START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT
CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

June 1994

Camera Operator:
John Sullivan

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER:
BSO-56-043

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library
(August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks
(Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959

VOL	TITLE	DATES
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copy-right law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: [✓ IA] IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 14X

FILM STOCK: Kodak
IMAGELINK™ HQ
MICROFILM
35mm x 30.5m · 100ft
Sp 425
DEVELOP BEFORE 05/1996
1461-0341-012-06
CAT 840 3594
04-08
Kodak

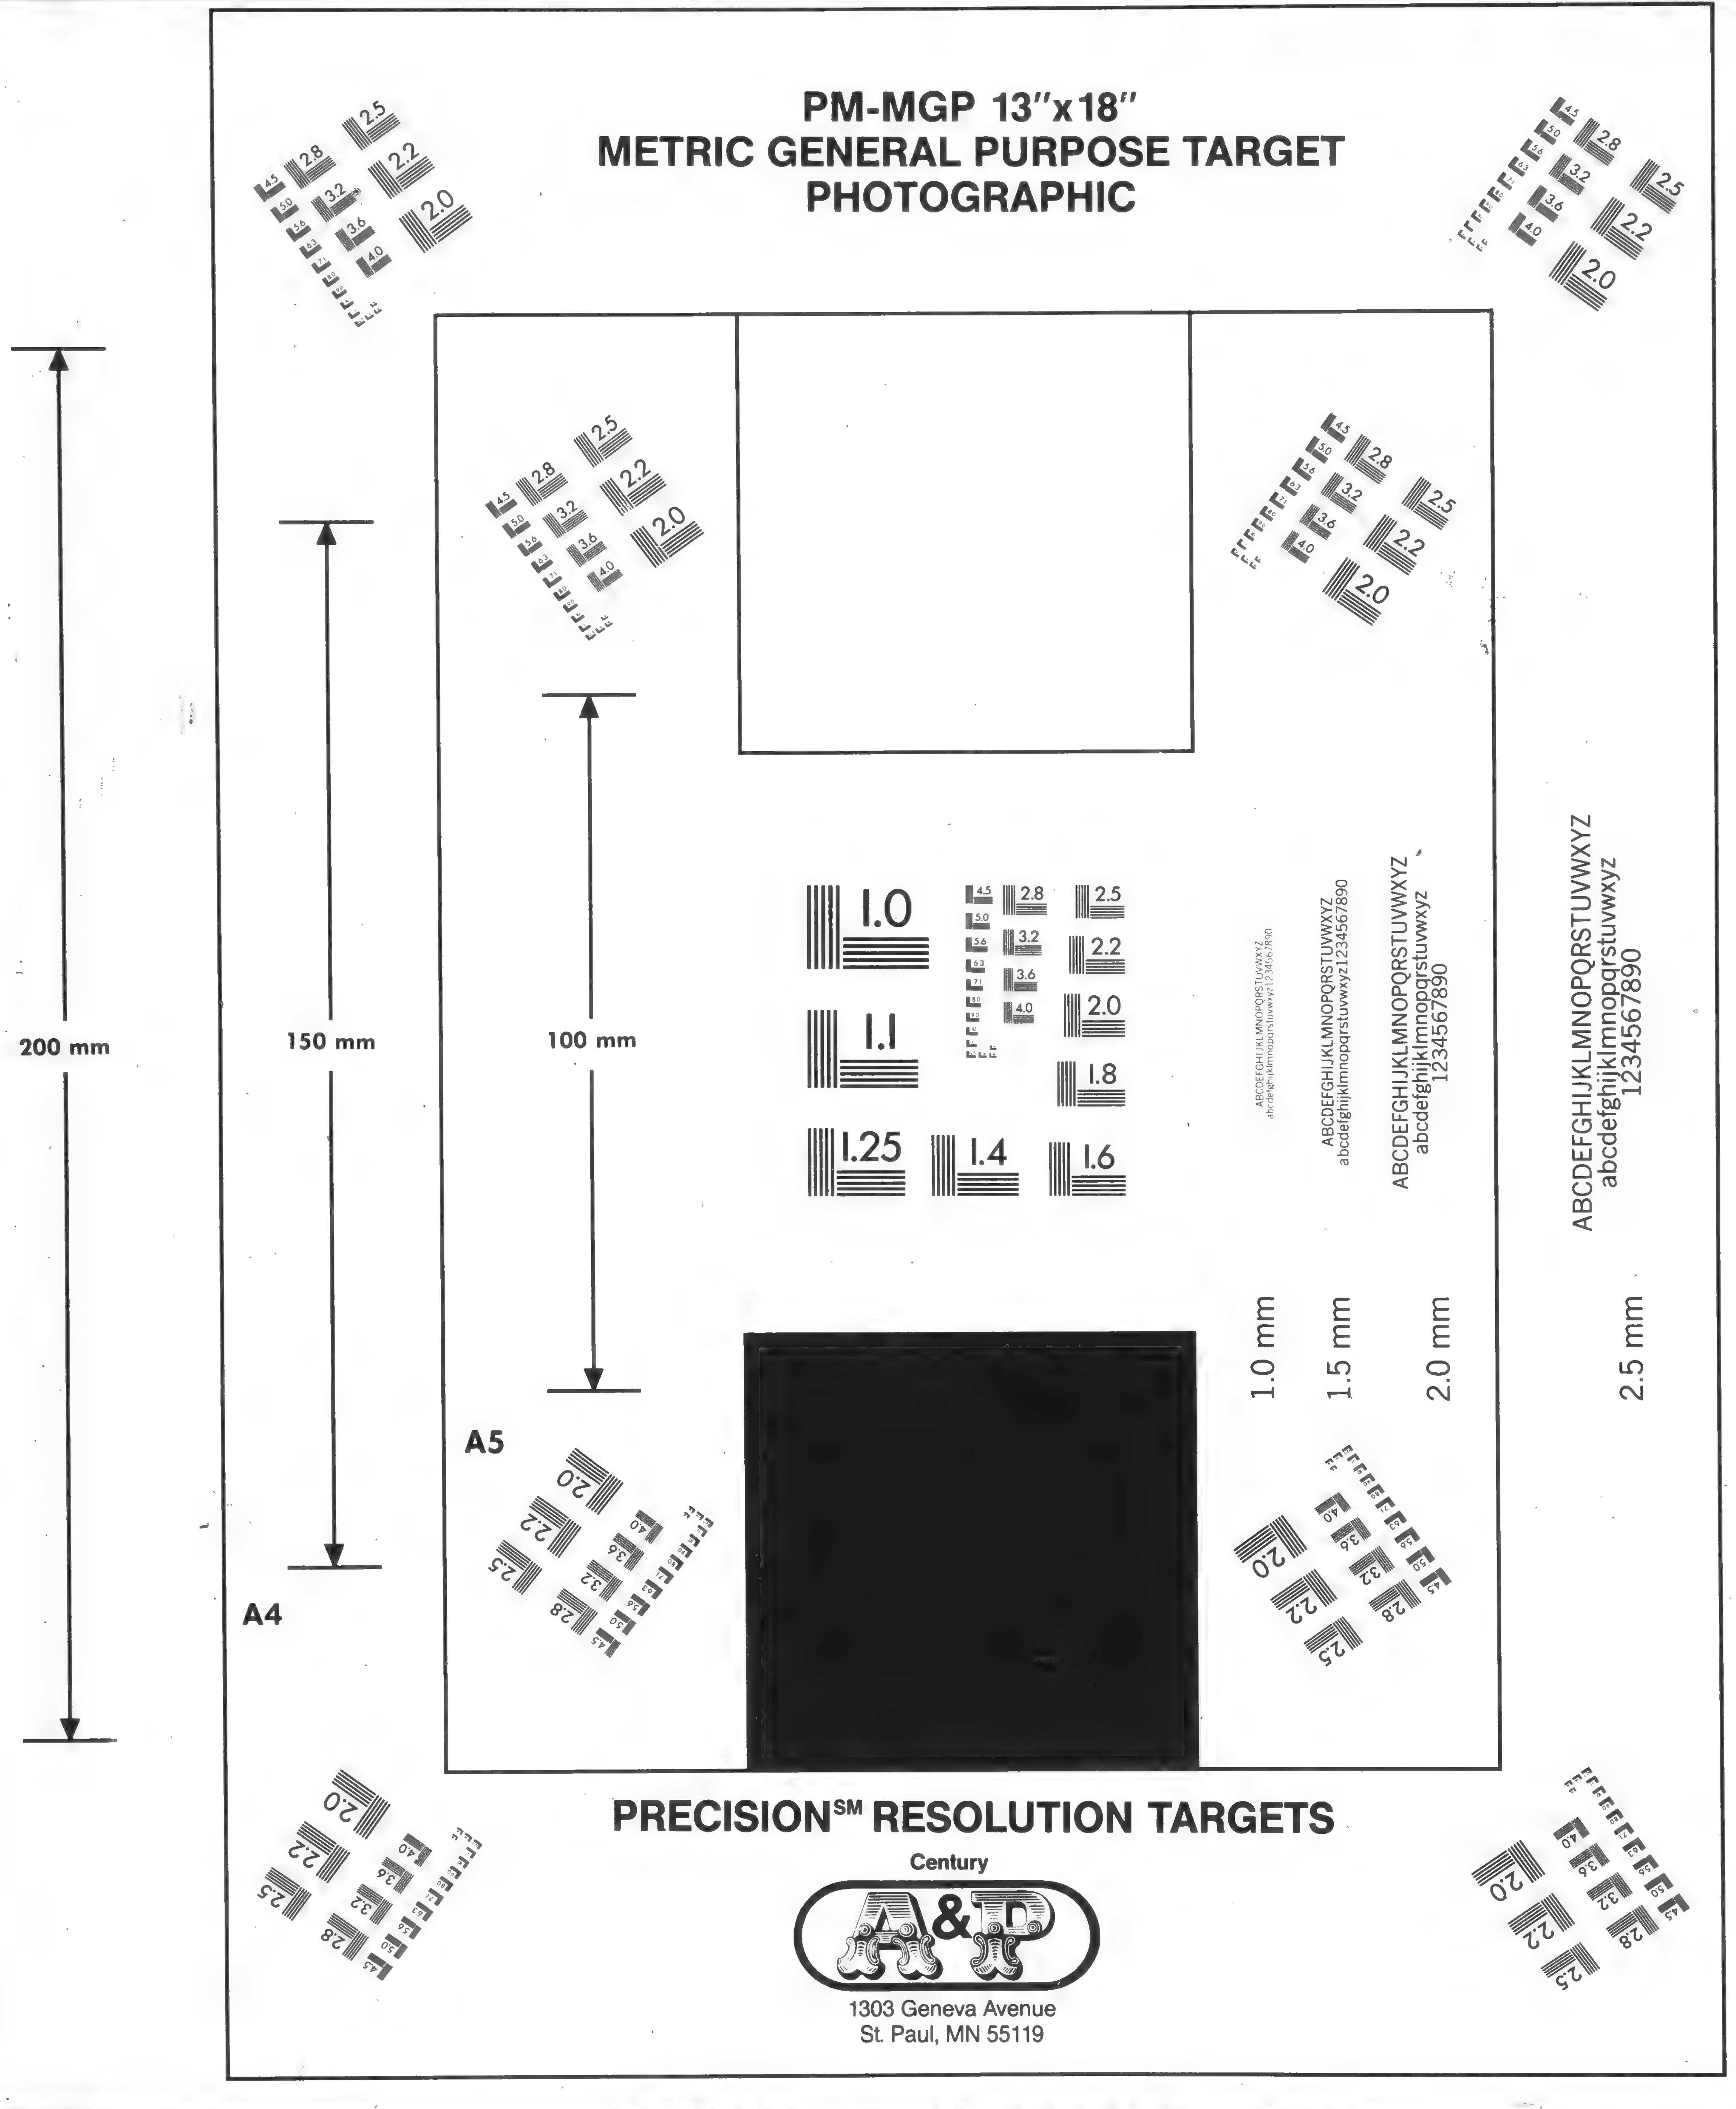
REEL 43

Volume78

BSO

1947-1949

PM-MGP 13″x 18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P 1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES
DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 78

BSO

1947 - 1949

NATIONAL FLAT BACK SCRAP BOOKS

Made in U.S.A.

FULL DUCK COVER, MANILA PAPER
Without Index, Ruling, Paging or Title

NUMBER	THICKNESS	SIZE
1032	72 Leaves	12⅝ × 10¼
1033	72 Leaves	15 × 10
1034	100 Leaves	15 × 10
1036	90 Leaves	16 × 11⅜
1038	150 Leaves	16 × 11⅜
1039	90 Leaves	18 × 13
→ 1041	150 Leaves	18 × 13
1042	150 Leaves	25 × 20

To duplicate this book Order Number indicated by arrow

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N. Y.

SEP 1 - 1947

Bach: Suites Nos. 2 and 3. Boston Symphony Orchestra; Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Georges Laurent, flute. Victor M/DM-1123, 12", 5 discs, $5.85.

Like his Brandenburg Concertos Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of these two suites will not completely satisfy the Bach purists. His way with the third suite, for example, is rather the sort of thing virtuoso conductors have always done with Handel, and we seek in vain in this set for the cleanness and balance which made the recordings of this music by Adolf Busch so outstanding (Victor M-332 and M-339). For all that, these performances are bound to please the conductor's special following, which is a large one. The recording is first rate.

READERS DIGEST
PLEASANTVILLE, N. Y.

SEP - 1947

On Friday afternoons in autumn, Boston is rent by a great schism. The Red Sox are playing the season's crucial games at Fenway Park, the Boston Symphony is giving its opening concerts, and the natives must choose between sports and music. Last year, however, at Symphony Hall the twain met.

On one side of me sat an ill-at-ease young man who quickly identified himself as a prisoner in enemy territory: "I was dragged here by my wife and it's a crime, when I could be seeing the ball game." On my other side was an elderly dowager, in Queen Mary hat, pearl choker and fur tippet, who seemed in her element, leaning forward with a rapt expression. She spoke only once — after the baseball fan had asked me for the third time what I thought the score was.

"Please tell that young man," she whispered, "that the Red Sox are ahead six to two."

I relayed the message. "You're kidding," protested the young man. "How would she know?"

The lady nudged me and furtively pointed to a large knitting bag in her lap. In it was a miniature radio, and as Dr. Koussevitzky raised his baton to begin the last number on the program, to my astonishment I caught a muted voice from another world saying, "Here's the pitch. . . ."

—Sherwood Rollins, Jr. (Boston, Mass.)

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N. Y.

SEP 1 - 1947

Bach: Brandenburg Concertos nos. 2 and 5. Boston Symphony Orchestra; Roger Voisin, trumpet; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe; Richard Burgin, violin; Lukas Foss, piano; Serge Koussevitzky, conductor (recorded at Tanglewood). Victor M/DM-1118, 12", 4 discs, $4.85.

This is the second volume of what may eventually be another complete recording of the six Brandenburg Concertos; nos. 3 and 4 were released just a year ago in performances like the present ones made by Koussevitzky at Tanglewood (Victor M-1050). The conductor has quite properly reduced his orchestra to suit the essentially "chamber" character of these works; the special "Bach trumpet" in D-flat is used in the fiendishly difficult part Bach wrote for it; and we are assured by the sponsoring company that this is "Bach played as it should be."

But turning back to the Busch recording of the six concertos (Columbia M-249 and M-250), we sense at once just what is lacking in intimacy as Koussevitzky's admirable forces perform the music. The first movement of the second concerto seems rather driven here and the second lacks serenity. The fact that neither the harpsichord nor the piano is used to realize the continuo part is here especially noticeable, for the movement becomes a quartet for flute, oboe, violin and cello.

In the fifth concerto I have always felt some disappointment with the Busch recording because the tempi are slower than I like, and the excellent Mr. Serkin lingers inordinately over the details of the long cadenza. I prefer the drive of Cortot's performance here (Victor 7863-64) and I find something of the same quality in Mr. Foss. But I do not feel that the new version of the Affetuoso hangs together as well as it might, though turning back to Cortot I note that here his tempo is too fast. In the final Allegro again I like Cortot. Those who insist that the modern piano spoils this work will have to search long and patiently for copies of the recording conducted by Melichar, in which Franz Rupp was the harpsichord soloist (Polydor 15073-76).

Septembe

nificant than the controls established by the government on behalf of the public interest."

Llewellyn White is assistant director of the much maligned Commission on Freedom of the Press which is guided by Chicago's Robert Hutchins. With notable exceptions the practitioners—press, radio and movies—have met the commission's criticism with an ungracious civility. They seem to have shown that their hides are thinner than their bankbooks. This book, too, will draw much fire from those in radio.

Technically, Author White takes radio from Marconi through FM and beyond into television. Economically, he reviews the commercial pressures that have beset radio, the struggle with ASCAP and Petrillo, the formation of the National Association of Broadcasters, the tangled development of national networks and the pre-empting of choice frequencies by those who staked out the first claims. Governmentally, he takes us through Hoover's early attempts at regulation, various FCC cases and the recent Blue Book approach. On this point he says that the Blue Book maneuver was "at least superficially successful" if all that it intended was to "throw a good scare into the boys."

Despite its 260 pages, this is a big book. It is worth regretting that its price could not have been held down to a dollar to assure deserved wider circulation. White winds up with an appeal that the public make known its wants. Throughout the pages there is more than inference that the

---

MENASHA, WIS.
CRESSET

SEP - 1947

Breaking Lances

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY: The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New American Music. By Hugo Leichtentritt. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, Massachusetts. 1947. 199 pages. Illustrated. $3.00.

No one can write an accurate history of music as it has flourished—and sometimes languished—in our land without stressing the achievements—and the shortcomings—of the conductors of our important symphony orchestras. Almost to a man the maestri have been foreign-born and foreign-trained. Some of them have been cold or, at best, lukewarm toward the cause of American music; some have espoused that cause with admirable zeal.

Serge Koussevitzky came to this country in 1924 to preside over the musical destiny of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He had gained much fame in Europe as a player of the double-bass; he had achieved some measure of renown as a conductor. Boston wanted the best it could get, and the directors of the orchestra, which had seen good days and bad days, decided that Koussevitzky was their man.

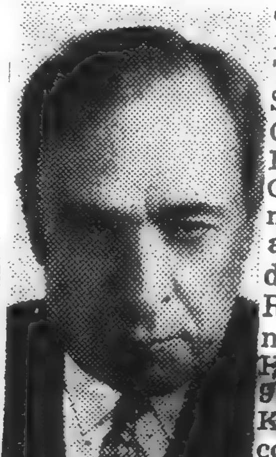
Koussevitzky showed unusual acumen in the make-up of the very first program he presented in the United States. He would give the Boston audiences music by revered composers of the distant past. Therefore he

---

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

SEP 2 - 1947

Following its patterned-programming policy, ABC network makes Tuesday a "serious" night of discussion and music as of now. Tonight at 8:30, Screen Writers Guild President Emmett Lavery, Ginger Rogers' mother (Lela) and others will discuss "Is There Really a Communist Threat in Hollywood." At 9:30 Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony. AFL Secretary-Treasurer George Meany will speak on Labor-USA at 10:30. Town meeting shifts after 12 years on Thursdays.



Dr. Koussevitzky

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

SEP 2 1947

Don Tranter's

Radio Comment

Local network outlets have indicated that they will carry President Truman's address from Rio de Janeiro this morning, in live form with one exception—WBEN which has scheduled the speech for rebroadcast at 1 p. m.

Time set for the original broadcast, at this writing, is 9.30 a. m.

America's Town Meeting of the Air takes its new spot at 8.30 o'clock tonight over WKBW, in line with the ABC network's intention to make its Tuesday evening schedule one for programs of a rather serious nature.

Dave Rose

The Boston Symphony concerts will be shifted to 9.30 o'clock and the web is now busily arranging a series of news and comment periods to fill out the list before and after the two hour long features. These include Elmer Davis, the Christian Science Monitor Views and there'll probably be another of similar nature in the 8 o'clock spot when Lum and Abner switch over to CBS and WGR later this month.

What it amounts to is a pitch against NBC's heavy comedy schedule for Tuesdays, ABC figuring to snare the lion's share of non-cemedy listeners.

ALEXANDRIA, IND.
TIMES-TRIBUNE

SEP 2 - 1947

Phonograph Vs. "Live" Orchestra

LENOX, Mass. — (UP) — Pitting a phonograph against a full symphony orchestra and inviting an audience to tell when the orchestra leaves off playing and the phonograph picks up is quite an acoustical stunt.

It was tried out successfully by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra during this summer's Berkshire Music Festival at the Tanglewood estate outside Lenox.

The demonstration was held in the big music shed, seating 6,000. Another 1,000 listened on the lawn outside. The occasion was the public introduction of The Berkshire, a new instrument developed by RCA Victor and named in honor of the Tanglewood festival.

This combination radio, television and phonograph set is aimed at making available in the home a wider range of tonal reproduction, bringing out qualities hitherto lost.

The orchestra, in the course of a long program, played the Beethoven "Egmont" Overture. Midway in the performance, the "live" musicians ceased playing and the phonograph took over. The change, under the ideal acoustical conditions of the music shed, was almost imperceptible.

Not For Apartments

Of course, the instrument used as a de luxe model which will retail at $4,000 is over-elaborate for apartment dwellers or small home owners. The price range of the "custom built" line is from $1,800 to $4,000

The phonograph demonstration was part of a day-long program called "Music for All" which traced the development of reproduction by phonograph, radio and television over the last 30 years.

Recordings by the Boston Symphony since that organization first began making records for Victor in 1917 were played on machines of the period, giving a graphic picture of how the tonal range has been more fully captured over the decades.

During the course of events, movies were made of the audience to be incorporated in a forthcoming film by MGM, dramatizing the history and growth of the festival, along the lines of the recent production which glorified Carnegie Hall.

It was announced that the first 200 sets of the new Berkshire instrument line will be sold on a subscription basis, the proceeds to benefit the Berkshire Music Center scholarship fund. A silver plaque, with the customer's name and Dr. Koussevitzky's signature, will be placed in each set.

WALLACE, IDAHO
PRESS-TIMES

SEP 2 1947

Symphony Conductor Marries

(NEA Telephoto)

Serge Koussevitsky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, poses with his bride, the former Olga Noumoof, as they left on honeymoon trip aboard the SS Queen Elizabeth from New York City. She was his secretary for 18 years prior to their secret marriage at Lenox, Mass.

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEP 1 - 1947

ach: Suites Nos. 2 and 3. Boston Symphony rchestra; Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Georges Laurent, flute. Victor M/DM-1123, 12", 5 discs, $5.85.

Like his Brandenburg Concertos Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of these two suites will not completely satisfy the Bach purists. His way with the third suite, for example, is rather the sort of thing virtuoso conductors have always done with Handel, and we seek in vain in this set for the cleanness and balance which made the recordings of this music by Adolf Busch so outstanding (Victor M-332 and M-339). For all that, these performances are bound to please the conductor's special following, which is a large one. The recording is first rate.

READERS DIGEST
PLEASANTVILLE, N. Y.
SEP - 1947

On Friday afternoons in autumn, Boston is rent by a great schism. The ed Sox are playing the season's cru al games at Fenway Park, the Boston ymphony is giving its opening con erts, and the natives must choose be ween sports and music. Last year, owever, at Symphony Hall the twain et.

On one side of me sat an ill-at-ease oung man who quickly identified him lf as a prisoner in enemy territory: "I as dragged here by my wife and it's a me, when I could be seeing the ball me." On my other side was an elderly wager, in Queen Mary hat, pearl oker and fur tippet, who seemed in element, leaning forward with a expression. She spoke only once — r the baseball fan had asked me for third time what I thought the score

"Please tell that young man," she spered, "that the Red Sox are ahead two."

elayed the message. "You're kid-" protested the young man. "How d she know?"

e lady nudged me and furtively ed to a large knitting bag in her n it was a miniature radio, and as Koussevitsky raised his baton to the last number on the program, astonishment I caught a muted from another world saying, 's the pitch. . . ."

—Sherwood Rollins, Jr. (Boston, Mass.)

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEP 1 - 1947

Bach: Brandenburg Concertos nos. 2 and 5. Boston Symphony Orchestra; Roger Voisin, trumpet; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe; Richard Burgin, violin; Lukas Foss, piano; Serge Koussevitzky, conductor (recorded at Tanglewood). Victor M/DM-1118, 12", 4 discs, $4.85.

This is the second volume of what may eventually be another complete recording of the six Brandenburg Concertos; nos. 3 and 4 were released just a year ago in performances like the present ones made by Koussevitzky at Tanglewood (Victor M-1050). The conductor has quite properly reduced his orchestra to suit the essentially "chamber" character of these works; the special "Bach trumpet" in D-flat is used in the fiendishly difficult part Bach wrote for it; and we are assured by the sponsoring company that this is "Bach played as it should be."

But turning back to the Busch recording of the six concertos (Columbia M-249 and M-250), we sense at once just what is lacking in intimacy as Koussevitzky's admirable forces perform the music. The first movement of the second concerto seems rather driven here and the second lacks serenity. The fact that neither the harpsichord nor the piano is used to realize the continuo part is here especially noticeable, for the movement becomes a quartet for flute, oboe, violin and cello.

In the fifth concerto I have always felt some disappointment with the Busch recording because the tempi are slower than I like, and the excellent Mr. Serkin lingers inordinately over the details of the long cadenza. I prefer the drive of Cortot's performance here (Victor 7863-64) and I find something of the same quality in Mr. Foss. But I do not feel that the new version of the Affetuoso hangs together as well as it might, though turning back to Cortot I note that here his tempo is too fast. In the final Allegro again I like Cortot. Those who insist that the modern piano spoils this work will have to search long and patiently for copies of the recording conducted by Melichar, in which Franz Rupp was the harpsichord soloist (Polydor 15073-76).

MENASHA, WIS.
CRESSET
SEP - 1947

Septemb

nificant than the controls established by the government on behalf of the public interest."

Llewellyn White is assistant director of the much maligned Commission on Freedom of the Press which is guided by Chicago's Robert Hutchins. With notable exceptions the practitioners—press, radio and movies—have met the commission's criticism with an ungracious civility. They seem to have shown that their hides are thinner than their bankbooks. This book, too, will draw much fire from those in radio.

Technically, Author White takes radio from Marconi through FM and beyond into television. Economically, he reviews the commercial pressures that have beset radio, the struggle with ASCAP and Petrillo, the formation of the National Association of Broadcasters, the tangled development of national networks and the pre-empting of choice frequencies by those who staked out the first claims. Governmentally, he takes us through Hoover's early attempts at regulation, various FCC cases and the recent Blue Book approach. On this point he says that the Blue Book maneuver was "at least superficially successful" if all that it intended was to "throw a good scare into the boys."

Despite its 260 pages, this is a big book. It is worth regretting that its price could not have been held down to a dollar to assure deserved wider circulation. White winds up with an appeal that the public make known its wants. Throughout the pages there is more than inference that the

Breaking Lances

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY: The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New American Music. By Hugo Leichtentritt. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, Massachusetts. 1947. 199 pages. Illustrated. $3.00.

No one can write an accurate history of music as it has flourished—and sometimes languished—in our land without stressing the achievements—and the shortcomings—of the conductors of our important symphony orchestras. Almost to a man the maestri have been foreign-born and foreign-trained. Some of them have been cold or, at best, lukewarm toward the cause of American music; some have espoused that cause with admirable zeal.

Serge Koussevitzky came to this country in 1924 to preside over the musical destiny of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He had gained much fame in Europe as a player of the double-bass; he had achieved some measure of renown as a conductor. Boston wanted the best it could get, and the directors of the orchestra, which had seen good days and bad days, decided that Koussevitzky was their man.

Koussevitzky showed unusual acumen in the make-up of the very first program he presented in the United States. He would give the Boston audiences music by revered composers of the distant past. Therefore he

---

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
SEP 2 - 1947

Following its patterned-programming policy, ABC network makes Tuesday a "serious" night of discussion and music as of now. Tonight at 8:30, Screen Writers Guild President Emmett Lavery, Ginger Rogers' mother (Lela) and others will discuss "Is There Really a Communist Threat in Hollywood." At [illegible] Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony. AFL Secretary-Treasurer George Meany will speak on Labor-USA at 10:30. Town meeting shifts after 12 years on Thursdays.

Dr. Koussevitzky

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
SEP 2 1947

Don Tranter's

Radio Comment

Local network outlets have indicated that they will carry President Truman's address from Rio de Janeiro this morning, in live form with one exception—WBEN which has scheduled the speech for rebroadcast at 1 p. m.

Time set for the original broadcast, at this writing, is 9.30 a. m.

America's Town Meeting of the Air takes its new spot at 8.30 o'clock tonight over WKBW, in line with the ABC network intention to make its Tuesday evening schedule one for programs of a rather serious nature.

Dave Rose

The Boston Symphony concerts will be shifted to 9.30 o'clock and the web is now busily arranging a series of news and comment periods to fill out the list before and after the two hour long features. These include Elmer Davis, the Christian Science Monitor Views and there'll probably be another of similar nature in the 8 o'clock spot when Lum and Abner switch over to CBS and WGR later this month.

What it amounts to is a pitch against NBC's heavy comedy schedule for Tuesdays, ABC figuring to snare the lion's share of non-cemedy listeners.

ALEXANDRIA, IND.
[illegible]

Phonograph Vs. "Live" Orchestra

LENOX, Mass. — (UP) — Pitting a phonograph against a full symphony orchestra and inviting an audience to tell when the orchestra leaves off playing and the phonograph picks up is quite an acoustical stunt.

It was tried out successfully by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra during this summer's Berkshire Music Festival at the Tanglewood estate outside Lenox.

The demonstration was held in the big music shed, seating 6,000. Another 1,000 listened on the lawn outside. The occasion was the public introduction of The Berkshire a new instrument developed by RCA Victor and named in honor of the Tanglewood festival.

This combination radio, television and phonograph set is aimed at making available in the home a wider range of tonal reproduction bringing out qualities hitherto lost.

The orchestra, in the course of a long program, played the Beethoven "Egmont" Overture. Midway in the performance, the "live" musicians ceased playing and the phonograph took over. The change, under the ideal acoustical conditions of the music shed, was almost imperceptible.

Not For Apartments

Of course, the instrument used as a de luxe model which will retail at $4,000 is over-elaborate for apartment dwellers or small home owners. The price range of the "custom built" line is from $1,800 to $4,000

The phonograph demonstration was part of a day-long program called "Music for All" which traced the development of reproduction by phonograph, radio and television over the last 30 years.

Recordings by the Boston Symphony since that organization first began making records for Victor in 1917 were played on machines of the period, giving a graphic picture of how the tonal range has been more fully captured over the decades.

During the course of events, movies were made of the audience to be incorporated in a forthcoming film by MGM, dramatizing the history and growth of the festival, along the lines of the recent production which glorified Carnegie Hall.

It was announced that the first 200 sets of the new Berkshire instrument line will be sold on a subscription basis, the proceeds to benefit the Berkshire Music Center scholarship fund. A silver plaque, with the customer's name and Dr. Koussevitzky's signature, will be placed in each set.

[illegible] IDAHO
PRESS-TIMES
SE

Symphony Conductor Marries

(NEA Telephoto)

Serge Koussevitsky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, poses with his bride, the former Olga Noumoof, as they left on honeymoon trip aboard the SS Queen Elizabeth from New York City. She was his secretary for 18 years prior to their secret marriage at Lenox, Mass.

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEP 1 - 1947 ✓

[illegible]ch: Suites Nos. 2 and 3. Boston Symphony [illegible]chestra; Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; [illegible]orges Laurent, flute. Victor M/DM-1123, 1[illegible]", 5 discs, $5.85.

[illegible]ike his Brandenburg Concertos Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of these two suites will not completely satisfy the Bach purists. His way with the third suite, for example, is rather the sort of thing virtuoso conductors have always done with Handel, and we seek in vain in this set for the cleanness and balance which made the recordings of this music by Adolf Busch so outstanding (Victor M-332 and M-339). For all that, these performances are bound to please the conductor's special following, which is a large one. The recording is first rate.

READERS DIGEST
[illegible]LEASANTVILLE, N. Y.
SEP - 1947

[illegible]N FRIDAY afternoons in autumn, [illegible]on is rent by a great schism. The [illegible] Sox are playing the season's cru[illegible]games at Fenway Park, the Boston [illegible]phony is giving its opening con[illegible], and the natives must choose be[illegible] sports and music. Last year, [illegible]ver, at Symphony Hall the twain [illegible]

[illegible] one side of me sat an ill-at-ease [illegible] man who quickly identified him[illegible] a prisoner in enemy territory: "I [illegible]agged here by my wife and it's a [illegible] when I could be seeing the ball [illegible] On my other side was an elderly [illegible]r, in Queen Mary hat, pearl [illegible] and fur tippet, who seemed in [illegible]ment, leaning forward with a [illegible]pression. She spoke only once — [illegible]e baseball fan had asked me for [illegible] time what I thought the score [illegible]

[illegible]e tell that young man," she [illegible]ed, "that the Red Sox are ahead [illegible]o."

[illegible]ed the message. "You're kid[illegible]rotested the young man. "How [illegible]e know?"

[illegible]dy nudged me and furtively [illegible] to a large knitting bag in her [illegible] was a miniature radio, and as [illegible]ssevitsky raised his baton to [illegible] last number on the program, [illegible]tonishment I caught a muted [illegible]om another world saying, [illegible]he pitch. . . ."

—SHERWOOD ROLLINS, JR. (Boston, Mass.)

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEP 1 - 1947 ✓

Bach: Brandenburg Concertos nos. 2 and 5. Boston Symphony Orchestra; Roger Voisin, trumpet; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe; Richard Burgin, violin; Lukas Foss, piano; Serge Koussevitzky, conductor (recorded at Tanglewood). Victor M/DM-1118, 12", 4 discs, $4.85.

This is the second volume of what may eventually be another complete recording of the six Brandenburg Concertos; nos. 3 and 4 were released just a year ago in performances like the present ones made by Koussevitzky at Tanglewood (Victor M-1050). The conductor has quite properly reduced his orchestra to suit the essentially "chamber" character of these works; the special "Bach trumpet" in D-flat is used in the fiendishly difficult part Bach wrote for it; and we are assured by the sponsoring company that this is "Bach played as it should be."

But turning back to the Busch recording of the six concertos (Columbia M-249 and M-250), we sense at once just what is lacking in intimacy as Koussevitzky's admirable forces perform the music. The first movement of the second concerto seems rather driven here and the second lacks serenity. The fact that neither the harpsichord nor the piano is used to realize the continuo part is here especially noticeable, for the movement becomes a quartet for flute, oboe, violin and cello.

In the fifth concerto I have always felt some disappointment with the Busch recording because the tempi are slower than I like, and the excellent Mr. Serkin lingers inordinately over the details of the long cadenza. I prefer the drive of Cortot's performance here (Victor 7863-64) and I find something of the same quality in Mr. Foss. But I do not feel that the new version of the Affetuoso hangs together as well as it might, though turning back to Cortot I note that here his tempo is too fast. In the final Allegro again I like Cortot. Those who insist that the modern piano spoils this work will have to search long and patiently for copies of the recording conducted by Melichar, in which Franz Rupp was the harpsichord soloist (Polydor 15073-76).

[illegible]nificant than the controls estab[illegible] by the government on be[illegible] public interest."

Llewellyn White is [illegible] tor of the much malign[illegible] sion on Freedom of the [illegible] is guided by Chicago's Robe[illegible] ins. With notable exceptio[illegible] practitioners—press, radio and movies —have met the commission's criticism with an ungracious civility. They seem to have shown that their hides are thinner than their bankbooks. This book, too, will draw much fire from those in radio.

Technically, Author White takes radio from Marconi through FM and beyond into television. Economically, he reviews the commercial pressures that have beset radio, the struggle with ASCAP and Petrillo, the formation of the National Association of Broadcasters, the tangled development of national networks and the pre-empting of choice frequencies by those who staked out the first claims. Governmentally, he takes us through Hoover's early attempts at regulation, various FCC cases and the recent Blue Book approach. On this point he says that the Blue Book maneuver was "at least superficially successful" if all that it intended was to "throw a good scare into the boys."

Despite its 260 pages, this is a big book. It is worth regretting that its price could not have been held down to a dollar to assure deserved wider circulation. White winds up with an appeal that the public make known its wants. Throughout the pages there is more than inference that the [illegible] do not deserve freedom [illegible]until they divorce themselves from [illegible]he advertising agencies

RAY SCHERER

[illegible]king Lances

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY: The Boston Symphony Orchestra and the New American Music. By Hugo Leichtentritt. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, Massachusetts. 1947. 199 pages. Illustrated. $3.00.

NO ONE can write an accurate history of music as it has flourished —and sometimes languished—in our land without stressing the achievements—and the shortcomings—of the conductors of our important symphony orchestras. Almost to a man the maestri have been foreign-born and foreign-trained. Some of them have been cold or, at best, lukewarm toward the cause of American music; some have espoused that cause with admirable zeal.

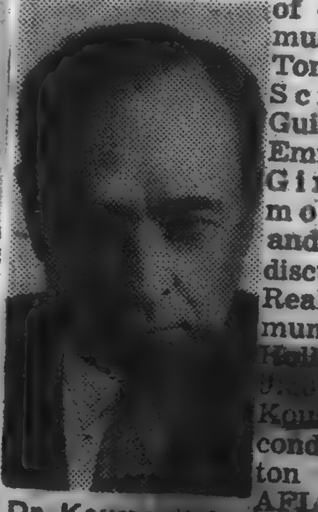
Serge Koussevitzky came to this country in 1924 to preside over the musical destiny of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He had gained much fame in Europe as a player of the double-bass; he had achieved some measure of renown as a conductor. Boston wanted the best it could get, and the directors of the orchestra, which had seen good days and bad days, decided that Koussevitzky was their man.

Koussevitzky showed unusual acumen in the make-up of the very first program he presented in the United States. He would give the Boston audiences music by revered composers of the distant past. Therefore he

X

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
[illegible] 2 - 1947

Following its patterned-programming policy, ABC network makes Tuesday a "serious" night of discussion and music as of now. Tonight at 8:30, Screen Writers Guild President Emmett Lavery, Ginger Rogers' mother (Lela) and others will discuss "Is There Really a Communist Threat in Hollywood." At [illegible] Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony. AFL Secretary-Treasurer George Meany will speak on Labor-USA at 10:30. Town meeting shifts after 12 years on Thursdays.



Dr. Koussevitzky

BUFFALO, N. Y.
[illegible]URIER-EXPRESS
SEP 2 1[illegible]

Don Tranter's
Radio Comment

Local network outlets have indicated that they will carry President Truman's address from Rio de Janeiro this morning, in live form with one exception—WBEN, which has scheduled the speech for rebroadcast at 1 p. m.

Time set for the original broadcast, at this writing, is 9.30 a. m.

America's Town Meeting of the Air takes its new spot at 8.30 o'clock tonight over WKBW, in line with the ABC network's intention to make its Tuesday evening schedule one for programs of a rather serious nature.

Dave Rose

The Boston Symphony concerts will be shifted to 9.30 o'clock and the web is now busily arranging a series of news and comment periods to fill out the list before and after the two hour long features. These include Elmer Davis, the Christian Science Monitor Views and there'll probably be another of similar nature in the 8 o'clock spot when Lum and Abner switch over to CBS and WGR later this month.

What it amounts to is a pitch against NBC's heavy comedy schedule for Tuesdays, ABC figuring to snare the lion's share of non-comedy listeners.

[illegible], IND.
[illegible]

Phonograph Vs. "Live" Orchestra

LENOX, Mass. — (UP) — Pitting a phonograph against a full symphony orchestra and inviting an audience to tell when the orchestra leaves off playing and the phonograph picks up is quite an acoustical stunt.

It was tried out successfully by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra during this summer's Berkshire Music Festival at the Tanglewood estate outside Lenox.

The demonstration was held in the big music shed, seating 6,000. Another 1,000 listened on the lawn outside. The occasion was the public introduction of The Berkshire, a new instrument developed by RCA Victor and named in honor of the Tanglewood festival.

This combination radio, television and phonograph set is aimed at making available in the home a wider range of tonal reproduction, bringing out qualities hitherto lost.

The orchestra, in the course of a long program, played the Beethoven "Egmont" Overture. Midway in the performance, the "live" musicians ceased playing and the phonograph took over. The change, under the ideal acoustical conditions of the music shed, was almost imperceptible.

Not For Apartments

Of course, the instrument used as a de luxe model which will retail at $4,000 is over-elaborate for apartment dwellers or small home owners. The price range of the "custom built" line is from $1,800 to $4,000.

The phonograph demonstration was part of a day-long program called "Music for All" which traced the development of reproduction by phonograph, radio and television over the last 30 years.

Recordings by the Boston Symphony since that organization first began making records for Victor in 1917 were played on machines of the period, giving a graphic picture of how the tonal range has been more fully captured over the decades.

During the course of events, movies were made of the audience to be incorporated in a forthcoming film by MGM, dramatizing the history and growth of the festival, along the lines of the recent production which glorified Carnegie Hall.

It was announced that the first 200 sets of the new Berkshire instrument line will be sold on a subscription basis, the proceeds to benefit the Berkshire Music Center scholarship fund. A silver plaque, with the customer's name and Dr. Koussevitzky's signature, will be placed in each set.

[illegible] IDAHO
PRESS-TIMES
SE[illegible]

Symphony Conductor Marries

(NEA Telephoto)

Serge Koussevitsky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Berkshire Music Center, poses with his bride, the former Olga Noumoof, as they left on honeymoon trip aboard the SS Queen Elizabeth from New York City. She was his secretary for 18 years prior to their secret marriage at Lenox, Mass.

[4]

selected a work from the pen of Antonio Vivaldi. He would listen attentively to the neighing of the sturdy war horses. For this reason he conducted a composition by Hector Berlioz. He would have place on his programs for profundity of expression. Consequently, he included music written by Brahms. He would not eschew novelties of genuine worth. This resolution led him to perform Arthur Honegger's much-discussed Pacific 231. He would pay tribute to writers born in his native Russia. So he gave the Bostonians an opportunity to sink their teeth into Scriabin's Poem of Ecstacy.

The new conductor had determined to do his part in fostering works composed by Americans. Hugo Leichtentritt points out that he tested the ground cautiously. In those days music of American origin was, for the most part, viewed with condescension and, at times, with more than a little suspicion by most Europeans and, unfortunately, by altogether too many denizens of the United States. Nevertheless, Koussevitzky had made up his mind to break lances for American composers who, in his opinion, produced works of indisputable worth.

Since 1924 Koussevitzky has rendered an invaluable service to music composed in the United States. Dr. Leichtentritt's excellent book deals in detail with the American works which, for more than a score of years, have been presented under the able and exacting leadership of the famous conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In addition, the learned author analyzes and evaluates the compositions. Profound erudition is reflected on every page of the eminent musicologist's volume. Some of the chapter heads will show how substantially Dr. Leichtentritt discusses the American works performed under Koussevitzky's direction. He deals, for example, with "Two Older Generations of American Composers," with the "Second Phase of American Symphonic Writing," with "French Impressionism and Exoticism in American Music," with the "First Wave of Americanism in Music," with "Illustrative American Program Music," with "Judaism in American Music," with "The Russian-American School—and Others," and with "The New Americanism of the Thirties and Forties." Besides, the book contains a brief biographical sketch of Boston's renowned conductor and chapters devoted to Koussevitzky the artist and Koussevitzky the educator. The following statement is worth pondering:

> Koussevitzky's manifold activities, his international affiliations, and his authority in a multitude of fields are at present unique in America; altogether they represent the maximum of active power and influence ever accorded to a musician in this country.

Dr. Leichtentritt's book is, in sum and substance, a eulogy of Koussevitzky. In a later issue of The Cresset there will be a review of another volume on the famous conductor—a volume which sets forth the greatness of the man and, at the same time, shows that he, like all mortals, has feet of clay.

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEP 1 - 1947

Bach: Suites Nos. 2 and 3. Boston Symphony Orchestra; Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Georges Laurent, flute. Victor M/DM-1123, 12", 5 discs, $5.85.

Like his Brandenburg Concertos Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of these two suites will not completely satisfy the Bach purists. His way with the third suite, for example, is rather the sort of thing virtuoso conductors have always done with Handel, and we seek in vain in this set for the cleanness and balance which made the recordings of this music by Adolf Busch so outstanding (Victor M-332 and M-339). For all that, these performances are bound to please the conductor's special following, which is a large one. The recording is first rate.

READERS DIGEST
PLEASANTVILLE, N. Y.
SEP - 1947

On Friday afternoons in autumn, Boston is rent by a great schism. The Red Sox are playing the season's crucial games at Fenway Park, the Boston Symphony is giving its opening concerts, and the natives must choose between sports and music. Last year, however, at Symphony Hall the twain met.

On one side of me sat an ill-at-ease young man who quickly identified himself as a prisoner in enemy territory: "I was dragged here by my wife and it's a crime, when I could be seeing the ball game." On my other side was an elderly dowager, in Queen Mary hat, pearl choker and fur tippet, who seemed in her element, leaning forward with a rapt expression. She spoke only once — after the baseball fan had asked me for the third time what I thought the score was.

"Please tell that young man," she whispered, "that the Red Sox are ahead x to two."

I relayed the message. "You're kidding," protested the young man. "How could she know?"

The lady nudged me and furtively pointed to a large knitting bag in her p. In it was a miniature radio, and as . Koussevitzky raised his baton to begin the last number on the program, my astonishment I caught a muted ice from another world saying, Here's the pitch. . . ."

—Sherwood Rollins, Jr. (Boston, Mass.)

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEP 1 - 1947

Bach: Brandenburg Concertos nos.2 and 3. Boston Symphony Orchestra; Roger Voisin, trumpet; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gil-

---

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
SEP 2 - 1947

Following its patterned-programming policy, ABC network makes Tuesday a "serious" night of discussion and music as of now. Tonight at 8:30, Screen Writers Guild President Emmett Lavery, Ginger Rogers' mother (Lela) and others will discuss "Is There

---

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
SEP 2 1947

Don Tranter's

Radio Con

reign
ther

Local network outlets have dicated that they will carry President Truman's address from R de Janeiro this morning, in li form with one exception—WBEN which has scheduled the speec for rebroadcast at 1 p. m.

ALEXANDRIA, IND.
TIME [illegible] UNE
SE [illegible]

Phonograph Vs. "Live" Orchestra

LENOX, Mass. — (UP) — Pitting a phonograph against a full symphony orchestra and inviting an audience to tell when the orchestra leaves off playing and the phonograph picks up is quite an acoustical stunt.

It was tried out successfully by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra during this summer's Berkshire Music Festival at the Tanglewood estate outside Lenox.

The demonstration was held in the big music shed, seating 6,000. Another 1,000 listened on the lawn outside. The occasion was the public introduction of The Berkshire a new instrument developed by RCA Victor and named in honor of the Tanglewood festival.

This combination radio, television and phonograph set is aimed at making available in the home a wider range of tonal reproduction bringing out qualities hitherto lost.

The orchestra, in the course of a long program, played the Beethoven "Egmont" Overture. Midway in the performance, the "live" musicians ceased playing and the phonograph took over. The change, under the ideal acoustical conditions of the music shed, was almost imperceptible.

Not For Apartments

Of course, the instrument used as a de luxe model which will retail at $4,000 is over-elaborate for apartment dwellers or small home owners. The price range of the "custom built" line is from $1,800 to $4,000.

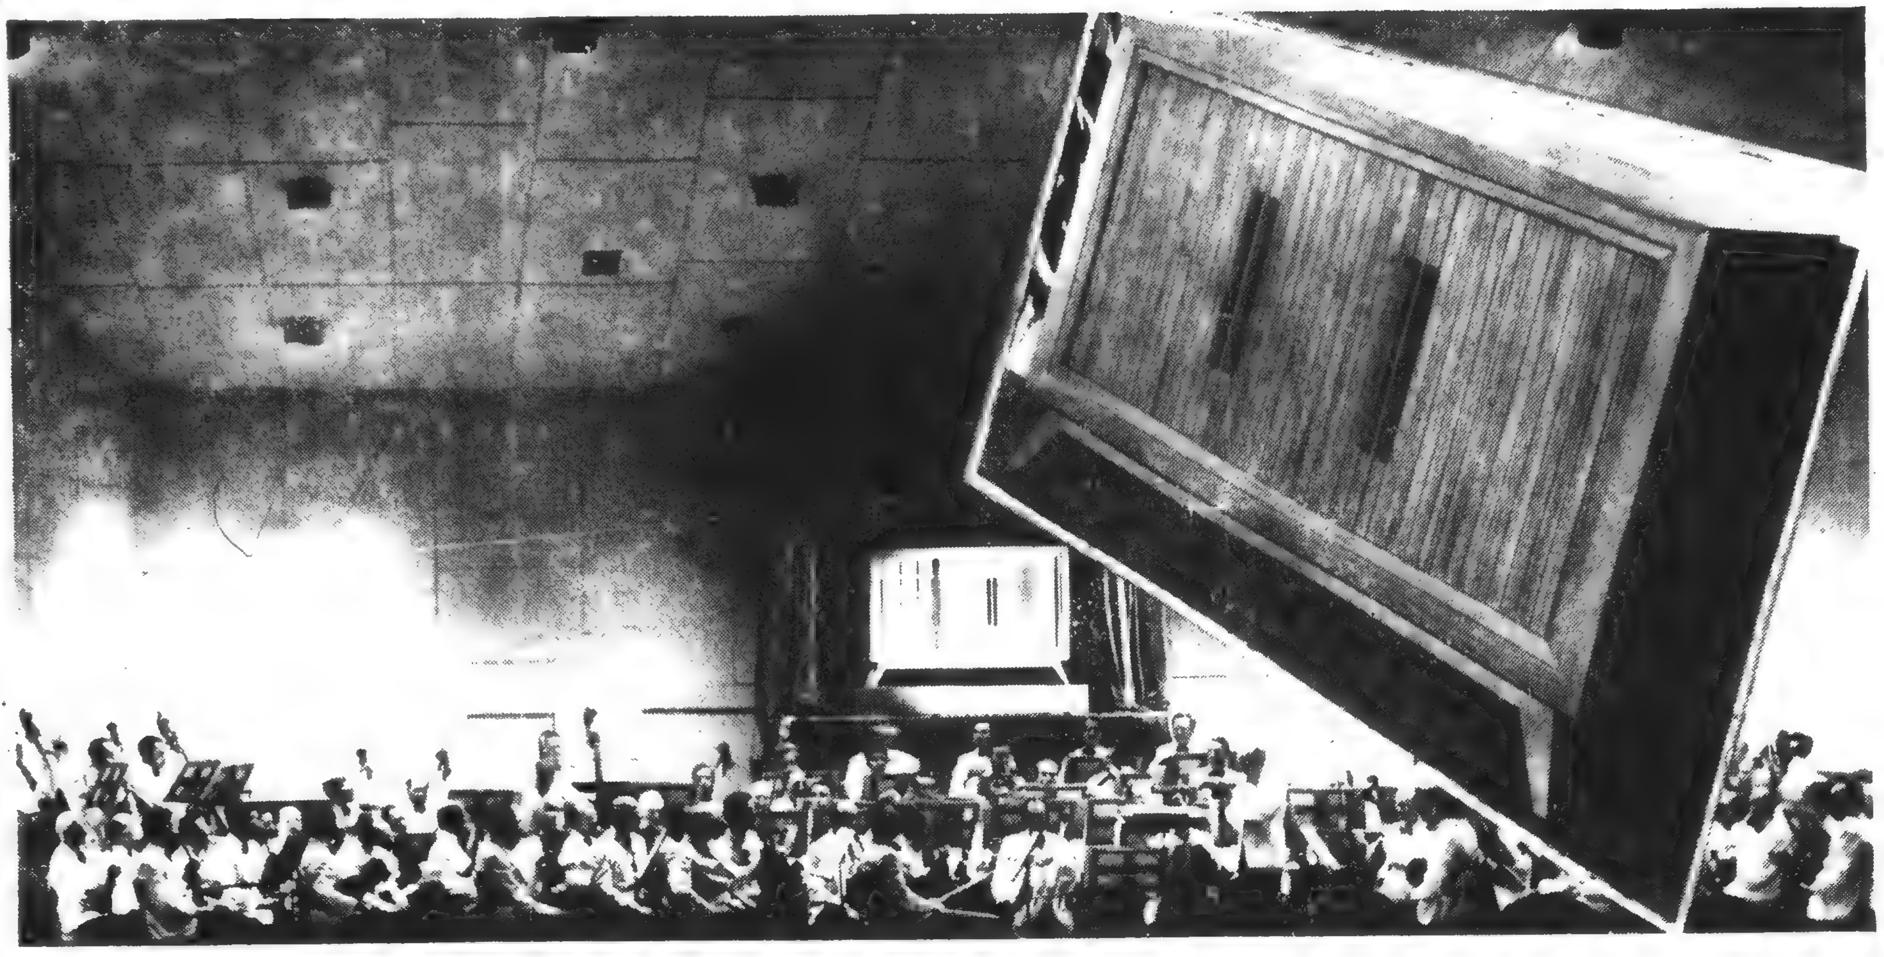
The phonograph demonstration was part of a day-long program called "Music for All" which traced the development of reproduction by phonograph, radio and television over the last 30 years.

Recordings by the Boston Symphony since that organization first began making records for Victor in 1917 were played on machines of the period, giving a graphic picture of how the tonal range has been more fully captured over the decades.

During the course of events, movies were made of the audience to be incorporated in a forthcoming film by MGM, dramatizing the history and growth of the festival, along the lines of the recent production which glorified Carnegie Hall.

It was announced that the first 200 sets of the new Berkshire instrument line will be sold on a subscription basis, the proceeds to benefit the Berkshire Music Center scholarship fund. A silver

RADIO & APPLIANCE JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEP - 1947



Highlight of the preview was the demonstration put on by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky to dramatize the tonal fidelity of the Berkshire model shown behind orchestra and in close-up view in inset.

COLORFUL 'BERKSHIRE' PREVIEW

Trade Press Sees New RCA Model Unveiled at Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass.

USING the Berkshire Music Festival as a colorful backdrop, RCA-Victor introduced its "Berkshire Model" combination radio-television-phonograph to some 6,000 music lovers, music critics, trade press and newswriters at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., last month. In a special concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the audience was given a dramatic demonstration of phonographic tonal reproduction hitherto unachieved in a home instrument.

Making its world debut in the massive Tanglewood "shed." the instrument was stirringly presented as it continued the orchestra's playing of the first part of Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont." As Dr. Koussevitzky dramatically folded his arms and stopped conducting, the Berkshire radio-phonograph model, spotlighted on a raised platform behind the musicians, continued the concert from a recording and defied the audience to tell whether the music came from the orchestra or "The Berkshire."

This new instrument is the result of more than a year of intensive development, employing for the first time postwar applications of military perfected electronics in the engineering of sound. A new Consumer Custom Products department has been added for the manufacture of these special models, according to Frank M. Folsom, executive vice president of RCA in charge of the RCA Victor division.

Miss Harriett H. Higginson, fashion and merchandising expert, a former executive of Montgomery Ward & Co., heads the new enterprise, which includes designers, technicians and specialist services, "custom selected" to custom build a "Festival" series of high fidelity instruments in the top price range. Essentially a project for custom engineering of music into individual homes undergoing construction, the mechanical components of the Festival Series, of which "The Berkshire" is the first, will also be cabinet styled in period pieces ranging from the large traditional breakfront introduced at Tanglewood to modern pieces.

"The Berkshire" instruments incorporate a de luxe Victrola phonograph of unusual power, a radio providing standard and frequency modulated broadcast and international short wave reception, including a motor-driven electric tuning mechanism perfected for use on military aircraft, and, in certain models, a large screen projection television. The radio phonograph chassis has 30 tubes, plus two rectifiers and two voltage regulators.

One hundred music critics, feature writers, members of the trade press, radio stars and leaders in the field of merchandising and finance were brought to Tanglewood from all over the country aboard a special train from New York. Before the concert, they were given a special demonstration of "The Berkshire" and its television performance, at which James Murray, RCA Victor vice president in charge of record manufacturing, Dr. H. F. Olson of the RCA Laboratories, and Marvin Hobbs, chief engineer of the project, talked informally and demonstrated other components of the new instrument.

Also attending were many RCA Victor dealers and distributors, many by special invitation along with those living in the area.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

SEP 5 - 47

Disc Favorites Of The Day

CLASSICAL ALBUMS

BACH: Brandenburg Concerti Nos. 2 and 3, Serge Koussevitzky—Boston Symphony (V).

MOUSSORGSKY: "Pictures at an Exhibition," Eugene Ormandy—Philadelphia Orchestra (Col.).

VERDI: "La Traviata," Rome Opera Company (Col.).

KHATCHATURIAN: Concerto for Piano, William Kappell, Boston Symphony—Arthur Fiedler (V.)

POPULAR ALBUMS

FRANKIE CARLE: "Carle Comes Calling" (Col.).

DOROTHY SHAY: "Park Ave[illegible]billy" (Col.).

AL JOLSON: "Souvenir" (Decca).

BING CROSBY: "Merry Christmas" (Decca).

TEX BENEKE: "Prom Date" (V.).

POPULAR SINGLES

TEX WILLIAMS: "Smoke, Smoke, Smoke" (Cap.).

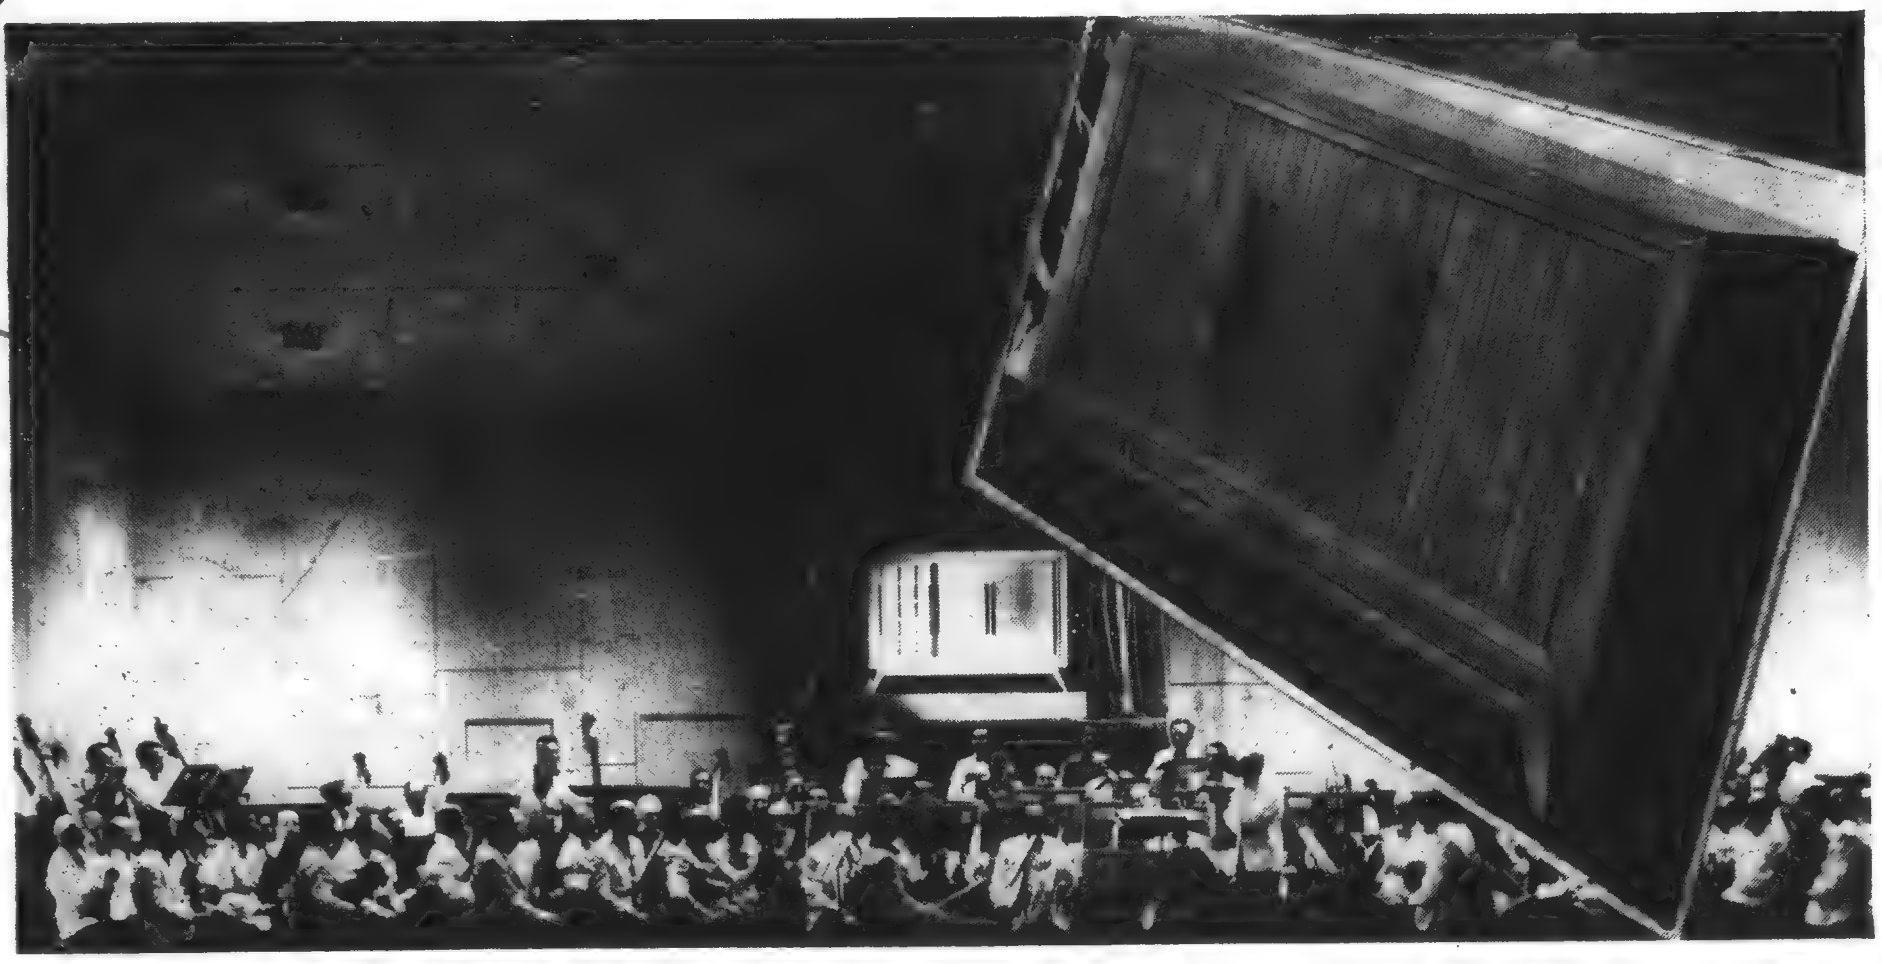
DOROTHY SHAY: "Feudin', Fightin'" (Col.).

HARMONICATS: "Peg O' My Heart" (Vitacoustic).

PERRY COMO: "When You Were Sweet Sixteen" (V.).

DINAH SHORE: "Tallahassee" with Woody Herman Orchestra (Col.).

RADIO & APPLIANCE JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEP - 1947



Highlight of the preview was the demonstration put on by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky to dramatize the tonal fidelity of the Berkshire model shown behind orchestra and in close-up view in inset.

COLORFUL 'BERKSHIRE' PREVIEW

Trade Press Sees New RCA Model Unveiled at Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Mass.

USING the Berkshire Music Festival as a colorful backdrop, RCA-Victor introduced its "Berkshire Model" combination radio-television-phonograph to some 6,000 music lovers, music critics, trade press and newswriters at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., last month. In a special concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the audience was given a dramatic demonstration of phonographic tonal reproduction hitherto unachieved in a home instrument.

Making its world debut in the massive Tanglewood "shed," the instrument was stirringly presented as it continued the orchestra's playing of the first part of Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont." As Dr. Koussevitzky dramatically folded his arms and stopped conducting, the Berkshire radio-phonograph model, spotlighted on a raised platform behind the musicians, continued the concert from a recording and defied the audience to tell whether the music came from the orchestra or "The Berkshire."

This new instrument is the result of more than a year of intensive development, employing for the first time postwar applications of military perfected electronics in the engineering of sound. A new Consumer Custom Products department has been added for the manufacture of these special models, according to Frank M. Folsom, executive vice president of RCA in charge of the RCA Victor division.

Miss Harriett H. Higginson, fashion and merchandising expert, a former executive of Montgomery Ward & Co., heads the new enterprise, which includes designers, technicians and specialist services, "custom selected" to custom build a "Festival" series of high fidelity instruments in the top price range. Essentially a project for custom engineering of music into individual homes undergoing construction, the mechanical components of the Festival Series, of which "The Berkshire" is the first, will also be cabinet styled in period pieces ranging from the large traditional breakfront introduced at Tanglewood to modern pieces.

"The Berkshire" instruments incorporate a de luxe Victrola phonograph of unusual power, a radio providing standard and frequency modulated broadcast and international short wave reception, including a motor-driven electric tuning mechanism perfected for use on military aircraft, and, in certain models, a large screen projection television. The radio phonograph chassis has 30 tubes, plus two rectifiers and two voltage regulators.

One hundred music critics, feature writers, members of the trade press, radio stars and leaders in the field of merchandising and finance were brought to Tanglewood from all over the country aboard a special train from New York. Before the concert, they were given a special demonstration of "The Berkshire" and its television performance, at which James Murray, RCA Victor vice president in charge of record manufacturing, Dr. H. F. Olson of the RCA Laboratories, and Marvin Hobbs, chief engineer of the project, talked informally and demonstrated other components of the new instrument.

Also attending were many RCA Victor dealers and distributors, many by special invitation along with those living in the area.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
SEP. 5 - 1947

Disc Favorites Of The Day

CLASSICAL ALBUMS

BACH: Brandenburg Concerti Nos. 2 and 3, Serge Koussevitzky—Boston Symphony (V).

MOUSSORGSKY: "Pictures at an Exhibition," Eugene Ormandy—Philadelphia Orchestra (Col.).

VERDI: "La Traviata," Rome Opera Company (Col.).

KHATCHATURIAN: Concerto for Piano, William Kappell, Boston Symphony—Arthur Fiedler (V.)

POPULAR ALBUMS

FRANKIE CARLE: "Carle Comes Calling" (Col.).

DOROTHY SHAY: "Park Ave-[illegible]lly" (Col.).

AL JOLSON: "Souvenir" (Decca).

BING CROSBY: "Merry Christmas" (Decca).

TEX BENEKE: "Prom Date" (V.).

POPULAR SINGLES

TEX WILLIAMS: "Smoke, Smoke, Smoke" (Cap.).

DOROTHY SHAY: "Feudin', Fightin'." (Col.).

HARMONICATS: "Peg O' My Heart" (Vitacoustic).

PERRY COMO: "When You Were Sweet Sixteen" (V.).

DINAH SHORE: "Tallahassee" with Woody Herman Orchestra (Col.).

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

SEP 6 - 1947

Dinner Parties Popular Events Of Berkshire Hills Fall Season

Stockbridge Resident Is Hostess to Sally Kinsolving Of Baltimore; Pittsfield Art League Exhibition Opens

Special to The Daily News

Berkshire Hills, Sept. 6 Mrs. William Penn Cresson is a dinner hostess tonight at Chesterwood, Stockbridge, in compliment to her house guest, Miss Sally Archer Kinsolving of Baltimore. She is the daughter of Rev. Dr. Arthur Barksdale Kinsolving, retired Episcopal clergyman. Her brother, Rev. Dr. Arthur Lee Kinsolving, was rector of Grace Episcopal Church, Amherst, for six years from 1921. Their mother is Sally Bruce Kinsolving author and poet.

Mr. and Mrs. Walter Hoving (Pauline R. van der Voort) had a dinner party on Thursday night at their summer home on Prospect Hill, Stockbridge. Their guests were Mrs. D. Percy Morgan, Miss Mabel Choate, Rev. Edmund Randolph Laine, Mr. and Mrs. Rodney Procter and Robert Talcott Francis. The Prospect Hill home of Dr. and Mrs. William Morris Carpenter, who are now located near Palo Alto, Cal., is for sale and reports are current that Mr. and Mrs Hoving, next-door neighbors, may be interested in its purchase. Formerly owned by Miss Ellen King of New York City, it was the old home of Rev. Dr. Henry M. Field, a member of the famous Field family of Stockbridge.

The last of two performances of Pittsfield Country Club Follies will be given tonight before an expected capacity house at the club. The show is directed by Frederic Arnold Pease, Jr., and William R. Furey.

Among those who entertained guests at the Labor Day luncheon at the Lenox Club, Lenox, were Robert Talcott Francis, New York City, and Mr. and Mrs. F. Bayard Rives of El Encanto Hotel, Santa Barbara, Cal., who are at the club for the autumn; also Mr. and Mrs. Stephanus Van Cortlandt Morris, who returned later in the week to Washington, D. C.; Miss Anna Remsen Alexandre and her sister, Mrs. Alexandre Hoppin; Mrs. Bruce W. Sanborn of St. Paul, Minn.; Mrs. Caroline Savie Lloyd of Fencefields, Lee; Mr. and Mrs. Harry C. Holloway of Tamarack, Tyringham; Mr. and Mrs. William E. Dodge Stokes, Miss Nancy Thayer Patten, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Howard of Corby Lodge, West Stockbridge; Mrs. Chauncey C. Loomis, Mrs. Ramsay C. Hoguet, John P. S. Harrison, Mr. and Mrs. John B. Swann, Mrs. Henry Hollister Pease, Mrs. Stuart Burghley.

Pittsfield Art League Exhibition

The 26th annual exhibition of Pittsfield Art League was opened this afternoon at Berkshire Museum with a tea from 3 to 5 in charge of Mrs. Arthur J. Langworthy, Mrs. Jacob J. Vienneau and Mrs. DeWitt Clinton Gardner. Mrs. Michael L. Eisner is chairman of the exhibition committee with Mrs. Raymond E. Dresser, head of the crafts committee. On the jury of selection were Stuart C. Henry, director of the museum; Robert Hamilton, Miss Mary P. Hibbard and Thomas Curtin. The exhibition will be open through the 30th.

Baron and Baroness Dolf Bentinck of The Netherlands, who are to be in this country for the UNO conferences at Lake Success, are expected the coming week at the Stockbridge home of her grandmother, Baroness Louisa Bornemisza. Baroness Bentinck will remain here during the six weeks that her husband will be at Lake Success. Baron Bentinck was charge d'affaires of the Dutch legation in Cairo, and more recently has been first secretary of the embassy in London.

Mr. and Mrs. William Felton Barrett were dinner hosts tonight at Sky Farm, North Egremont, for Mr. and Mrs. Clarence A. Warden of Haverford, Pa., who are tenants this season of Mrs. Ralph Pulitzer's summer home, Cliffwood St., Lenox.

Among those who registered this week at Berkshire Garden Center, Stockbridge, were Mr. and Mrs. Philip St. Germain, Agawam; Mr. and Mrs. David I. Blauvelt, Mr. and Mrs. Irving Blauvelt, Westfield; Charles F. Bradley, Wilbraham. Great Barrington Garden club is to have its annual meeting at the Center on Monday, the 29th.

Mrs. Arthur Honegger flew from Paris to La Guardia Field early in the week, to join her husband, the distinguished composer, who has been seriously ill with a heart ailment at the Downs cottage, Lenox. He was stricken during the Tanglewood festival the last of July, when one of his compositions was played by Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Honegger has made such good progress under the care of Dr. Edward T. Forsley, Lenox, that he and Mrs. Honegger expect to return to Paris later in the month. While aboard the Queen Elizabeth ~~Dr. Serge~~ Koussevitzky and his bride were kept informed by radio.

CAMDEN, ARK.
NEWS

COSTLY 'CELLO TAKES AIR

Boston (UP)— One of the oldest and most valuable pieces of baggage flown overseas from Logan International Airport was a 'cello owned by Alexander J. Ludwig of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The 'cello, made in France in 1679, was valued at $25,000.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

SEP 11 1947

Boston Symphony Played to 800,000

More than 800,000 people heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the concerts of its 66th season completed this autumn, a record attendance for a symphony orchestra. At Tanglewood, in addition to the festival concerts, 47 performances were given by the Berkshire Music Center to audiences totalling 50,000. The orchestra is scheduled to give a concert in Northampton this coming season on its road tour.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

SEP 12 1947

Boston Symphony Orchestra Has Had Record Attendance

More than 800,000 people heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the concerts of its 66th season completed this Autumn—a record attendance for a symphony orchestra. The approximate attendance was as follows: 109 Winter concerts, 300,000; 6 Youth concerts, 12,000; 58 Pop concerts, 135,000; 21 Esplanade concerts, 250,000; 14 Berkshire Festival concerts, 105,000.

These concerts included nine subscription series, seven of which were completely subscribed in advance of the season. At Tanglewood, in addition to the Festival concerts, 47 performances were given by the Berkshire Music Center to audiences totalling 50,000. 45 Tuesday evening concerts throughout the season were broadcast over the ABC Network.

New Season's Activities

Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will shortly return from abroad to open the 67th season of these concerts on Oct. 10, in Symphony Hall. The coming season lists as many concerts as last. The Satur-series in Boston, the series in New York, Brooklyn, Providence and Cambridge are already completely subscribed. Concerts will also be given in New Haven, Hartford and New London, Conn.; Northampton, Mass.; New Brunswick, N. J.; Philadelphia Pa.; Washington, D. C.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Cincinnati, Ohio; Bloomington and South Bend, Ind.; Chicago; Ann Arbor and Detroit, Mich.; Rochester N. Y.

The soloists are announced for the series of 24 Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts. Four will be newcomers to these concerts: Ginette Neveu, the French violinist who is about to make her first visit to America; Isac Stern, the violinist; Nadia Reisenberg, pianist; and Marina Moshetz, soprano. Three pianists who have played with the Orchestra in former seasons are Myra Hess, who is to make a return visit to this country, Witold Malcuzynski, and Arthur Rubinstein.

Guest conductors will be Charles Munch, returning from France, Eleazar de Carvalho, a visiting conductor from Rio de Janeiro, and

---

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

SEP 7 1947

Program Notes

"Warts and All" Biography Gives Koussevitzky Towering Stature

By John Rosenfield

Serge Koussevitzky, 73-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony, is the subject of two biographies.

One by Dr. Hugo Leichtentritt (Harvard Press), is "official" and has Koussevitzky's praise. The other by Moses Smith (Allen, Towne & Heath) so incurred the maestro's displeasure that he tried vainly to stop it by injunction.

Koussevitzky's emotional fury at Smith, former Boston music critic, is something of a confirmation of the Smith pen portrait. Posterity, if not the conductor, will be grateful.

Or if he lives long enough in retirement he, too, will be pleased. Smith's picture is the man "warts and all" and a greater man for it.

The moral is that great conductors are not run through a conservatory stamping machine. Immortal achievement in symphonism is invariably an alchemy of personality, character, musicianship, musical politics, musical resources, time and place. It has never happened before and it will never happen again in the same manner.

So it is that Serge Koussevitzky, big man and little, musically intuitive and largely untrained, has made his twenty-three seasons in Boston add up to something colossal in the annals of music. His orchestra is, perhaps, the grandest symphonic instrument the world has ever known. His programs are invariably exciting even when disappointing to the finicky. Of late even these have learned to relax and enjoy themselves.

His propagation of contemporary music, much of it American, has raised the sights and opened the ears of a generation, not only in Boston but throughout America where other conductors are not uninfluenced by the Koussevitzky programming.

◆

Koussevitzky is actually the first long-term conductor of the illustrious Boston Symphony history. His predecessors, of guest or interim status, included such eminent virtuosos and massive musical scholars as Gericke, Muck, Nikisch, Rabaud and Monteux. When Koussevitzky in 1924 had the hardihood to follow in their line he all but tore his well-tailored pants. His repertoire was not only limited but also unbalanced and specialized. Worse, he could hardly read a partitur. There are some musicians to this day, also some in his orchestra, who regard him as a "fake" and "bluffer."

◆

All his critics and foes reckoned without his character—its egotism, drive and stubborness. He was a musician, ill-trained to be sure, but a musician. His solo instrument was, of all things, the double-bass on which he performed with a certain magic. He learned an orchestra score by having it played by a personal pianist, following the music with gestures calculated to draw the music from an orchestra. Later he studied what he should have known, conducting.

◆

Always he has been able to do what he must do. Son of a poor Jewish street musician, he earned his way into the opera and ballet orchestras of Moscow. His first marriage, with a ballet dancer, lasted briefly. His next was with a wealthy woman who placed her sizable fortune at his disposal.

With this Koussevitzky turned grand seigneur of music, hiring his own orchestras, financing tours down the Volga on river boats, combining musical publishing with musical performance.

Somehow he and his wife got much of their fortune out of Bolshevik Russia. Anti-Bolshevik from the start, Koussevitzky made his escape with no great difficulty. He was cherished rather than ill-used by the new regime which tried to enlist him and, failing, permitted him to depart, grabbing only such properties as remained in the realm.

◆

Paris was his home until the bid from America. His wife died five years ago. Not many days ago he married her niece, who was his long-time secretary.

Jealously petty he has been to many colleagues, including Fabien Sevitzky, the vastly underrated conductor of the Indianapolis Symphony, and a nephew whom he first befriended and then practically drove out of Boston. There is no record that he or Toscanini are on visiting terms. On the other hand, Mitropoulos, Bernstein and Burgin have reason to thank him for their places in American musical life. At least fifty contemporary composers owe their vogue to his efforts.

Serge Koussevitzky. . . . Some day he will appreciate candor.

Variety

ABC Symph Poser: Will You Love Me Sustaining As You Did as a Com'l?

6/11/47

Reports that John Hancock Life Insurance Co., which plunked $500,000 into institutional sponsorship of the Boston Symphony concerts on ABC this past season, won't be around when the roll of bankrollers is called next fall, poses a problem for ABC.

Question raised by speculation on Hancock's exit, as it concerns ABC, is whether the net will retain the symphony as a sustainer in the projected back-to-backing of it Tuesday nights with "America's Town Meeting." Web only recently maneuvered the co-op "Town Meeting" switchover from Thursday nights in a move ballyed as building Tuesday nights into a big public service programming feature. Boston Symph was shifted back to 9:30 to slot George V. Denny's forum in the 8:30 period. If ABC can't round up a new sponsor for the longhair stanza, the temptation might be to shift it to a less saleable time, or drop it.

Latter action is considered unlikely inasmuch as the Boston aggregation was retained after Allis-Chalmers, which paid its way a couple of seasons, got into strike difficulties and had to bow out last year. Boston Pops series, a summer edition of the symphony, has been on ABC since Hancock's sponsorship terminated April 22.

WALTHAM, MASS.
NEWS TRIBUNE

SEP 13 1947

day of every month

Boston Symphony Heard by Record 800,000 Persons

More than 800,000 people heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the concerts of its 66th season completed this autumn—a record attendance for a symphony orchestra. The approximate attendance was as follows: 109 winter concerts, 300,000; 6 youth concerts, 12,000; 58 Pop concerts, 135,000; 21 Esplanade concerts, 250,000; 14 Berkshire Festival concerts, 105,000.

These concerts included nine subscription series, seven of which were completely subscribed in advance of the season. At Tanglewood, in addition to the Festival concerts, 47 performances were given by the Berkshire Music Center to audiences totaling 50,000. 45 Tuesday evening concerts throughout the season were broadcast over the ABC Network.

NEW ACTIVITIES

Serge Koussevitzky, the music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will return shortly from abroad to open the 67th season of these concerts on Oct. 10, in Symphony Hall. The coming season lists as many concerts as last. The Saturday evening and Tuesday evening series in Boston, the series in New York, Brooklyn, Providence and Cambridge are already completely subscribed. Concerts will also be given in New Haven, Hartford and New London, Conn.; Northampton, Mass.; New Brunswick, N. J.; Philadelphia; Washington, D. C.; Pittsburgh; Cincinnati; Bloomington and South Bend, Ind.; Chicago; Ann Arbor and Detroit, Mich. and Rochester, N. Y.

The soloists are announced for the series of 24 Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts. Four will be newcomers to these concerts, Ginette Neveu, the French violinist who is about to make her first visit to America; Isaac Stern, the violinist; Nadia Reisenberg, pianist, and Marina Koshetz, soprano. Three pianists who have played with the orchestra in former seasons are Myra Hess, who is to make a return visit to this country, Witold Malcuzynski and Artur Rubinstein.

Guest conductors will be Charles Munch, returning from France, Eleazar de Carvalho, a visiting conductor from Rio de Janeiro and Leonard Bernstein.

[6]

Music

Tanglewood Tales

At Tanglewood, Mass., Berkshire Music Festival audiences had two surprises this summer.

The first came from Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony conductor and head of the 210-acre summer school in the Berkshire hills. It was the American premiere of an opera seldom performed even in its native Europe: Mozart's Idomeneo, King of Crete.

Masterpiece? Written in 1780 for a Munich court performance, the opera tells of the Cretan King's vow to sacrifice to Poseidon, god of the sea, the first human being he sees after his safe return from a stormy voyage.

Fate makes the King's son, Idamante, the potential sacrifice. Idamante is saved by Ilia, his betrothed, whose devotion and desire to die with her beloved soften Poseidon's heart.

Tanglewood critics, hailing the opera's "vivid emotional persuasiveness" and "astounding choral writing," called it Mozart's greatest operatic achievement. But how other American audiences, familiar only with Idomeneo's overture and choruses, will like the whole thing is still a question. It sometimes has been shrugged off as a musical novelty—and too long a one, at that.

Rival. Second surprise came when RCA Victor presented its new "Berkshire" radio-phonograph in world debut under Tanglewood's massive Music Shed. In a performance contest against the Boston Symphony Orchestra, "The Berkshire" set the audience buzzing by practically matching the orchestra itself in tone.

With 30 tubes, two rectifiers, two voltage regulators, a duo cone loudspeaker, and a more efficient noise suppressor, the instrument can reproduce sound on a frequency from 30 to 15,000 cycles—the full range of human hearing. Fly in the ointment is cost: $1,800 to $4,000, depending on cabinet design and type of radio installed in it.

With these two events out of the way, Tanglewood then folded up for the summer, said its 100,000 attendance at 15 concerts had broken all its records, announced that it would open next year again for its 11th Festival season.

H. S. Babbitt Jr.

IS IT ART? Students sang bravely through Idomeneo's long score. (SEE: Tanglewood Tales)

HACKENSACK, N. J.
RECORD

SEP 13 1947

Music News And Views

By DOUGLAS HART

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, music director of the Boston Symphony, will shortly return from abroad to open the sixty-seventh season of that orchestra October 10 in Symphony Hall, Boston.

TOUR OUTLINED

The organization will also conduct series in New York, Brooklyn, Providence, and Cambridge, which are already completely subscribed.

Concerts will be given in New Haven, Hartford and New London, Conn.; New Brunswick, N. J.; Philadelphia; Washington, D. C.; Pittsburgh; Northampton, Mass.; Cincinnati; Bloomington and South Bend, Ind; Ann Arbor and Detroit, Mich.; Chicago, and Rochester, N. Y.

Four soloists will be newcomers: Ginette Neveu, French violinist, who is about to make her first visit to America; Isaac Stern, violinist; Nadia Reisenberg, pianist, and Marina Moshetz, soprano. Pianists who have played with the orchestra in previous seasons will be Myra Hess, Witold Malcuzynski and Artur Rubinstein.

Guest conductors will be Charles Munch, Eleazar de Carvalho, visiting conductor from Rio de Janeiro, and Leonard Bernstein.

Over 800,000 heard the orchestra last season. The 109 winter concerts drew 300,000; 6 youth concerts, 12,000; 58 Pop concerts, 135,000; 21 Boston Esplanade concerts, 250,000, and 14 Berkshire Festival concerts, 105,000.

The youth concerts are directed by Wheeler Beckett, Englewood resident.

At Tanglewood, in addition to the festival concerts, 47 performances were given for the Berkshire Music Center to audiences totalling 50,000.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO

SEP 13 1947

PROKOFIEFF: ROMEO AND JULIET—Boston Symphony Orchestra—Serge Koussevitsky (Victor DM-1129)

Another brilliant and incisive recording by the Boston Symphony, directed by Serge Koussevitsky, of the music from the second Suite which Serge Prokofieff made from his full-length ballet, Romeo and Juliet. The striking music capturing the mood of Shakespeare's immortal love tragedy, the artful ballet episodes selected for this set of two 12-inch records include the music describing the Montagues and Capulets, Juliet as a young girl, a dance, and Romeo at the Tomb of Juliet. Classical figures illustrating the musical story make for an attractive cover page with notes on the score and story carried on the inside page.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

SEP 13 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY TO DO A JUILLIARD CONCERT

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will direct the Juilliard Orchestra in a special concert on May 9 at Carnegie Hall, it was announced yesterday afternoon by William Schuman, president of the Juilliard School of Music, at the convocation exercises held in the Juilliard Concert Hall.

Dr. Koussevitzky's appearance is part of a plan to afford students at the school the opportunity of playing under the direction of celebrated conductors. His concert will be given in addition to the two annual concerts to be presented by the Juilliard Orchestra and the Juilliard Chorus on Feb. 22 and April 5 at Carnegie Hall. The three concerts will be given with the cooperation of Local 802, American Federation of Musicians, and the proceeds will go to the school's Student Aid Fund.

"In accepting our invitation," Mr. Schuman said, "Dr. Koussevitzky once again clearly demonstrates his deep and abiding interest in the welfare of music—not only music of today, but of the music of tomorrow as well. Our students represent part of America's musical future. Playing under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, they will learn at first hand what it means to perform under the guidance of a master. The significance of Dr. Koussevitzy's generous gesture to the young musicians of our time will not, I feel certain, be underestimated in its far-reaching implications."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

SEP 13 1947

Koussevitzky to Direct

Appears at Carnegie Hall With Juilliard Orchestra May 9

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will direct a special concert of the Juilliard Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on May 9, 1948. The announcement was made yesterday afternoon at the convocation ceremony of the Juilliard School of Music by William Schuman, the school's president. The May concert will supplement the two Carnegie events already announced.

These two concerts, to be presented by the Juilliard orchestra and chorus, are scheduled for Feb. 22 and April 5. All three concerts will be given with the co-operation of Local 802 of the American Federation of Musicians. The proceeds will go to the Student Aid Fund of the Juilliard School.

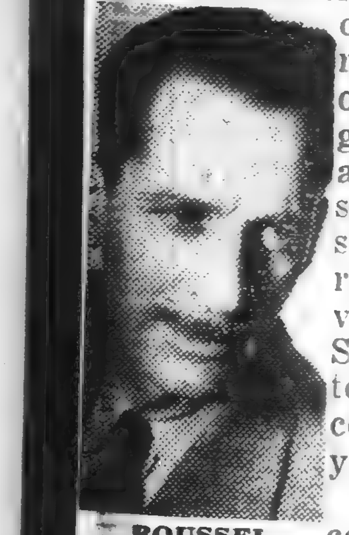
HOUSTON, TEX.
POST

SEP 14

Koussevitzky Subject Of Full-Length Study By Able Biographer

By HUBERT ROUSSEL

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the eminent Boston Symphony, has been a considerable influence on the Houston Symphony orchestra. His ideas have been felt through Ernst Hoffmann, who headed the local ensemble for more than a decade, and through certain officials of the organization who regard the veteran of more than 20 years on the Boston podium as an oracle of the greatest authority. Because of this fact among others, a new biography of Koussevitzky which has made its appearance should discover some very interested readers in Houston. Entitled "Koussevitzky," the book is the work of Moses Smith, formerly music critic of the Boston Transcript, who knew the Russian conductor at close range for a number of years.



ROUSSEL

Mr. Smith combines the talents of a conscientious reporter with a sound knowledge of music and a cool and poised critical instinct. He presents an excellent portrait of a personality and a firmly organized estimate of Koussevitzky from the strictly professional standpoint. Due to one element or the other, the book received an unusual and perhaps valuable launching. Koussevitzky attempted by legal means to suppress the biography, claiming invasion of privacy and apparently libel as well. The litigation went through a number of courts, resulting in a victory for the author.

✦ ✦ ✦

Extending an Interesting Legend

THIS judgment seems thoroughly founded. It is evident that Smith has written with exemplary care, objectivity and a properly balanced approach. The glory awarded to Koussevitzky is certainly great and impressive. But some artists have curious notions of the function and rights of the critic; and the effort of Koussevitzky to keep from the public a volume which, though granting him such a magnificent record, is not adulatory in nature, is in itself a considerable verification of some of the claims made by the author.

The amount of research that has gone into this book is indeed a tribute of size; it represents perhaps as taxing a labor as any living musician—surely any living conductor—has inspired in one viewing his life. The book is by no means an account of Smith's personal recollections of Koussevitzky, but a full-scale biographical piece. It is firmly buttressed with historical fact, and plentifully furnished with anecdote.

Most of the stories are fresh, and they add much to the legend of "Koussy." We have here, indeed, an anthology of musical Goldwynisms—for Koussevitzky is a gifted inventor of phrase and grammar in English. But in addition to their humorous interest, Mr. Smtih's anecdotes are revealing; they furnish a rich glimpse of the private life of a great symphony orchestra.

It is not likely, however, that any of these more or less innocent tales led to the litigation. Kousevitzky does not lack an appreciation of humor, though his limits in that direction appear modest. What apparently rankled his Olympian ego was the critical counter-theme that is interwoven with this story of a vivid, eventful and amazingly intense musical life.

The tonality of Smith's study is set in his argument that Koussevitzky has become one of the greatest contemporary conductors of music not because of his training, but in spite of his method of preparation. And Smith contends that the signs of a faulty beginning have never been wholly eradicated.

As nearly everyone knows, Koussevitzky began as a player of the double-bass, for which he had an exceptional gift. The son of poor parents and handicapped by his race, he elected this cumbersome instrument because it offered the only means of getting into the school of the Moscow Philharmonic Society. But he conquered it with spectacular ease. After only a year's study he appeared for Tschaikowsky, in 1892, as a master performer, and he made a brilliant career as a virtuoso.

✦ ✦ ✦

Feat of Getting in at the Top

MEANWHILE he had married a ballerina in Moscow, a union dissolved by divorce in two or three years. It was when Koussevitzky then married the daughter of a vastly wealthy importer of tea that he really started his trip to the heights.

He moved to Berlin and there decided to launch into conducting. The author is much concerned with the method he used. According to Smith, Koussevitzky engaged a pianist to play over and over the pieces he desired to present, while he stood with his eyes glued to the scores and worked out the required gestures and motions.

It is Smith's contention that Koussevitzky set out to learn the art of conducting from the top down—that he developed a baton technique and was on his way without properly mastering the fundamentals—especially the fluent reading and translation of scores. In the author's opinion, the cost of the short-cut has been heavy. Koussevitzky's exceptional personality and a truly superb musical instinct made possible the use of the method under ordinary conditions; but Smith argues that when the leader was suddenly faced by the gruelling schedule of the Boston orchestra, he could not hide from the players the uncertainties that grew out of a definite shortage of technique, and indeed he was all but overwhelmed.

That he survived the ordeal, according to Smith, is a testimonial to his great and instinctive musicianship, and to remarkable courage and pride. So much greater the glory. But Smith says in his summing-up: "After those first months of discouragement he set about learning his craft. The cost to himself and the musicians of the Boston Symphony orchestra was enormous. After more than 20 years he has still not learned completely; but only one of superlative gifts would have stuck to so impossible a job and achieved such mastery in spite of the towering obstacles of faulty musical training and a very late start."

Such is the critical vein of the book, and the author's position is backed up by much careful detail. It is understandable that Koussevitzky should be touched in a sensitive spot by some pages, but to find any ground for a charge of bias or impropriety would be a difficult matter indeed. Biography is a form of interpretation; the biographer has certain conventional rights, such as those granted the conductor of music. Mr. Smith is concerned merely with presenting in a straightforward and logical manner his view of the "score."

I found the book an absorbing study of a complex and emotional personality; a fine account of a singular chapter in American music (the history of the Boston orchestra is thoroughly told), and a substantial and persuasive analysis. Mr. Smith writes without heat, in the level tone of "a gentleman from the Transcript," and is a very easy author to read. "Koussevitzky," published by Allen, Towne and Heath, is an interesting literary overture to another musical season.

of the City

SEP 15 1947

All Time Record Made By Boston Listeners

Hartford Times

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

THE BOSTON Symphony Orchestra last season was heard by more people than have ever listened to a symphony orchestra before. These people numbered more than 800,000. The figure does not take into account radio audiences.

It is interesting to note the remarkable growth in the attendance at the Berkshire Festival concerts. Tanglewood set a record of its own this year with a total of 105,000 listeners. Even so, this did not equal the number who heard the Pops and the Esplanade concerts in Boston. There were, of course, more programs in the two Boston series, 58 Pop concerts being attended by 135,000 persons and 21 Esplanade concerts by 250,000.

The 109 winter concerts in the Symphony Hall and on tour attracted a total of 300,000 listeners. There were, besides, six Youth concerts with a total audience of 12,000.

At Tanglewood, not counting the Festival concerts, there were 47 performances given by the Berkshire Music Center before 50,000 listeners.

* * *

THE COMING season—the 67th — calls for as many concerts as previously. There will be the usual tours with concerts in New Haven and New London besides Hartford in this state, and Northampton, Mass., New Brunswick, N. J., Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Bloomington, Ill., and South Bend, Ind.; Chicago, Ann Arbor, Detroit and Rochester.

Among the soloists to be heard are the following newcomers: Ginette Neveu, the French violinist who is about to make her first visit to America; Isaac Stern, the violinist; Nadia Reisenberg, pianist, and Marina Koshetz, soprano. Besides these, Myra Hess, Artur Rubinstein and Witold Malcuzynski will appear as piano solists. Guest conductors will be Charles Münch, Eleazar de Carvalho and Leonard Bernstein.

* * *

THERE IS NOTHING new under the sun except in the field of modern music. And here the ingenuity of composers is inexhaustible. The modern crowd seems to be capable of almost anything except giving a long-suffering and skeptical public something pleasant to listen to.

It is hardly surprising that the latest novelty comes from George Antheil. He has composed a suite entitled "Carnival of the Beautiful Dresses" which is a suite of 13 pieces composed apparently for a style show by the Neiman - Marcus Company of Dallas.

This was given just a week ago, but the pressure of local business made it impossible for your reviewer to attend this historic presentation of Gebrauchsmusik.

Merely a summary of the various sections of this suite will completely satisfy even the most ardent, devotees of modern music.

1. Opening choral (with a hop-skip).
2. A La Valse (with a "romantico").
3. Mexicali (Ed. Note: border Mexican rhythm).
4. Valse Passion (with a dream waltz middle section).
5. Habanera Rumba (for a very soign dress or dresses).
6. Love Affair Waltz.
7. Autumn Fancy (falling leaves, whirling?).
8. Gamin Valse (or music for a beautiful tomboy).
9. Martinique (for the unsophisticate).
10. Grand Climax (where they, the beautiful dresses, all get together—a longish number).
11. Valse of the Female Gamin Who Fell in Love Hopelessly for a Time.
12. Gay American Valse (hale fellows, well met).
13. Finale Rumbetta (what is Rumbetta?)—Why a little tiny rumba not yet full grown.

John Rosenfield in the Dallas Morning News has written of this suite: "Bach wrote cantatas for somebody's birthday. Antheil writes music for a store's birthday.

"Much incidental music has outlived the event that inspired its creation. It is possible that Antheil's "Carnival of the Beautiful Dresses" may be played independent of mannekins. Certainly it should outlast Neiman-Marcus styles which was not supposed to last too long, anyway."

I don't think Antheil or the fashion world have anything to worry about on the ground of permanence.

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR-LEDGER

SEP 16 1947

Disc ties symphony in music test

Acoustical event applauded by Berkshire festival

LENOX, Mass. (U.P.)—Pitting a phonograph against a full symphony orchestra and inviting an audience to tell when the orchestra leaves off playing and the phonograph picks up is quite an acoustical stunt.

It was tried out successfully by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the recent Berkshire Music Festival at the Tanglewood estate outside Lenox.

The demonstration was held in the big music shed, seating 6,000. Another 1,000 listened on the lawn outside. The occasion was the public introduciton of The Berkshire, a new instrument developed by RCA Victor and named in honor of the Tanglewood festival.

GREATER TONE

This combination radio, television and phonograph set is aimed at making available in the home a wider range of tonal reproduction, bringing out qualities hitherto lost.

The orchestra, in the course of a long program, played the Beethoven "Egmont" Overture. Midway in the performance, the "live" musicians ceased playing and the phonograph took over. The change, under the ideal acoustical conditions of the music shed, was almost imperceptible.

Of course, the instrument used as a deluxe model which will retail at $4,000 and is over-elaborate for apartment dwellers or small home owners. The price range of the "custom built" line is from $1,800 to $4,000.

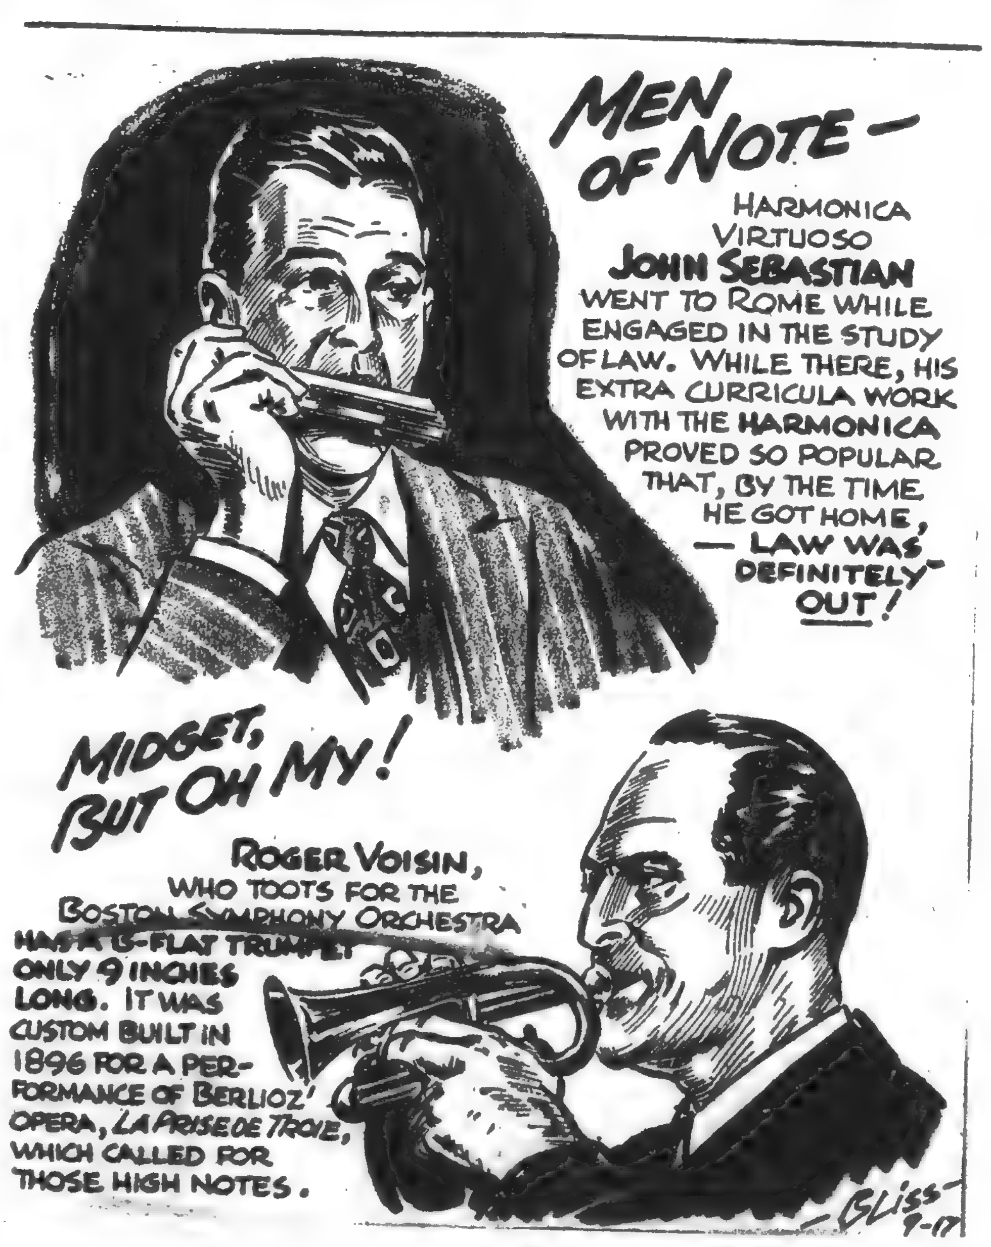
The phonograph demonstration was part of a day-long program called "Music For All" which traced the development of reproduction by phonograph, radio and television over the last 30 years.

Recordings by the Boston Symphony since that organization first began making records for Victor in 1917 were played on machines of the period, giving a graphic picture of how the tonal range has been more fully captured over the decades.

TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD

SEP 17 1947

'RIVATE LIVES By Paul Fo



MEN OF NOTE —
HARMONICA VIRTUOSO JOHN SEBASTIAN WENT TO ROME WHILE ENGAGED IN THE STUDY OF LAW. WHILE THERE, HIS EXTRA CURRICULA WORK WITH THE HARMONICA PROVED SO POPULAR THAT, BY THE TIME HE GOT HOME, — LAW WAS DEFINITELY OUT!
MIDGET, BUT OH MY!
ROGER VOISIN, WHO TOOTS FOR THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HAS A B-FLAT TRUMPET ONLY 9 INCHES LONG. IT WAS CUSTOM BUILT IN 1896 FOR A PERFORMANCE OF BERLIOZ' OPERA, LA PRISE DE TROIE, WHICH CALLED FOR THOSE HIGH NOTES.
BLISS 9-17

ANDERSON, S. C.
INDEPENDENT-TRIBUNE

SEP 19 1947

TRAVEL: Sergi Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, wanted to fly his orchestra to Europe, for a tour this month. The bookings were plentiful and there were assurances of exciting receptions. The Board of Trustees of the Boston Symphony refused to permit the flight. "Our orchestra," Koussevitzky was told, "is too prized to have its future entrusted to a plane. One accident—just one—and what would happen to the Boston Symphony?" Mr. Koussevitzky is determined to make the trip next year, even if he leaves the orchestra in Boston and goes aboard with a group of student-musicians.

Bloomington 9/19/47

C Sharp Minor

Music—with a Look-around at Intermissions

By PROF. GUIDO H. STEMPEL
Star-Courier Music Editor

LAST week I mentioned casually a demonstration in Assembly Hall some twenty-five years ago of the Edison phonograph company, comparing records with the viva voce renditions of the recording artists present in person—two or three of them as I dimly remember. A demonstration on a larger scale and of larger significance is reported by Jack Gaver of the United Press. His report follows in full.

PHONOGRAPH RIVALS
"LIVE" ORCHESTRA
AT TANGLEWOOD

LENOX, Mass. (U.P.)—Pitting a phonograph against a full symphony orchestra and inviting an audience to tell when the orchestra leaves off playing and the phonograph picks up is quite an acoustical stunt.

It was tried out successfully by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra during this summer's Berkshire Music Festival at the Tanglewood estate outside Lenox.

The demonstration was held in the big music shed, seating 6,000. Another 1,000 listened on the lawn outside. The occasion was the public introduction of The Berkshire, a new instrument developed by RCA Victor and named in honor of the Tanglewood festival.

This combination radio, television and phonograph set is aimed at making available in the home a wider range of tonal reproduction, bringing out qualities hitherto lost.

The orchestra, in the course of a long program, played the Beethoven "Egmont" Overture. Midway in the performance, the "live" musicians ceased playing and the phonograph took over. The change, under the ideal acoustical conditions of the music shed, was almost imperceptible.

NOT FOR APARTMENTS

Of course, the instrument used was a de luxe model which will retail at $4,000 and is over-elaborate for apartment dwellers or small home owners. The price range of the "custom built" line is from $1,800 to $4,000.

The phonograph demonstration was part of a day-long program called "Music for All" which traced the development of reproduction by phonograph, radio and television over the last 30 years.

Recordings by the Boston Symphony since that organization first began making records for Victor in 1917 were played on machines of the period, giving a graphic picture of how the tonal range has been more fully captured over the decades.

During the course of events, movies were made of the audience, to be incorporated in a forthcoming film by MGM, dramatizing the history and growth of the festival, along the lines of the recent production which glorified Carnegie Hall.

It was announced that the first 200 sets of the new Berkshire instrument line will be sold on a subscription basis, the proceeds to benefit the Berkshire Music Center scholarship fund. A silver plaque, with the customer's name and Dr. Koussevitzky's signature, will be placed in each set.

ANOTHER UP press release is the following by Harman W. Nichols, under caption:

PULLMAN OF FUTURE WILL PLAY MUSIC TO FIT SCENERY

CHICAGO (U.P.) — Say you are traveling from Chicago to the West Coast. Maybe the long ride always has been a big bore as you checked off the miles, hour by hour.

Well, the railroads are planning to do something to help pass the time. More precisely, the Pullman company is.

By music. Wired music, with tunes to fit the locale through which you travel. Ralph Haman, a Pullman designer who was born in a railroad station, is working on the blueprint right now.

For example, Haman is thinking of a symphony arrangement of the "Old Gray Mare" as you roll across the Midwest farm belt. She—the mare—may not be what she used to be, etc., but with a bank of bull fiddles, a lot of brass, woodwinds and a harp—well, she could come pretty close.

Through the cattle country, at the gateway to the West, what's wrong with "Ragtime Cowboy," played real soft and soothing like? Through the Rockies, "Springtime in the Rockies"? "The Desert Song" for the desert? And so forth.

RIGHT COLORS, TOO

Haman thinks that such psychology adds to comfort. The same as it does in the color combinations he is using in designs for the trains of tomorrow.

The right colors in the right cars. Soft colors for places where you rest, and the gaudy colors in the rolling houses of fun, like the club cars.

On the trial run with the wired music (still away in the future) the designer admits he may run into trouble at the end of the line.

"I wouldn't be surprised," he said, "to wind up in San Francisco or Los Angeles and see the music czar, Petrillo, standing there with a club in one hand and a restraining order in the other."

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER
SEP 20 1947

Koussevi[illegible] Will Direct Special Event

NEW YORK, Sept. 20—Serge oussevitzky, world-famous conductor of the Boston Smyphony rchestra, will direct the Juilliard rchestra in a special concert in arnegie Hall on May 9, 1948, it vas announced today by William chuman, president of the Juilliard chool of Music. Mr. Schuman's ramatic announcement came at he conclusion of convocation xercises recently in the Juilliard oncert hall, marking the openng of the 1947-1948 academic year.

Dr. Koussevitzky's concert will e given in addition to the two nnual Carnegie Hall concerts iven by the Juilliard orchestra nd the Juilliard chorus which this ear will take place on February 2 and on April 5 respectively. All hree concerts will be given with he cooperation of Local 802 of the merican Federation of Musicians.

BLOOMINGTON, IND
STAR COURIER
9/19/47

C Sharp Minor

Music—wi a Look-aroun at Intermissio

By PROF. GUIDO H. STEMPEL
Star-Courier Music Editor

LAST week I mentioned casually a demonstration in Assembly Hall some twenty-five years ago of the Edison phonograph company, comparing records with the viva voce renditions of the recording artists present in person—two or three of them as I dimly remember. A demonstration on a larger scale and of larger significance is reported by Jack Gaver of the United Press. His report follows in full.

PHONOGRAPH RIVALS
"LIVE" ORCHESTRA
AT TANGLEWOOD

LENOX, Mass. (U.P.)—Pitting a phonograph against a full symphony orchestra and inviting an audience to tell when the orchestra leaves off playing and the phonograph picks up is quite an acoustical stunt.

It was tried out successfully by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra during this summer's Berkshire Music Festival at the Tanglewood estate outside Lenox.

The demonstration was held in the big music shed, seating 6,000. Another 1,000 listened on the lawn outside. The occasion was the public introduction of The Berkshire, a new instrument developed by RCA Victor and named in honor of the Tanglewood festival.

This combination radio, television and phonograph set is aimed at making available in the home a wider range of tonal reproduction, bringing out qualities hitherto lost.

The orchestra, in the course of a long program, played the Beethoven "Egmont" Overture. Midway in the performance, the "live" musicians ceased playing and the phonograph took over. The change, under the ideal acoustical conditions of the music shed, was almost imperceptible.

NOT FOR APARTMENTS

Of course, the instrument used was a de luxe model which will retail at $4,000 and is over-elaborate for apartment dwellers or small home owners. The price range of the "custom built" line is from $1,800 to $4,000.

The phonograph demonstration was part of a day-long program called "Music for All" which traced the development of reproductio by phonograph, radio and telev sion over the last 30 years.

Recordings by the Boston Sym phony since that organization firs began making records for Victor i 1917 were played on machines o the period, giving a graphic pic ture of how the tonal range ha been more fully captured over th decades.

During the course of events movies were made of the audience, to be incorporated in a forthcoming film by MGM, dramatizing the history and growth of the festival, along the lines of the recent production which glorified Carnegie Hall.

It was announced that the first 200 sets of the new Berkshire instrument line will be sold on a subscription basis, the proceeds to benefit the Berkshire Music Center scholarship fund. A silver plaque, with the customer's name and Dr. Koussevitzky's signature, will be placed in each set.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA
OKLAHOMAN

Koussevitsky Back With New Bride To Aid Symphony

By ALICE HUGHES

NEW YORK—On a recent incoming ocean liner, Boston Symphony conductor Serge Koussevitsky returned from Europe with his recent bride, Olga Naoumoff, who was his late wife's cousin. Because she is a modest, quiet-spoken person few know much about her. The newspapers when reporting the marriage referred to her as "the spinster-like Madame Olga."

My French brother-in-law who fiddles for the Boston Symphony informs me she is indeed quiet, but one of the most indispensible persons in the excitable, executive setup of the famous orchestra. Important details of policy and management fall upon her shoulders.

Koussy's personal finances are her concern. Certainly not his, for he is too much the artist to be a good businessman and his considerable fortune needs expert handling. Pale, Mona Lisa-like the new Mrs. Koussevitsky cuts through red tape, I am told, like an efficiency expert.

Whenever Kousevitsky comes in from abroad, the 105 men in the symphony grow restive for a time. The maestro keeps close touch with them: hears them in daily rehearsal. Now and then to assure himself each man is up to the high standard he sets for his musicians, he gives them a casual but meaningful invitation. "Are you free Friday at 4?" Koussy will ask. "Won't you come and play for me?" Sounds like a nice cozy little musicale, but actually it is a test performance, a command to show proof why the player should retain his coveted place in these exalted musical circles.

On each trip to Europe, the gifted Russian conductor forages about for fresh material, music and musicians. So now that the maestro is back home the 105 men await rather nervously his call to come and play for him, hoping, of course, it won't happen. Firing is not frequent in the BSO. For the most part retirement comes as the consequence of old age. At 65 a musician is disqualified and must retire, but he is given a two-years' notice first.

HEADLESS MAN—These hot Indian summer nights we New Yorkers sit around one another's living rooms, sip cooling drinks, fan ourselves and roam idly over light conversational terrain. Now and then if a guest stops in the middle of a sentence and his eyes are riveted to a point in the distance, it is not rigor mortis that has set in, but probably something someone in the apartment across the way is doing, that can be seen plainly from any apartment within eye-range.

We New Yorkers live too closely together for decency. The other night at the home of respectable friends in the Park Avenue 60s, half a dozen of us were listening to our host tell of a tricky law case he had handled that day.

Across the street the windows parallel to our's were brightly lighted and unshaded. The night was stifling; our windows were up and also free of curtains. Suddenly the host stopped talking. "People on the seventh, eighth and ninth floor are taking shower baths across the street," he announced. We all rushed to the window to see, and indeed they were doing just what we all wished we could do; keep cool. Nothing exhibitionistic about it. It was simply too hot to care about neighbors whom one never recognizably sees.

My Murray Hill apartment faces a narrow inside court and I could almost stretch a board across my window ledge and into my neighbors', and walk over. One of the persons I'd encounter would be Mr. Headless Man who lives in the apartment directly opposite mine, a few floors up. Young, slender and shapely, he wears pale gray shorts and no shirt, shoes or socks. He has good shoulders; reads a good deal sitting up and lying in bed. That's all I know about him except that he is decapitated. I never have seen his head or face, for his window shade is drawn just to reveal him from the neck down.

I have the feeling he sees me just as I see him for each time I walk about my room in stepins and bras, Mr. Headless seems to be doing the same in shorts. Neither of us is indecent. Neither of us has even seen the other's face, I am sure. But one must keep cool these Indian summer nights.

Toronto, September 20, 1947

Magic Maestro From Moscow

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Bull Fiddle Graduate Has Made Boston A Capital on the World's Musical Map

By JOSEPH WECHSBERG

BOSTON

FORTY years ago, a young man named Serge Koussevitzky, then already a prominent conductor in his native Russia, chartered a steamer and took his own symphony orchestra on a four-month trip along the Volga. When the steamer passed by a little village, Koussevitzky and his 75 musicians would go ashore and set up shop in the middle of the public square. There they would play music by Bach, Beethoven and Tschaikowsky for illiterate farmers who had never heard a symphony orchestra in their life.

"They would come from far away, on their hay-carts and on foot," the maestro remembers. "They would stare in fascination at the musical instruments they had never seen before. There was an incredulous expression on the hardy peasant faces but, as we started to play, they were enchanted . . ."

Up and down the Volga Koussevitzky and his music-making "Volga Boatmen" travelled, over 2,500 miles. They played in hundreds of tiny hamlets, making good music for people. The tour cost over $100,000 but it was such a tremendous success that Koussevitzky and his orchestra repeated it the following two summers.

He became almost a legendary person along the plains of the Volga. People who had once listened to the orchestra were praying that they would come back again. Only when World War I started did Koussevitzky give up his musical expeditions.

Today Serge Koussevitzky is something of a legend in American music. Since 1924, when he became the permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, he has been one of the three or four great orchestra leaders of our time. He has made Boston one of the capitals on the musical map of the world. Under his magic baton, the Boston Symphony, once a second-rate organization, became one of the two or three leading orchestras on earth. In this writer's opinion (which he happens to share with a great many music lovers) it is now the world's best orchestra.

What is the secret behind Koussevitzky's magic? There is a story that Koussevitzky as a child never played soldiers or robbers as other children do. He would always pretend that he was conducting an orchestra. He was born in Tver, near Moscow, on July 26, 1874, and at an early age showed so much interest in music that his father gave him his first lessons. When Serge was seven years old, he conducted for the first time one of his own compositions! At the age of 14, he was the regular conductor of a travelling orchestra.

It is not generally known today that Koussevitzky once was a world-famous virtuoso of the double bass, generally considered the most unhandy instrument of all. He was not driven toward the bull fiddle by any strange passion. When he applied for a scholarship at Moscow's philharmonic school, there was only a scholarship for double bass available. Young Koussevitzky was so eager to stay that he accepted.

He graduated with honors and began to give concerts on the double bass throughout Europe. He made a lot of money and a lot of fame but he wasn't happy.

"I guess I've always been only a conductor at heart," he says.

The opportunity came in 1905 when he married Natalie Oushkoff, the child of a well-to-do Russian landowner. She used to come to his double bass concerts and Koussevitzky had been looking at her, while he worked on his bull fiddle. His father-in-law asked him what he wanted as a wedding gift. Koussevitzky had his answer ready.

"I want my own symphony orchestra," he said.

He didn't get the orchestra but he got the money for it and he began to hire 75 excellent musicians, and after a few guest concerts in Berlin, Paris and London, he started rehearsals of his new orchestra in Moscow.

It is interesting that in those days, prior to World War I, Koussevitzky had already shown the same independence of spirit that made him famous in later years in Paris and in Boston. He began to play modern Russian composers against the wishes of his audiences. He pioneered the works of Stravinsky, Moussorgsky and Prokofieff. On Sunday nights he would lend his baton to gifted young conductors. And once a year he would organize a festival devoted to the music of Beethoven, or Bach, or Brahms.

After the revolution he was appointed director of the Russian state orchestras. He was practically in charge of all music in Russia but he felt unhappy in the maze of administrative work. He left Russia in 1920 and went to Paris, where he became a brilliant propagandist for Russian music. Again he founded his own orchestra—Les Concerts Koussevitzky—and performed for the first time Moussorgsky's "Boris Godunov" at the Paris grand opera. Again he gave popular orchestra concerts at reduced prices for those who couldn't afford expensive tickets. Again he went out and conducted good music on public squares and market places.

Ten years later, in 1934, he realized the same dream in the U.S. when he took charge of the Berkshire symphony festival. This festival, which today has become an American Salsburg, started on an estate in Stockridge, Massachusetts, and later moved on to Tanglewood, near Lenox. In 1938 a big open-air shed was constructed. New buildings were erected in which operas and chamber music performances were given. Tens of thousands of music lovers from Canada and the U.S. go there every summer. At the Berkshire music centre, students, teachers, virtuosi and critics began to study music under Koussevitzky.

"We are all here to live and breathe music," he told them. "There will be no fixed hours of study. It will be music from dawn to dawn."

Visitors have been enchanted by the atmosphere of the music centre. Able young conductors are given instruction by the maestro himself. Members of the Boston Symphony lead chamber music classes and string ensembles. Young composers are given a chance to conduct their new works. There are special courses for voice training, lectures on musical history, concerts every noon and evening, opera performances. Last summer Tanglewood heard the first U.S. performance of "Peter Grimes," an opera by the gifted English composer, Benjamin Britten. Once again, Koussevitzky was back on the public square, bringing good music to the people.

There are numerous legends about Koussevitzky and his orchestra in Boston. Rehearsals are as top-secret as the meetings of the chiefs of staffs in Washington. As a conductor Koussevitzky is a despot, to put it mildly. He is a perfectionist and tolerates no horseplay. He has fired musicians for minor mistakes. He does not tolerate any lack of interest. Once he dismissed a wind-player for a minor mistake. The man got up and said, "Nuts to you, Mr. Koussevitzky!"

The maestro, who still speaks with a thick Russian accent and hasn't quite got around to the intricacies of U.S. slang, shouted, "No, no, no! It's too late to apologize. You go."

Once he asked Sibelius for permission to change the tempo of a symphony movement "because that's the way I feel it."

Sibelius wrote back, "The right tempo is as you feel it." Not many musicians can boast of such an endorsement.

DING, PA.
EAGLE
P 20 1947

A Woman's New York

By Alice Hughes

Alice Hughes

ON A recent incoming ocean liner, Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitsky returned from Europe with his recent bride, Olga Naoumoff, who was his late wife's cousin. Because she is a modest, quiet-spoken person few know much about her. The newspapers when reporting the marriage referred to her as "the spinster-like Madame Olga." My French brother-in-law who fiddles for the Boston Symphony informs me she is indeed quiet, but one of the most indispensible persons in the excitable, executive setup of the famous orchestra. Important details of policy and management fall upon her shoulders. Koussy's personal finances are her concern. Certainly not his, for he is too much the artist to be a good business man and his considerable fortune needs expert handling. Pale, Mona Lisa-like the new Mrs. Koussevitsky cuts through red tape, I am told, like an efficiency expert.

Whenever Koussevitsky comes in from abroad, the 105 men in the symphony grow restive for a time. The Maestro keeps close touch with them: hears them in daily rehearsal. Now and then to assure himself each man is up to the high standard he sets for his musicians, he gives them a casual but meaningful invitation. "Are you free Friday at four?" Koussy will ask. "Won't you come and play for me?" Sounds like a nice cosy little musicale, but actually it is a test performance, a command to show proof why the player should retain his coveted place in these exalted musical circles.

On each trip to Europe, the gifted Russian conductor forages about for fresh material, music and musicians. So now that the Maestro is back home the 105 men await rather nervously his call to come and play for him, hoping, of course, it won't happen. Firing is not frequent in the B.S.O. For the most part retirement comes as the consequence of old age. At 65 a musician is disqualified and must retire, but he is given a two-years notice first. My relative-by-marriage has been playing in the band for over 20 years and has never yet been asked to do a solo for the boss. But you never can tell. Might happen any time.

Headless Man.—These hot Indian summer nights we New Yorkers sit around one another's living rooms, sip cooling drinks, fan ourselves and roam idly over light conversational terrain. Now and then if a guest stops in the middle of a sentence and his eyes are riveted to a point in the distance, it is not rigor mortis that has set in, but probably something someone in the apartment across the way is doing, that can be seen plainly from any apartment within eye-range. We New Yorkers live too closely together for decency. The other night at the home of respectable friends in the Park Avenue 60s, half a dozen of us were listening to our host tell of a tricky law case he had handled that day..

Across the street the windows parallel to ours were brightly lighted and unshaded. The night was stifling; our windows were up and also free of curtains. Suddenly the host stopped talking." "People on the seventh, eighth and ninth floor are taking shower baths across the street," he announced. We all rushed to the window to see, and indeed they were doing just what we all wished we could do; keep cool. Nothing exhibitionistic about it. It was simply too hot to care about neighbors whom one never recognizably sees.

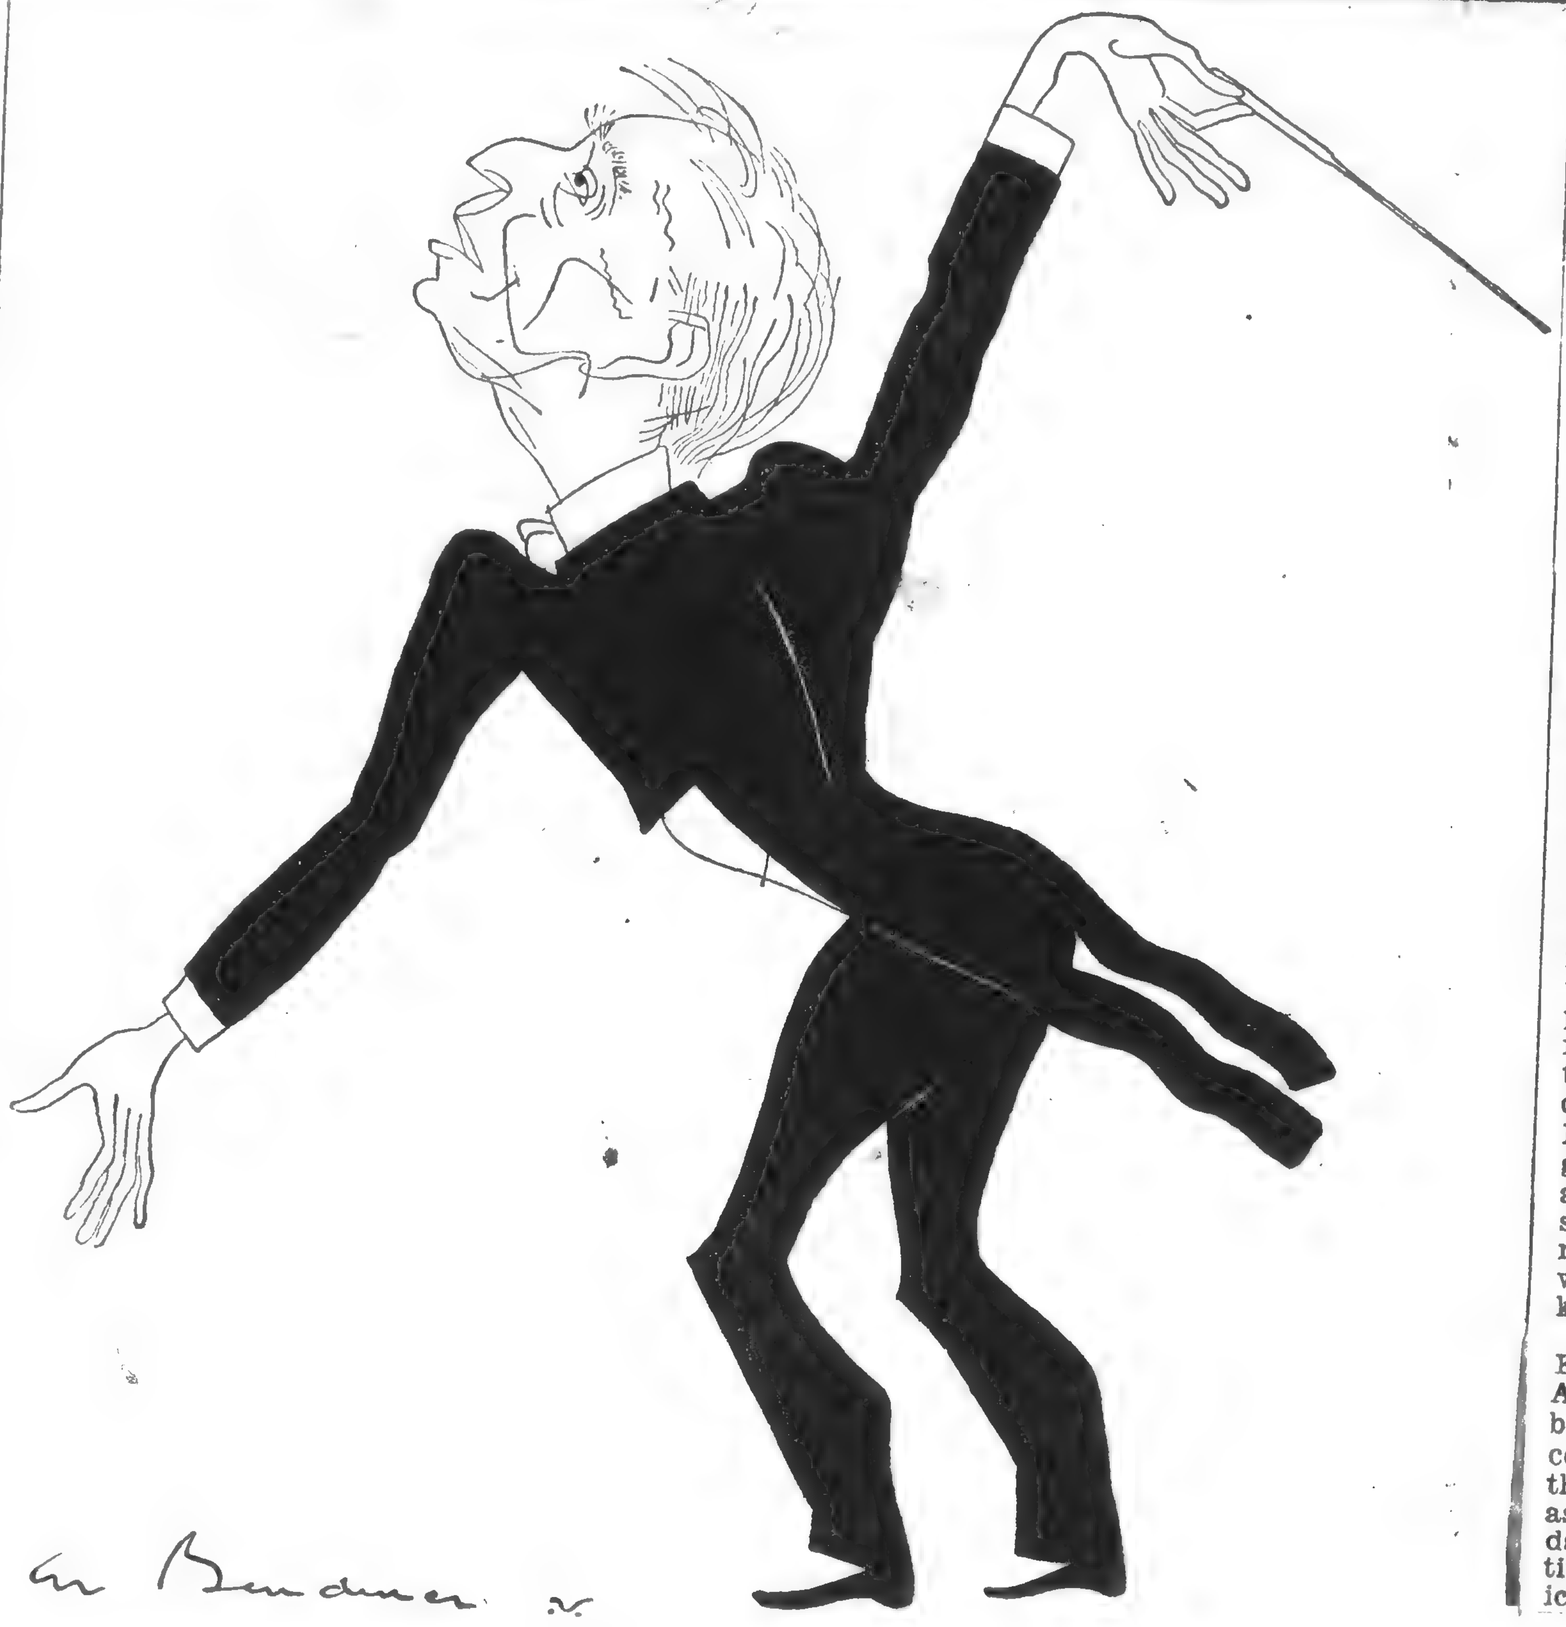
My Murray Hill apartment faces a narrow inside court and I could almost stretch a board across my window ledge and into my neighbors' and walk over. One of the person's I'd encounter would be Mr. Headless Man who lives in the apartment directly opposite mine, a few floors up. Young, slender and shapely, he wears pale gray shorts and no shirt, shoes or socks. He has good shoulders; reads a good deal sitting up and lying in bed. That's all I know about him except that he is decapitated. I never have seen his head or face, for his window shade is drawn just to reveal him from the neck down. I have the feeling he sees me just as I see him for each time I walk about my room in stepins and bras, Mr. Headless seems to be doing the same in shorts. Neither of us are indecent. Neither of us has ever seen the other's face, I am sure. But one must keep cool these Indian summer nights.

[10]

Music's Leading Men: III

Koussevitzky: He's a Virtuoso of the Baton

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY: He caters to descendants of the Boston Tea Party.

TO UNDERSTAND Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's position in American musical life one must understand Boston, or at least the traditions that have developed in relation to its support of its symphonic art.

The Boston Symphony, heard last season by 800,000 of the heirs and descendants of the Boston tea party, and believed by all Bostonians to be the foremost of American orchestras, began as an importation. All its members, 67 years ago, from conductor to percussionists, came from abroad. Henry Lee Higginson, its founder, sought to establish in his city a replica of the great orchestras of Leipzig and Vienna which he had heard in his youth.

Boston remained musically a German city until its most beloved conductor, B. K. (before Koussevitzky), Dr. Karl Muck, found himself in a detention camp in 1917, accused of espionage. A revulsion of feeling followed. German music was banned. French conductors, of whom the most important was Pierre Monteux, took over.

Eventually it was Monteux who brought German music back; but it occurred to no one to cease the importation of musicians. Though Boston was fanatically proud of its orchestra, the directors of the institution treated its members as they treated their factory hands and ruthlessly exploited their economic dependence.

♫

THE story of Koussevitzky's Boston career coincides, in point of time, with the eventual Americanization of the orchestra he had been imported to lead. It is not to be assumed, however, that the great Russian believed in the change. In fact he resisted it.

Long after the importation of labor under contract was made illegal he and the trustees of the Boston Symphony continued to practice it.

Koussevitzky proved a harsh and exacting task master, who rehearsed endlessly and showed no consideration for the unhappy economic situation of his players, who, being nonunion according to Boston tradition, could get no other employment.

Endless rehearsal eventually realized Koussevitzky's acoustic ideals. The lovely crystalline tone, the luminous proportions that create a glowing tonal perspective, the tireless repetitions that wrought infinitely varied definition of musical beauty, gradually won the respect of the men who learned to help a conductor struggling against the barriers of two alien tongues—Russian and French. So players and conductor came to understand one another. Mutual respect created mutual pride.

♫

IT WAS economic pressure that stopped the importation of players, however. Though the multitude, from the first, provided sold out houses at home and on tour, the revenues deriving from broadcasting were needed to reduce a growing deficit. Broadcasting is closed to non-union groups. So Koussevitzky and the trustees capitulated. The men got union contracts which make citizenship an obligation. The conductor got one, too. So he is now legally an American.

While he confirmed the artistic discipline of the Boston Symphony, Koussevitzky was himself not, at first, a man of sound orchestral discipline such as his predecessors, Gereke, Nikisch and Muck had been.

He began his musical career as a double bass player in the orchestra of the Bol'shoi theater in Moscow. Seemingly this worm's-eye view of the orchestral acoustic did not acquaint him with the rudiments of the conductor's technique. Toscanini and Kindler, from their less humble places at the cello desks, learned more. Koussevitzky did not want to be a symphonic bassist. He wanted to be a virtuoso on his instrument, a soloist, and this he became—the greatest perhaps in the history of the art; certainly the most renowned.

♫

AS SUCH he acquired soci position in Moscow and co tracted a marriage with th daughter of the fabulous wealthy tea merchant, Konsta tine Ushkov. With millions at his command he blossomed out as a conductor. He was self-taught. While a pianist played the scores Koussevitzky practiced the conductor's pantomime before mirrors.

He so perfected this important factor of his art that players insist his gestures for any given work never change. They are his own. Players sometimes have difficulty in understanding them. But from the first the public has found them persuasive, nor have his harshest critics—there have been some even in Boston—suggested that these gestures lack musical significance.

Koussevitzky used his wealth for patriotic as well as personal advantage. In the long series of symphonic concerts which he conducted in Russia, and throughout Europe, he specialized in modern music, Russian and French. He set up a publishing firm to make new Russian masterpieces available. He continued that practice in Boston, at first to the dissatisfaction of a public steeped in the German classics. He even played the Americans, thus forcing his competitors to do the same. The names of native composers appear 118 times in Koussevitzky's Boston and Tanglewood programs. This may be a record. And he founded a great school for conductors, symphonists, and composers at Tanglewood, the most renowned of its kind in the world.

It would be interesting were Koussevitzky to confirm his Americanism by playing works by some of the 118 American composers in his repertoire in this city where they surely are as appropriate as at home. To date he has never played a native work in the seat of American government.

BLANK PAGE

HASTINGS, NEB.
TRIBUNE

NO PLANE JAUNT

Serge[illegible] Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, wanted to fly his orchestra to Europe, for a tour this month. The bookings were plentiful and there were assurances of exciting receptions. The board of trustees of the Boston Symphony refused to permit the flight. "Our orchestra," Koussevitzky was told, "is too prized to have its future entrusted to a plane. One accident—just one—and what would happen to the Boston Symphony?" . . . Mr. Koussevitzky is determined to make the trip next year, even if he leaves the orchestra in Boston and goes abroad with a group of student-musicians.

Benjamin V. Cohen, who recently resigned as counselor at the State Department, after 14 years in the service of the government, will rejoin his former partner, Tommy Corcoran, in the private practice of law on October 1 . . . Justice Frank Murphy has been invited to make a quick trip to Manila before the Supreme Court reconvenes . . . Justice Douglas isn't expected back in Washington in time for the opening of court. He needs two more weeks of recuperation after his recent operation . . . Richard Strauss has written a new opera, "The Loves of Danae." Rodzinski may give a performance of it in Chicago . . . Some of Taft's adherents say that the Republican party can't start mending its fences because Tom Dewey is sitting on all of them.

In England, during a discussion of the economic crisis, an editor suggested to Ernest Bevin a sure way of obtaining America's help without having to apply for another loan. "Let's declare war on the United States tomorrow," he said. "Twenty-four hours later, we'll announce that we surrender. And after that, America is bound to take care of us."

FAIRMOUNT, W. VA.
WEST VIRGINIAN
[illegible] 1 1947

The Boston Symphony Orchestra reports an attendance of more than 800,000 at the concerts of its 66th season, recently completed at the Tanglewood Festival in Massachusetts.

Claiming a record attendance for a symphony orchestra season, the society gave the following figures: 109 winter concerts, 300,000; six youth concerts, 12,000; 58 Pops concerts, 135,000; 21 Esplanade concerts, 250,000; 14 Berkshire Festival concerts, 105,000.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, musical director of the orchestra, will open the 67th season at Symphony Hall in Boston on Oct. 10. The number of concerts will be the same as last season. In addition to the Boston concerts, the usual regular series will be given in New York, Brooklyn, Providence and Cambridge.

Concerts also will be given in New Haven, Hartford and New London, Conn.; Northampton, Mass.; New Brunswick, N. J.; Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati; Bloomington and South Bend, Ind.; Ann Arbor and Detroit, Michigan; Chicago and Rochester.

* * *

Music to be "seen" on the screen as well as heard is being developed by United Artists. Called musicolor shorts, the ten-minute subjects are recorded by Werner Janssen, conductor of the Janssen Symphony Orchestra of Los Angles.

They are shot in color, with backgrounds from nature to illustrate the moods of the music. The latest release is Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave," to have its first showing in Portland, Ore., in November. The background was photographed at Sea Lion Cave on the Oregon coast.

* * *

Six unknown young Negro musical artists will have a chance to make their debuts at Town Hall in New York this season as the result of auditions held by the National Negro Congress.

The winners were selected from 150 contestants who were given auditions. They are Allen Brown, pianist, New York; Oland Gaston, pianist, Chicago; Theodore Hines, bass-baritone, Rye, N. Y.; Lawrence Mellon, pianist, New York; Louise Parker, contralto, Philadelphia, and Ruth Stewart, mezzo-soprano, New York. They will be heard in pairs at Town Hall, one singer and one instrumentalist to a concert.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT & LEADER
[illegible]

THE 67TH SEASON

. . . of the Boston symphony will open on Oct. 10 with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, recently returned from Europe, directing. There will be approximately the same number of concerts as last season. The Saturday evening and Tuesday evening series in Boston, the series in New York, Brooklyn, Providence and Cambridge are already completely subscribed. There will also be a tour and concerts in New Haven, Hartford and New London, Conn.; Northampton, Mass.; New Brunswick, N. J.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Washington, D. C.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Cincinnati, Ohio; Bloomington and South Bend, Ind.; Chicago; Ann Arbor and Detroit, Mich., and Rochester, N. Y.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
[illegible] 21 [illegible]

Stanford to Give "Peter Grimes"

PALO ALTO, Calif., Sept. [illegible].—Benjamin Britten's contemporary opera "Peter Grimes" will be given its West Coast premiere at Stanford University during the 1947-48 season. This is expected to be the second production of the opera in the United States and the first to which the public can buy tickets.

Written for and produced by the Sadler's Wells Opera Company in England, the opera since has been presented in ten different countries in eight different languages. Its only previous United States performance, however, was at the Berkshire Music Festival in Massachusetts in the summer of 1946, before an invited audience including music critics from over the nation.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT & LEADER
SEP [illegible] 1947

SERGEI KOUSSEVITSKY

. . . conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will direct the Julliard Music school orchestra in a special concert in New York next spring. His appearance is part of a plan to afford students at the school an opportunity to play under the direction of a celebrated conductor. Under Dr. Koussevitsky's direction the student orchestra will learn at first hand what it means to perform under the guidance [illegible]

ADVERTISING AGE
CHICAGO, ILL.
SEP [illegible] 1947

John Hancock Makes Sectional Test of ABC Show

NEW YORK—John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company will sponsor "Point Sublime," a drama about a mythical village store, starting Oct. 5 over 12 ABC stations in California and Texas.

If the company is pleased with results of the test broadcasts, the program may be expanded to the full network. [illegible] agency is McCann-E[illegible]

In its first [illegible] network radio, John Hancock [illegible]pany sponsored the Boston Symphony Orchestra on ABC from January to April this year.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 22 1947

Boston's Symphony Has Record Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra reports an attendance of more than 800,000 at the concerts of its 66th season, which ended with the Tanglewood Festival in Massachusetts.

Claiming a record attendance for a symphony orchestra season, the society gave the following figures: 109 Winter concerts, 300,000; six youth concerts, 12,000; 58 Pops concerts, 135,000; 21 Esplanade concerts, 250,000; 14 Berkshire Festival concerts, 105,000.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, musical director of the orchestra, will open the 67th season at Symphony Hall in Boston on Oct. 10. The number of concerts will be the same as last season.

Concerts also will be given in New Haven, Hartford and New London, Conn.; Northampton, Mass.; New Brunswick, N. J.; Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati; Bloomington and South Bend, Ind.; Ann Arbor and Detroit, Michigan; Chicago and Rochester.

OGDEN, UTAH
STANDARD EXAMINER
[illegible] 23 1947

TUESDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 23, 1947

Funds Offered for Hawthorne House

DES MOINES, Sept. 22 (AP) — The National Federation of Music clubs executive board, closing its 1947 meeting here, voted today a $1,000 gift to reconstruct the "little red house" where Nathaniel Hawthorne lived in 1850 and 1851 and wrote some of his most famous stories.

The house will be used as practice rooms by the Berkshire music center, which is sponsored by Serge Koussevitzky, the board announced. Full cost of the restoration will be borne by the federation, the announcement said. The federat will dedicate the house at the ginning of the annual music tival there next summer.

Josiah Kirby Lilly, Indianapo Ind., well known collector of S phen Foster relics, was named t first honorary member of the fe eration.

Mrs. Ernest Hale, of Rindge, H., and Mary Howe, of Washin ton, D. C., were named member at-large of the board. Mrs. Charl Kastning, of Albuquerque, N. M was elected Rocky mountain di trict president.

TAUNTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
SEP 23 1947

To Reconstruct "Little Red House"

DES MOINES, Sept. 23 (AP)—The National Federation of Music clubs executive board, closing its 1947 meeting here, voted a $1,000 gift yesterday to reconstruct the "Little Red House" where Nathaniel Hawthorne lived in 1850 and 1851 and wrote some of his most famous stories.

The house will be used as practice rooms by the Berkshire Music Center, which is sponsored by Serge Koussevitzky, the board announced. The full cost of the restoration to be borne by the Federation.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
SEP 23 1947

METROPOLITAN OPERA ENGAGES RYCHTARIK

Richard Rychtarik has been engaged as technical director by the Metropolitan Opera Company, Edward Johnson, the opera's general manager, announced yesterday. The technical director coordinates the various aspects of the stage productions, such as scenery, costumes, lighting, properties and carpentry.

Born in Czechslovakia, Mr. Rychtarik received early training in architecture and music, but has spent most of his life since then backstage in the theatres of Europe and America as a scenic artist and technical authority.

In this country he worked with Artur Rodzinski on productions in the Cleveland Playhouse, was chief designer for the Cleveland Great Lakes Exposition, designed for the World's Fair and was responsible for the New York production of Shostakovich's "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk" in 1935. Since 1939 he has been the scenic director of the Berkshire Music Center; and has designed costumes and scenery for various Metropolitan Opera productions.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
SEP 24 1947

To Restore Hawthorne House

DES MOINES, Iowa, Sept. 23 (AP).—The National Federation of Music Clubs executive board, closing its 1947 meeting here, voted $1,000 to reconstruct the "Little Red House" where Nathaniel Hawthorne lived in 1850 and 1851 and wrote some of his most famous stories. The house will be used as practice rooms by the Berkshire Music Center, which is sponsored by [illegible] Koussevitzky, the board announced. The [illegible]st of the restoration will be borne by the federation, which will dedicate the house at the beginning of the annual music festival next summer.

BURBANK, CALIF.
REVIEW
SEP 2[illegible] 1947

Serge Koussevitzky, direct of the Boston Symphony, w conduct the orchestra of t Julliard School of Music in a sp cial concert at Carnegie Hall May 9 next. William Schuma president of the school, said t arrangement is part of a plan give students an opportunity work under the greatest condu tors. The concert will be in a dition to the two annual Carneg Hall concerts given regularly b the Julliard Orchestra and Jul lard Chorus.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES

Koussevitzky Sets Symphony Schedule

Special to The Standard-Times

BOSTON, Sept. 27—Serge Koussevitzky, who is expected to arrive Wednesday on his return from Europe, has cabled the program with which he will open the 67th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Oct. 10, and the following Saturday evening. These concerts will be the first of the longer series of 24 pairs.

There will also be shorter series of six Sunday afternoon and six Tuesday evening concerts. A few season tickets are still to be had for the Friday afternoon and Sunday afternoon series.

The opening program will consist of the first Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, which is to have its initial performance at these concerts, Hindemith's Symphony in three parts, "Mathis der Maler," and the Fifth Symphony by Beethoven in C minor.

Soloists for the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series will include the pianists Myra Hess, Witold Malcuzynski, Artur Rubinstein, and Nadia Reisenberg; the violinists Ginette Neveu and Isaac Stern; the sopranos Mariana Koshetz and Eleanor Steber. The guest conductors will be Charles Munch, Eleazar de Carvalho, and Leonard Bernstein.

TULSA, OKLA.
WORLD

Koussevitzky to Lead Juilliard Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the orchestra of the Juilliard School of Music in a special concert at Carnege Hall next May 9. William Schuman, president of the school, said the arrangement is part of a plan to give students an opportunity to work under the greatest conductors.

The concert will be in addition to the two annual Carnegie Hall concerts given regularly by the Julliard Orchestra and Julliard Chorus.

[illegible]
SAN F[illegible], CALIF.
[illegible] 25 [illegible]

LIGHT OPERA FESTIVAL OF MOTION PICTURES CONTINUES

The last three programs of the Festival of Musical Film presented at Vogue Theatre, Sacramento at Presidio, by San Francisco Theatres, Inc., will be the following:

Today and tomorrow will be the last showings of "Existence of Music," the story of and with the London Philharmonic Orchestra, also Walter Damrosch brodacasting the scherzo from a symphony by Glazounow, Werner Janssen's symphony orchestra doing "Toccata and Fugue in D Minor," and the academy award winner, "The Cat Concerto." From Sunday to Wednesday, September 28, 29, 30, and October 1, "The Seventh Veil" with James Mason and Ann Todd will be shown, as well as Mme. Schumann-Heink singing Brahms' "Cradle Song," and Jacques Thibaud in "The Story of the Violin."

From Thursday to Saturday, October 2, 3, 4, "April Romance," with Richard Tauber and Jane Baxter to the music of Franz Schubert will be featured. Also on this last program will be Josef Hofmann playing selections of Rachmaninoff and Beethoven with Don Voorhees and the Telephone Hour Symphony Orchestra; "Melody of Youth" by the California Junior Symphony, and "Holiday for Shoe Strings," a color cartoon.

PETER GRIMES AT STANFORD

The West Coast premiere of the modern opera, "Peter Grimes," by Benjamin Britten, will be a feature of the 1947-48 dramatic season at Stanford, it was announced by Hubert C. Heffner, head of the department of speech and drama, and William L. Crosten, head of the music department.

Written for and produced by the Sadlers Wells Opera Company in England, the production has been an international success, having been presented in 10 countries in eight different languages.

The only time it has been given in the United States, however, was in the summer of 1946 at the Berkshire Music Festival in Lenox, Massachusetts, for an invited audience only, and with music cr ics present from over all the nation. Th consensus was that "Peter Grimes" is most important opera written in Eng and one of the most important of m operas.

The Stanford presentation, in whic departments of speech and drama a music will co-operate, is expected to b second production of "Peter Grim the United States, and the first to the public can buy tickets.

Herbert Jan Popper will be mu rector of the Stanford producti Cowles Strickland, stage director; dell Cole, designer; and Virginia [illegible] costumer.

Benjamin Britten, the compose [illegible] powerful new creative force in [illegible]ish music. The libretto of "Peter [illegible]mes" was written by Montagu Slater and is adapted from a poem by George [illegible]rabbe.

HASTINGS, NEB.
TRIBUNE

NO PLANE JAUNT

Sergei Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, wanted to fly his orchestra to Europe, for a tour this month. The bookings were plentiful and there were assurances of exciting receptions. The board of trustees of the Boston Symphony refused to permit the flight. "Our orchestra," Koussevitzky was told, "is too prized to have its future entrusted to a plane. One accident—just one—and what would happen to the Boston Symphony?" . . . Mr. Koussevitzky is determined to make the trip next year, even if he leaves the orchestra in Boston and goes abroad with a group of student-musicians.

Benjamin V. Cohen, who recently resigned as counselor at the State Department, after 14 years in the service of the government, will rejoin his former partner, Tommy Corcoran, in the private practice of law on October 1 . . . Justice Frank Murphy has been invited to make a quick trip to Manila before the Supreme Court reconvenes . . . Justice Douglas isn't expected back in Washington in time for the opening of court. He needs two more weeks of recuperation after his recent operation . . . Richard Strauss has written a new opera, "The Loves of Danae." Rodzinski may give a performance of it in Chicago . . . Some of Taft's adherents say that the Republican party can't start mending its fences because Tom Dewey is sitting on all of them.

In England, during a discussion of the economic crisis, an editor suggested to Ernest Bevin a sure way of obtaining America's help without having to apply for another loan. "Let's declare war on the United States tomorrow," he said. "Twenty-four hours later, we'll announce that we surrender. And after that, America is bound to take care of us."

FAIRMOUNT, W. VA.
WEST VIRGINIAN
SEP 21 1947

The Boston Symphony Orchestra reports an attendance of more than 800,000 at the concerts of its 66th season, recently completed at the Tanglewood Festival in Massachusetts.

Claiming a record attendance for a symphony orchestra season, the society gave the following figures: 109 winter concerts, 300,000; six youth concerts, 12,000; 58 Pops concerts, 135,000; 21 Esplanade concerts, 250,000; 14 Berkshire Festival concerts, 105,000.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, musical director of the orchestra, will open the 67th season at Symphony Hall in Boston on Oct. 10. The number of concerts will be the same as last season. In addition to the Boston concerts, the usual regular series will be given in New York, Brooklyn, Providence and Cambridge.

Concerts also will be given in New Haven, Hartford and New London, Conn.; Northampton, Mass.; New Brunswick, N. J.; Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati; Bloomington and South Bend, Ind.; Ann Arbor and Detroit, Michigan; Chicago and Rochester.

Music to be "seen" on the screen as well as heard is being developed by United Artists. Called musicolor shorts, the ten-minute subjects are recorded by Werner Janssen, conductor of the Janssen Symphony Orchestra of Los Angles.

They are shot in color, with backgrounds from nature to illustrate the moods of the music. The latest release is Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave," to have its first showing in Portland, Ore., in November. The background was photographed at Sea Lion Cave on the Oregon coast.

Six unknown young Negro musical artists will have a chance to make their debuts at Town Hall in New York this season as the result of auditions held by the National Negro Congress.

The winners were selected from 150 contestants who were given auditions. They are Allen Brown, pianist, New York; Oland Gaston, pianist, Chicago; Theodore Hines, bass-baritone, Rye, N. Y.; Lawrence Mellon, pianist, New York; Louise Parker, contralto, Philadelphia, and Ruth Stewart, mezzo-soprano, New York. They will be heard in pairs at Town Hall, one singer and one instrumentalist to a concert.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT & LEADER
[illegible] 1947

THE 67TH SEASON

. . . of the Boston symphony will open on Oct. 10 with Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, recently returned from Europe, directing. There will be approximately the same number of concerts as last season. The Saturday evening and Tuesday evening series in Boston, the series in New York, Brooklyn, Providence and Cambridge are already completely subscribed. There will also be a tour and concerts in New Haven, Hartford and New London, Conn.; Northampton, Mass.; New Brunswick, N. J.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Washington, D. C.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Cincinnati, Ohio; Bloomington and South Bend, Ind.; Chicago; Ann Arbor and Detroit, Mich., and Rochester, N. Y.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
SEP 21 1947

Stanford to Give "Peter Grimes"

PALO ALTO, Calif., Sept. 20.—Benjamin Britten's contemporary opera "Peter Grimes" will be given its West Coast premiere at Stanford University during the 1947-48 season. This is expected to be the second production of the opera in the United States and the first to which the public can buy tickets.

Written for and produced by the Sadlers Wells Opera Company in England, the opera since has been presented in ten different countries in eight different languages. Its only previous United States performance, however, was at the Berkshire Music Festival in Massachusetts in the summer of 1946, before an invited audience including music critics from over the nation.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT & LEADER
SEP 2[illegible] 1947

SERGEI KOUSSEVITSKY

. . . conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will direct the Julliard Music school orchestra in a special concert in New York next spring. His appearance is part of a plan to afford students at the school an opportunity to play under the direction of a celebrated conductor. Under Dr. Koussevitsky's direction the student orchestra will learn at first hand what it means to perform under the guidance of

---

ADVERTISING AGE
CHICAGO, ILL.
SEP 22 1947

John Hancock Makes Sectional Test of ABC Show

NEW YORK—John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Company will sponsor "Point Sublime," a drama about a mythical village store, starting Oct. 5 over 12 ABC stations in California and Texas.

If the company is pleased with results of the test broadcasts, the program may be expanded to the full network later. Agency is McCann-Erickson.

In its first use of network radio, John Hancock Company sponsored the Boston Symphony Orchestra on ABC from January to April this year.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 22 1947

Boston's Symphony Has Record Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra reports an attendance of more than 800,000 at the concerts of its 66th season, which ended with the Tanglewood Festival in Massachusetts.

Claiming a record attendance for a symphony orchestra season, the society gave the following figures: 109 Winter concerts, 300,000; six youth concerts, 12,000; 58 Pops concerts, 135,000; 21 Esplanade concerts, 250,000; 14 Berkshire Festival concerts, 105,000.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, musical director of the orchestra, will open the 67th season at Symphony Hall in Boston on Oct. 10. The number of concerts will be the same as last season.

Concerts also will be given in New Haven, Hartford and New London, Conn.; Northampton, Mass.; New Brunswick, N. J.; Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati; Bloomington and South Bend, Ind.; Ann Arbor and Detroit, Michigan; Chicago and Rochester.

OGDEN, UTAH
STANDARD EXAMINER
SEP 23 1947

TUESDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 23, 1947

Funds Offered for Hawthorne House

DES MOINES, Sept. 22 (AP) — The National Federation of Music clubs executive board, closing its 1947 meeting here, voted today a $1,000 gift to reconstruct the "little red house" where Nathaniel Hawthorne lived in 1850 and 1851 and wrote some of his most famous stories.

The house will be used as practice rooms by the Berkshire music center, which is sponsored by Serge Koussevitzky, the board announced. Full cost of the restoration will be borne by the federation, the announcement said. The federation will dedicate the house at the beginning of the annual music festival there next summer.

Josiah Kirby Lilly, Indianapolis, Ind., well known collector of Stephen Foster relics, was named the first honorary member of the federation.

Mrs. Ernest Hale, of Rindge, N. H., and Mary Howe, of Washington, D. C., were named members-at-large of the board. Mrs. Charles Kastning, of Albuquerque, N. M., was elected Rocky mountain district president.

TAUNTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
SEP 23 1947

To Reconstruct "Little Red House"

DES MOINES, Sept. 23 (AP)—The National Federation of Music clubs executive board, closing its 1947 meeting here, voted a $1,000 gift yesterday to reconstruct the "Little Red House" where Nathaniel Hawthorne lived in 1850 and 1851 and wrote some of his most famous stories.

The house will be used as practice rooms by the Berkshire Music Center, which is sponsored by Serge Koussevitzky, the board announced. The full cost of the restoration to be borne by the Federation.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
SEP 23 1947

METROPOLITAN OPERA ENGAGES RYCHTARIK

Richard Rychtarik has been engaged as technical director by the Metropolitan Opera Company, Edward Johnson, the opera's general manager, announced yesterday. The technical director coordinates the various aspects of the stage productions, such as scenery, costumes, lighting, properties and carpentry.

Born in Czechslovakia, Mr. Rychtarik received early training in architecture and music, but has spent most of his life since then backstage in the theatres of Europe and America as a scenic artist and technical authority.

In this country he worked with Artur Rodzinski on productions in the Cleveland Playhouse, was chief designer for the Cleveland Great Lakes Exposition, designed for the World's Fair and was responsible for the New York production of Shostakovich's "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk" in 1935. Since 1939 he has been the scenic director of the Berkshire Music Center, and has designed costumes and scenery for various Metropolitan Opera productions.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
SEP 24 1947

To Restore Hawthorne House

DES MOINES, Iowa, Sept. 23 (AP).—The National Federation of Music Clubs executive board, closing its 1947 meeting here, voted $1,000 to reconstruct the "Little Red House" where Nathaniel Hawthorne lived in 1850 and 1851 and wrote some of his most famous stories. The house will be used as practice rooms by the Berkshire Music Center, which is sponsored by Serge Koussevitzky, the board announced. The full cost of the restoration will be borne by the federation, which will dedicate the house at the beginning of the annual music festival next summer.

BURBANK, CALIF.
REVIEW
SEP 2[illegible] 1947

Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the orchestra of the Juillard School of Music in a special concert at Carnegie Hall on May 9 next. William Schuman, president of the school, said the arrangement is part of a plan to give students an opportunity to work under the greatest conductors. The concert will be in addition to the two annual Carnegie Hall concerts given regularly by the Juillard Orchestra and Juillard Chorus.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
SEP 28 1947

Koussevitzky Sets Symphony Schedule

Special to The Standard-Times

BOSTON, Sept. 27—Serge Koussevitzky, who is expected to arrive Wednesday on his return from Europe, has cabled the program with which he will open the 67th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Oct. 10, and the following Saturday evening. These concerts will be the first of the longer series of 24 pairs.

There will also be shorter series of six Sunday afternoon and six Tuesday evening concerts. A few season tickets are still to be had for the Friday afternoon and Sunday afternoon series.

The opening program will consist of the first Brandenburg Concerto of Bach, which is to have its initial performance at these concerts, Hindemith's Symphony in three parts, "Mathis der Maler," and the Fifth Symphony by Beethoven in C minor.

Soloists for the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening series will include the pianists Myra Hess, Witold Malcuzynski, Artur Rubinstein, and Nadia Reisenberg; the violinists Ginette Neveu and Isaac Stern; the sopranos Mariana Koshetz and Eleanor Steber. The guest conductors will be Charles Munch, Eleazar de Carvalho, and Leonard Bernstein.

TULSA, OKLA.
WORLD

Koussevitzky to Lead Juilliard Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct the orchestra of the Juilliard School of Music in a special concert at Carnege Hall next May 9.

William Schuman, president of the school, said the arrangement is part of a plan to give students an opportunity to work under the greatest conductors.

The concert will be in addition to the two annual Carnegie Hall concerts given regularly by the Julliard Orchestra and Julliard Chorus.

HE ARGONAUT FRANCISCO, CALIF.
EP 26 1947

OPERA FESTIVAL OF MOTION PICTURES CONTINUES

[illegible]

[illegible] GRIMES AT STANFORD

[illegible]

Herbert Jan Popper [illegible] of the Stanford [illegible] Strickland, stage [illegible] Cole, designer; and [illegible] costumer.

Benjamin Britten [illegible] powerful new creat[illegible] music. The libretto [illegible] was written by Montague Slater adapted from a poem by George

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
SEP 27 1947

MUSICAL EVENTS

Concert Records

FOUR excerpts from the second suite of Prokofieff's lengthy "Romeo and Juliet" ballet score have been recorded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, in Victor album 1129. The result is magnificent. This music, which was composed in 1935, has, for some reason, never been put on records before in this country, and it is fortunate that it has been given such an exquisite performance the first time out. Probably none of our other important orchestras could have played it so well. I haven't heard the score all the way through, but it's a reasonable guess that these parts reflect the character of the whole. They are almost completely impersonal, but fascinatingly theatrical in their interpretation of episodes from the great romantic tragedy. I was interested in comparing Prokofieff's approach to the theme with that of Tschaikowsky, whose fantasy overture on the same subject is one of his most gratifying works. Prokofieff's music is, as you might expect, more intellectual, and it is satisfying because of the way it contrasts the dramatic forces involved. It is also less moving and less noble, though extremely persuasive on its own terms.

The first of the four excerpts, "Montagues and Capulets," is, I think, the best. A fragile dance theme, which evokes a vision of a pitiable Juliet, is threaded through heavier music picturing a relentless, lumbering promenade by the heads of the two families. "Juliet the Maiden," "Dance," and "Romeo and Juliet's Grave" are the other movements. In the first, a light and impetuous theme is now and then reined in by more sober and romantic music. The second is a graceful, fleet, but not entirely festive piece; and the last, and longest, movement is grave, tragic music that eventually becomes an apotheosis of the whole story.

"Romeo and Juliet" represented Prokofieff's first attempt to harness his creative instincts, after sixteen years away from Russia, to the stern artistic doctrines of the Soviet Union. The compromise apparently was no trouble at all.

CLEVER craftsmanship, which sometimes can amount to brilliance, as in the "Romeo and Juliet" suite, characterizes a lot of functional modern m[illegible]often at the expense of true c[illegible]imely case in point, altho[illegible] of a confection in itse[illegible]Gould's "Minstrel Show," which is smartly played by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra on a new Victor single, No. 11-9654. The music has all the stock ingredients of a blackface entertainment—jokes, a sentimental song, a soft-shoe dance—but they don't add up to a very good minstrel show. The Gould piece, like a lot of other contemporary compositions, sounds as if it had been written to specifications handed down by a new muse, the Muse of Functional Design. Under this inspiration, as soon as a composer gets his orders to knock together something on, say, a circus, a threshing combine, or a hydroelectric dam, he starts drumming out the appropriate rhythms, relying on a later effort to invest them with emotional content. Too glib, that's the trouble—dazzling, sometimes, but too glib.

RACHMANINOFF's choral symphony "The Bells" is another work that has not been recorded before. The Santa Monica Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Jacques Rachmilovich, makes up for the oversight in an album (Disc 804) that features Carmen Prietto, soprano; Breece Westmoreland, tenor; and Stephan Kemalyan, baritone, as soloists, backed up by the Hollywood First Methodist Church Chorus. The original text of "The Bells" was a Russian version of Poe's poem, but for this performance the Russian has been re-translated into English, certainly a roundabout maneuver. It's a moody work, which retains much of the flavor of the poem. I wish I could say more nice things about it, but I'm afraid the four parts are too monotonous to be of real interest. The performance is a fair one, though I think you'll have trouble following all those converted words.

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEP 27 1947

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

TO CATCH up now on the August records, and to begin with what I thought would be especially interesting, RCA Victor's set (1129; $2.85) of the Suite No. 2 from Prokofiev's music for the ballet "Romeo and Juliet": it turns out to be an adaptation of the resources of Prokofiev's idiom to the purpose of the action—expertly made, suitable, agreeable to the ear, but, for me at any rate, with no inner life to command interest in it for itself. Koussevitzky's performance with the Boston Symphony seems good and is excellently reproduced—though in my review copy the conclusion wavers in pitch.

Stokowski, conducting the Hollywood Bowl Orchestra, produces the performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique"

Symphony one would expect: eccentric and wilful in pace, mannered and fussy in phrasing, distorted in shape (Set 1105; $6.85). It is not always clear on the records; and occasional vagaries of balance and volume lead one to suspect that Stokowski did some twiddling of control-knobs.

The materials, plant, and labor that RCA Victor can't waste on any of Schnabel's new H. M. V. recordings, or even on keeping his old ones available, it expends on a four-record set (1133; $4.85) of Glazunov's music for the ballet "Raymonda," which one tolerates with the dancing but which has no claim to attention without it. The playing of the Boston "Pops" Orchestra under Fiedler is excellent and well reproduced.

Even the two sides of the H. M. V. recording of Schnabel's beautiful performance of Mozart's wonderful Rondo K.511 is something on which RCA Victor can't waste the materials, plant, and labor that it expends on Mozart's inconsequential Adagio and Rondo K.617 for glass harmonica, played on the celesta, not always clearly, by E. Power Biggs with a quartet of excellent winds and strings (11-9570; $1).

Columbia offers Liszt's enjoyable "Mephisto Waltz," played by Rodzinski with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (Set X-281; $3). The performance has a little of Rodzinski's tenseness; but I find this less disturbing than

TION PICTURES

RKO NOW
AY AND NOSTALGIC—N. Y. POST
HAVER • MARK STEVENS
'Wonder Who's Kissing Her Now'
in TECHNICOLOR and
'Wyoming' William Elliott, Vera Ralston, John Carroll

BRONX: CASTLE HILL, CHESTER, FORDHAM, FRANKLIN, MARBLE HILL, PELHAM, ROYAL WESTCHESTER: MT. VERNON, NEW ROCH., WH. PLAINS, YONKERS

"Tense Adventure"—N. Y. Times
YOUNG • SUSAN HAYWARD
JANE GREER • RITA JOHNSON
'They Won't Belive Me'
—and—
'Woman on the Beach'
OAN BENNETT • ROBERT RYAN

QUEENS: ALDEN, Jamaica; MIDWAY, Forest Hills; Keith's FLUSHING; Keith's RICH. HILL; STRAND, Far Rockaway MANHATTAN: COLONIAL, B'way & 62 St.

STAGE PLAY

MAX GORDON presents
BORN YESTERDAY
The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street, East of B'way. CH 4-4256
Eves. 8:40. Mats. Wed & Sat. 2:40. Air-Conditioned

BE TO THE NATION TODAY!

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
SEP 28 1947

OTHER REVIEWS

Prokofieff: Romeo and Juliet, Ballet Suite No. 2. Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. (Victor, two twelve-inch records). These excerpts from Prokofieff's score for a "Romeo and Juliet" ballet show that the composer did his usual efficient, journeyman job of composing. The music has an agreeable modern flavor, though the romantics of music and theatre might object to this orientation for the subject. The performance is brilliant, sonorous, and the recording is satisfactory.

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
SEP 28 1947

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra reports an attendance of more than 800,000 at the concerts of its 66th season, recently completed at the Tanglewood Festival in Massachusetts.

Claiming a record attendance for a symphony orchestra season, the society gave the following figures: 109 winter concerts, 300,000; six youth concerts, 12,000; 58 Pops concerts, 135,000; 21 Esplanade concerts, 250,000; 14 Berkshire Festival concerts, 105,000.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, musical director of the orchestra, will open the 67th season at Symphony Hall in Boston on Oct. 10. The number of concerts will be the same as last season. In addition to the Boston concerts, the usual regular series will be given in New York, Brooklyn, Providence and Cambridge.

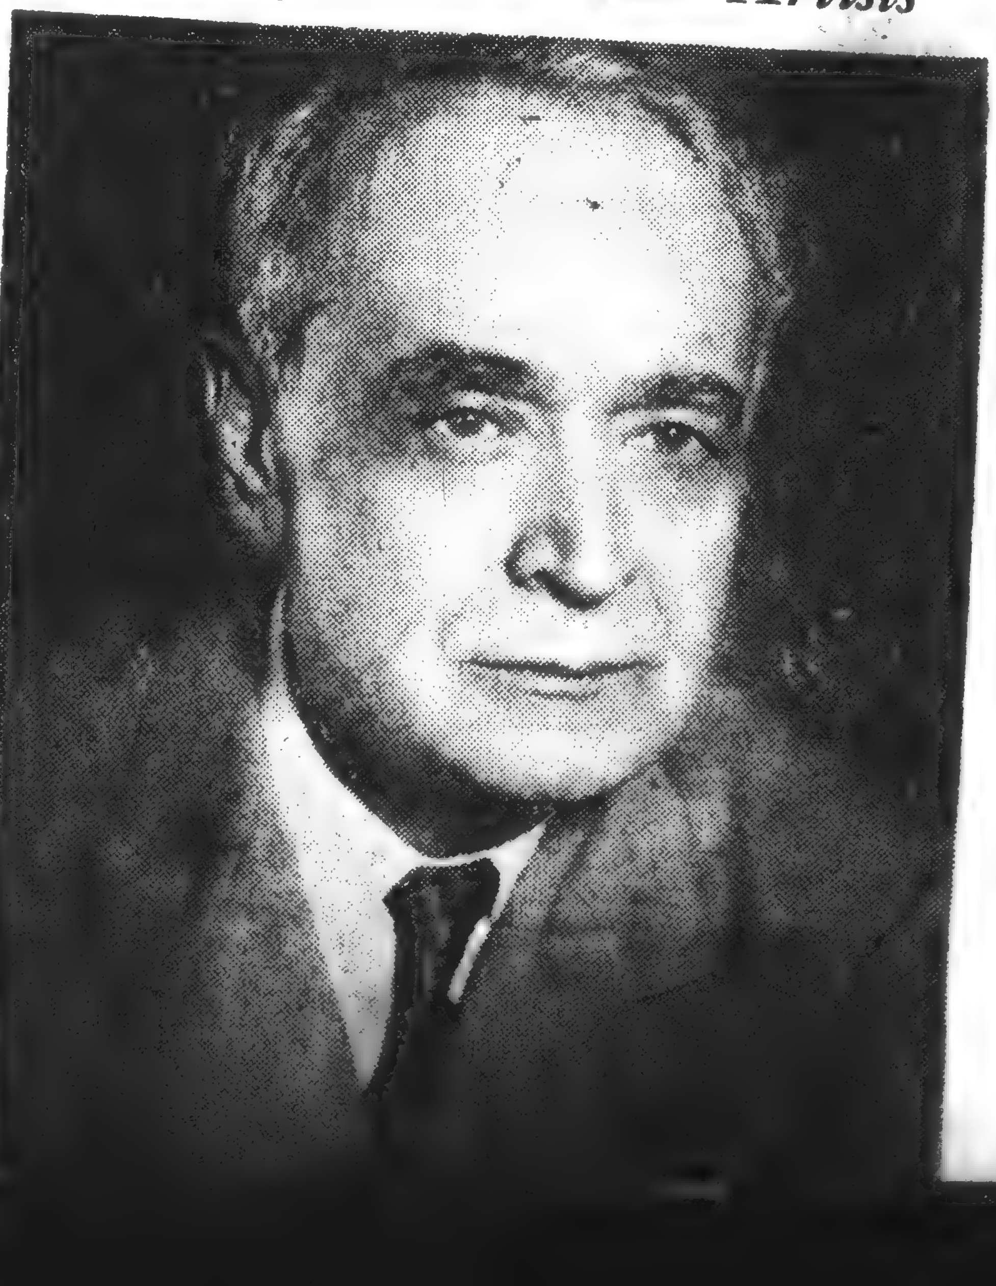
Concerts also will be given in New Haven, Hartford and New London, Conn.; Northampton, Mass.; New Brunswick, N. J.; Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati; Bloomington and South Bend, Ind.; Ann Arbor and Detroit, Michigan; Chicago and Rochester.

COLUMBUS, GA.
LEDGER
SEP 28 1947

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR EXPLAINS SCORE—Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, explains a musical score to a young student in an off moment at the Berkshire Festival Concerts at Tanglewood, Mass. The concerts are broadcast over radio station WDAK via the ABC network.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
SEP 28 1947

Woolsey Hall Series Artists

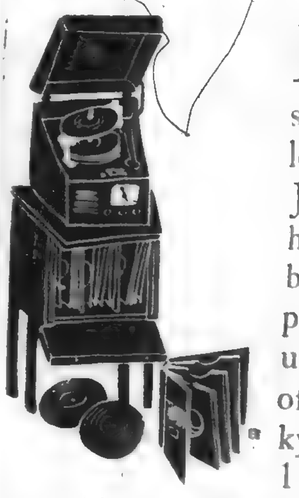


[14]

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
SEP 27 1947

MUSICAL EVENTS

Concert Records



FOUR excerpts from the second suite of Prokofieff's lengthy "Romeo and Juliet" ballet score have been recorded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, in Victor album 1129. The result is magnificent. This music, which was composed in 1935, has, for some reason, never been put on records before in this country, and it is fortunate that it has been given such an exquisite performance the first time out. Probably none of our other important orchestras could have played it so well. I haven't heard the score all the way through, but it's a reasonable guess that these parts reflect the character of the whole. They are almost completely impersonal, but fascinatingly theatrical in their interpretation of episodes from the great romantic tragedy. I was interested in comparing Prokofieff's approach to the theme with that of Tschaikowsky, whose fantasy overture on the same subject is one of his most gratifying works. Prokofieff's music is, as you might expect, more intellectual, and it is satisfying because of the way it contrasts the dramatic forces involved. It is also less moving and less noble, though extremely persuasive on its own terms.

The first of the four excerpts, "Montagues and Capulets," is, I think, the best. A fragile dance theme, which evokes a vision of a pitiable Juliet, is threaded through heavier music picturing a relentless, lumbering promenade by the heads of the two families. "Juliet the Maiden," "Dance," and "Romeo and Juliet's Grave" are the other movements. In the first, a light and impetuous theme is now and then reined in by more sober and romantic music. The second is a graceful, fleet, but not entirely festive piece; and the last, and longest, movement is grave, tragic music that eventually becomes an apotheosis of the whole story.

"Romeo and Juliet" represented Prokofieff's first attempt to harness his creative instincts, after sixteen years away from Russia, to the stern artistic doctrines of the Soviet Union. The compromise apparently was no trouble at all.

CLEVER craftsmanship, which sometimes can amou[illegible] brilliance, as in the "Romeo and Juliet" suite, characterizes a lot of functional modern m[illegible]often at the expense of true c[illegible]timely case in point, althou[illegible]n of a confection in itse[illegible] Gould's "Minstrel Show," which is smartly played by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra on a new Victor single, No. 11-9654. The music has all the stock ingredients of a blackface entertainment—jokes, a sentimental song, a soft-shoe dance—but they don't add up to a very good minstrel show. The Gould piece, like a lot of other contemporary compositions, sounds as if it had been written to specifications handed down by a new muse, the Muse of Functional Design. Under this inspiration, as soon as a composer gets his orders to knock together something on, say, a circus, a threshing combine, or a hydroelectric dam, he starts drumming out the appropriate rhythms, relying on a later effort to invest them with emotional content. Too glib, that's the trouble—dazzling, sometimes, but too glib.

RACHMANINOFF's choral symphony "The Bells" is another work that has not been recorded before. The Santa Monica Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Jacques Rachmilovich, makes up for the oversight in an album (Disc 804) that features Carmen Prietto, soprano; Breece Westmoreland, tenor; and Stephan Kemalyan, baritone, as soloists, backed up by the Hollywood First Methodist Church Chorus. The original text of "The Bells" was a Russian version of Poe's poem, but for this performance the Russian has been re-translated into English, certainly a roundabout maneuver. It's a moody work, which retains much of the flavor of the poem. I wish I could say more nice things about it, but I'm afraid the four parts are too monotonous to be of real interest. The performance is a fair one, though I think you'll have trouble following all those converted words.

NATION
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SEP 27 1947

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

TO CATCH up now on the August records, and to begin with what I thought would be especially interesting, RCA Victor's set (1129; $2.85) of the Suite No. 2 from Prokofiev's music for the ballet "Romeo and Juliet": it turns out to be an adaptation of the resources of Prokofiev's idiom to the purpose of the action—expertly made, suitable, agreeable to the ear, but, for me at any rate, with no inner life to command interest in it for itself. Koussevitzky's performance with the Boston Symphony seems good and is excellently reproduced—though in my review copy the conclusion wavers in pitch.

Stokowski, conducting the Hollywood Bowl Orchestra, produces the performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique"

Symphony one would expect: eccentric and wilful in pace, mannered and fussy in phrasing, distorted in shape. (Set 1105; $6.85). It is not always clear on the records; and occasional vagaries of balance and volume lead one to suspect that Stokowski did some twiddling of control-knobs.

The materials, plant, and labor that RCA Victor can't waste on any of Schnabel's new H. M. V. recordings, or even on keeping his old ones available, it expends on a four-record set (1133; $4.85) of Glazunov's music for the ballet "Raymonda," which one tolerates with the dancing but which has no claim to attention without it. The playing of the Boston "Pops" Orchestra under Fiedler is excellent and well reproduced.

Even the two sides of the H. M. V. recording of Schnabel's beautiful performance of Mozart's wonderful Rondo K.511 is something on which RCA Victor can't waste the materials, plant, and labor that it expends on Mozart's inconsequential Adagio and Rondo K.617 for glass harmonica, played on the celesta, not always clearly, by E. Power Biggs with a quartet of excellent winds and strings (11-9570; $1).

Columbia offers Liszt's enjoyable "Mephisto Waltz," played by Rodzinski with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (Set X-281; $3). The performance has a little of Rodzinski's tenseness; but I find this less disturbing than

TION PICTURES

RKO NOW

AY AND NOSTALGIC ... POST
HAVER • MARK STEVENS
Wonder Who's issing Her Now'
in TECHNICOLOR and
Wyoming' William Elliott Vera Ralston John Carroll

"Tense Adventure"—N. Y. Times
. YOUNG SUSAN HAYWARD
JANE GREER • RITA JOHNSON
ney Won't Belive Me'
—and—
Voman on the Beach'
OAN BENNETT • ROBERT RYAN

BRONX
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL WESTCHESTER
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS
QUEENS
ALDEN, Jamaica
MIDWAY Forest Hills
Keith's FLUSHING
Keith's RICH. HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway MANHATTAN
COLONIAL B'way & 62 St.

STAGE PLAY

MAX GORDON presents
BORN YESTERDAY
The Hilarious Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street, East of B'way. CH 4-4256
Eves. 8:40. Mats. Wed & Sat. 2:40. Air-Conditioned

BE TO THE NATION TODAY! -

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
SEP 28 1947

OTHER REVIEWS

Prokofieff: Romeo and Juliet, Ballet Suite No. 2. Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. (Victor, two twelve-inch records). These excerpts from Prokofieff's score for a "Romeo and Juliet" ballet show that the composer did his usual efficient, journeyman job of composing. The music has an agreeable modern flavor, though the romantics of music and theatre might object to this orientation for the subject. The performance is brilliant, sonorous, and the recording is satisfactory.

COLUMBUS, GA.
LEDGER
SEP 28 1947

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR EXPLAINS SCORE—Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, explains a musical score to a young student in an off moment at the Berkshire Festival Concerts at Tanglewood, Mass. The concerts are broadcast over radio station WDAK via the ABC network.

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
SEP 28 1947

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY Orchestra reports an attendance of more than 800,000 at the concerts of its 66th season, recently completed at the Tanglewood Festival in Massachusetts.

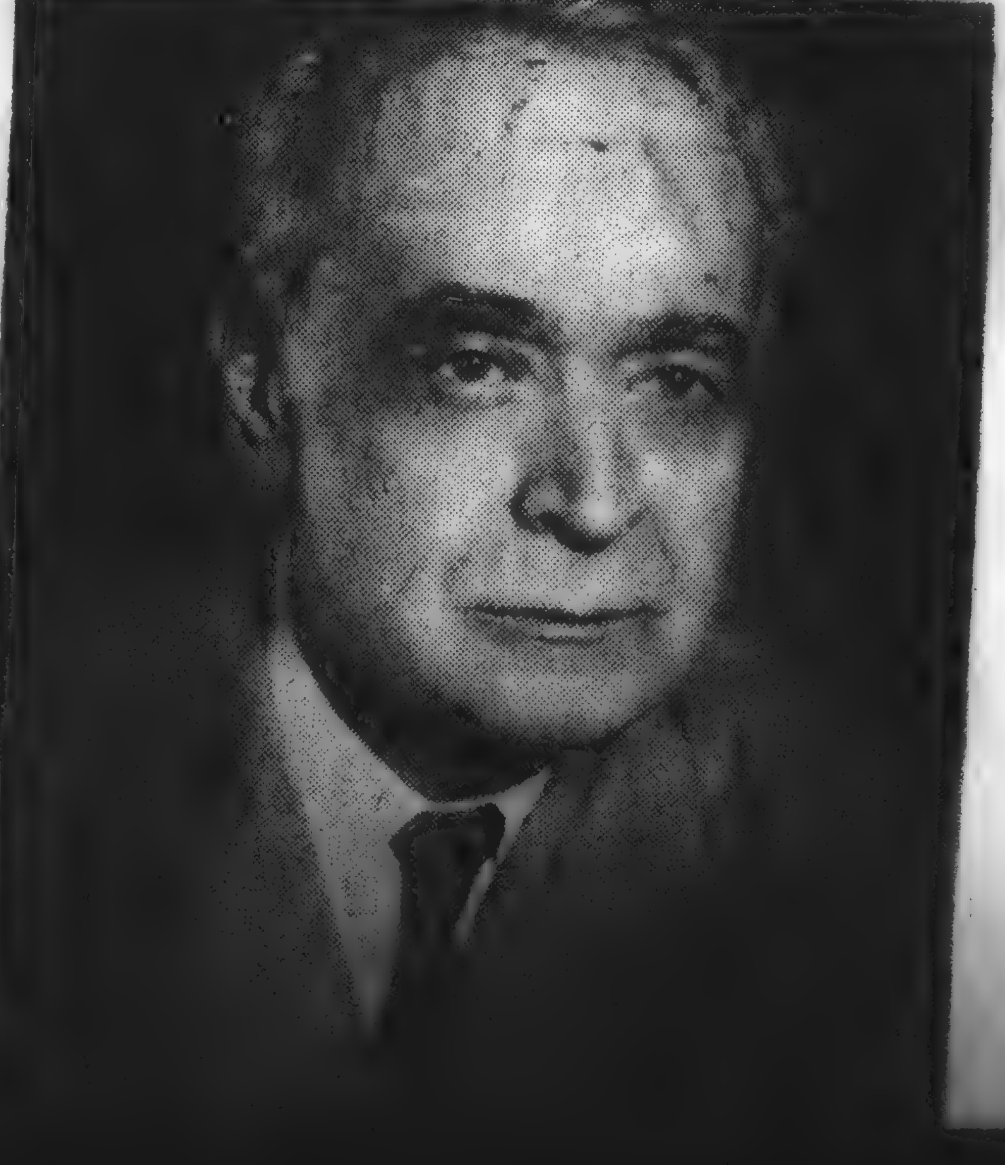
Claiming a record attendance for a symphony orchestra season, the society gave the following figures: 109 winter concerts, 300,000; six youth concerts, 12,000; 58 Pops concerts, 135,000; 21 Esplanade concerts, 250,000; 14 Berkshire Festival concerts, 105,000.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, musical director of the orchestra, will open the 67th season at Symphony Hall in Boston on Oct. 10. The number of concerts will be the same as last season. In addition to the Boston concerts, the usual regular series will be given in New York, Brooklyn, Providence and Cambridge.

Concerts also will be given in New Haven, Hartford and New London, Conn.; Northampton, Mass.; New Brunswick, N. J.; Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati; Bloominton and South Bend, Ind.; Ann Arbor and Detroit, Michigan; Chicago and Rochester.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
SEP 28 1947

Woolsey Hall Series Artists



WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD

SEP 28 1947

Music's Leading Men: III

Koussevitzky: He's a Virtuoso of the Baton

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

TO UNDERSTAND Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's position in American musical life one must understand Boston, or at least the traditions that have developed in relation to its support of its symphonic art.

The Boston Symphony, heard last season by 800,000 of the heirs and descendants of the Boston tea party, and believed by all Bostonians to be the foremost of American orchestras, began as an importation. All its members, 67 years ago, from conductor to percussionists, came from abroad. Henry Lee Higginson, its founder, sought to establish in his city a replica of the great orchestras of Leipzig and Vienna which he had heard in his youth.

Boston remained musically a German city until its most beloved conductor, B. K. (before Koussevitzky), Dr. Karl Muck, found himself in a detention camp in 1917, accused of espionage. A revulsion of feeling followed. German music was banned. French conductors, of whom the most important was Pierre Monteux, took over.

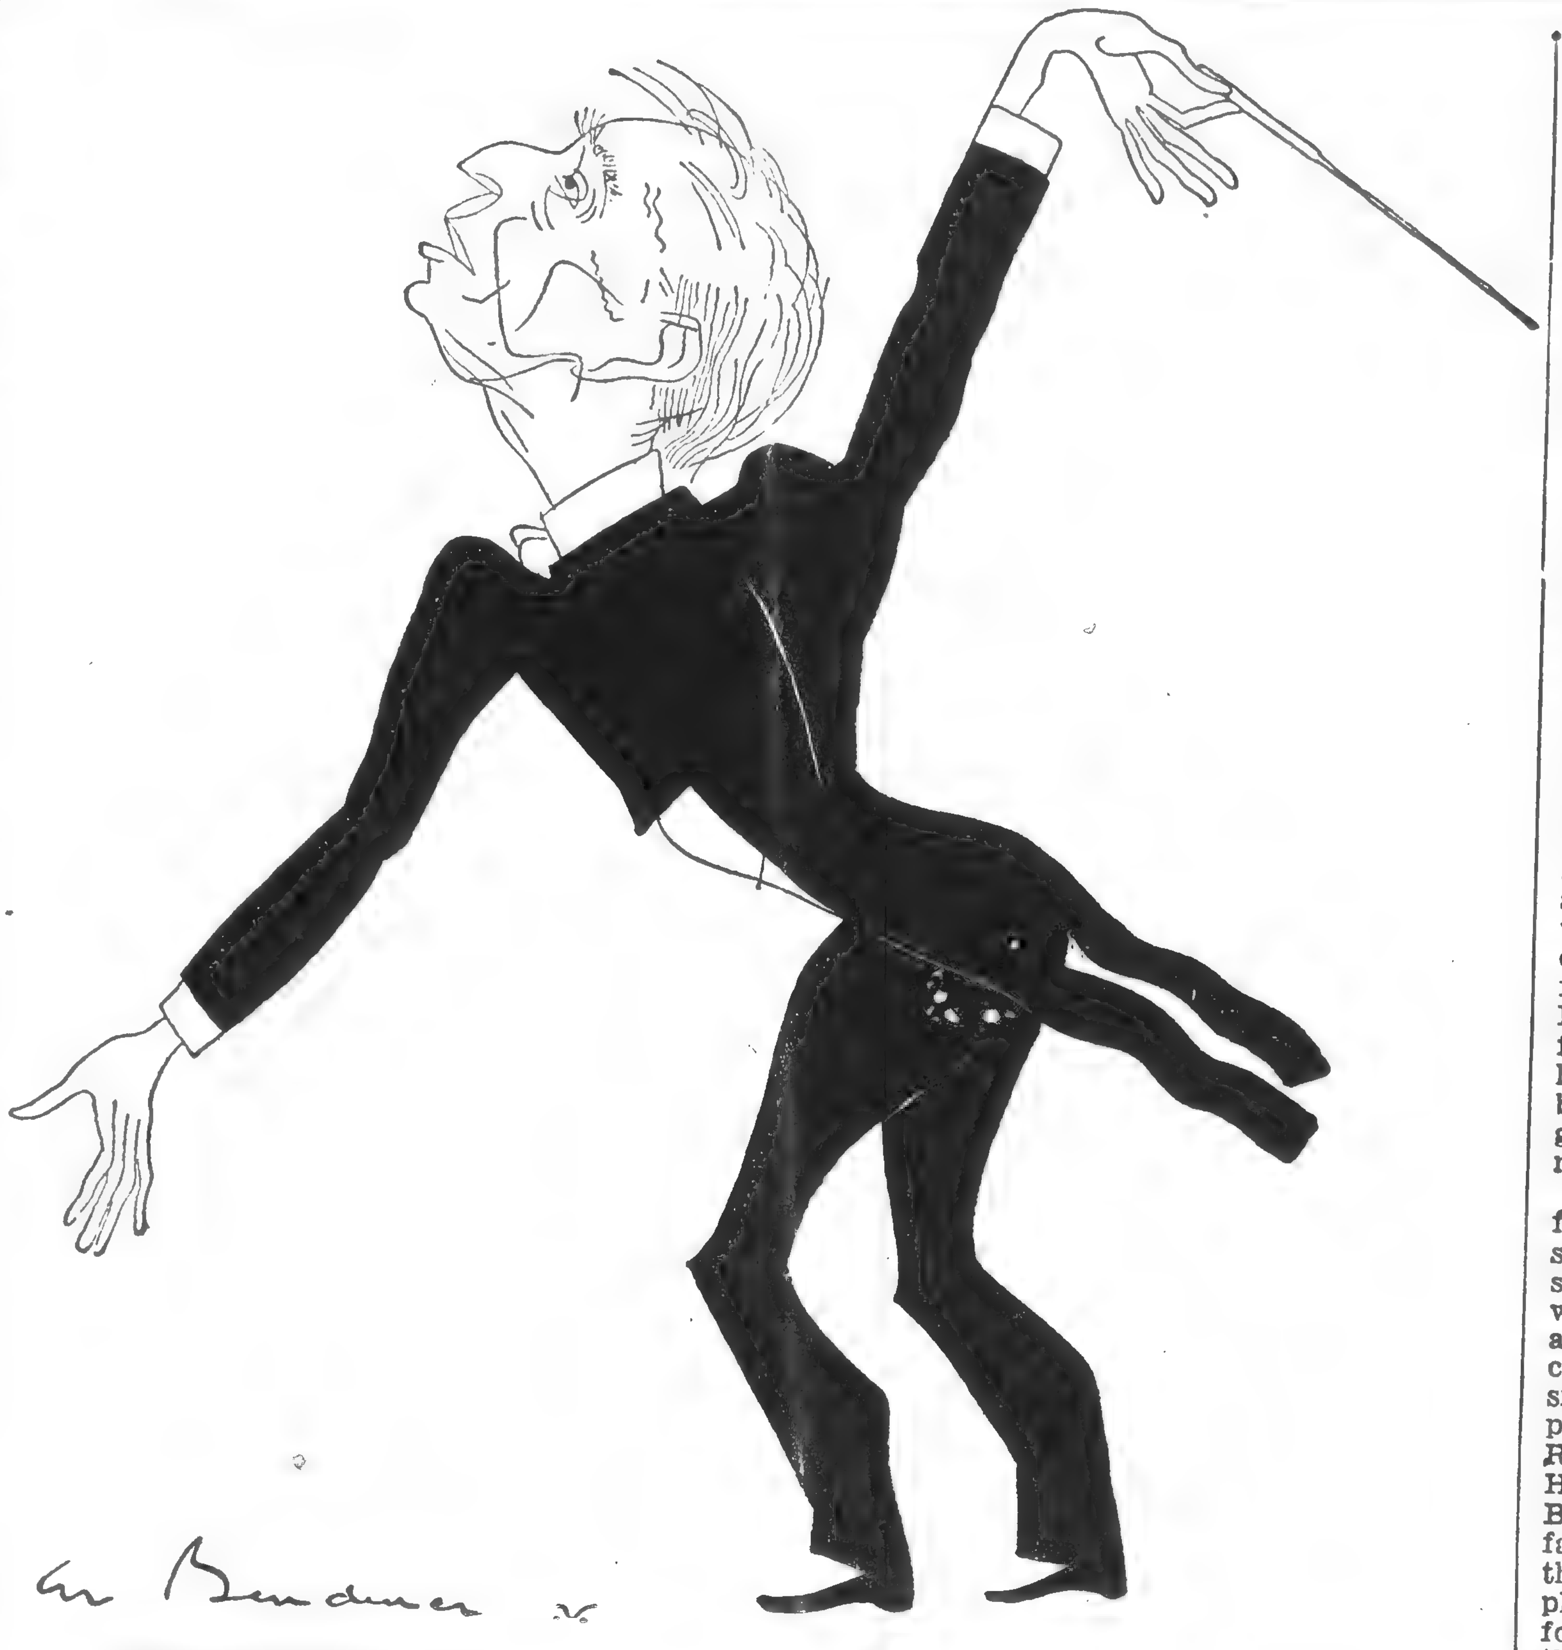
Eventually it was Monteux who brought German music back; but it occurred to no one to cease the importation of musicians. Though Boston was fanatically proud of its orchestra, the directors of the institution treated its members as they treated their factory hands and ruthlessly exploited their economic dependence.

♬

THE story of Koussevitzky's Boston career coincides, in point of time, with the eventual Americanization of the orchestra he had been imported to lead. It is not to be assumed, however, that the great Russian believed in the change. In fact he resisted it.

Long after the importation of labor under contract was made illegal he and the trustees of the Boston Symphony continued to practice it.

Koussevitzky proved a harsh and exacting task master, who rehearsed endlessly and showed no consideration for the unhappy economic situation of his players, who, being nonunion according to Boston tradition, could get no other employment.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY: He caters to descendants of the Boston Tea Party.

Endless rehearsal eventually realized Koussevitzky's acoustic ideals. The lovely crystalline tone, the luminous proportions that create a glowing tonal perspective, the tireless repetitions that wrought infinitely varied definition of musical beauty, gradually won the respect of the men who learned to help a conductor struggling against the barriers of two alien tongues—Russian and French. So players and conductor came to understand one another. Mutual respect created mutual pride.

♬

IT WAS economic pressure that stopped the importation of players, however. Though the multitude, from the first, provided sold out houses at home and on tour, the revenues deriving from broadcasting were needed to reduce a growing deficit. Broadcasting is closed to non-union groups. So Koussevitzky and the trustees capitulated. The men got union contracts which make citizenship an obligation. The conductor got one, too. So he is now legally an American.

While he confirmed the artistic discipline of the Boston Symphony, Koussevitzky was himself not, at first, a man of sound orchestral discipline such as his predecessors, Gereke, Nikisch and Muck had been.

He began his musical career as a double bass player in the orchestra of the Bol'shoi theater in Moscow. Seemingly this worm's-eye view of the orchestral acoustic did not acquaint him with the rudiments of the conductor's technique. Toscanini and Kindler, from their less humble places at the cello desks, learned more. Koussevitzky did not want to be a symphonic bassist. He wanted to be a virtuoso on his instrument, a soloist, and this he became—the greatest perhaps in the history of the art; certainly the most renowned.

♬

AS SUCH he acquired social position in Moscow and contracted a marriage with the daughter of the fabulously wealthy tea merchant, Konstantine Ushkov. With millions at his command he blossomed out as a conductor. He was self-taught. While a pianist played the scores Koussevitzky practiced the conductor's pantomime before mirrors.

He so perfected this important factor of his art that players insist his gestures for any given work never change. They are his own. Players sometimes have difficulty in understanding them. But from the first the public has found them persuasive, nor have his harshest critics—there have been some even in Boston—suggested that these gestures lack musical significance.

Koussevitzky used his wealth for patriotic as well as personal advantage. In the long series of symphonic concerts which he conducted in Russia, and throughout Europe, he specialized in modern music, Russian and French. He set up a publishing firm to make new Russian masterpieces available. He continued that practice in Boston, at first to the dissatisfaction of a public steeped in the German classics. He even played the Americans, thus forcing his competitors to do the same. The names of native composers appear 118 times in Koussevitzky's Boston and Tanglewood programs. This may be a record. And he founded a great school for conductors, symphonists, and composers at Tanglewood, the most renowned of its kind in the world.

It would be interesting were Koussevitzky to confirm his Americanism by playing works by some of the 118 American composers in his repertoire in this city where they surely are as appropriate as at home. To date he has never played a native work in the seat of American government.

Next Sunday: Eugene Ormandy

MUSIC ON THE RADIO

nyc

By B. H. HAGGIN

Sept 28, 47

TOSCANINI ended his special summer broadcast with the N. B. C. Symphony last Sunday by conducting a performance of the Symphony No. 5½ of Don Gillis, who is the producer of the N. B. C. Symphony broadcasts. The work is subtitled "Symphony for Fun," and might also be subtitled "Symphony in a Dither." It is a more robust, rowdy and hectic version of the Morton Gould type of product; and the excessive cleverness is therefore more acceptable and diverting. But the cleverness is, nevertheless, excessive.

The performance of Beethoven's First Symphony and Smetana's "Die Moldau" were familiar matters which gave evidence of continuing powers and promise of great experiences in the months ahead. But their sound as they came out of the radio struck me this time with its unresonant dryness.

A reader who, after the second Tanglewood broadcast, wrote to A. B. C. about the distortion of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony on this occasion and similar distortion by A. B. C.'s broadcasts of the Boston Symphony at other times and places, received in reply the explanation that in those instances "there have been unavoidable circumstances which have occurred while the program was being broadcast—so unavoidable that they could not be corrected on the spur of the moment"—and, apparently, could not be prevented from turning up regularly each week.

This reply would seem to be ammunition for the reader who thought it was my duty to demand of A. B. C. why the volume compressor necessary for line transmission had been used at a level which produced the distortion, and why it had not been properly adjusted for subsequent broadcasts when the distortion had resulted the first time. This reader disagreed with my contention that it was for the public to demand those answers of A. B. C.: it was I, he insisted, who must write to the broadcasting companies—as some one they would have to answer. But if I wrote to A. B. C. about the distortion of the Tanglewood broadcasts I would get back the same nonsense about unavoidable circumstances. The only way I can have any effect is to speak out publicly in this column, and thus crystallize the attitudes and opinions of other people and get them to write to the broadcasting companies. True, they will get only effusive nonsense in reply; but if a large enough number write and keep writing they will, I think, have an effect. And as for the Tanglewood broadcasts in particular, it might be a good idea to let Koussevitzky know what they did to his performances.

As it happens I did, last year, as a result of what I wrote here about the defects of the broadcasts of the Frick Collection concerts, have some correspondence with the directors of WNYC and the museum, both of whom assured me of their determination to take steps to change the microphone-placement that was responsible for the defects—and then did nothing. If enough listeners wrote to them about it something would be done, I think.

And there is another thing for the public to write to WNYC about. After a couple of months it has given up its Friday evening series of long programs of the works of one composer (protest against that) and is using the time to rebroadcast a series of the British Broadcasting Corporation's programs of great dramas. I suggest that music-lovers ask WNYC to rebroadcast some of the B. B. C.'s wonderful musical programs of its Third Program—for example, Beecham's performance of the two parts of Berlioz's "Trojans."

BURBANK, CALIF.
REVIEW

SEP 27 1947

The Boston Symphony Orchesa reports an attendance of ore than 800,000 at the concerts f its 66th season ,recently comleted at the Tanglewood Fesival in Massachusetts.

Claiming a record attendance or a symphony orchestra seaon, the society gave the followng figures: 109 winter concerts, 300,000; six youth concerts, 12,000; 58 Pops concerts, 135,000; 21 Esplanade concerts, 250,000; 14 Berkshire Festival concerts, 105,000.

Dr. Serge Kooussevitzky, musical director of the orchestra, will open the 67th season at Symphony Hall in Boston on Oct. 10. The number of concerts will be the same as last season. In addition to the Boston concerts ,the usual regular series will be given in New York, Brooklyn, Providence and Cambridge.

Concerts also will be given in w Haven, Hartford and New ndon, Conn.; Northampton, ss.; New Brunswick, N. J.; iladelphia, Washington, Pittsrgh, Cincinnati; Bloomington d South Bend, Ind.; Ann Ar r and Detroit, Michigan; Chigo and Rochester.

COLUMBUS, GA.
ENQUIRER

SEP 28 1947

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR EXPLAINS SCORE—Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, [illegible] a musical score to a young student in an off moment at the Berkshire Festival Concerts at Tanglewood, Mass. The concerts are broadcast over radio station WDAK via the ABC network.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD

SEP 28 1947

Music's Leading Men: III

Koussevitzky: He's a Virtuoso of the Baton

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

TO UNDERSTAND Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's position in American musical life one must understand Boston, or at least the traditions that have developed in relation to its support of its symphonic art.

The Boston Symphony, heard last season by 800,000 of the heirs and descendants of the Boston tea party, and believed by all Bostonians to be the foremost of American orchestras, began as an importation. All its members, 67 years ago, from conductor to percussionists, came from abroad. Henry Lee Higginson, its founder, sought to establish in his city a replica of the great orchestras of Leipzig and Vienna which he had heard in his youth.

Boston remained musically a German city until its most beloved conductor, B. K. (before Koussevitzky), Dr. Karl Muck, found himself in a detention camp in 1917, accused of espionage. A revulsion of feeling followed. German music was banned. French conductors, of whom the most important was Pierre Monteux, took over.

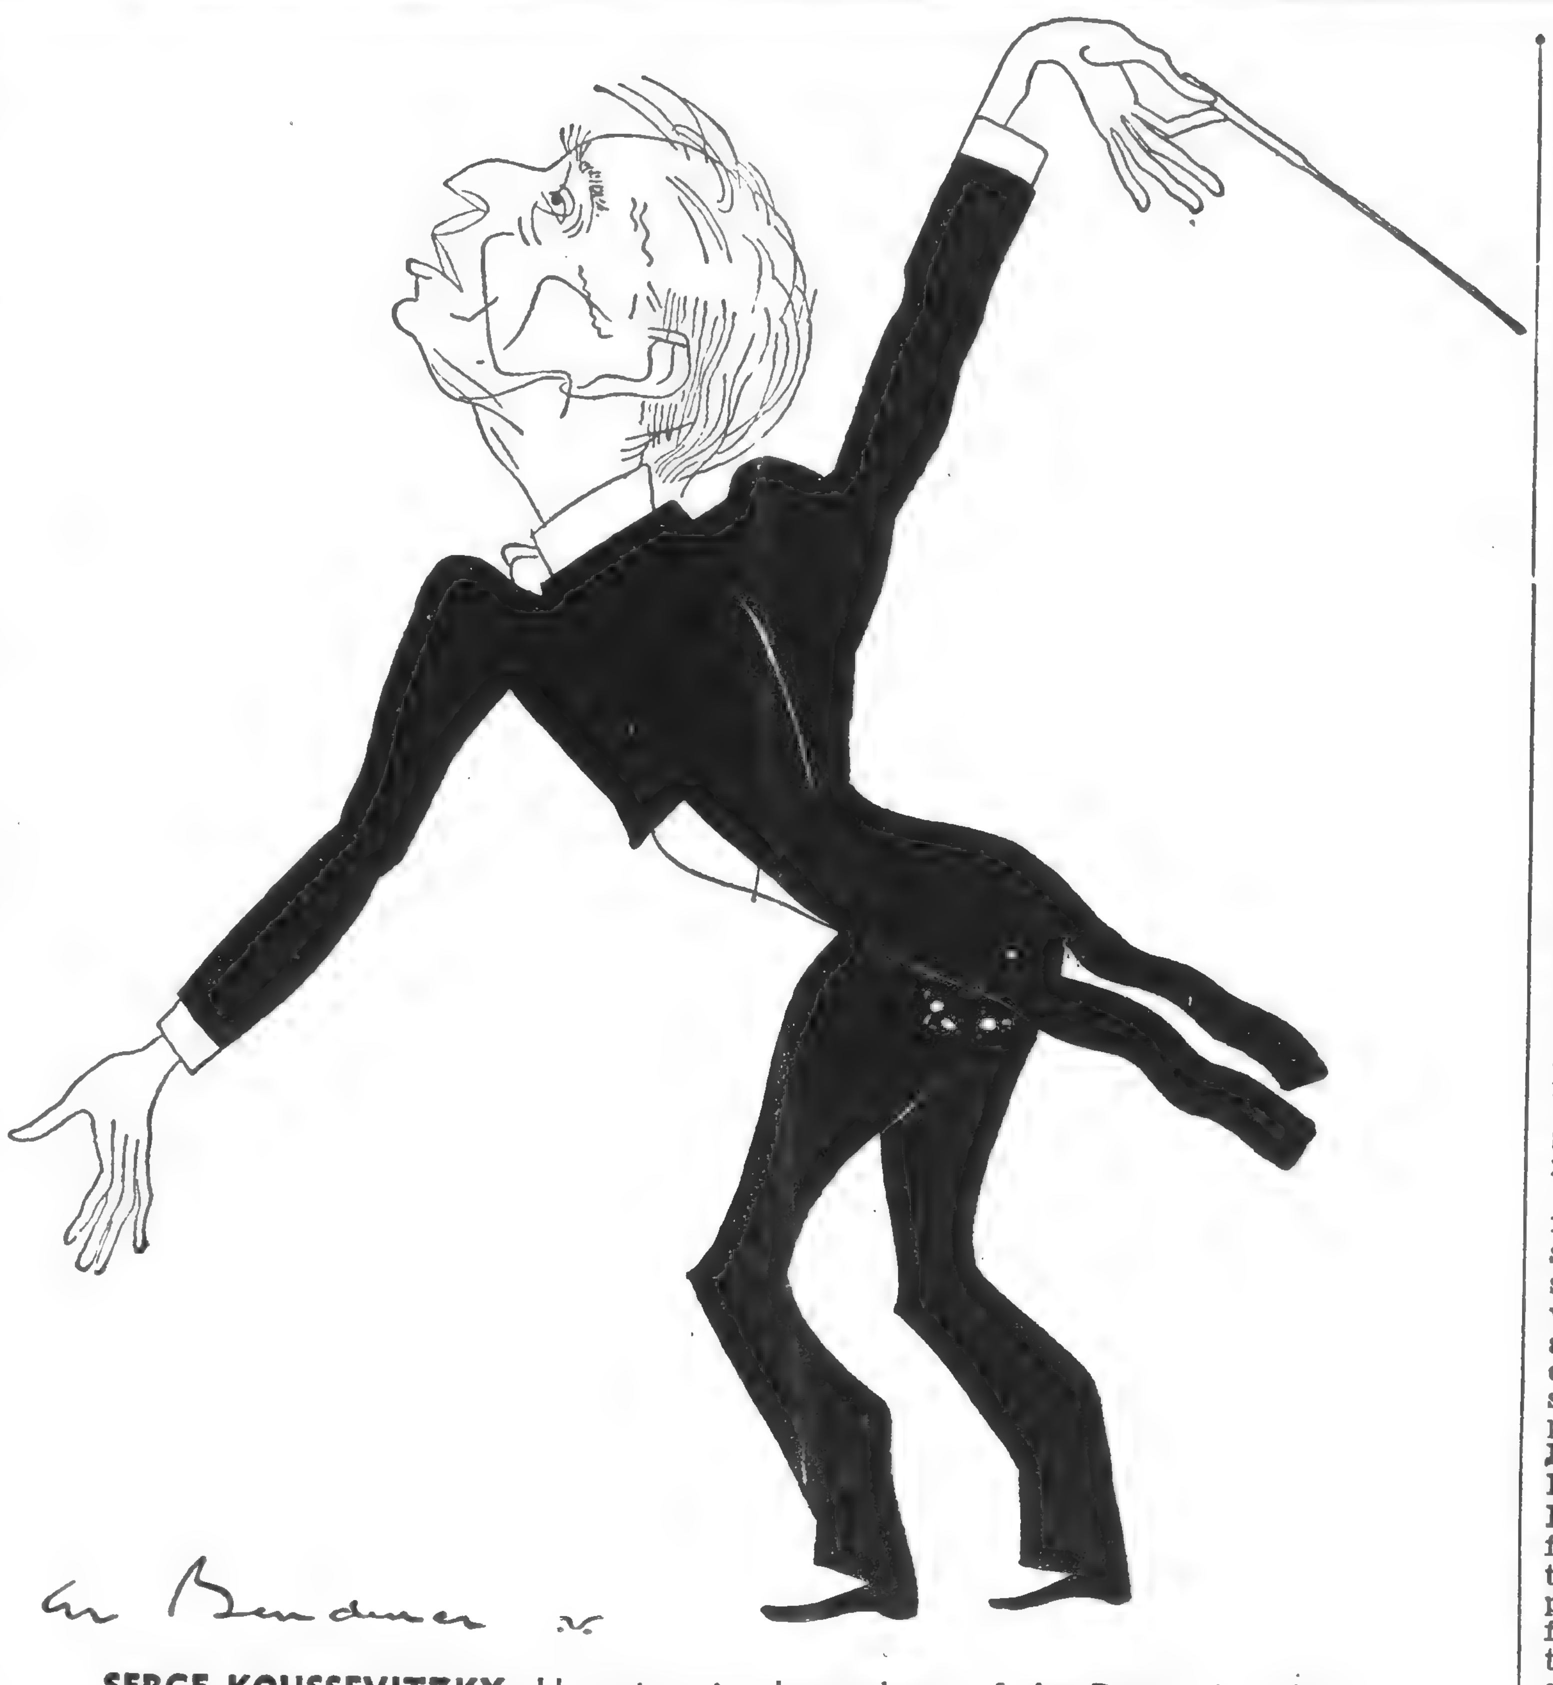
Eventually it was Monteux who brought German music back; but it occurred to no one to cease the importation of musicians. Though Boston was fanatically proud of its orchestra, the directors of the institution treated its members as they treated their factory hands and ruthlessly exploited their economic dependence.

♫

THE story of Koussevitzky's Boston career coincides, in point of time, with the eventual Americanization of the orchestra he had been imported to lead. It is not to be assumed, however, that the great Russian believed in the change. In fact he resisted it.

Long after the importation of labor under contract was made illegal he and the trustees of the Boston Symphony continued to practice it.

Koussevitzky proved a harsh and exacting task master, who rehearsed endlessly and showed no consideration for the unhappy economic situation of his players, who, being nonunion according to Boston tradition, could get no other employment.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY: He caters to descendants of the Boston Tea Party.

Endless rehearsal eventually realized Koussevitzky's acoustic ideals. The lovely crystalline tone, the luminous proportions that create a glowing tonal perspective, the tireless repetitions that wrought infinitely varied definition of musical beauty, gradually won the respect of the men who learned to help a conductor struggling against the barriers of two alien tongues—Russian and French. So players and conductor came to understand one another. Mutual respect created mutual pride.

♫

IT WAS economic pressure that stopped the importation of players, however. Though the multitude, from the first, provided sold out houses at home and on tour, the revenues deriving from broadcasting were needed to reduce a growing deficit. Broadcasting is closed to non-union groups. So Koussevitzky and the trustees capitulated. The men got union contracts which make citizenship an obligation. The conductor got one, too. So he is now legally an American.

While he confirmed the artistic discipline of the Boston Symphony, Koussevitzky was himself not, at first, a man of sound orchestral discipline such as his predecessors, Gereke, Nikisch and Muck had been.

He began his musical career as a double bass player in the orchestra of the Bol'shoi theater in Moscow. Seemingly this worm's-eye view of the orchestral acoustic did not acquaint him with the rudiments of the conductor's technique. Toscanini and Kindler, from their less humble places at the cello desks, learned more. Koussevitzky did not want to be a symphonic bassist. He wanted to be a virtuoso on his instrument, a soloist, and this he became—the greatest perhaps in the history of the art; certainly the most renowned.

♫

AS SUCH he acquired social position in Moscow and contracted a marriage with the daughter of the fabulously wealthy tea merchant, Konstantine Ushkov. With millions at his command he blossomed out as a conductor. He was self-taught. While a pianist played the scores Koussevitzky practiced the conductor's pantomime before mirrors.

He so perfected this important factor of his art that players insist his gestures for any given work never change. They are his own. Players sometimes have difficulty in understanding them. But from the first the public has found them persuasive, nor have his harshest critics—there have been some even in Boston—suggested that these gestures lack musical significance.

Koussevitzky used his wealth for patriotic as well as personal advantage. In the long series of symphonic concerts which he conducted in Russia, and throughout Europe, he specialized in modern music, Russian and French. He set up a publishing firm to make new Russian masterpieces available. He continued that practice in Boston, at first to the dissatisfaction of a public steeped in the German classics. He even played the Americans, thus forcing his competitors to do the same. The names of native composers appear 118 times in Koussevitzky's Boston and Tanglewood programs. This may be a record. And he founded a great school for conductors, symphonists, and composers at Tanglewood, the most renowned of its kind in the world.

It would be interesting were Koussevitzky to confirm his Americanism by playing works by some of the 118 American composers in his repertoire in this city where they surely are as appropriate as at home. To date he has never played a native work in the seat of American government.

Next Sunday: Eugene Ormandy

MUSIC ON THE RADIO

nyo

By B. H. HAGGIN

Sept 28 '47

TOSCANINI ended his special summer broadcast with the N. B. C. Symphony last Sunday by conducting a performance of the Symphony No. 5½ of Don Gillis, who is the producer of the N. B. C. Symphony broadcasts. The work is subtitled "Symphony for Fun," and might also be subtitled "Symphony in a Dither." It is a more robust, rowdy and hectic version of the Morton Gould type of product; and the excessive cleverness is therefore more acceptable and diverting. But the cleverness is, nevertheless, excessive.

The performance of Beethoven's First Symphony and Smetana's "Die Moldau" were familiar matters which gave evidence of continuing powers and promise of great experiences in the months ahead. But their sound as they came out of the radio struck me this time with its unresonant dryness.

A reader who, after the second Tanglewood broadcast, wrote to A. B. C. about the distortion of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony on this occasion and similar distortion by A. B. C.'s broadcasts of the Boston Symphony at other times and places, received in reply the explanation that in those instances "there have been unavoidable circumstances which have occurred while the program was being broadcast—so unavoidable that they could not be corrected on the spur of the moment"—and, apparently, could not be prevented from turning up regularly each week.

This reply would seem to be ammunition for the reader who thought it was my duty to demand of A. B. C. why the volume compressor necessary for line transmission had been used at a level which produced the distortion, and why it had not been properly adjusted for subsequent broadcasts when the distortion had resulted the first time. This reader disagreed with my contention that it was for the public to demand those answers of A. B. C.: it was I, he insisted, who must write to the broadcasting companies—as some one they would have to answer. But if I wrote to A. B. C. about the distortion of the Tanglewood broadcasts I would get back the same nonsense about unavoidable circumstances. The only way I can have any effect is to speak out publicly in this column, and thus crystallize the attitudes and opinions of other people and get them to write to the broadcasting companies. True, they will get only effusive nonsense in reply; but if a large enough number write and keep writing they will, I think have an effect. And as for the Tanglewood broadcasts in particular, it might be a good idea to let Koussevitzky know what is did to his performances.

As it happens I did, last yea a result of what I wrot about the defects of the casts of the Frick Collection certs, have some correspo with the directors of WNY the museum, both of wh sured me of their determin take steps to change the phone-placement that w sponsible for the defec then did nothing. If listeners wrote to them something would be done,

And there is another t the public to write to about. After a couple of it has given up its Friday series of long programs works of one composer against that) and is u time to rebroadcast a seri British Broadcasting tion's programs of great I suggest that music-lov WNYC to rebroadcast som B. B. C.'s wonderful musi grams of its Third Prog example, Beecham's perf of the two parts of "Trojans."

BURBANK, CALIF.
REVIEW

SEP 27 1947

The Boston Symphony Orchestra reports an attendance of more than 800,000 at the concerts of its 66th season ,recently completed at the Tanglewood Festival in Massachusetts.

Claiming a record attendance for a symphony orchestra season, the society gave the following figures: 109 winter concerts, 300,000; six youth concerts, 12,000; 58 Pops concerts, 135,000; 21 Esplanade concerts, 250,000; 14 Berkshire Festival concerts, 105,000.

Dr. Serge Koousseviteky, musical director of the orchestra, will open the 67th season at Symphony Hall in Boston on Oct. 10. The number of concerts will be the same as last season. In addition to the Boston concerts ,the usual regular series will be given in New York, Brooklyn, Providence and Cambridge.

Concerts also will be given in New Haven, Hartford and New London, Conn.; Northampton, Mass.; New Brunswick, N. J.; Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati; Bloomington and South Bend, Ind.; Ann Arbor and Detroit, Michigan; Chicago and Rochester.

COLUMBUS, GA.
ENQUIRER

SEP 28 1947

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR EXPLAINS SCORE—Serge Koussevitzky, noted conducter of the Boston Symphony Orch[illegible] score to a young student in an off moment at the Berkshire Festival Concerts at Tanglewood, Mass. The concerts are broadcast over radio station WDAK via the ABC network.

[15]

ELMIRA, N. Y.
TELEGRAM
SEP 28 1947

World of Music

Mendelssohn Anniversary Events Slated

United Press

New York—The New Friends of Music has announced an alluring program for its 12th season of 16 chamber music concerts, to open at Town Hall in New York on Nov. 2.

The concerts will be devoted to the works of Beethoven, Bach, Mendelssohn and Paul Hindemith. To honor the memory of Mendelssohn, the 100th anniversary of whose death falls on Nov. 4, the first program lists one of his great chamber works, the Octet for Strings. The same concert also will include Hindemith's Sonata for Viola d'Amore and Piano, with the composer playing the viola part.

Participating artists in the 1947-48 series will include the Budapest, Gordon, Griller, Guilet and Paganini Quartets; the Albeneri and Busch-Serkin Trios; the Collegiate Chorale directed by Robert Shaw; also Adolf Busch, Hermann Busch, Harry Davis, Joanna and Nikolai Graudan, Paul Hindemith, M. Horszowski, Lotte Lehmann, Ray Lev, K. U. Schnabel, Joseph Schuster, Rudolf Serkin, Joseph Szigeti and Jennie Tourel.

The cornerstone of the series of concerts is the chamber works of Beethoven. All of his string quartets will be performed, as well as most of his piano trios, violin and 'cello sonatas. One concert will be devoted to the lieder of Beethoven and Mendelssohn, sung by Miss Lehmann. The first performance anywhere of the new version of Hindemith's song cycle "Das Marienleben" will be given on Nov. 30 with Miss Tourel. The Collegiate Chorale will present several Bach motets, a Bach cantata, and a Beethoven mass in addition to two groups of Hindemith songs.

The ~~Boston~~ Symphony Orchestra reports an attendance of more than 800,000 at the concerts of its 66th season, recently completed at the Tanglewood Festival in Massachusetts.

Claiming a record attendance for a symphony orchestra season, the society gave the following figures: 109 winter concerts, 300,000; six youth concerts, 12,000; 58 Pops concerts, 135,000; 21 Esplanade concerts, 250,000; 14 Berkshire Festival concerts, 105,000.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, musical director of the orchestra, will open the 67th season at Symphony Hall in Boston on Oct. 10. The number of concerts will be the same as last season. In addition to the Boston concerts, the usual regular series will be given in New York, Brooklyn, Providence and Cambridge.

Concerts also will be given in New Haven, Hartford and New London, Conn.; Northampton, Mass.; New Brunswick, N. J.; Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati; Bloomington and South Bend, Ind.; Ann Arbor and Detroit, Michigan; Chicago and Rochester.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE
SEP 30 1947

Phonograph Rivals "Live" Orchestra At Tanglewood Musical Symposium

LENOX, Mass., Sept. 30—Pitting a phonograph against a full symphony orchestra and inviting an audience to tell when the orchestra leaves off playing and the phonograph picks up is quite an acoustical stunt.

It was tried out successfully by Dr. Serge ~~Koussevitzky~~ and the Boston Symphony orchestra during this summer's Berkshire Music festival at the Tanglewood estate outside Lenox.

The demonstration was held in the big music shed, seating 6,000. Another 1,000 listened on the lawn outside. The occasion was the public introduction of The Berkshire, a new instrument developed by RCA Victor and named in honor of the Tanglewood festival.

Combination Instrument

This combination radio, television and phonograph set is aimed at making available in the home a wider range of tonal reproduction, bringing out qualities hitherto lost.

The orchestra in the course of a long program, played the Beethoven "Egmont" Overture. Midway in the performance, the "live" musicians ceased playing and the phonograph took over. The change, under the ideal acoustical conditions of the music shed, was almost imperceptible

Of course, the instrument used as a de luxe model which will retail at $4,000 is over-elaborate for apartment dwellers or small home owners. The price range of the "custom built" line is from $1,800 to $4,000.

The phonograph demonstration was part of a day-long program called "Music for All" which traced the development of deproduction by phonograph, radio and television over the last 30 years.

Recordings by the Boston Symphony since that organization first began making records for Victor in 1917 were played on machines of the period, giving a graphic picture of how the tonal range has been more fully captured over the decades.

During the course of events, movies were made of the audience, to be incorporated in a forthcoming film by MGM, dramatizing the history and growth of the festival, along the lines of the recent production which glorified Carnegie Hall.

It was announced that the first 200 sets of the new Berkshire instrument line will be sold on a subscription basis, the proceeds to benefit the Berkshire Music Center scholarship fund. A silver plaque, with the customer's name and Dr. Koussevitzky's signature, will be placed in each set.

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

THE last of the books on my desk for review is Kolodin's new edition of his "Guide to Recorded Music" (Doubleday, $3.50), which I would feel no need of concerning myself with (any more than with the later editions of Hall's "Record Book") if even one of the reviews of the first edition that I saw in 1941 had put on record an adequate description of what I read in the book.

Kolodin's revisions include elimination of inconsequential errors of the kind that are unavoidable in such a compilation (one of the readers whom he thanks for pointing them out might tell him that the Bach Toccata in D recorded by Pessl is the same work as the Toccata and Fugue in D recorded by Landowska). But also eliminated is an erroneous statement of a different and not inconsequential kind. Concerning the Beecham recording of Mozart's Symphony K. 201 Kolodin wrote in 1941: "It has been my reaction, after hearing Beecham's more recent performances of this work, that the interpretation he recorded was a transitional one, tending toward the conception he holds today." I knew of no Beecham performances of K. 201 in this country after the recording; an accidental meeting with Beecham enabled me to ascertain that there had been none; and other inquiries established the fact that neither Beecham nor Columbia had received from England a sample pressing of a new recording that Kolodin might have heard. The statement appeared, then, to be an example of the interesting points a writer can make about imagined material.

Another example was the statement that followed it, in 1941, about Koussevitzky's recording of K. 201—that "Koussevitzky has incorporated many of the virtuous elements of [Beecham's] conception into his performance." This also is not in the new edition; but still present is the similar statement that Beecham's more recent recorded performance of Mozart's K. 338 "is the authentic conception of the work, not, as Koussevitzky's seems to me, a duplicate ~~of the previous~~ Beecham recording." It makes interesting reading; but as I observed once, try to imagine Koussevitzky listening to another conductor's performance, if at all, with any thought other than to show how he did it; better still, try listening to the Koussevitzky and the old Beecham recorded performances of K. 338. Listen merely to the two statements of the opening phrase of the Andante movement—to the sharply clipped staccatos of Koussevitzky, then to the same notes held longer and released without sharp clipping by Beecham (and note that I am talking about such objectively verifiable physical facts, not about subjective evaluations of these facts): they constitute one of the many dissimilarities in the actual styles of the two performances that represent the differences in the two conductors and their feeling about the music—Koussevitzky's style brisk, chirpy; Beecham's slower-moving, spaciously elaborating. And it is such dissimilarities that you will hear, not the similarities of a copy and its original.

Now my reason for discussing these details is that they are especially clear-cut and striking examples of Kolodin's method throughout the book. And I should add that the method is a normal one of Kolodin's writing: his program-notes for the works performed by the New Friends of Music, for example, have been a profusion of points about them which I have had to conclude were mostly churned up in his own mind, since I couldn't discover the things they referred to in the works.

That sort of thing doesn't make for reliable guidance; and Kolodin is an astonishingly unreliable guide even in the simple matter of whether the recorded sound of a performance is natural and agreeable or unpleasantly false or distorted. A reader who in 1941 acquired the Stokowski performance of Stravinsky's "Firebird" that Kolodin described as "carefully defined" by the Columbia recording, or the Stokowski performance of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony that Kolodin described as "splendidly reproduced" by Columbia, would have found himself with two of the horrors of orchestral recording that Columbia perpetrated in those years; and on the other hand if fear of the "weaknesses" Kolodin found in the recording kept this reader from acquiring the Budapest Quartet performance of Mozart's K.499, it would have deprived him of a beautiful H.M.V. recording of the performance. True, Kolodin had been using an Astatic pickup and 12-inch speaker which cut down the range of the reproduction and in this way reduced the defects of the recordings; but his book was going to be read by some people with wide-range reproducing equipment. And now he has a wide-range Brush pickup (but the same limited 12-inch speaker); but it doesn't seem to have made him any more reliable a guide. A reader will discover the realities of "Columbia's skillful reproduction of chamber music" only after he has acquired the defective recordings of the Budapest Quartet that Kolodin praises; that is how he will find out also about the noisy confusion caused by excessive hall-reverberation in the recent Victor recordings of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloë," and Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite," about which Kolodin's enthusiasm is unqualified; and the learning process won't stop there.

[16]

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
OCT 1 1947

American Music

What's the matter with American music? Why don't our big symphony orchestras play more of it? Isn't it any good? Aren't our composers any good? Don't American people like American music?

Yes, it's good. Yes, our composers are good. And the American people do like it and would like it even better if they could get tuned to it. But that's quite a story. Here are some figures from the National Music Council's annual survey of the music played by our 25 leading symphony orchestras last season: Altogether they played 1968 compositions, just 152 of which were the works of American-born composers. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has a reputation for trying new pieces, stands 21st among the 25 in the percentage list of American-born composers' works which it played last season.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 1

American Music

What's the matter with American music? Why don't our big symphony orchestras play more of it? Isn't it any good? Aren't our composers any good? Don't American people like American music?

Yes, it's good. Yes, our composers are good. And the American people do like it and would like it even better if they could get tuned to it. But that's quite a story. Here are some figures from the National Music Council's annual survey of the music played by our 25 leading symphony orchestras last season: Altogether they played 1968 compositions, just 152 of which were the works of American-born composers. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has a reputation for trying new pieces, stands 21st among the 25 in the percentage list of American-born composers' works which it played last season.

The American batting average on the Boston list is 3.7. It is little better—4.3—in Cincinnati, another noted music center. In Chicago it was 4.4 and on up the list by way of Philadelphia, where it was 6.7 to Columbus and Indianapolis, where it was 16.7 and 17.3, respectively.

The story is about the same with singers, instrumentalists and phonograph records. Why? Because big music is big business, and the people who run it want to make it pay, so they give the public what they think the public wants (something foreign presumably). And the public just sit there and take it. A lot of them are so soothed by it that they go to sleep. Seldom do they get mad and stomp out.

And that may be sound commercially but it is bad culturally—for us Americans, that is. We have melodies, harmonies, rhythms, memories, a vitality and an individuality distinctly our own. We ought to hear all this in our music. Which may sound pretty long-haired, though these things are as real as hot potatoes, and we'll never come into our own musically until they become real to all of us.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
3 1947

Boston to Hear 78-Minute Symphon

Boston, Oct. 3.—(UP)—A marathon symphony which includes 10 movements and runs for an hour and 16 minutes will be introduced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today.

The symphony was brought back by Koussevitzky from his European honeymoon, and the 73-year-old conductor made immediate plans to revamp the orchestra for its presentation.

"It is a new symphony by a Frenchman," Koussevitzky said. "I think he is the man of the day among composers—Olivier Messiaen."

Koussevitzky said the music called for an "enormous" orchestra and that he would have to increase his percussion section from four to 12 men. In addition he will have to add an electrical instrument called a theremin.

"Usually," he said, "four rehearsals are enough for a new work, but I think at least 12 will be needed for this. For the good of the players and the audience, I think it will be essential to have an intermission after the first five movements."

OCTOBER 2,

SYMPHONY HEAD BACK FROM TRIP

Dr. Koussevitzky and Bride Return From Europe

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Accompanied by his bride and former secretary, whom he married on the eve of their sailing in mid-August, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned yesterday from his first European trip in several years. The Koussevitzkys landed in New York yesterday—they sailed both ways on the Queen Elizabeth—and came immediately to Boston and their Brookline home, in which they had not been since their marriage.

TELLS OF PRICES

Dr. Koussevitzky and his wife spent their time in London, Paris, Aix-les-Bains and Montreux, in Switzerland. "Switzerland," said Koussevitzky, "is Paradise." He hastened to explain that conditions in France are not as black as they are painted. "If you have the money," he said, "you can buy anything you want, whether to eat or to wear; but you have to pay for it." And then he quoted some of these prices, including the $40 dinner for two—without champagne. His smart-looking overcoat was English, and purchased on the ship. Marriage appears to agree with him. His eyes sparkled; his talk was animated. And the new Mme. Koussevitzky was blooming.

At Providence the Boston music critics joined the conductor in his drawing room on the train. During the greater part of the journey to Boston he discussed his plans for the coming season at Symphony Hall, with especial emphasis on the new works, of which, if all goes well, there will be a considerable number.

Describes Plans

His principal novelty, not yet completed, will be a formidable Symphony by Olivier Messaien, whom he regards as the most promising talent in Europe. The new work runs in 10 movements, with an intermission in the middle, lasts an hour and eight minutes and calls for an enormous orchestra with 12 percussion players.

Other and less pretentious new works will be a piano concerto by Howard Hanson, a 'cello concerto by Khatchaturian, works for soprano and orchestra by Nabokov and Barber, a symphony for chorus and orchestra by Benjamin Britten, the third Symphony of Walter Piston and, if it is ready in time, the Sixth of Prokofieff. The Brazilian guest-conductor, Eleazer Carvalho, will introduce a new piece by his countryman, Villa-lobos, whom Dr. Koussevitzky will represent by a new work for soprano and 'cellos. Leonard Bernstein stands ready to give us yet another novelty, the Fourth Symphony of David Diamond.

This also looks like a symphony season with emphasis on the vocal side. Besides the new works mentioned above there will be revivals of Stravinsky's opera-oratorio, "Oedipus Rex"; Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," Debussy's "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian" and Lizt's "13th Psalm." Three pairs of concerts will fall to Charles Muench of Paris, favorably received here last year, and of his plans there is no word as yet.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
3 1947

Koussevitzky Will Present French 'Marathon Symphony'

BOSTON, Oct. 3—(UP) A marathon symphony which includes 10 movements and runs for an hour and 18 minutes will be introduced by the Boston Symphony orchestra this year, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today.

The symphony was brought back by Koussevitzky from his European honeymoon and the 73-year-old conductor made immediate plans to revamp the orchestra for its presentation.

"It is a new symphony by a Frenchman," Koussevitzky said, "I think he is the man of the day among composers—Olivier Messiaen."

NEWBURGH, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 3 1947

The Boston Symphony Orchestra reports an attendance of more than 800,000 at the concerts of its 66th season, recently completed at the Tanglewood Festival in Massachusetts.

Claiming a record attendance for a symphony orchestra season, the society gave the following figures: 109 winter concerts, 300,000; six youth concerts, 12,000; 58 Pops concerts, 135,000; 21 Esplanade concerts, 250,000; 14 Berkshire Festival concerts, 105,000.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, musical director of the orchestra, will open the 67th season at Symphony Hall in Boston on Oct. 10. The number of concerts will be the same as last season. In addition to the Boston concerts, the usual regular series will be given in New York, Brooklyn, Providence and Cambridge.

Concerts also will be given in New Haven, Hartford and New London, Conn.; Northampton, Mass.; New Brunswick, N. J.; Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati; Bloominton and South Bend, Ind.; Ann Arbor and Detroit, Michigan; Chicago and Rochester.

Music to be "seen" on the screen as well as heard is being developed by United Artists. Called musicolor shorts, the ten-minute subjects are recorded by Werner Janssen, conductor of the Janssen Symphony Orchestra of Los Angeles.

They are shot in color, with backgrounds from nature to illustrate the moods of the music. The latest release is Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave," to have its first showing in Portland, Ore., in November. The background was photographed at Sea Lion Cave on the Oregon coast.

Six unknown young Negro musical artists will have a chance to make their debuts at Town Hall in New York this season as the result of auditions held by the National Negro Congress.

The winners were selected from 150 contestants who were given auditions. They are Allen Brown, pianist, New York; Oland Gaston, pianist, Chicago; Theodore Hines, bass - baritone, Rye, N. Y.; Lawrence Mellon, pianist, New York; [illegible] Parker, contralto, Philadelphia, and Ruth [illegible], mezzo soprano, New York. They will be heard in pairs at Town Hall, one singer and one instrumentalist to a concert.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 4 1947

New Music To Be Heard

Koussevitzky to Offer Scores He Brought From Europe

Serge Koussevitzky, who returned from Europe last Wednesday, brought with him several new scores which he will introduce during the coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston's Symphony Hall. Among these are a symphony by the French composer, Olivier Messaien, in ten movements, which takes more than an hour to perform, and the Fourth Symphony by the Italian composer, G. Francesco Malipiero. Both symphonies will have their first public performances during the Boston season. A new cello concerto by the Soviet-Armenian composer, Aram Khatchaturian, will also be heard for the first time in this country.

New American works to be presented by the Boston Symphony under Dr. Koussevitzky include Walter Piston's Third Symphony, Henry Cowell's Second Symphony, a piano concerto by Howard Hanson and a work by Samuel Barber for soprano and orchestra. Leonard Bernstein will introduce David Diamond's Fourth Symphony. Other guest conductors during the Boston season, which opens next Friday afternoon, will

---

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
OCT 3 1947

Boston Orchestra To Play New Work

Koussevitzky Says New Symphony Runs One Hour, 18 Minutes

BOSTON (UP)—A marathon symphony which includes 10 movements and runs for an hour and 18 minutes will be introduced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today.

The symphony was brought back by Koussevitzky from his European honeymoon and the 73-year-old conductor made immediate plans to revamp the orchestra for its presentation.

"It is a new symphony by a Frenchman," Koussevitzky said. "I think he is the man of the day among composers — Olivier Messiaen."

Koussevitzky said the music called for an "enormous" orchestra and that he would have to increase his percussion section from four to 12 men. In addition, he will have to add an electrical instrument called a theremin.

"Usually," he said, "four rehearsals are enough for a new work, but I think at least 12 will be needed for this. For the good of the players and the audience, I think it will be essential to have an intermission after the first five movements."

Koussevitzky has not heard the symphony, but said he had "read and re-read this complex manuscript until I can hear it plainly in my mental ear.

"It is very, very beautiful."

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
HERALD
OCT 5 1947

DE PASQUALE NEW BOSTON VIOLIST

When the Boston Symphony orchestra returns to the airwaves over ABC Tuesday, Oct. 14, the ensemble will have a new solo violist, Joseph de Pasquale.

The new first-desk occupant has been heard on several ABC broadcasts and last summer participated in the Berkshire music festival under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, who personally selected him for his new assignment.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
OCT 5 1947

New Musical Scores Added By Orchestra

Returing from Europe last Wednesday on the Queen Elizabeth, Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought with him new scores of significance which will figure in the 67th season of the orchestra, opening Oct. 10 in Boston.

The conductor announced his intention of introducing a number of works by our native composers. Dr. Koussevitzky considers the composer of the future in Europe a Frenchman, Olivier Messiaen. He interviewed Messiaen in Paris and examined a symphony for a huge orchestra, which he will give its first performance.

The symphony is in 10 movements and more than an hour in length. Another first performance will be the "4th Symphony" by the Italian composer Malipiero. A new concerto for cello and orchestra by Khatchatourian will have its first American hearing, and Honegger, now in this country, will be represented by his string Symphony and his liturgic symphony.

A—31

Two Whopping New Symphonies Are on Koussevitzky's Schedule

By CYRUS DURGIN

T[illegible] new symphonies, by a [illegible] and a Britisher, [illegible] on Serge Koussevitzky [illegible] the new season [illegible] Symphony Orchestra. One, [illegible] Messaien, will require [illegible] tremendous orchestra [illegible] the other, by Benjamin B[illegible] the most original symphony ever composed."

The Boston conductor, on his way back from a trip to England, France and Switzerland with his new bride and former secretary, Olga Naumoff Koussevitzky, did not hesitate to [illegible] on the superlatives. He settled [illegible] in his compartment seat aboard the Yankee Clipper, between Providence and Boston, and told me.

"[illegible] work is in 10 movements [illegible] take an hour [illegible] 18 [illegible] play. You can make an [illegible] after the fifth movement. I shall have to have at least 12 rehearsals for it, because this symphony is the most difficult music I have ever seen for orchestra. Yet it is of the greatest beauty imaginable. Messaien's harmonic ideas are new and fresh, and even his notation is different.

"He calls for that electrical instrument, the theremin, and 12 percussion players. You know, all sorts of drums, bells, in fact, every sort of percussion.

Britten's Choral Symphony

"Benjamin Britten's symphony is so remarkable because it is for chorus and orchestra, and the chorus is treated just like an instrument. It is very logically worked out. For example, the first theme is for orchestra, the second for chorus. Later on, every time the second theme is brought in you hear it always from the chorus.

"No, there are no words at all. The chorus just produces musical sounds. The adagio is almost all for chorus, with a little orchestral accompaniment."

Whether Boston will actually hear these works depends upon their composers finishing them in time. The Britten work was promised for Tanglewood last Summer, but the English composer just didn't get it done. As for Messaien's work, the composition is finished, but the instrumentation is incomplete.

Other composers have promised Mr. Koussevitzky music for the season which begins next Friday and Saturday. Florent Schmitt has promised a piece, and so has Arnold Schoenberg.

Definitely Set

Definitely set, however, are the first performances of the Second Symphony by Henry Cowell, and the Fourth Symphony by Malipiero, the latter—like the Messaien work—commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. From Aram Khatchatourian there will be a new cello concerto with Edmund Kurtz as soloist. The work has "deep Oriental feeling."

The Symphony by Walter Piston of Harvard, intended for last season but not completed in time, is now ready and will be heard. The Brazilian Villa-Lobos will supply something that seems unusual, music for soprano voice and seven cellists. There will be two other pieces involving soprano solo, one by Samuel Barber (exact nature unspecified) and a setting by Nicholas Nabokoff of a text by Pushkin. Howard Hanson has written a Piano Concerto.

There will be numerous pieces already performed here which will be done again: Copland's "Appalachian" Suite; Prokofieff's Second and Fifth Symphonies (Mr. Koussevitzky is awaiting his new Sixth Symphony, too, but Prokofieff is not well and cannot work many hours a day); Roussel's Fourth Symphony and "Le Festin de l'Araignee"; Honegger's Symphony for Strings and perhaps his "Liturgical" Symphony; William Schuman's Third Symphony.

Mendelssohn Centenary

Mr. Koussevitzky will observe the 100th anniversary of the death of Mendelssohn, which occurred Nov. 4, 1847, with a program devoted to that now underrated composer. It will include one of the piano concertos and the "Reformation" Symphony.

There will be more Debussy this season, including "Rondes de Printemps", "Gigues" and, with the Cecilia Society, "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastien." Stravinsky's Oedipus Rex" and Beethoven's Missa Solemnis will be done with the participation of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. If he can find the singers, Mr. Koussevitzky would like to do excerpts from the opera "Pique Dame" by Tchaikovsky.

The conductor has exacted from each guest conductor a promise to do a new work. Leonard Bernstein will proffer David Diamond's Fourth Symphony, and Eleazar de Carvalho will present something by Villa-Lobos.

"Bernstein and Carvalho, they will be the best conductors in five years," pronounced Mr. Koussevitzky.

Mr. Carvalho also will do the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz. That French master will further be represented, in performances by Koussevitzky, by the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony, and, to show the public the prowess of the Boston Symphony's new first viola, Joseph de Pasquale, the "Harold in Italy" Symphony.

Liszt will be revived also, to the extent of the Psalm No. 13 and the "Faust" Symphony.

WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS-REGISTER
OCT 5 1947

he Metropolitan Opera has announced the engagement of Richard Rychtarik as technical director for the coming season. An announceemnt by Edward Johnson, general manager, said the director's duties will be to co-ordinate all departments concerned with stage production, scenery, costumes, wigs, lighting, carpentry, properties, etc. Rychtarik, the announcement noted, has spent the major part of his 50 years backstage in the opera houses and theatres of the world. In this country, he has supervised productions in New York, Chicago, Cleveland, St. Louis and at the Berkshire Festival.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 7 - 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY GIVES LIST

Conductor Plans Messiaen Work as Premiere During Season

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced that he will give a new symphony by Olivier Messiaen its première performance. Just returned from Europe, Dr. Koussevitzky considers the French composer the future hope of European music.

Besides Messiaen's ten-movement work, the Boston Symphony will introduce the Fourth symphony by Malipiero and a new 'Cello Concerto by Khatchatourian to American audiences.

BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS
OCT 7 - 1947

Koussevitzky Plans Lengthy NewSymphony

BOSTON. (UP)—A marathon symphony which includes 10 movements and runs for an hour and 18 minutes will be introduced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky has revealed.

The symphony was brought back by Koussevitzky from his European honeymoon and the 73-year-old conductor made immediate plans to revamp the orchestra for its presentation.

"It is a new symphony by a Frenchman," Koussevitzky said. "I think he is the man of the day among composers—Olivier Messiaen."

Koussevitzky said the music called for an "enormous" orchestra and that he would have to increase his percussion section from four to 12 men. In addition, he will have to add an electrical instrument called a theremin.

"Usually," he said, "four rehearsals are enough for a new work, but I think at least 12 will be needed for this. For the good of the players and the audience, I think it will be essential to have an intermission after the first five movements."

BOSTON SUNDAY HERALD, OCTOBER 5, 1947

Koussevitzky Discloses Plans for the 67th Season

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens its 67th season this week at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Some of us local music critics journeyed down to Providence the other day and travelled back on the train bearing Serge Koussevitzky northwards to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its 67th season which starts this week. The eminent conductor, just back from Europe seemed in excellent spirits, and I have never passed a quicker trip from Providence to Boston than in listening to him expound his views and plans. At first he appeared very gloomy about the state of music in Europe today and the prospect for new and unusual works for the coming season; but if you follow this article with any care I think you will admit that the concerts will be far from stodgy.

The only composer in Europe who seemed to Mr. Koussevitzky to be producing original and outstanding work was the Frenchman, Olivier Messiaen. He has written an immense Symphony in ten movements and requiring an hour and eighteen minutes to play. The score is immensely difficult and would require at least 12 rehearsals to get it in hand. The harmonic idiom, Mr. Koussevitzky says, is fascinating once you get accustomed to it. The orchestration is also on a vast scale, requiring no less than 12 percussion players, a piano, 5 trumpets, 4 trombones, 2 tubas and, strangest of all, a theramin. If the score can be got ready, we shall probably hear it at the end of the season. Mr. Koussevitzky also met Florent Schmitt and Jacques Ibert in France, and a couple of scores are promised from these composers. But the conductor's enthusiasm on the continent was almost exclusively for Messiaen.

He also stopped in England and found that distressed country thinking musically mainly of Vaughan Williams. Not so Mr. Koussevitzky. For him Benjamin Britten is the man of the day, and the next most unusual score that he contemplates is Britten's latest. This is a Symphony for chorus and orchestra. The chorus, however, is treated instrumentally. It sings to no text and is balanced to the orchestra as another instrumental body. For example, the orchestra plays the first theme and the chorus comes in alone with the second. This extraordinary work will also be heard towards the end of the season.

Coming to American composers Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce a new Piano Concerto by Howard Hanson, "although some of you," he added with a wink, "don't seem to like his music." A new Symphony by Walter Piston will be brought forward, and William Schuman's 3rd Symphony will be repeated. Mr. Koussevitzky laid strong emphasis on the necessity of repeating arresting works which have only been done once or twice. Thus he will also repeat Copland's Appalachian Suite. For other new American scores he has in mind a couple of works for soprano and orchestra, one by Samuel Barber and the other by the resident foreigner, Nicholas Nabokov. Leonard Bernstein will conduct David Diamond's 4th Symphony.

As a matter of fact all three of our guest conductors have been asked to include a new work on each of their programs. Charles Muench will be with us for one pair in November and two in April, but it is not known what he will offer. Mr. Koussevitzky warmly praised the work of our other two guest conductors, Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. The latter will, of course, bring us one of Villa-Lobos' more than a thousand compositions; and Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce a piece for soprano and celli only.

Questioned about Prokofieff, the conductor said he was eagerly awaiting his Sixth Symphony and would meanwhile repeat the fifth, which he considers one of the greatest of modern compositions. He will also repeat Honegger's Symphony for Strings, which he did in Tanglewood last summer and which Muench conducted last winter; and we shall also hear Honegger's Symphonie Liturgique. Mr. Koussevitzky says he is going to give us quite a bit of Roussel and Debussy this season. From the former he mentioned the Fourth Symphony, the "Festin de l'arraigne" and a piece whose title escaped him but which on referring to the books I think must be the "Pour une fete de printemps." We shall get some of the less familiar works by Debussy, the Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, "Gigues" and "Rondes de printemps."

Mr. Koussevitzky waxed very enthusiastic over a new Cello Concerto by Khatchatourian, which will be given its first American performance in Boston. A new piece by Schoenberg is also promised. For further choral works we shall get Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" and Beethoven's Missa Solemnis with the Harvard-Radcliffe choruses and Liszt's 13th Psalm with the Cecilia Society. Mr. Koussevitzky would also like to do a concert version of parts of Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame," but he added ruefully that he required "a tremendous tenor with a beautiful voice"—not an easy order to fill.

Mendelssohn, who died 100 years ago this November, will be commemorated with a concert, probably the Reformation Symphony and one of the piano concertos. Of Berlioz we shall hear again, in all likelihood, "Harold in Italy," in order to show off the orchestra's new first viola player, Mr. De Pasquale. As another Liszt work the Faust Symphony will be revived.

Mr. Koussevitzky said in Providence that he had little to disclose, but the train was slowing down back of the Arena before he had finished the tale I have attempted to tell. And, as I am writing this, comes a telephone message of two other new works forgotten in the interview, namely Henry Cowell's Second Symphony and Malipiero's Fourth Symphony! A dull season? I defy anyone to fit the above listed works into the schedule and emerge with dullness. And remember that we have heard only one or two hints as to what the guest conductors may have up their sleeves.

BAYONNE, N. J.
TIMES
OCT 9 - 1947

The Lyons Den

By LEONARD LYONS

SETTLEMENT: Some months ago Sergie Koussevitzky brough suit to suppress the biography about him written by Moses Smitl Koussevitzky insisted that this unauthorized biography was a viol tion of his privacy, etc. . . . This week the case finally was close Koussevitzky paid the publishers of the book, Allen, Towne & Heat Inc., almost $5,000 for damages resulting from his suit.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
OCT 6 1947

Marathon Symphony Koussevitzky Find; To Run 78 Minutes

Boston — (UP) — A marathon symphony to include 10 movements and to run for an hour and 18 minutes will be introduced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today.

The symphony was brought back by Koussevitzky from his European honeymoon, and the 73-year-old conductor made immediate plans to revamp the orchestra for its presentation.

"It is a new symphony by a Frenchman," Koussevitzky said. "I think he is the man of the day among composers—Olivier Messiaen."

Koussevitzky said the music called for an "enormous" orchestra and that he would have to increase his percussion section from four to 12 men. In addition, he will have to add an electrical instrument called a theremin.

"Usually," he said, "four rehearsals are enough for a new work, but I think at least 12 will be needed for this. For the good of the players and the audience, I think it will be essential to have an intermission after the first five movements."

Koussevitzky has not heard the symphony, but said he had "read and re-read this complex manuscript until I can hear it plainly in my mental ear. It is very, very beautiful."

Two Whopping New Symphonies Are on Koussevitzky's Schedule

By CYRUS DURGIN

Two whopping new symphonies, by a Frenchman and a Britisher, figure importantly on Serge Koussevitzky's plans for the new season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. One, by Olivier Messaien, will require "the most tremendous orchestra" ever, while the other, by Benjamin Britten, is "the most original symphony ever composed."

The Boston conductor, on his way back from a trip to England, France and Switzerland with his new bride and former secretary, Olga Naumoff Koussevitzky, did not hesitate to bring on the superlatives. He settled back in his compartment seat aboard the Yankee Clipper, between Providence and Boston, and told more.

"Messaien's work is in 10 movements and it will take an hour and 18 minutes to play. You can make an intermission after the fifth movement. I shall have to have at least 12 rehearsals for it, because this symphony is the most difficult music I have ever seen for orchestra. Yet it is of the greatest beauty imaginable. Messaien's harmonic ideas are new and fresh, and even his notation is different.

"He calls for that electrical instrument, the theremin, and 12 percussion players. You know, all sorts of drums, bells, in fact, every sort of percussion.

Britten's Choral Symphony

"Benjamin Britten's symphony is so remarkable because it is for chorus and orchestra, and the chorus is treated just like an instrument. It is very logically worked out. For example, the first theme is for orchestra, the second for chorus. Later on, every time the second theme is brought in you hear it always from the chorus.

"No, there are no words at all. The chorus just produces musical sounds. The adagio is almost all for chorus, with a little orchestral accompaniment."

Whether Boston will actually hear these works depends upon their composers finishing them in time. The Britten work was promised for Tanglewood last Summer, but the English composer just didn't get it done. As for Messaien's work, the composition is finished, but the instrumentation is incomplete.

Other composers have promised Mr. Koussevitzky music for the season which begins next Friday and Saturday. Florent Schmitt has promised a piece, and so has Arnold Schoenberg.

Definitely Set

Definitely set, however, are the first performances of the Second Symphony by Henry Cowell, and the Fourth Symphony by Malipiero, the latter—like the Messaien work—commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation. From Aram Khatchatourian there will be a new cello concerto with Edmund Kurtz as soloist. The work has "deep Oriental feeling."

The Symphony by Walter Piston of Harvard, intended for last season but not completed in time, is now ready and will be heard. The Brazilian Villa-Lobos will supply something that seems unusual, music for soprano voice and seven cellists. There will be two other pieces involving soprano solo, one by Samuel Barber (exact nature unspecified) and a setting by Nicholas Nabokoff of a text by Pushkin. Howard Hanson has written a Piano Concerto.

There will be numerous pieces already performed here which will be done again: Copland's "Appalachian" Suite; Prokofieff's Second and Fifth Symphonies (Mr. Koussevitzky is awaiting his new Sixth Symphony, too, but Prokofieff is not well and cannot work many hours a day); Roussel's Fourth Symphony and "Le Festin de l'Araignee"; Honegger's Symphony for Strings and perhaps his "Liturgical" Symphony; William Schuman's Third Symphony.

Mendelssohn Centenary

Mr. Koussevitzky will observe the 100th anniversary of the death of Mendelssohn, which occurred Nov. 4, 1847, with a program devoted to that now underrated composer. It will include one of the piano concertos and the "Reformation" Symphony.

There will be more Debussy this season, including "Rondes de Printemps", "Gigues" and, with the Cecilia Society, "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastien." Stravinsky's Oedipus Rex" and Beethoven's Missa Solemnis will be done with the participation of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. If he can find the singers, Mr. Koussevitzky would like to do excerpts from the opera "Pique Dame" by Tchaikovsky.

The conductor has exacted from each guest conductor a promise to do a new work. Leonard Bernstein will proffer David Diamond's Fourth Symphony, and Eleazar de Carvalho will present something by Villa-Lobos.

"Bernstein and Carvalho, they will be the best conductors in five years," pronounced Mr. Koussevitzky.

Mr. Carvalho also will do the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz That French master will further be represented, in performances by Koussevitzky, by the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony, and, to show the public the prowess of the Boston Symphony's new first viola, Joseph de Pasquale, the "Harold in Italy" Symphony.

Liszt will be revived also, to the extent of the Psalm No. 13 and the "Faust" Symphony.

WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS-REGISTER

OCT 5 1947

The Metropolitan Opera has announced the engagement of Richard Rychtarik as technical director for the coming season. An announceemnt by Edward Johnson, general manager, said the director's duties will be to co-ordinate all departments concerned with stage production, scenery, costumes, wigs, lighting, carpentry, properties, etc. Rychtarik, the announcement noted, has spent the major part of his 50 years backstage in the opera houses and theatres of the world. In this country, he has supervised productions in New York, Chicago, Cleveland, St. Louis and at the Berkshire Festival.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 7 - 1947

KOUSSEVITZKY GIVES LIST

Conductor Plans Messiaen Work as Premiere During Season

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced that he will give a new symphony by Olivier Messiaen its première performance. Just returned from Europe, Dr. Koussevitzky considers the French composer the future hope of European music.

Besides Messiaen's ten-movement work, the Boston Symphony will introduce the Fourth symphony by Malipiero and a new 'Cello Concerto by Khatchatourian to American audiences.

BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS

OCT 7 - 1947

Koussevitzky Plans Lengthy NewSymphony

BOSTON. (UP)—A marathon symphony which includes 10 movements and runs for an hour and 18 minutes will be introduced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky has revealed.

The symphony was brought back by Koussevitzky from his European honeymoon and the 73-year-old conductor made immediate plans to revamp the orchestra for its presentation.

"It is a new symphony by a Frenchman," Koussevitzky said. "I think he is the man of the day among composers—Olivier Messiaen."

Koussevitzky said the music called for an "enormous" orchestra and that he would have to increase his percussion section from four to 12 men. In addition, he will have to add an electrical instrument called a theremin.

"Usually," he said, "four rehearsals are enough for a new work, but I think at least 12 will be needed for this. For the good of the players and the audience, I think it will be essential to have an intermission after the first five movements."

BOSTON SUNDAY HERALD, OCTOBER 5, 1947

Koussevitzky Discloses Plans for the 67th Season

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Some of us local music critics journeyed down to Providence the other day and travelled back on the train bearing Serge Koussevitzky northwards to the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its 67th season which starts this week. The eminent conductor, just back from Europe seemed in excellent spirits, and I have never passed a quicker trip from Providence to Boston than in listening to him expound his views and plans. At first he appeared very gloomy about the state of music in Europe today and the prospect for new and unusual works for the coming season; but if you follow this article with any care I think you will admit that the concerts will be far from stodgy.

The only composer in Europe who seemed to Mr. Koussevitzky to be producing original and outstanding work was the Frenchman, Olivier Messiaen. He has written an immense Symphony in ten movements and requiring an hour and eighteen minutes to play. The score is immensely difficult and would require at least 12 rehearsals to get it in hand. The harmonic idiom, Mr. Koussevitzky says, is fascinating once you get accustomed to it. The orchestration is also on a vast scale, requiring no less than 12 percussion players, a piano, 5 trumpets, 4 trombones, 2 tubas and, strangest of all, a theramin. If the score can be got ready, we shall probably hear it at the end of the season. Mr. Koussevitzky also met Florent Schmitt and Jacques Ibert in France, and a couple of scores are promised from these composers. But the conductor's enthusiasm on the continent was almost exclusively for Messiaen.

He also stopped in England and found that distressed country thinking musically mainly of Vaughan Williams. Not so Mr. Koussevitzky. For him Benjamin Britten is the man of the day, and the next most unusual score that he contemplates is Britten's latest. This is a Symphony for chorus and orchestra. The chorus, however, is treated instrumentally. It sings to no text and is balanced to the orchestra as another instrumental body. For example, the orchestra plays the first theme and the chorus comes in alone with the second. This extraordinary work will also be heard towards the end of the season.

Coming to American composers Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce a new Piano Concerto by Howard Hanson, "although some of you," he added with a wink, "don't seem to like his music." A new Symphony by Walter Piston will be brought forward, and William Schuman's 3rd Symphony will be repeated. Mr. Koussevitzky laid strong emphasis on the necessity of repeating arresting works which have only been done once or twice. Thus he will also repeat Copland's Appalachian Suite. For other new American scores he has in mind a couple of works for soprano and orchestra, one by Samuel Barber and the other by the resident foreigner, Nicholas Nabokov. Leonard Bernstein will conduct David Diamond's 4th Symphony.

As a matter of fact all three of our guest conductors have been asked to include a new work on each of their programs. Charles Muench will be with us for one pair in November and two in April, but it is not known what he will offer. Mr. Koussevitzky warmly praised the work of our other two guest conductors, Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. The latter will, of course, bring us one of Villa-Lobos' more than a thousand compositions; and Mr. Koussevitzky will introduce a piece for soprano and celli only.

Questioned about Prokofieff, the conductor said he was eagerly awaiting his Sixth Symphony and would meanwhile repeat the fifth, which he considers one of the greatest of modern compositions. He will also repeat Honegger's Symphony for Strings, which he did in Tanglewood last summer and which Muench conducted last winter; and we shall also hear Honegger's Symphonie Liturgique. Mr. Koussevitzky says he is going to give us quite a bit of Roussel and Debussy this season. From the former he mentioned the Fourth Symphony, the "Festin de l'arraigne" and a piece whose title escaped him but which on referring to the books I think must be the "Pour une fete de printemps." We shall get some of the less familiar works by Debussy, the Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, "Gigues" and "Rondes de printemps."

Mr. Koussevitzky waxed very enthusiastic over a new Cello Concerto by Khatchatourian, which will be given its first American performance in Boston. A new piece by Schoenberg is also promised. For further choral works we shall get Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" and Beethoven's Missa Solemnis with the Harvard-Radcliffe choruses and Liszt's 13th Psalm with the Cecilia Society. Mr. Koussevitzky would also like to do a concert version of parts of Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame," but he added ruefully that he required "a tremendous tenor with a beautiful voice"—not an easy order to fill.

Mendelssohn, who died 100 years ago this November, will be commemorated with a concert, probably the Reformation Symphony and one of the piano concertos. Of Berlioz we shall hear again, in all likelihood, "Harold in Italy," in order to show off the orchestra's new first viola player, Mr. De Pasquale. As another Liszt work the Faust Symphony will be revived.

Mr. Koussevitzky said in Providence that he had little to disclose, but the train was slowing down back of the Arena before he had finished the tale I have attempted to tell. And, as I am writing this, comes a telephone message of two other new works forgotten in the interview, namely Henry Cowell's Second Symphony and Malipiero's Fourth Symphony! A dull season? I defy anyone to fit the above listed works into the schedule and emerge with dullness. And remember that we have heard only one or two hints as to what the guest conductors may have up their sleeves.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens its 67th season this week at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

BAYONNE, N. J.
TIMES

OCT 9 - 1947

The Lyons Den

—By LEONARD LYONS—

SETTLEMENT: Some months ago Sergie Koussevitzky brough suit to suppress the biography about him written by Moses Smit Koussevitzky insisted that this unauthorized biography was a viol tion of his privacy, etc. . . . This week the case finally was close Koussevitzky paid the publishers of the book, Allen, Towne & Heat
Inc., almost $5,000 for damages resulting from his suit.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 6 1947

Marathon Symphony Koussevitzky Find; To Run 78 Minutes

Boston — (UP) — A marathon symphony to include 10 movements and to run for an hour and 18 minutes will be introduced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this year, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky said today.

The symphony was brought back by Koussevitzky from his European honeymoon, and the 73-year-old conductor made immediate plans to revamp the orchestra for its presentation.

"It is a new symphony by a Frenchman," Koussevitzky said. "I think he is the man of the day among composers—Olivier Messiaen."

Koussevitzky said the music called for an "enormous" orchestra and that he would have to increase his percussion section from four to 12 men. In addition, he will have to add an electrical instrument called a theremin.

"Usually," he said, "four rehearsals are enough for a new work, but I think at least 12 will be needed for this. For the good of the players and the audience, I think it will be essential to have an intermission after the first five movements."

Koussevitzky has not heard the symphony, but said he had "read and re-read this complex manuscript until I can hear it plainly in my mental ear. It is very, very beautiful."

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Richard Burgin conducts the second program in the "regular" series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, due to the continuing illness of Serge Koussevitzky. This program begins with a welcome revival of the Third Symphony by William Schuman, and otherwise consists of "Don Juan" by Richard Strauss; Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite, and the Fifth Symphony of Jean Sibelius.

The performances yesterday afternoon revealed the able Mr. Burgin at his best. "Don Juan," which he had conducted last Tuesday night, was far more intense and fiery, with firmer outlines. "Mother Goose" was also an improvement over Mr. Burgin's reading earlier in the week.

There was consistent and true Ravellian richness and spirit, together with a greater sense of imaginative play and narration music.

Mr. Burgin also gave the Symphony by Sibelius a salient and persuasive interpretation; not remarkably eloquent, to be sure, but correct in style and poetic to a degree. The texture of this still curious work, with its repeated figures and involuted rhythmic patterns, was very clear. Except when the weight and thickness of the orchestration, notably in the finale, so prevented, you could hear all the instruments. This Symphony is one to stand a cerain amount of interpretive rhetoric; it is more effective that way than when played completely "straight." But Mr. Burgin is not what you would call a rhetorical conductor.

The Third Symphony by William Schuman is both an important step in the creative evolution of its composer and a by no means negligible work in itself.

The scheme of the two movements, each of which divides into two parts, betrays, I think, a young man giving very serious thought to form. The Passacaglia, Fugue, Chorale and Toccata suggest intellectual preoccupation with the theoretical side of composition.

In its length and its oftentimes very thick orchestration, the Symphony probably was over-written. Schuman here does go on and on, and his counterpoint is frequently more arbitrary than expressive. Now and then he seems to be groping, not entirely free in communicating what he has to say.

Even so, this is real music, because it is solid of ideas, and it is imaginative and passionate. Here you find nothing of the dry futility of men who compose according to a system and entirely from the head.

There is no reason whatever why we should not hear this Symphony more frequently than we have in recent seasons. How else are we all to know it well? Let it be done again and again until it is truly familiar.

The program next week will be as follows: Violin Concerto, Brahms (Ginette Neveu, soloist, in her American debut); Symphony for Strings, Honegger; "Short Symphony" (No. 4), Henry Cowell (first performance).

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In the continued, though happily not serious, illness of Dr. Koussevitsky, Richard Burgin is conducting this week's "regular" Symphony Concerts, as he did that of last Tuesday evening. This second program is more agreeably varied than that of the opening pair of concerts and it contains nothing so familiar as the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, though in the case of Sibelius' Fifth, which serves as closing number, Dr. Koussevitsky has been making up for lost time.

And we have been hearing quite a lot lately of the "Don Juan" of Strauss. The program-book inadvertently informed us that Walter Bruno conducted the performances of last January. Measured by that high standard, and to continue the transposition, Burgin Richard's reading, while admirably proportioned and faithful to the spirit of the music, still lacked a little in emotional warmth. Wholly successful, however, was yesterday's performance of Ravel's "Mother Goose," which along with the youthful Strauss' impetuous tone poem, had had a working-out on Tuesday. Ravel has been called a little master, though he is not always so diminutive as in this particular work. But little or big, this Suite fully merits that overworked adjective "charming." And this is the sort of music in which the Boston Symphony is without peer.

The other composer yesterday was William Schuman, a fourth modern and an American to pit himself against the German, the Frenchman and the Finn. In point of fact, there is nothing recognizably American about his Third Symphony, which the composer dedicated to Dr. Koussevitsky and which had its previous performance here exactly six years ago yesterday. Nor is there anything particularly personal in the music. We can detect various influences, notably those of Mr. Schuman's teachers, Roy Harris, Hindemith and Stravinsky.

Moreover, in choosing such forms as the Passacaglia, Chorale, Fugue and Toccata, which respectively comprise the four divisions of the work, the New York composer is in line with the current trend to go back to the early 18th and late 17th centuries. The technical name for it is neo-Baroque. The year after its Boston premiere, the symphony won the first award of the Critics' Circle of New York. You could hardly say that the award was not deserved. The piece is sound, sober and scholastic, with a sonorous proclamation at the end that yesterday brought the inevitable applause. It is still a work calculated to compel admiration rather than to inspire affection.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Paul Hindemith, the eminent German composer who has become an American citizen, found himself in distinguished company at yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert. On this opening program of the orchestra's 67th season and his own 24th as its conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky has placed Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" between Bach's First Brandenburg Concerto and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven.

"Mathis der Maler" is in reality an opera, as yet heard on the stage only in Zurich, where it had its premiere in 1938. The three orchestral excerpts, now familiar in the concert room and one of the acknowledged masterpieces of our day, were first heard 4 years earlier. Those who have seen "Mathis" on the stage say it is undramatic, and until we are in a position to refute that judgment, we must accept it. There is plenty of drama, however, in the third of the three tone pictures inspired by Matthias Gruenewald's celebrated altar-piece at Isenheim, "The Temptation of St. Anthony." Here Hindemith, modern though he is, has written true program music, portraying the saint's fortitude and his ultimate victory over his tormenters. There is high pictorial content also in the other movements, "Angelic Concert" and "Entombment." In all there is a vitality of invention, a mastery or workmanship, a display of constructive power that place Hindemith in the royal line of German composers. Is he the last? We can only wait and see.

In certain respects yesterday's performance of this remarkable music was elouqent. Yet to one familiar with the recorded performance by the Berlin Philharmonic, with the composer conducting, Dr. Koussevitzky's version might well seem over-soft, unduly romanticized, too flexible of pace. A more rigid, more strongly rhythmed performance would better impart the archaic flavor that Hindemith undoubtedly intended besides giving the music its personal character. Hindemith is Hindemith; he is not Strauss. Tonally the performance was magnificent, and the final "Alleluia" set off a tumult of applause.

The First Brandenburg has been played at Tanglewood but never before in Symphony Hall. The reason for this neglect was made clear enough yesterday. The instrumental setup is curious: two horns, three oboes, a bassoon, a small sized violin, replaced yesterday by the ordinary fiddle, and strings. Bach's horn parts, like his trumpet parts, run high, the common practice with the valveless instruments of the time, but they are not exactly grateful to play or to hear. The three oboes make for decidedly reedy effect, and we are reminded that Bach had little feeling for color, as we now understand it. Moreover, outside the Minuet, the music itself is less appealing than that of the other five concertos of the Brandenburg series. If the Adagio is not devoid of beauty, the Allegros are on the mechanical side—the old contrapuntal mill a-grinding.

ST. CLOUD, MINN.
TIMES

OCT 10 1947

ice of Volume eads Readers

By W. G. Rogers

HE OTHER ~~SIDE~~ OF THE RE ORD, by Charles O'Conr (Knopf; $3.50).

Ormandy, who is short, used wear "elevator" shoes; Fied makes pets of tropical fish; "p tentiousness, snobbism, self-de sion, and capricious temper" ch acterized in part the late Gra Moore; "many critics are unfa some of the them are venal, a most of them incompetent."

These are some aspects of th gossipy, informative and engagin ly written report on the music bu ness, with which O'Connell h been associated over 20 years, mos ly with Victor and, until recentl Columbia Recording.

Chapters are devoted to Pon Kostelanetz, Iturbi, Ormandy, Me chior, Flagstad, Traubel, Monteau Rubinstein, Koussevitzky and others. The Philadelphia group, including Stokowski and Ormandy, and O'Connell, too, is treated handsomely, but some of these subjects, their ire aroused by the author's dogmatism, will want to break their fiddles, batons or pianos over his head.

Some concert goers will deny indignantly that Horowitz's playing is "insufferable brilliance;" some music lovers will be driven to tears by the "minority report" on Toscanini; some readers will be driver to the dictionary by rhotacism, exophthalmic and rhonchisonus; and Victor, which is a money making as well as music-making organization will not be surprised at charge that it wouldn't spend money a O'Connell wanted. But some readers, I hope, will agree that Flagstad and Furtwaengler deserved to be judged on their musical ability not to their politics.

O'Connell's preface seems t promise more than it delivers. Th author "suffered" he says, while ex posed to artistic temperments, ye there is more praise than blame at least his professional association were stimulating enough to be th stimulus for this book and mos readers will be envious. The storie are not unexpected, though many especially about the inside of th recording business, are new outsid the studios. Yet on the whole th is not the other side, but both side of the record.

---

ed, besides the part played by the outstanding Saints and Martyrs in the course of the Christian year.

Any Cleric, Sister or Layman reading this book, which is a gold mine of liturgical information, will want to refer to it many times in the course of the church year as the various cycles recur. It is without a doubt one of the finest one-volume books dealing with Catholic worship on the market today. A perusal of it will prove both fruitful and interesting; besides, it reveals several new facets of a subject that has proved rather hazy to the ordinary faithful. People in the pews will find therein many informative explanations of the symbols, customs, traditions and feasts they have been observing for years whose true meaning and purpose they have never heard of before. "With Christ Through the Year" will prove a valuable addition to the library of any Catholic home, school, Convent or rectory. It deserves a cordial reception.—

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, one of the world's greatest conductors, again will lead th Boston Symphony one of the greatest orchestras, when it starts a new radio series tonight (WJW, 11:30).

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NEWS

OCT 1 1 1947

Columbia's contribution is a repressing of the Fifth Symphony, probably the most popular of all the composer's major works. This full score reading is by the Philharmonia orchestra, under the baton of the Polish conductor, Paul Kletski, and was recorded in Europe. Unfortunately there is no comparison between this and the recently released reading of the same work by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, for RCA Victor.

A contrast between two RCA Victor piano artists is provided this week with the release of two concertos. Artur Rubenstein, who probably would be the great pianist he wants to be if he would learn to stop pounding the keys, plays Liszt's concerto No. 1 in E-flat with the Dallas symphony orchestra. This is a good test of Rubenstein's virtuosity as a musician, but one wishes for a more delicate playing of certain of the themes, particularly in the final movement. This is a fine recording job from the production standpoint, however, and is worth adding to one's library.—

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 67th season was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the following program:

Brandenburg Concerto No. 1 in F major .... Bach
Symphony, "Mathis der Maler" Hindemith
Symphony No. 5 in C minor Op. 97 Beethoven

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Yesterday's concert was certainly one of the most auspicious openings to any season that most of us can recall. Orchestra and conductor were in top, mid-season form. The program was attractive and well-balanced; and the interpretations were glowing with vitality. To take the last first, that old, familiar stand-by, Beethoven's Fifth, was played yesterday as thought it were a new composition to fire the imagination of conductor and musicians. That is to say, it was recreated with a freshness of inspiration that was astonishing when we consider that most orchestras know it backwards. It was a magnificent artistic feat.

Why Bach's First Brandenburg Concerto should have been so long neglected in favor of the other five is a mystery. It is, of course, very difficult for instrumentalists to play, especially the horns and the solo violin; but, equally, that is nothing to faze the Boston Symphony men so that the mystery remains the more impenetrable. At any rate we may all rejoice that Dr. Koussevitzky saw fit to revive it at Tanglewood and to bring it here at last. The music is of enchanting quality with one or two rather startling features, for example the suspended cadence and curious close of the adagio and the two trios with the minuet. The orchestration is remarkable and indeed the whole piece is fascinating to listen to. The performance was beautifully polished.

Between Bach and Beethoven we had a modern German, Hindemith, represented by his "Mathis der Maler" Symphony, which is by now thoroughly familiar to Boston audiences. It would be interesting sometime to hear the opera from which it stems. I can't myself envisage it from this completely symphonic work, with its stunning brazen climaxes in the finale.

The "Mathis der Maler" Symphony is still an impressive work, though it no longer presents any listening difficulties. Perhaps be- [illegible] terms with Hindemith's stylistic tricks it seems as though these were repeated with too much emphasis. The Symphony thus emerges more and more as one of fine purple passages and less as a consistently splendid work. Nevertheless these passages are ample reward for listening to the entire Symphony. Once again Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra did a glorious job of presenting the music.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct William Schuman's Symphony No. 3, Strauss' "Don Juan," Ravel's "Me mere l'oye" and Sibelius' 5th Symphony.

THEATERS AND CONCERTS

COLONIAL—"Oklahoma," musical play by Richard Rodgers and Oscar Ha stein, 2nd, presented by the Guild with Ridge Bond, Ann Crowl Dave Morris, Dorothea MacFarland a others; 2:30 and 8:30 P. M.

SHUBERT—"Sweethearts," revival of the Victor Herbert operetta, prese Paula Stone and Michael Sl Bobby Clarke, June Knight, Gateson and others; 2:30 and 8 P. M.

WILBUR—"The Druid Circle," a by John Van Druten, presente fred de Liagre, Jr., with Leo G. Ethel Griffies, Boyd Crawfo Patterson and others; 2:30 and P. M.

PLYMOUTH—"An Inspector C drama by J. B. Priestley, pr Courtney Burr and Lassor H directed by Sir Cedric Hardw Thomas Mitchell Melvill Coo Lloyd, Rene Ray and John master; 2:30 and 8:30 P. M.

SYMPHONY HALL—First concer Boston Symphony Orchestra in season, with Serge Koussevitz ducting Bach's 1st Brandenbu certo, Hindemith's "Mathis der Symphony and Beethoven's 5th phony; 8:30 P. M.

N. E. MUTUAL HALL—"Peer Ibsen's poetic drama, presented Boston Tributary Theater, dir Eliot Duvey; 8:30 P. M.

N. E. MUTUAL HALL—"Ali Ba celebrated fairy tale drama Estelle Ritchie and presented Tributary Theater's children's 2:30 P. M.

SANTA BARBARA, CALIF.
EVENING NEWS PRESS

MAESTRO — Serge Koussevitzky mounts the podium at 6:30 p.m. for the Boston Symphony's 22nd year on the air. KECA is the station.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 12 1947

Boston Winter Season Opens

First of Symphony Concerts Is Signal. — October Ball Held for Debutantes

Special to The Providence Sunday Journal

Boston, Oct. 11. — Friday marked the official opening of the Winter season in Boston. For the Symphony concerts began and from now until Spring, Friday afternoons will be definitely reserved for these important occasions. No Boston hostess would ever think of planning anything to interfere with the Friday Symphony. Luncheon always is early and tea late on that red-letter day, for Symphony tickets are prized highly and are handed down from mother to daughter, along with the family portraits and silver.

There were many familiar faces in the audience which filled Symphony Hall for the first concert of the 67th season and stood to applaud Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as he appeared on the stage. The intermission was like a family reunion with friends greeting friends after the long Summer, and Dr. Koussevitzky's bride receiving a warm welcome.

The October Ball held at the Hotel Somerset Friday evening opened the Autumn social season in Boston. This gala party was a reunion of the debutantes of the last few years, who invited the debutantes of the current season.

Mrs. Tedrowe Watkins was chairman of the committee, which included post-debs of 1943, '44, '45 and '46, as well as Miss Claire Fuller, Miss Florence McKean and Miss Molly Reynolds, who are making their debuts this year.

Miss Gale Smith's coming-out party this evening at the Hotel Sheraton is another event that will make Oct. 11 an important date in her family annals. It was the eighth anniversary of the memorable coming-out party of her sister, Mrs. George Bradford Foote, the former Nancy Putnam Smith, and the birthday of Mrs. Foote's little son, George B. Foote Jr., who is one year old. It is also the birthday of her brother, Mr. Lyman Whitman Smith, who was head usher at the dance.

Miss Smith, whose parents, Mr. and Mrs. S. Abbot Smith of Blue Jay Hill, Westwood, and Edgewood, Manchester-by-the-Sea, gave the dance for her, also was presented at a tea last month given by her parents and her grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. Lyman Whitman Gale of Galands, Temple, N. H., at Blue Jay Hill.

On Tuesday, for the second time this year, Rear Admiral Richard Evelyn Byrd will give a daughter in marriage. On that afternoon at the family home at 9 Brimmer Street, his second daughter, Miss Katharine Ames Byrd, will become the bride of Mr. Robert Garnett Breyer of Los Angeles, son of Mr. and Mrs. Robert S. Breyer of Houston, Tex.

The Rev. Robert G. Metters of Emmanuel Church, who officiated at the marriage of the eldest daughter, Miss E. Bolling Byrd, to Mr. William A. Clarke Jr., of Wallingford, Pa., on June 25, in the Leslie Lindsey Memorial Chapel, will perform the 4:30 o'clock ceremony in the presence of members of the immediate families and a few close friends. A small reception will follow.

The bride-to-be will have her younger sister, Miss Helen Byrd, as her only attendant, and Mr. James Robertshaw of Mississippi will be the best man.

Twelve Amusements THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—SATURDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1

Koussevitzky Given Ovation As Symphony Opens Season

By CYRUS DURGIN

The 87th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Serge Koussevitzky, beginning his 24th year as conductor, was greeted, as usual on such occasions, with warmth that amounted to affection. Both the orchestra and the audience rose, and thus remained until, with his usual gesture, he bade them all be seated.

The opening program was solidly German: Bach of the First Brandenburg Concerto (hitherto unplayed at these concerts); Hindemith of the Matthias the Painter" Symphony, and Beethoven of the Fifth Symphony. It was played superbly, from first to last, as everyone expected it would be.

And how magnificent the orchestra sounded! The semi-open air festivals at Tanglewood are all very nice, but you have to hear the Boston Symphony in an auditorium like Symphony Hall or Carnegie Hall to experience the full depth and richness of the strings, the complete range of woodwind color and the mellow power of the brass.

First Brandenburg More Varied

Now that Bach's First Brandenburg Concerto has been introduced to the "regular" series, we may all hope for reasonably frequent repetition. It is far more varied and interesting than that old standby among the Brandenburg Concertos—the No. 3—and the horns and oboes of the concertino have a very fetching sound quality. The minuet, with a polacca among the trios, is Bach at his most ingratiating.

After nearly 14 years, there can be little doubt that Hindemith achieved a masterpiece in the symphonic excerpts from his opera "Matthias the Painter." Here you have modern music at its finest: carefully wrought and with no little complication, to be enjoyed by listeners of well developed taste, and yet simple in its effect upon one's emotions.

This is not sensuous music, for Hindemith is almost never sensuous. It is austere, occasionally a little dry, frequently nervous in its [illegible] counterpoint and at all times [illegible] alive. The harmonic [illegible] involve a great deal of strong [illegible]nce, but it is dissonance [illegible] and well-ordered, with never [illegible] of confusion or "wrong-[illegible]mposition."

[illegible] three movements have [illegible], all the same, and [illegible] and feeling within [illegible] Hindemith's artistic [illegible] that we shall [illegible] from any but [illegible], because it can [illegible] only by virtuosi.

[illegible] Among Players

[illegible] Fifth Symphony [illegible] strength and [illegible] me that Mr. [illegible] taking it faster [illegible]. It was not too [illegible] not distorted [illegible]ded, but except [illegible]endos no one [illegible].

[illegible] changes in the [illegible] de Pasquale, [illegible] network radio orchestra, is the new first viola, in [illegible] to Jean Lefranc. Vinal [illegible] over to the tuba [illegible] who has gone [illegible] Norman Carol, a [illegible] who was concert[illegible] Berkshire Music [illegible] last Summer, now [illegible] the late Nicolai [illegible].

[illegible] economic troubles [illegible] season bids fair [illegible] the symphonic [illegible] that most orches[illegible] increases in [illegible] The Boston Symphony [illegible] with the Saturday, [illegible] Tuesday series sold [illegible] a handful of seats [illegible] Friday concerts.

This program will be repeated at 8:30 tonight. Next week: William Schuman's Third Symphony, "Don Juan" by Strauss, Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite and the Fifth Symphony by Sibelius.

Phonograph Rivals "Live" Orchestra At Tanglewood

LENOX, Mass. (U.P.)—Pitting a phonograph against a full symphony orchestra and inviting an audience to tell when the orchestra leaves off playing and the phonograph picks up is quite an acoustical stunt.

It was tried out successfully by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra during this Summer's Berkshire Music Festival at the Tanglewood estate outside Lenox.

The demonstration was held in the big music shed, seating 6,000. Another 1,000 listened on the lawn outside. The occasion was the public introduction of The Berkshire, a new instrument developed by RCA Victor and named in honor of the Tanglewood festival.

This combination radio, television and phonograph set is aimed at making available in the home a wider range of tonal reproduction, bringing out qualities hitherto lost.

The orchestra, in the course of a long program, played the Beethoven "Egmont" Overture. Midway in the performance, the "live" musicians ceased playing and the phonograph took over. The change under the ideal acoustical conditions of the music shed, was almost imperceptible.

Of course, the instrument used is a de luxe model which will retail at $4,000 and is over-elaborate for apartment dwellers or small home owners. The price range of the "custom built" line is from $1,800 to $4,000.

The phonograph demonstration was part of a day-long program called "Music for All" which traced the development of reproduction by phonograph, radio and television over the last 30 years.

Recordings by the Boston Symphony since that organization first began making records for Victor in 1917 were played on machines of the period, giving a graphic picture of how the tonal range has been more fully captured over the decades.

During the course of events, movies were made of the audience, to be incorporated in a forthcoming film by MGM, dramatizing the history and growth of the festival, along the lines of the recent production which glorified Carnegie Hall.

It was announced that the first 200 sets of the new Berkshire instrument line will be sold on a subscription basis, the proceeds to benefit the Berkshire Music Center scholarship fund. A silver plaque, with the customer's name and Dr. Koussevitzky's signature, will be placed in each set.

[illegible], N. Y.
MORNING WALL ST. JOURN[illegible]

OCT 16 1947

Metropolitan Opera—

Metropolitan Opera's 63rd season will open Monday November 10 with Verdi's Un Ballo in Maschera. The company has signed 14 new singers for the season.

In addition to the new and ambitious productions of the four dramas that comprise Wagner's Ring Cycle, Benjamin Britten's Peter Grimes, which was originally commissioned by Serge Koussevitzky and given its American debut in August, 1946, at Tanglewood, Mass., will have its first Metropolitan premiere this season.

Waynesville, N.C.
Mountaineer
10/17/47

A report from the Boston Symphony Orchestra says Serge Koussevitzky considers "the composer of the future in Europe" to be the Frenchman, Olivier Messiaen. Consequently, Koussevitzky is introducing Messiaen's symphony. It is for an over-size orchestra in ten movements and more than an hour in length.

Another first performance by Koussevitzky will be the Fourth Symphony of the Italian composer Malipiero. Koussevitzky also will conduct the first American performance of a new concerto for 'cello and orchestra by Khatchatourian.

New music by American composers planned for the Bostonians, will include the Third Symphony of Walter Piston, the Second Symphony by Henry Cowell, a piano concerto by Howard Hanson, a piece for soprano and orchestra by Samuel Barber, and the new Fourth Symphony by David Diamond, to be presented by Leonard Bernstein as guest conductor. Charles Munch will come again from France to conduct the orchestra as guest and also will introduce new works.

HE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 18,

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The second concert by the Boston symphony Hall. The program was as ducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hal. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 3 .... William Schuman
"Don Juan," Tone Poem, Op. 20 . Strauss
"Ma Mere l'Oye" Suite .... Ravel
Symphony No. 5 in E flat Op. 82
Sibelius

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

It was rather an oddly contrasted program that we heard yesterday and which Mr. Burgin conducted owing to the indisposition of Serge Koussevitzky. Yet the juxtaposition of these strange contemporary bedfellows— for all save Ravel are still alive—proved not unrewarding. Mr. Burgin had the orchestra well in hand, and all in all it was an interesting musical afternoon.

William Schuman's 3rd Symphony had a considerable critical success when it was first played throughout the country in 1941. In form, though not always in spirit, it delves back into the late 17th century, since its movements—Passacaglia, Fugue, Chorale and Toccata—came to their highest development at that period and some years later with Bach. If the Symphony were no more than an ingenious imitation of the musical baroque, however, there would be no special point in repeating it. Mr. Schuman starts strictly enough in both the Passacaglia and Fugue, but soon he wanders far afield, then returns fitfully only to veer off again.

I should say that the Symphony is now less emotionally overpowering than when we first heard it. Its appeal is more to the intellect than the emotions. In the first movement, particularly, the listener is taken up with following the composer's track in the Passacaglia and Fugue. We are more interested in what he is going to do with his material, how he is going to vary it and depart from it on a new tack than we are in the general effectiveness of the material itself. It is how he says it rather than what. The final toccata is more of a display piece for a virtuoso orchestra, but even here it is the manner, not the matter, which holds our attention. The Symphony is obviously difficult and I imagine that Mr. Burgin will be just as glad of this performance yesterday before the composer is himself on hand to hear it tonight.

Strauss' "Don Juan" and Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye" are at opposite ends of the artistic pole from each other. The former might perfectly well be the first movement (for it is in sonata form) of some large Wagnerian symphony. It is a gorgeous cataract of sound and is doted on by conductors of first-class orchestras for the tremendous effect, in spite of the quiet ending, which they can achieve with it. Ravel's Suite with its acidulous, modal harmonies and its magically transparent orchestration is lovely sound of a radically different school. You can easily take your pick; and Mr. Burgin and the orchestra gave splendid interpretations of both for the choosing.

Sibelius' 5th Symphony is an old friend at these concerts and is beloved for its resounding finale, a remarkable demonstration of what a composer can do by way of creating his own miracle of the loaves and the fishes. The slow movement I find less and less to my taste. There are disquieting little patches of vulgarity in it and the preceding movement, which you don't mind, in fact crave, in Strauss but which are disconcerting in Sibelius' artistic aim. It may be too that in the last 15 years we have been overdosed with Sibelius in Boston. The chances are that may account for a certain carping spirit about Sibelius which can be noted by any ear close to the ground of the public taste.

Next week's program offers Henry Cowell's Short Symphony, Honegger's Symphony for Strings and Brahms' Violin Concerto with Ginette Neveu as soloist.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 19 1947

Orchestras to Honor League on Anniversary

Conductors and major orchestras throughout the country will honor the League of Composers on its twenty-fifth anniversary by performing contemporary works that have been commissioned by this organization since its inception. Conductors responding in this way will include Serge Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony, Bruno Walter and Leopold Stokowski with the Philharmonic-Symphony, Carlos Chavez with the Symphony Orchestra of Mexico, Leonard Bernstein with the New York City Symphony, Artur Rodzinski with the Chicago Symphony, George Szell with the Cleveland Orchestra, Vladimir Golschmann with the St. Louis Symphony, Hans Kindler with the National Symphony, Fabian Sevitzky with the Indianapolis Symphony, Pierre Monteux with the San Francisco Symphony, Howard Hanson with the Rochester Symphony and Thor Johnson with the Cincinnati Symphony. The Vancouver, Fort Wayne, Denver and Baltimore orchestras and the orchestra of the National Gallery in Washington will also honor the league in this way.

PHILA., PA
GERMANTOWN COURIER
9/18/47

Named to Boston Viola Chair

Joseph de Pasquale of 213 E. Cliveden St., Germantown, has been appointed to the first viola chair of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will make his first appearance with the orchestra at a rehearsal October 6 under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 19 1947

Out of Town

Serge Koussevitzky will open the Boston Symphony Orchestra's third pair of home concerts, next Friday afternoon and Saturday night in Symphony Hall, with the first performances of Henry Cowell's fourth (or Short) symphony. Its four movements are titled "Hymn," "Ballad," "Dance" and "Fuguing Tune." Arthur Honegger's Symphony for Strings, which has not yet been heard in New York, will follow. Ginette Neveu, French violinist, will be the soloist in the Brahms concerto.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE
OCT 20 1947

A report from the Boston Symphony orchestra says Serge Koussevitzky considers "the composer of the future in Europe" to be the Frenchman, Olivier Messiaen. Consequently, Koussevitzky is introducing Messiaen's symphony. It is for an over-size orchestra in ten movements and more than an hour in length.

Another first performance by Koussevitzky will be the Fourth Symphony of the Italian composer Malipero. Koussevitzky also will conduct the first American performance of a new concerto for 'cello and orchestra by Khatchatourian.

New music by American composers planned for the Bostonians, will include the Third Symphony of Walter Piston, the Second Symphony by Henry Cowell, a piano concerto by Howard Hanson, a piece for soprano and orchestra by Samuel Barber, and the new Fourth Symphony by David Diamond, to be presented by Leonard Bernstein as guest conductor. Charles Munch will come again from France to conduct the orchestra as guest and also will introduce new works.

Donating his services for the benefit of the Rachmaninoff fund, Alexander Brailowsky will appear with the Cleveland orchestra under George Szell on November 2 in Cleveland. Brailowsky returned to resume his American tour after a five months tour of Europe.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1947 Art—Music—Theater

Christian Science Boston

—Burgin Takes Baton at Symphony

Schuman's Prize Work Has Second Hearing

By L. A. Sloper

Richard Burgin took the baton for the second Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony season yesterday, in the forced absence of Dr. Koussevitzky. The program, planned of course by the music director, consisted of William Schuman's Symphony No. 3, Strauss' "Don Juan," Ravel's "Ma Mère l'Oye," and the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius. It was an odd collection, the scheme of which is difficult to discover.

Schuman's so-called symphony, dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky, had had its first performance exactly six years earlier. It is now having its first revival here since then. But it has been played elsewhere, and has been honored by the Critics' Circle of New York.

* * *

At this performance the impression was renewed that it is a work of great competence and interest. On a second hearing, however, it seemed to have more emotion in it than at first. This may have been due to the reading, but it is more likely that at the first performance one was listening so hard to the form that one missed the feeling.

At all events, the piece sounded on this occasion not only like an orchestral suite but like a suite drawn from an opera. It was surprising how much ardor was projected from behind the façade of Passacaglia, Fugue, Chorale and Toccata, even though it is well known that dramatic tension can be and has been expressed through these classic forms in the lyric theater itself. The composition is good enough to keep in the repertory.

* * *

Mr. Burgin secured a spirited performance of the Schuman symphony, and was rewarded with prolonged applause, which he shared with the players. He also provided a vivid realization of "Don Juan," with its soaring themes and its magnificent orchestral colors. This masterpiece was inevitably the high light of the program, and Ravel's charming "Mother Goose" pieces sounded pale and thin after it—an unfair bit of program making.

But if Ravel seemed tame after Strauss, he served at least as a useful prelude to the Sibelius Fifth, which no doubt would have sounded even more redundant, empty and pompous without its help. We have heard this work almost annually for years. Why not give it a rest of five or six seasons? It might seem less tiresome then, though it never will rank with Tchaikovsky's Fifth, even as a warhorse.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
OCT 21 1947

Boston Symphony

Providence tonight welcomes with delight the first in the 1947-48 series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Koussevitsky himself as conductor. Over the span of more than half a century, the Boston Symphony has paid its regular visits to Providence in a mutually happy arrangement. During the years the audiences have increased in size, with last year setting "SRO" records. Appreciation of and pleasure in orchestral music among a growing number of people make the actual presence of the Boston Symphony an event of great moment in our lives. The contribution of Dr. Koussevitsky and the Boston orchestra to the love of good music in the whole United States needs no testimony. We are a fortunate community to have a personal tie with this splendid organization for our own enrichment.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

[illegible] 2 1947

Music

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert At Metropolitan

BY RUTH TRIPP

The musical season was brilliantly launched last evening at the Metropolitan Theater. A capacity audience attended the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series. Serge Koussevitzky was prevented by illness from conducting. His place was taken by Richard Burgin, the associate conductor of the orchestra, who conducted one of the most interesting programs played here by this orchestra in several seasons.

Burgin's conducting has always been our first choice after Dr. Koussevitzky's and in the many times his work has been heard, it has never seemed so inspired and convincing as at last evening's concert. The program:

Symphony No. 5 in C minor,
Op. 67 ....Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio
II. Andante con moto
III. Allegro; Trio
IV. Allegro
INTERMISSION
Brandenburg Concerto No. 1,
in F major ....Bach
I. Allegro
II. Adagio
III. Minuet; Trio; Polacca
IV. Allegro
Serenade for Solo Flute,
Harp and Strings .... Hanson
Flute: Georges Laurent
Harp: Bernard Zighera
Symphony, "Mathis der Maler". .Hindemith
("Matthias the Painter")
Angelic Concert
Entombment
Temptation of St. Anthony

Beethoven's "Fifth" was presented in a delightfully straightforward manner. The familiar phrases were interpreted faithfully with what seemed an extra quality of devotion from the strings, especially in the second movement. Burgin's reading was a model of clear exposition. The brasses achieved a splendid balance of tone in the last movement and throughout the work, the musicians seemed to enjoy thoroughly the great music they were privileged to play. This must have been a thrilling performance for young listeners hearing it for the first time, if it could have stirred the seasoned concert goers as it apparently did. The applause was prolonged and hearty.

The Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 1 gave us the opportunity to hear with the small orchestra, a sextet of solo instruments, a violino piccolo, three oboes and two hunting horns. Perfection of ensemble and delightful rhythmic flow marked the work as one of the most satisfactory of the entire program. There was a decided churchlike quality to the slow section, which came very near to being a solo for pipe organ. It would be hard to match the excellence of this interpretation.

American music came in for a share of attention with the Hanson number. It was interestingly written, sufficiently dissonant but quite understandable. The solo flute, played by Georges Laurent, was a delight to hear. Exquisite tone quality and virtuoso technique combined to bring out the content of the score. The harp played a secondary role to the flute yet Bernard Zighera's playing added brilliance to the ensemble. The audience liked the work.

Hindemith's great symphony, "Matthias the Painter", is a work which would require several hearing before one should express a final opinion about its content. Its combination of voices is fascinating, its changes surprising and frequent and its dissonances powerful. There were passages as interpreted last evening which were very beautiful. The final climax was tremendous. It hardly seemed possible that such tonal volume had been thought out by the modest little man who played a solo viola sonata of his own composing, when first we made his concert acquaintance at a Coolidge Festival in Washington some 10 years ago. His capacity for orchestral composition is astonishing and yet parts of his symphony were most enjoyable.

Providence will probably appreciate more than ever in perspective the importance of last evening's program as Richard Burgin presented it to us. It was interesting fare, delightfully set forth.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 24 1947

Cowell Symphony's Premiere

Henry Cowell's new "Short Symphony," the fourth symphony to his credit, will receive its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be presented at the regular pair of concerts, this afternoon and tomorrow night, in Boston. Because of the illness of Serge Koussevitzky, Richard Burgin, the orchestra's associate conductor, will direct both concerts and also will conduct Sunday afternoon's program. Dr. Koussevitzky is expected to lead next week's concerts.

Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N. Y.

OCT 25 1947

Letters to the Recordings Editor

Long-Time Believer

SIR: As a regular reader of the SRL I feel that I have been awarded a very substantial bonus by the addition of your section. After all, records are just one phase of the publishing business to which we are indebted for a wide distribution of products which otherwise would be inaccessible to most of us. My special reason for writing you is to endorse as strongly as I know how the sentiments of your editorial on the copyright situation. Your clear statement should help hasten the realization of a fair solution of this problem. I have never seen it so well stated.

GEORGE E. JUDD.

Boston, Mass.

EDITOR'S NOTE: Reader Judd is manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose Victor records are played on countless broadcasts each year, with no revenue to the organization which made them.

OCTOBER 27, 1947

phony Under Burgin Baton

Mendelssohn, Hanson, Ravel And Beethoven on Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Richard Burgin, presented yesterday in Symphony Hall, its first concert in the Sunday afternoon series. The program produced an agreeable balance, opening with the liveliness of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony; concluding on the power of Beethoven's Fifth, and bracketing in the middle the impressionism of Howard Hanson's Serenade for solo flute, harp, and strings and the ballet rhythm of Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite.

Except for the Beethoven, of course, Mr. Burgin's responsibility seemed to be to coax grace rather than passion from the music. He succeeded in doing justice to his scores, with especially notable assistance from the strings.

For the "Italian" Symphony the strings—carefully restrained by the conductor from proceeding too fast or with too emphatic accents—produced a delicate, dancing lilt in the first movement. In the second movement the basses were conspicuous for the crisp rhythm they established behind the phrasing of the violins and violas. The brass flourishes seemed a trifle loud in the third movement, jarring its tranquility. But the Saltarello was struck off with vivacity and color.

Howard Hanson's Serenade was first performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra almost exactly a year ago. Yesterday afternoon George Laurent again played the flute part, and Bernard Zighera the harp. However, the strings were largely responsible for the heavily impressionistic chords, against which the flute was able to sound so fluent.

Mr. Laurent played with virtuosity and dramatic effectiveness, but actually the Serenade offers little opportunity for real expression. As a rather romantic exercise, it remains pleasing enough, principally because Dr. Hanson seems to have known how to exploit the special qualities of the flute.

Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite succeeded the Serenade without changing the musical mood very radically. Once more the string section was pre-eminent, giving the five pieces, at times, a rich harmony which all of Ravel's tricks with piccolo, triangle, and wood blocks could not undermine. The oboes and English horn also made the most lovely passages in which they anticipate the strings. Mr. Burgin's performance had a special smoothness, even during the oblique Oriental strains of "Empress of the Pagodas."

Perhaps concentration on sprightliness and polish in the first three works of the program left the orchestra emotionally unprepared for Beethoven's Fifth. At any rate, its performance seemed slightly lacking in drive, particularly in the final movement. Nevertheless, the first three movements were conducted with a clean simplicity that had its virtues.

M. M.

Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N.Y.
OCT 25 1947

Recordings Reports on Current Releases

WORK, PERFORMER, DATA	REPORT
Bach: "Concerto in D minor" for violin and oboe. Willem Van den Burg conducting the Pacific Symphonetta, with Manuel Compinsky, violin, and Gordon Schoenberg, oboe. Alco set A-202, $4.00	Familiar enough in its form for two claviers, this alternative use is more successful than one would have expected. The material suits the instruments well, especially in the superb slow section. Fine musical playing, brightly recorded in a dead studio. Plastic surfaces well made.
Beethoven: "Sonata in F minor" (opus 57). Rudolf Serkin, piano. Columbia album MM-711, $4.60	Strong and somewhat rigid performance, far less "Appassionata" than the Rubinstein of last year. Serkin seems bent on remaking his character in the mold of the music, but the results are primarily ugly emphasis and over-statement. Good piano reproduction at medium volume, thin when sound is at maximum power.
Chopin: "Ballade in A flat." Guiomar Novaës, piano. Columbia No. 72345, $1.25	Winsome and womanly playing, an easy enough surmise if one knows who the performer is. Mme. Novaës is a perceptive and fine-grained player, somewhat lacking in the impetuosity for the climaxes of this piece. Her characteristic tone is well suggested.
Haydn: "Symphony No. 94" ("Surprise"). Serge Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Victor album 1155, $4.05	A welcome replacement for the old Koussevitsky, unavailable for several years. Clean, well-articulated performance, suitable for the black and white effects of Koussevitzky's direction. The orchestra sounds large to me for some of Haydn's writing, but the choice of tempo for the "Surprise" movement is justice itself, as is the giocosa spirit of the final. Efficient, broad-range recording.
Massenet: "Mort du Thais." Dorothy Kirsten, soprano, with Robert Merrill, baritone, and orchestra conducted by Jean Paul Morel. Victor No. 11-9792, $1	A bit of a soulful gem from "Thais," amounting to the familiar "Meditation" in its ultimate form for soprano, baritone, solo violin, and orchestra. Fervent singing, excellent recording. With it, Kirsten does an ingratiating "In Quelle Trine Morgide" from Puccini's "Manon Lescaut."
Mozart: "Seraglio" and "Figaro" arias. Eleanor Steber, soprano, with orchestra directed by Jean Paul Morel. Victor album 1157, $3	"Martern aller Arten" (sung in English), "Non So Più Cosa Son" and "Deh vieni non tardar" are the delights of this album, sung with a security and finish which Miss Steber has often approached at the Metropolitan but never achieved. The orchestra could be larger, but it is directed by Morel with notable zeal. The tone and balance of the recording are first rate.
Mozart: "Catalogue" aria ("Don Giovanni"). Joel Berglund, baritone, with orchestra conducted by Leo Blech. Victor No. 10-1346, 75c	Good resonant English recording of an air asking more subtlety and finish than Berglund provides. Leporello would be no companion for the lecherous Giovanni were he so blunt and stolid as this singer's tones paint him.
Mozart: "Quintet in D" (K. 593). Budapest Quartet with Milton Katims, viola. Columbia album 708, $4.60.	Magnificently rich, resonant reproduction of the Budapest-Katims string tone. I do not hear quite the deftness or subtlety of the old Pro Arte (V-Set 350) but there is fine temper in this treatment, ample understanding of Mozart.
Mozart: "Symphony in D" (No. 20). Edvard Fendler conducting a chamber orchestra. VOX album 171, $4.75	Not only a first recording, but also a first experience for most listeners with this product of Mozart's fifteenth year. Brisk, cheery music, with a slow movement of distinction even for Mozart. Fendler leads his little group with a sure hand. The good sound contrived by the engineers is much offset by the dull, unresonant studio.
Ponchielli: "Suicidio" ("La Gioconda"). Emmy Destinn, soprano. Victor No. 15-1014, $2.65	One of the latest in Victor's "Heritage" series and honestly entitled to that prizable word. Destinn's vocal strength and dramatic projection are truly a heritage that any singer of the day might value as a legacy. Note, particularly, the contralto richness of the low tones, the full brilliance of the top ones. For the time (1914) a successful recording. With it is a version of "Un Bel Di" (from "Butterfly") which is impressive if not breathtaking—as the other is.
Schubert: "Symphony in B minor" ("Unfinished") Bruno Walter conducting the Philadelphia Orchestra. Columbia album 699, $4.60	A much more creditable Walter version than his old one with the Vienna Philharmonic. Many fewer "romantic" touches, much more straightforward music. Big, roomy recording, also fine playing by the Philadelphia woodwinds. On balance, a better buy than the Beecham, my previous favorite.
Strauss, Johann: "Mein herr Marquis." Erna Sack, soprano. Radiofunken No. 70045, $2.62	Domestic repressings, on Vinylite, of European originals. Dazzling vocalization, in the "Fledermaus" (or "Rosalinda") spirit, with a high F sharp and G for those who value such favors. "Spiel Ich die Unschuld" is its partner. Both originals were excellent recordings, and the dubbings preserve most of their values. Sack's phenomenal high tones (her special distinction) are vividly audible.
Verdi: Excerpts from "Forza del Destino," sung by Jan Peerce, tenor, and Leonard Warren, baritone, with orchestra conducted by Jean Paul Morel. Victor album 1156, $3	Over-amplified, if impressive, reproduction of "Invano Alvaro," "Ah! Una Suora Mi Lasciati," and the famous "Solenne in Quest' Ora." Hard to believe these singers have so much power, under any circumstances. Much more natural, and attractive recording of "O Mimi" from the fourth act of "Boheme," on which Peerce is outstanding. (Erich Leinsdorf conducts "Solenne in Quest' Ora".)
Vivaldi: "Concerto Grosso" (D minor). Alexander Schneider and the Dumbarton Oaks Chamber Orchestra. Keynote No. 20003, $1.84	Spirited playing of a great work in the "L'estro Armonica" group, but unfortunately compressed on a single twelve-inch record. Consequently, the "Siciliano" is too fast, the final section also undervalued. Superb string tone, but not the desirable item it might be.
Wagner: "Die Meistersinger" ("Am Stillen Herd" and "Preislied"). Set Svanholm, tenor, with orchestra conducted by Frieder Weissman. Victor No. 11-9791, $1	Thick going in "Am Stillen Herd" for Svanholm, who is not lyric enough for the music. However, he delivers a well-phrased "Prize Song," lacking, of course, the required chorus. I. K.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 22 1947

First Nighters Come to Hear Boston Symphony

MISS DELITE GOBEILLE, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Alfred A. Gobeille of Jamestown, and Miss Jean D. Beasley (right), daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Donald S. Beasley of Groton, Mass., attending the opening concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Theater. Both are students at Lincoln School.

—Staff Photo by John P. Callahan

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Concert at Metropolitan

BY RUTH TRIPP

The musical season was brilliantly launched last evening at the Metropolitan Theater. A capacity audience attended the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series. Serge Koussevitzky was prevented by illness from conducting. His place was taken by Richard Burgin, the associate conductor of the orchestra, who conducted one of the most interesting programs played here by this orchestra in several seasons.

Burgin's conducting has always been our first choice after Dr. Koussevitzky's and in the many times his work has been heard, it has never seemed so inspired and convincing as at last evening's concert. The program:

Symphony No. 5 in C minor,
Op. 67 .... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio
II. Andante con moto
III. Allegro; Trio
IV. Allegro
INTERMISSION
Brandenburg Concerto No. 1,
in F major .... Bach
I. Allegro
II. Adagio
III. Minuet; Trio; Polacca
IV. Allegro
Serenade for Solo Flute,
Harp and Strings .... Hanson
Flute: Georges Laurent
Harp: Bernard Zighera
Symphony, "Mathis der Maler" .. Hindemith
("Matthias the Painter")
Angelic Concert
Entombment
Temptation of St. Anthony

Beethoven's "Fifth" was presented in a delightfully straightforward manner. The familiar phrases were interpreted faithfully with what seemed an extra quality of devotion from the strings, especially in the second movement. Burgin's reading was a model of clear exposition. The brasses achieved a splendid balance of tone in the last movement and throughout the work, the musicians seemed to enjoy thoroughly the great music they were privileged to play. This must have been a thrilling performance for young listeners hearing it for the first time, if it could have stirred the seasoned concert goers as it apparently did. The applause was prolonged and hearty.

The Bach Brandenburg Concerto No. 1 gave us the opportunity to hear with the small orchestra a sextet of solo instruments, a violino piccolo, three oboes and two hunting horns. Perfection of ensemble and delightful rhythmic flow marked the work as one of the most satisfactory of the entire program. There was a decided churchlike quality to the slow section, which came very near to being a solo for pipe organ. It would be hard to match the excellence of this interpretation.

American music came in for a share of attention with the Hanson number. It was interestingly written, sufficiently dissonant but quite understandable. The solo flute, played by Georges Laurent, was a delight to hear. Exquisite tone quality and virtuoso technique combined to bring out the content of the score. The harp played a secondary role to the flute yet Bernard Zighera's playing added brilliance to the ensemble. The audience liked the work.

Hindemith's great symphony, "Matthias the Painter", is a work which would require several hearing before one should express a final opinion about its content. Its combination of voices is fascinating, its changes surprising and frequent and its dissonances powerful. There were passages as interpreted last evening which were very beautiful. The final climax was tremendous. It hardly seemed possible that such tonal volume had been thought out by the modest little man who played a solo viola sonata of his own composing, when first we made his concert acquaintance at a Coolidge Festival in Washington some 10 years ago. His capacity for orchestral composition is astonishing and yet parts of his symphony were most enjoyable.

Providence will probably appreciate more than ever in perspective the importance of last evening's program as Richard Burgin presented it to us. It was interesting fare, delightfully set forth.

MUSIC

BY WARREN
STOREY SMITH

Falling on the 100th anniversary of the death of Felix Mendelssohn, in his 39th year, Tuesday evening's Symphony concert will be partly devoted to his music. The first number will be the Fourth Symphony of Brahms and after intermission will come the G minor Piano Concerto with Lukas Foss as soloist, the Scherzo from the "Midsummer Night's Dream Music" and the "Italian Symphony." Dr. Koussevitzky's original program was all-Mendelssohn and included the "Reformation" Symphony, which some of us can do without, and the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture. The last-named will show up on Friday and Saturday to open a program of romantic music, which will also include the Schumann Piano Concerto, with Myra Hess and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," long neglected hereabouts but now become a seasonal observance.

To commemorate Mendelssohn orchestrally in fitting style it would be necessary to play the "Scotch" Symphony, which some other conductors are doing, the Overture "Fingal's Cave," the undeservedly overlooked "The Fair Melusina" and the Violin Concerto, one of the three best in existence. The "Midsummer Night's Dream Music" also includes the charming Nocturne and the Wedding March, to which Princess Elizabeth will be faithful, though she has announced her intention of replacing the "Lohengrin" March at her forthcoming wedding with one by her countryman, the 19th century Parry.

The "Ruy Blas" Overture has its admirers; and what has happened to that other seascape, once so popular, "A Calm Sea and a Prosperous Voyage," the second part of which used to remind the irreverent Philip Hale of a noisy crowd on the deck of an excursion steamer heaving pop bottles into the water.

* * *

This is an impressive legacy, particularly when you consider that Mendelssohn was the one conservative among the romanticists, the only one who wrote for the immediate present, quite content to let the future look out for itself. It has been said that he tasted of the sweetness that time had brought to the bitterness of things but was unwilling to touch the bitter that would some day become sweet. Contemporary critical wrath never descended on his head, as it did on those of Berlioz, Chopin, Schumann, Liszt and Wagner. Moreover, he himself often berated and underrated his more adventurous colleagues. Of Berlioz he wrote that after reading one of his scores, one should wash one's hands. Toward Schumann he was always condescending. Chopin he liked only in spots, and what he was permitted to hear of Liszt he detested. The only thing he could find to praise in "Tannhauser" (he did not live to hear the greater Wagner but would not have understood him if he had) was a canonic answer in the second finale.

At this juncture the completely uninformed reader might wonder what it was that he did have, since a certain amount of enterprise is considered indispensible to significant achievement. But, as the career of Mendelssohn abundantly proves, a composer can be progressive without being an extremist or a radical, though he will never reach the top rank. The 17-year-old boy who wrote the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture should, you would say, have become the greatest composer of them all. Even Mozart never wrote anything of comparable importance in his 'teens. We should remember, however, that the most profound geniuses develop slowly. At 17 Wagner had not given the slightest indication that he would make his mark in music, nor had Verdi, who did not hit his real stride until he had passed 70; while if Beethoven had died before he was 25, he would probably have been forgotten.

* * *

But Mendelssohn, who had every other grace and gift, personal and professional, was not profound. Some say it was because he was born into a well-to-do family; never had to fight or struggle for anything; never knew any greater sorrow than the loss of his parents and of his beloved sister, Fanny, whose death undoubtedly hastened his own, brought on by an over-active professional life. That will account for part of his failure to maintain the position freely accorded him in his lifetime, that of peer of Bach and Beethoven. The rest was a defect in his own nature. He was stirred, generally speaking, by externals only, by places rather than by people. That is why he could never find an opera libretto to suit him. Fancy he had in abundance, coupled with an easy mastery of every trick of his trade that sends us to Mozart for fitting comparison. Passion he knew not; the tragic lay outside his scope as artist. Yet in the arts skill counts for more than feeling, unless the two are combined. And so it is that the 100th anniversary of his death finds Mendelssohn in high, if not the highest favor. We are charmed by his address, his imagination. And his best work, most of it orchestral, persuades us to overlook that which, however technically expert and polished, is merely hollow and conventional.

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra
By JOHN WM. RILEY

One hundred years ago last night, Felix Mendelssohn died in Leipzig, cutting short at the age of 38 the bright career, and drawing the shade on one of the most cultivated musical minds the world had seen to that time. Mendelssohn's standing faded quickly, but it has regained its true place in the affections of music lovers.

With true devotion to the memory of a fine artist and sensitive regard for the qualities of his music, Serge Koussevitzky gave over the broadcast portion of last evening's Boston Symphony concert to three of Mendelssohn's most popular works. There were the G Minor Piano Concerto, in which Lukas Foss was the able soloist; the Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and the "Italian" Symphony — three works which miss only two facets of the art of Mendelssohn: his gift as a miniaturist as shown in the "Songs Without Words" and his more Olympian view of "Elijah."

In contrast to the stunning but uncomfortably highly-charged performance of the Brahms Fourth Symphony which began the program, the Mendelssohn works all emerged with their character quite undisturbed. Lyricism at its loveliest; continuous melody in a happy (the name Felix means "happy") frame of mind; delicacy and brightness. Yet there was never depth wanting.

The Scherzo was a beauty of shimmering sound. And the Concerto was a delight. Mr. Foss has a nice feeling for the poetic qualities of Mendelssohn and the slow movement was particularly ingratiating. However, he had a tendency to rush some of the showy passage work. But the overall effect never departed from the spirit of Mendelssohn's intentions. The concert closed with a superbly light performance of the "Italian" Symphony.

MUSIC
SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra
By CYRUS DURGIN

Serge Koussevitsky, evidently rid of the cold which has beset him for the past two weeks, returned to the conductor's stand of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. The program for that concert (and for tonight) twice was changed, and finally emerged as follows: Honegger: Symphony for Strings; Rachmaninoff: Third Piano Concerto, with Witold Malcuzynski as soloist; Brahms: Fourth Symphony.

The first and last parts of the afternoon were so absorbing that it is a moot question with which to begin. Let 'er go chronologically, then, with the marvelously-wrought Honegger Symphony that was composed in Paris during the first 18 months of the Nazi occupation. This is troubled music, with a good deal of harshness and yet to some degree tender in a delicate style that suggests chamber music more than symphony. Overall, however, is a big sense of structure and intellect.

I suspect that Honegger's Symphony for Strings is going to take quite a while to make its way into public favor, for it is pre-eminently musicians' music. It asks an advanced taste and no fear of dissonance, together with active concentration upon its complications and its lengths.

Yet there is one passage dramatic as lightning, and that is when the trumpet chorale bursts out in the last movement, not only varying the color of the massed strings, but sounding (as I like to think) defiance to the Nazis and confidence in ultimate victory.

Mr. Koussevitzky probably has never conducted a dull performance in his life, but there are times when his fiery temperament takes hold of a familiar piece and makes it awesomely brilliant. That happened yesterday to the Brahms' Fourth Symphony, which was one long crescendo of strength and emotional outpouring. I don't think I have ever heard the andante and the scherzo done with such heat, clear detail or such full-bodied richness of tone.

After a vigorous but not to my mind distinctive performance of the Rachmaninoff D minor Concerto, Mr. Malcuzynski was given a rousing ovation by the Friday subscribers. Technically he again showed himself the virtuoso, but interpretively his work did not show the emotional character or the electrifying brilliance that Vladimir Horowitz gets out of the Concerto.

The program next week: Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; Schumann's Piano Concerto with Dame Myra Hess as soloist: Berlioz: "Harold in Italy" (Joseph de Pasquale, viola solo).

SYMPHONY CONCERT
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

After an absence of two weeks Dr. Koussevitzky has returned to the Symphony Concerts. If his appearance showed a slight trace of his recent indisposition, his conducting was as vital as ever. In its third and final form the current program begins with Honegger's Symphony for Strings, continues with Rachmaninoff's Third Concerto, with Witold Malcuzynski as pianist, and concludes with the Fourth Symphony of Brahms. Some had imagined that after such a dose of Brahms as we had last season, in commemoration of the 50th anniversary of his death, he would be sparsely represented on this year's programs. Yet the Violin Concerto showed up last week, and now it is the Fourth Symphony; two works in four pairs of concerts. What would conductors do without him?

Honegger's String Symphony is a deeply impressive composition. We were aware of that fact when Mr. Muench introduced it to us last December. The fine qualities of the piece were appreciated even more fully when Dr. Koussevitzky began the Berkshire Festival with it last summer, and this process was continued yesterday afternoon. It is something that one can hear and hear again, with pleasure and with profit. Composed in Paris during the German occupation, the Symphony is in a sense programmatic, and the final chorale, which bespeaks the hope of liberation, is one of the most stirring things in contemporary music. It was a happy thought on the composer's part to introduce here the ad libitum trumpet part, and of this opportunity both Mr. Muench and Dr. Koussevitzky have taken advantage.

You might describe Mr. Malcuzynski as the pianist who looks like Boris Karloff, but plays, when need be, like an angel. He can also play with a fire, a sweep, a passion that sets him apart from most of the pianists of the day. He is in our time the ideal interpreter of romantic music, as he abundantly proved when he played Chopin's F minor Concerto on the occasion of his previous appearance at a pair of Symphony Concerts. It was therefore a bit of a disappointment to find him descending from the real thing to the pale imitation. Rachmaninoff knew more about the orchestra than Chopin did. He could make more noise with it and with the piano. But with each passing year his music seems more and more a shadow, a reflection: warmed-over Tchaikovsky with echoes of late German romanticism and an almost indefinable something that is Rachmaninoff, himself. This Third Concerto while inferior to the Second, is undeniably effective, though there are dull stretches between the almost magical opening and the sure-fire close. Mr. Malcuzynski rose to the occasion and the audience gave him a great big hand.

MUSIC
Symphony Concert

The second concert in the series of six Sunday concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The guest conductor Charles Muench presented the following program:

"Iberia" ("Images" for Orchestra No. 2)	Debussy
Symphony No. 3 in G Minor, Op. 42	Roussel
Suite from Incidental Music of "Pelleas et Melisande," Op. 80	Faure
Symphony in D minor	Franck

By HOWARD WATSON

The program included two compositions repeated from the regular Friday and Saturday concerts, Debussy's "Iberia" and Roussel's "Third Symphony," already commented on in these columns, and two additional works, Faure's Suite from "Pelleas et Melisande," and the Franck Symphony in D Minor.

Once again, Mr. Muench proves himself a highly interesting conductor. He is energetic, but not overly so. He is not only fascinating to watch, but, which is more important, seems to have the great gift of making his men not only work, but thoroughly enjoy themselves while working for him. There is a completely wholesome quality about the man which inspires the orchestra to great heights. He is not a sentimentalist —as proved most clearly by his interpretation of Debussy, in which he chooses to paint little sketches, delicately, yet virilely, rather than engage in fussy extraneous details.

That he possesses nevertheless a deep degree of grace and feeling were illustrated in his "Pelleas et Melisande." The prelude to the Faure music written for Maeterlinck's play, in which the composer in the "Prelude" magnificently expresses the mysterious melancholy of the drama, were interpreted with great finesse and skill. The "Fileuse" and "Sicilienne" movements were performed with rare subtlety, while he achieved the height of pathos in the movement representing the death of Melisande.

There is bound to be considerable discussion among musicians, both for and against the conductor's interpretation of the Franck Symphony which concluded the program. For there will be those who will say it is nothing short of a series of paintings of blacks and whites, and others who feel the increased tempi and the emphasis is entirely effective and a good idea. I find myself in the latter group, for to me it is no more sinful to underline the symphony, than to extend it as conductors have too often been guilty of. It seems to me that the Muench version only serves to enhance the majesty and solemnity of Franck.

The third concert of this series will take place on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 28, with Eleazar de Carvalho conducting.

or Boston —Koussevitzky with Varied Program

Malcuzynski Soloist in Rachmaninov Concerto at Symphony

By L. A. Sloper

K[illegible] received a [illegible] when he returned [illegible] to conduct the [illegible] Boston Symphony [illegible] 31, after an [illegible] weeks. His program [illegible] considerably from [illegible] announced, consisted of Honegger's Symphony for Strings, Rachmaninov's Third Piano Concerto, in D minor, and the Brahms Fourth Symphony. Witold Malcuzynski was the soloist.

Honegger's Symphony for Strings had its first Boston performance, which I unfortunately missed, a year ago under Charles Münch as guest conductor. After its first hearing in Basel in 1945, Willi Reich reported in these columns that the piece, written in October, 1941, "embodies much of the mood of occupied Paris, to which the composer remained faithful under all difficulties."

This is undoubtedly a just comment, so just that it would not be unfair to describe the work as a tone poem. For Honegger is known less for absolute than for program music—"Roi David," "Horace Victorieux," "Pacific 2-3-1," "Rugby"—and it is not difficult to see the first movement of this symphony as a picture of the despair of Parisians at the Germans' approach. with the march of the invaders to underline it; and the second as an account of the grief and suffering in the occupied country.

The third movement, a lively, dance-like section, is harder to account for as of 1941, but it could be an anticipation of liberation. In any event, if the score is not notable, looked at as absolute music, it does skillfully provoke the mood that the composer presumably intended.

Mr. Malcuzynski first won our suffrage three seasons ago as soloist in Chopin's Second Concerto, and he has retained it by means of recitals since. He is an artist of distinction, with a lovely tone, a superb technique, lyrical phrasing, exquisite taste and a profound musicianship. He made a tremendous success in this concerto, which is really not his affair at all.

The work is all compact of the less admirable aspects of late nineteenth-century romanticism, and is particularly worthy of the virtuosity of Mr. Horowitz, who has played it three times with the Boston orchestra. But it is not worth the attention of Mr. Malcuzynski, even if he can make it sound better than it has any right to sound. He should be engaged in something more serious.

Dr. Koussevizky was in fine fettle throughout the afternoon, and he brought the concert to a close with one of the most stirring performances he has ever given of the Brahms Fourth—full of youth, zest and fire, and, in spite of some details to which exception might be taken; an eloquent exposition of the music.

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

S[illegible] last evening's Symphony Co[illegible] upon the 100th anniversary of the death of Mendelssohn [illegible] Koussevitzky devoted the latter part of the program to that composer's music. An all-Mendelssohn concert had been projected [illegible] "Italian" Symphony in the first half and the "Reformation" Symphony in the second [illegible] the Scherzo from the "Midsummer Night's Dream Music" and the G minor Piano Concerto, with Lukas Foss as soloist. As things turned out the "Reformation" was dropped and the evening began with Brahms' Fourth Symphony already played at the regular concerts of last week. The other Mendelssohn numbers held their place.

The "Italian" Symphony is one of Dr. Koussevitzky's pet pieces, and he favors us now and again with the [illegible] Scherzo. The G minor Piano Concerto is another matter. The only previous Boston performances by the Symphony Orchestra were those of Max Pauer at a pair of concerts in 1913, though the piece has been played at the Pops. It is not Mendelssohn at his best, nor is it to be mentioned in the same breath with the Violin Concerto. All of which is not to say that it did not afford pleasure last evening, for it did, both by reason of its facile charm and of Mr. Foss' fluent, sensitive and brilliant performance. Of the three movements, connected without pause, the most rewarding is the Andante, in the remote key of E major. The first movement begins promisingly but has its empty spots and the finale comes close to being trite. Mr. Foss was roundly applauded for his performance and Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra received a goodly share of these plaudits. The local Mendelssohn celebration will not carry over the week-end concerts. Dr. Koussevitzky has dropped "The Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," replacing them with the Eighth Symphony of Bruckner, to be followed by the Piano Concerto of Schumann, with Myra Hess as soloist.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 4th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Witold Malcuzynski, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony for Strings........Honegger
Piano Concerto in D minor
No. 3, Op. 30........Rachmaninoff
Symphony No. 4, in E minor,
Op. 98........................Brahms

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Serge Koussevitzky has fortunately recovered from his indisposition and was on hand yesterday to conduct a brilliant concert. Unfortunately he did not have time to prepare properly the Prokofieff 5th Symphony, so that we shall probably have that magnificent work later this month; and meanwhile the Brahms 4th, which we heard only last April, did solid duty in its stead.

Mr. Koussevitzky's faith in Honegger's Symphony for strings was made evident by his opening the Berkshire Festival with it last summer and further justified by his repeating it yesterday. The work grows on the listener with every performance. Its somber and despairing mood, that of a defeated and prostrate country, is relieved only in the end with the trumpets sounding a chorale of defiance and hope.

It was rather a pity that latecomers had to be admitted after the first movement, for the adagio really grows out of it. We need to have our listening faculties intent upon the piece from beginning to end. (On the other hand it would be too much to keep the tardy waiting through the whole symphony.) This music of Honegger's is not easy to listen to, in spite of the clarity of the musical thought and the expertness of the writing for strings; but it well repays a little effort.

Rachmaninoff's Third is not my favorite piano concerto by a long shot, and I have seldom been more bored by it than yesterday. Mr Malcuzynski is an excellent pianist and he certainly worked hard to achieve the utmost. His technical dexterity is remarkable and he is capable of highly sensitive phrasing. But for some reason, which I find hard to put a finger on, the Concerto did not come to life except fitfully. The final grand climax, of course, is sure-fire, so that Mr. Malcuzynski reaped his fair share of applause. But the effort on both orchestra's and soloist's part was too obvious.

I have often wondered whether, had Brahms known the telephone as we do, he would have scored the triangle so heavily in the scherzo of the 4th Symphony. And I wish that some intelligent musician, blasphemous though it might be called, would rescore the movement. The finale, as we all know, is one of the grandest things in all symphonic literature. Brahms was never better that when he was writing variations, and this passacaglia found him at his most inspired. The performance was a very fine one.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Myra Hess will be the soloist with the orchestra in Schumann's Piano Concerto. Mendelssohn's Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" complete the program.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
[illegible] 1 - 1947

HAYDN SURPRISE SYMPHONY—Boston Symphony Orchestra: Serge Koussevitsky (Victor DM-1155)

An evergreen in symphony orchestra repertoire, Haydn's lyrical Symphony No. 94 in G Major, better known as the Surprise symphony, is played with its freshness and warmth by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, taking its direction from Serge Koussevitsky's sensitive stick waving. A seasoned work without which no record library of classical music can be complete; this set of three 12-inch records should find a wide mark among those late in getting their music shelf started. Cover is striking title page, with notes on the Haydn music filling the inside page.

AMERICAN MERCURY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV - 1947

11

THE RECORD CABINET

by HOWARD L. GOODKIND

THE past few months have added many new albums to the already phenomenal collection that is available to the record-buying public. Some have been excellent, more of them good, and a few frankly disappointing. Handel's Messiah,[1] Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony,[2] Ezio Pinza's Mozart Arias,[3] the Bach Arias[4] sung by Marian Anderson, Handel's Great Elopement[5] and Ravel's recently issued Daphnis and Chloe Suite[6] come to mind as the better releases. Among those that could have been improved were Serkin's Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1,[7] the Helen Traubel Italian Arias[8] and the little-performed Second Symphony[9] of Tschaikovsky.

Out of the entire crop of releases, however, three sets are outstanding: one because of its great scope and contribution to the world of music; another because of the new process employed to record it; and the third, because of the superb quality of the performance.

The first set is the complete collection of Handel's Concerti Grossi[10] in three albums, performed by the Adolf Busch Chamber Players. The Columbia people have displayed unusual courage and public spirit in manufacturing a set of this type which, despite its excellence and worth, will probably never make money in the record-stores. Its price is a considerable outlay for the average collector.

The Concerti Grossi were composed and put down on paper — rough drafts, final copies, etc. — in the incredibly short period of one month. There are twelve of them, and each is so different from the next that the entire set may be played at one sitting without causing the listener to feel that he is revisiting familiar ground.

The concerto grosso is a form of music which preceded and offered a model for the concerto as we know it today. Instead of pitting a solo instrument against the entire orchestra as does our modern concerto, the concerto grosso contrasts one group of instruments against another. Handel's interpretations of this musical form were never twice alike — some with four movements, some with five, some with six. All vary in character with the master's mood. Some are joyous and bright — others gloomy and pensive. All, however, are carefully thought out and stocked with interesting harmonies and themes, set off by imaginative rhythmic devices.

Mr. Busch handles the entire set with an admirable technique and skillful manipulation of tone and color patterns.

*

From a purely mechanical point of view, far and away the outstanding recording of the year thus far is the breathtaking performance of Beethoven's Eroica Symphony[11] by the London Philharmonic Orchestra under the direction of Victor de Sabata. This album was issued by Decca as part of its "ffrr" (full frequency range recording) series, which is recorded and manufactured in England. I use the adjective "breathtaking" without experiencing any compunction. This set has the finest tone rendition of any recording I have ever heard including the plastics that have been released on this side of the ocean. Whatever the new process may be that Decca uses to record its music, it has made possible a strikingly new and worthwhile treatment of both the standard classics and less familiar modern music.

This new Eroica puts the Bruno Walter, Toscanini and Weingartner recordings out of the picture. From the first, powerful chords that open the symphony to the crashing coda of the last movement, this performance is an endless succession of magnificent effects. French horns sound richer than they do in concert halls. Violins are as thin and fine as spun-glass and the percussion section takes on brilliance and power that must be heard to be believed. Conductor de Sabata here proves himself to be among the world's finest interpreters of Beethoven.

Owners of record-changers that operate on the "knife" principle will find that the discs are one-half inch smaller than our twelve inch records and that they slip through two or more at a time. According to the classical music department at Decca, however, steps have been taken to mold all future sets in the standard American size.

*

The Victor recordings of Bach's Second and Third Suites in B Minor and D Major,[12] and the Second and Fifth Brandenburg Concertos,[13] all performed at Tanglewood, Massachusetts, by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston orchestra comprise another superb performance. In each of these albums, Bach's delicate and complicated improvisations are played meticulously, leaving little to be desired. It is always a pleasure to hear these pieces played, as they were scored, by small orchestras using authentic eighteenth-century instruments. The Boston group uses only half or less of its members in these recordings as contrasted to the Mengelberg recordings (also Victor) which employ the full modern orchestra with less pleasing results.

Especially noteworthy is the third movement of the Second Brandenburg Concerto with its spirited, staccato trumpet solo. Roger Voisin uses a tiny trumpet only ten inches long to perform the passage. The midget, valveless instrument is called a clarino and even experienced trumpeters shy away from it in fear of the flawless technique that it requires.

The masterly piano-playing of Lukas Foss in the Fifth Concerto also helps to make this album a memorable item for collectors. His performance is remarkable for its control and evenness; parts of his fluid cadenza are machine-like in their preciseness, yet free from the heavy-handed coloring that too many pianists allow to taint their Bach. Both albums are superior with respect to surface and instrument-balance. There are no disturbing mechanical defects. Although a choice between the excellent Busch recordings of the Brandenburg Concertos (Columbia) and the Koussevitsky album is difficult, prospective buyers would do well to choose the latter, which has better over-all performance quality.

---

[1] Columbia MM666, 19 records, $24.60.
[2] Columbia MM688, 4 records, $5.85.
[3] Columbia MM643, 4 records, $5.85.
[4] Victor DM108, 3 records, $3.85.
[5] Victor DM1093, 3 records, $3.85.
[6] Decca EDA29, 3 records, $7.00.
[7] Columbia MM652, 6 records, $9.35.
[8] Columbia MM675, 3 records, $4.60.
[9] Columbia MM673, 5 records, $7.10.
[10] Columbia MM685, 25 records, $34.30.
[11] Decca EDA

SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1947 Art—Music—Theater *11

or Boston —Koussevitzky with Varied Program

Malcuzynski Soloist in Rachmaninov Concerto at Symphony

By L. A. Sloper

Dr. Koussevitzky received a warm welcome when he returned to Symphony Hall to conduct the Friday afternoon Boston Symphony concert of Oct. 31, after an absence of two weeks. His program, changed considerably from that first announced, consisted of Honegger's Symphony for Strings, Rachmaninov's Third Piano Concerto, in D minor, and the Brahms Fourth Symphony. Witold Malcuzynski was the soloist.

Honegger's Symphony for Strings had its first Boston performance, which I unfortunately missed, a year ago under Charles Münch as guest conductor. After its first hearing in Basel in 1945, Willi Reich reported in these columns that the piece, written in October, 1941, "embodies much of the mood of occupied Paris, to which the composer remained faithful under all difficulties."

This is undoubtedly a just comment, so just that it would not be unfair to describe the work as a tone poem. For Honegger is known less for absolute than for program music—"Roi David," "Horace Victorieux," "Pacific 2-3-1," "Rugby"—and it is not difficult to see the first movement of this symphony as a picture of the despair of Parisians at the Germans' approach, with the march of the invaders to underline it; and the second as an account of the grief and suffering in the occupied country.

The third movement, a lively, dance-like section, is harder to account for as of 1941, but it could be an anticipation of liberation. In any event, if the score is not notable, looked at as absolute music, it does skillfully provoke the mood that the composer presumably intended.

Mr. Malcuzynski first won our suffrage three seasons ago as soloist in Chopin's Second Concerto, and he has retained it by means of recitals since. He is an artist of distinction, with a lovely tone, a superb technique, lyrical phrasing, exquisite taste and a profound musicianship. He made a tremendous success in this concerto, which is really not his affair at all.

The work is all compact of the less admirable aspects of late nineteenth-century romanticism, and is particularly worthy of the virtuosity of Mr. Horowitz, who has played it three times with the Boston orchestra. But it is not worth the attention of Mr. Malcuzynski, even if he can make it sound better than it has any right to sound. He should be engaged in something more serious.

Dr. Koussevizky was in fine fettle throughout the afternoon, and he brought the concert to a close with one of the most stirring performances he has ever given of the Brahms Fourth—full of youth, zest and fire, and, in spite of some details to which exception might be taken, an eloquent exposition of the music.

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Since last evening's Symphony Concert fell upon the 100th anniversary of the death of Mendelssohn, Dr. Koussevitzky devoted the latter part of the program to that composer's music. An all-Mendelssohn concert had been projected with the "Italian" Symphony in the first half and the "Reformation" Symphony in the second, plus the Scherzo from the "Midsummer Night's Dream Music" and the G minor Piano Concerto, with Lukas Foss as soloist. As things turned out, the "Reformation" was dropped and the evening began with Brahms' Fourth Symphony, already played at the regular concerts of last week. The other Mendelssohn numbers held their place.

The "Italian" Symphony is one of Dr. Koussevitzky's pet pieces, and he favors us now and again with the light and airy Scherzo. The G minor Piano Concerto is another matter. The only previous Boston performances by the Symphony Orchestra were those of Max Pauer at a pair of concerts in 1913, though the piece has been played at the Pops. It is not Mendelssohn at his best, nor is it to be mentioned in the same breath with the Violin Concerto. All of which is not to say that it did not afford pleasure last evening, for it did, both by reason of its facile charm and of Mr. Foss' fluent, sensitive and brilliant performance. Of the three movements, connected without pause, the most rewarding is the Andante, in the remote key of E major. The first movement begins promisingly but has its empty spots and the finale comes close to being trite. Mr. Foss was roundly applauded for his performance, and Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra deserved a goodly share of these plaudits. The local Mendelssohn celebration will not carry over the week-end concerts. Dr. Koussevitzky has dropped "The Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," replacing them with the Eighth Symphony of Bruckner, to be followed by the Piano Concerto of Schumann, with Myra Hess as soloist.

E BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 1,

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 4th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Witold Malcuzynski, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony for Strings........Honegger
Piano Concerto in D minor No. 3, Op. 30........Rachmaninoff
Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98........................Brahms

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Serge Koussevitzky has fortunately recovered from his indisposition and was on hand yesterday to conduct a brilliant concert. Unfortunately he did not have time to prepare properly the Prokofieff 5th Symphony, so that we shall probably have that magnificent work later this month; and meanwhile the Brahms 4th, which we heard only last April, did solid duty in its stead.

Mr. Koussevitzky's faith in Honegger's Symphony for strings was made evident by his opening the Berkshire Festival with it last summer and further justified by his repeating it yesterday. The work grows on the listener with every performance. Its somber and despairing mood, that of a defeated and prostrate country, is relieved only in the end with the trumpets sounding a chorale of defiance and hope.

It was rather a pity that latecomers had to be admitted after the first movement, for the adagio really grows out of it. We need to have our listening faculties intent upon the piece from beginning to end. (On the other hand it would be too much to keep the tardy waiting through the whole symphony.) This music of Honegger's is not easy to listen to, in spite of the clarity of the musical thought and the expertness of the writing for strings; but it well repays a little effort.

Rachmaninoff's Third is not my favorite piano concerto by a long shot, and I have seldom been more bored by it than yesterday. Mr Malcuzynski is an excellent pianist and he certainly worked hard to achieve the utmost. His technical dexterity is remarkable and he is capable of highly sensitive phrasing. But for some reason, which I find hard to put a finger on, the Concerto did not come to life except fitfully. The final grand climax, of course, is sure-fire, so that Mr. Malcuzynski reaped his fair share of applause. But the effort on both orchestra's and soloist's part was too obvious.

I have often wondered whether, had Brahms known the telephone as we do, he would have scored the triangle so heavily in the scherzo of the 4th Symphony. And I wish that some intelligent musician, blasphemous though it might be called, would rescore the movement. The finale, as we all know, is one of the grandest things in all symphonic literature. Brahms was never better that when he was writing variations, and this passacaglia found him at his most inspired. The performance was a very fine one.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Myra Hess will be the soloist with the orchestra in Schumann's Piano Concerto. Mendelssohn's Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" complete the program.

AMERICAN MERCURY
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV - 1947

THE RECORD CABINET

by HOWARD L. GOODKIND

THE past few months have added many new albums to the already phenomenal collection that is available to the record-buying public. Some have been excellent, more of them good, and a few frankly disappointing. Handel's Messiah,[1] Shostakovich's Ninth Symphony,[2] Ezio Pinza's Mozart Arias,[3] the Bach Arias[4] sung by Marian Anderson, Handel's Great Elopement[5] and Ravel's recently issued Daphnis and Chloe Suite[6] come to mind as the better releases. Among those that could have been improved were Serkin's Brahms' Piano Concerto No. 1,[7] the Helen Traubel Italian Arias[8] and the little-performed Second Symphony[9] of Tschaikovsky.

Out of the entire crop of releases, however, three sets are outstanding: one because of its great scope and contribution to the world of music; another because of the new process employed to record it; and the third, because of the superb quality of the performance.

The first set is the complete collection of Handel's Concerti Grossi[10] in three albums, performed by the Adolf Busch Chamber Players. The Columbia people have displayed unusual courage and public spirit in manufacturing a set of this type which, despite its excellence and worth, will probably never make money in the record-stores. Its price is a considerable outlay for the average collector.

The Concerti Grossi were composed and put down on paper — rough drafts, final copies, etc. — in the incredibly short period of one month. There are twelve of them, and each is so different from the next that the entire set may be played at one sitting without causing the listener to feel that he is revisiting familiar ground.

The concerto grosso is a form of music which preceded and offered a model for the concerto as we know it today. Instead of pitting a solo instrument against the entire orchestra as does our modern concerto, the concerto grosso contrasts one group of instruments against another. Handel's interpretations of this musical form were never twice alike — some with four movements, some with five, some with six. All vary in character with the master's mood. Some are joyous and bright — others gloomy and pensive. All, however, are carefully thought out and stocked with interesting harmonies and themes, set off by imaginative rhythmic devices.

Mr. Busch handles the entire set with an admirable technique and skillful manipulation of tone and color patterns.

*

From a purely mechanical point of view, far and away the outstanding recording of the year thus far is the breathtaking performance of Beethoven's Eroica Symphony[11] by the London Philharmonic Orchestra under the direction of Victor de Sabata. This album was issued by Decca as part of its "ffrr" (full frequency range recording) series, which is recorded and manufactured in England. I use the adjective "breathtaking" without experiencing any compunction. This set has the finest tone rendition of any recording I have ever heard including the plastics that have been released on this side of the ocean. Whatever the new process may be that Decca uses to record its music, it has made possible a strikingly new and worthwhile treatment of both the standard classics and less familiar modern music.

This new Eroica puts the Bruno Walter, Toscanini and Weingartner recordings out of the picture. From the first, powerful chords that open the symphony to the crashing coda of the last movement, this performance is an endless succession of magnificent effects. French horns sound richer than they do in concert halls. Violins are as thin and fine as spun-glass and the percussion section takes on brilliance and power that must be heard to be believed. Conductor de Sabata here proves himself to be among the world's finest interpreters of Beethoven.

Owners of record-changers that operate on the "knife" principle will find that the discs are one-half inch smaller than our twelve inch records and that they slip through two or more at a time. According to the classical music department at Decca, however, steps have been taken to mold all future sets in the standard American size.

*

The Victor recordings of Bach's Second and Third Suites in B Minor and D Major,[12] and the Second and Fifth Brandenburg Concertos,[13] all performed at Tanglewood, Massachusetts, by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston orchestra comprise another superb performance. In each of these albums, Bach's delicate and complicated improvisations are played meticulously, leaving little to be desired. It is always a pleasure to hear these pieces played, as they were scored, by small orchestras using authentic eighteenth-century instruments. The Boston group uses only half or less of its members in these recordings as contrasted to the Mengelberg recordings (also Victor) which employ the full modern orchestra with less pleasing results.

Especially noteworthy is the third movement of the Second Brandenburg Concerto with its spirited, staccato trumpet solo. Roger Voisin uses a tiny trumpet only ten inches long to perform the passage. The midget, valveless instrument is called a clarino and even experienced trumpeters shy away from it in fear of the flawless technique that it requires.

The masterly piano-playing of Lukas Foss in the Fifth Concerto also helps to make this album a memorable item for collectors. His performance is remarkable for its control and evenness; parts of his fluid cadenza are machine-like in their preciseness, yet free from the heavy-handed coloring that too many pianists allow to taint their Bach. Both albums are superior with respect to surface and instrument-balance. There are no disturbing mechanical defects. Although a choice between the excellent Busch recordings of the Brandenburg Concertos (Columbia) and the Koussevitsky album is difficult, prospective buyers would do well to choose the latter, which has better over-all performance quality.

---

[1] Columbia MM666, 19 records, $24.60.
[2] Columbia MM688, 4 records, $5.85.
[3] Columbia MM643, 4 records, $5.85.
[4] Victor DM108, 3 records, $3.85.
[5] Victor DM1093, 3 records, $3.85.
[6] Decca EDA29, 3 records, $7.00.
[7] Columbia MM652, 6 records, $9.35.
[8] Columbia MM675, 3 records, $4.60.
[9] Columbia MM673, 5 records, $7.10.
[10] Columbia MM685, 25 records, $34.30.

BILLBOARD
CINCINNATI, OHIO
NOV 1 - 1947

AYDN SURPRISE SYMPHONY—Boston Symphony Orchestra: Serge Koussevitsky (Victor DM-1155)

An evergreen in symphony orchestra repertoire, Haydn's lyrical Symphony No. 94 in G Major, better known as the Surprise symphony, is played with tenderness and warmth by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, taking its direction from Serge Koussevitsky's sensitive stick waving. A seasoned work without which no record library of classical music can be complete, this set of three 12-inch records should find a wide mark among those late in getting their music shelf started. Cover is striking title page, with notes on the Haydn music filling the inside page.

MUSIC

Nov 5

Tuesday Symphony

The second concert of the Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The soloist was Lukas Foss, pianist. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 4 in E minor Op. 98 .... Brahms
Piano Concerto in G minor..Mendelssohn
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .... Mendelssohn
Symphony in A major, "Italian," Op. 90 .... Mendelssohn

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The centennial—to the exact day—of the death of Mendelssohn was observed last night by the Boston Symphony in the last and broadcast half of the program. The first part was occupied by the 4th Symphony of Brahms, of which Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra give a magnificent interpretation; but since it was heard last Friday and Saturday and also at the end of last season no further comment need be made just now.

Mr. Lukas Foss gave a truly brilliant and spirited performance of Mendelssohn's First Piano Concerto, a work full of charm and the spirit of youth. Oddly enough it has been neglected by the Boston Symphony. Its vivacity and effectiveness cannot be gainsaid, especially in the first two movements. Moreover the recklessly indulgent prettiness of the andante is not too much of a muchness when played with the taste and suavity of phrasing which it had last night. Mr. Foss won a well deserved ovation for his impeccably fluent work. As a matter of fact I infinitely preferred this composition to the more pretentious Concerto of Rachmaninoff which we endured last Friday.

Mr. Koussevitzky then went on to play the ever-delightful Scherzo from the incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," in which M. Laurent was signalled out for his fine flute playing, and the familiar and amiable Italian Symphony. Mendelssohn's centennial might actually rate a complete program of his music, but at least last night nobody could complain that we listened to inferior examples of his art.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
NOV 5 - 1947

To pilgrims to Tanglewood, to students of music, and to music lovers in general, "Koussevitzky" by Moses Smith gives insight into the life and mind of the dominant figure in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Tracing his life from childhood to 1947 Mr. Smith disclose Koussevitzky's ambitions and achievements, including his dream of founding a school for musicians. Notwithstanding Dr. Koussevitzky's objection to this biography, it seems to the general reader to be an authentic and sympathetic study of a most remarkable musician. There are a ver full index and several appendices, including a list of world premieres b the Boston Symphony, composition by American composers presented b the orchestra, and a list of Koussevitzky's recordings (through June 1946).

(Library No. 780 K96S)

JACKSON, TENN
SUN
11/11/47

~~BOSTON SYM~~PHONY

Joseph de Pasquale, 22-year-old American violinist, will make his first radio appearance as solo violinist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast tonight at 8:30 over WTJS-ABC. The concert will be heard from Woolsey Hall on the campus of Yale University.

De Pasquale, born in Germantown, Pa., and believed to be the youngest solo violinist of any major American orchestra, personally was selected for his post during the summer by Serge Koussevitzky, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During the war he served with the Marine band and orchestra, making several appearances at the White House.

Following his discharge, he joined the viola section of the American Broadcasting Symphony Orchestra. A graduate of Curtis Institute, he studied there with William Primrose, Louis Bailly and other noted violinists and teachers.

During the current tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, de Pasquale will make several solo appearances. On tonight's broadcast, he will be heard in Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," a four-movement symphony for solo violinist and orchestra. The program will open with Ravel's "Pavane for a Dead Infanta."

URDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1947

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 5th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dame Myra Hess, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 8 in C minor....Bruckner
Piano Concerto in A minor Op. 54—Schumann

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Dame Myra Hess was yesterday's heroine in Symphony Hall, and she was warmly applauded when she came out on the platform and given an ovation when she finished the Schumann Concerto. This was, moreover, no more than her due, for she read this lovely romantic music with an intensity of poetic feeling that was remarkable. We have long known that she has a way with this Concerto. It is not only that she has completely mastered its technical difficulties, which are considerable on the rhythmic side in the finale, but it is also that she seems able, as almost no one else, to reveal to us its inmost meaning.

I had thought that the combination of Dame Myra Hess and the Schumann Concerto would for once put a stop to that irritating creature, the early leaver. But I reckoned without the toughness of the Friday afternoon audience, for there were several who got up in the middle of the finale and headed for the doors. As a sociological note this was the more mysterious in that the concert was not a long one. It is beyond me to conceive how anyone could leave in the middle of yesterday's performance.

Bruckner's 8th Symphony was played last season, and I have not got much to add to what has already been said about it. The important movement is the long adagio, which, I believe, Koussevitzky streamlines to some eight minutes less than its actual length by an ingenious cut. At any rate what remains is quite enough Bruckner for me. In fact, the finale after the adagio always strikes me as an overpowering anticlimax.

The Symphony is a field day for a conductor like Koussevitzky, who has the most delicate ear for sonorities and can, with the Boston Symphony at his command, make the most of the thunderous, brazen fortissimi and the sudden shift to the lightest pianissimi. The many summits of nobility in the music have to be compensation for the evcessive repetitiousness. It is possible, too, to get a surfeit of sonority in the Bruckner 8th, so that there are times when we long for the astringency and the orchestral transparency of a Ravel.

Next week the orchestra will be on tour. For the concerts of Nov. 21 and 22 Charles Muench will be guest conductor. His all-French program offers Rameau's Suite from "Dardanus," Honegger's Symphonie Liturgique, Debussy's "Iberia" and Roussel's Symphony No. 3.

BERKELEY, CALIF.
GAZETTE

News Tonight: Joseph De Pa quale, 22-year-old violist, makes h first radio appearance over KGO 6:30 tonight as soloist with the Bo ton Symphony Orchestra in Be loiz' "Harold in Italy."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 9 - 1947

MUSIC ON THE RADIO

By B. H. HAGGIN

ONE reader complained after the first autumn broadcast of the Boston Symphony that "the crescendi are still being lopped off"; another wrote that this broadcast was quite good but that in the second there was a sudden loss of volume and high frequencies at one point, with a return to normal after about fifteen minutes, which caused him to think "they have experimenters not engineers [for the] Boston Symphony broadcasts." I did not hear these two broadcasts, but heard part of the third, and noted the leveling off of the first big crescendo and climax in Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony, but thereafter was aware rather of the lack of liveness and brilliance, caused either by the cutting down of the frequency range in the line transmission or by a limitation of range (which I doubt) in the machine to which I happened to be listening. However, one improvement over the Tanglewood broadcast was unmistakable and welcome: no disintegration of drumbeats and other forceful sounds.

The loss of brilliance in the Mendelssohn symphony spoiled what has always been one of Koussevitzky's finest performances—dazzling in its impetus, buoyancy and radiance, and fabulous in its orchestral sonority and execution. On the other hand, the Scherzo from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music was a succession of pretty sounds that became almost laughable in its insipidity after Toscanini's excitingly inflected performance on his second N. B. C. Symphony broadcast (of which I will say more later—though I will say right now that N. B. C. omitted its hourly time-signal, which A. B. C. and C. B. S. also should do in such broadcasts).

A reader who agreed with my criticism of the "fancy introductory remarks" on A. B. C.'s Coffee Concerts thought, however, that A. B. C. "deserves much credit for being the only major station (WQXR excluded) which carries a program of live chamber music and also presents it in such excellent performances, as, for instance, the one of the C minor Beethoven Violin Sonata." A. B. C. does indeed deserve credit for putting on that program of chamber music, and additional credit for the opportunity it gives the outstandingly talented young musicians in its orchestra, which makes me reluctant to criticize it for giving only a half-hour at 8:30 Sunday morning, for occasionally filling this half-hour with little bits of things or cutting off a large work before the end, and for occasionally having such a work—Beethoven's Trio Opus 97, for example—played by young musicians who are not equal to it.

Another reader's complaint about Dr. Karl Krueger's "inanities" and "attempts at musicological profundities" on the Sunday Evening Hour led me to listen to the program last Sunday. Since this was the occasion when the winners of the prize competition were to be announced, Dr. Krueger's remarks on the music were few; but he did, nevertheless, achieve a description of Glazunov's Violin Concerto as the work of that brilliant Russian eclectic in which were combined the Tolstoyan idea of atonement and the pleasures of the drawing room (I'm not sure I have every word exactly right), and another of the music of the Viennese academic Franz Schmidt as bringing the epoch of the classic Viennese symphony to a close. But Dr. Krueger contributed only a small part of the pretentiousness that surpasses anything that is to be heard on the air. The program offers the utmost in lack of distinction but to listen to the announcer, to Dr. Krueger, to Dr. Alfred Human, one would suppose the Sunday Evening Hour to be something without precedent, spectacular in its daring, watched breathlessly by the whole world, something that could have been thought up only by the brain of the man who is constantly referred to in hushed and fulsome adoration: Henry—A.—Reichold.

On the other hand, there is what WQXR has thought up: Jacques Fray as radio's first classical disc jockey, saying "Bon soir," offering "music and chit-chat—not for the highbrow—a leetle music for the heart—a leetle for the head—a leetle for the foot," and then doing a Jean Sablon act around the first movement of Mozart's D minor Quartet, what he calls Wagner's "Liebestahd," and Ravel's "La Valse."

The arrangements which the two-piano team of Hambro and Zayde have been playing on WQXR haven't interested me; but when the program last Tuesday was to be a couple of works by Haydn, period, I listened—only to have them turn out to be two-piano arrangements of an Adagio and a Sonata for one keyboard instrument, which I think should be played on one keyboard instrument.

Outstanding among the week's events are WNYC's broadcasts of the three concerts of Ernest Bloch's music at the Juilliard School on Friday at 8:30 p. m. and Saturday at 5 and 8:30 p. m. The Viola Suite and the Quintet for piano and strings will be performed, but not the Violin Sonata, and not "Voice in the Wilderness" for cello and orchestra, which impressed me as one of Bloch's finest works when Rodzinski played it with the Philharmonic and Schuster in 1936 and when I heard it again in 1939 played by the Boston Symphony cellist Tourtelier with Bloch at the piano, and which the Juilliard School might have given us now in place of the always-played "Schelomo."

Also, Toscanini's performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" with the N. B. C. Symphony next Saturday will provide an opportunity to hear what Tchaikovsky sounds like when played by a musician of taste. And here are some additional programs of the week:

Today—P. M.: Stravinsky's Dumbarton Oaks Concerto, WNYC, noon; Mahler's Symphony No. 2, WBAM (FM), 4; Haydn's Quartet, Op. 76, No. 2, Mozart's "Hunt" Quartet, played by the WQXR String Quartet, WQXR, 6; Schubert's Octet, WQXR, 7; Mozart's Serenade K. 388 and Masonic Funeral Music K. 477, WABF (FM), 9:30; Mozart's Piano Concerto K. 456, Rawsthorne's Symphonic Studies, WQXR, 11; Prokofieff's Piano Concerto No. 5, played by Samson Francois, with the C. B. S. Symphony under Leonard Bernstein, C. B. S., 11:30.

Monday—P. M.: Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 10, WNYC, 7; Haydn's Symphony No. 53, WQXR, 8.

Tuesday—P. M.: Stravinsky's Suite Italienne, a Charles Ives violin sonata, WNYC, 8.

Wednesday—P. M.: Rehearsal of the National Orchestral Association, WNYC, 6.

Thursday—P. M.: Mozart's Symphony in C ("Jupiter"), Debussy's Rhapsody for clarinet annd orchestra, WQXR, 8.

Friday—P. M.: Excerpts from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" (new Toscanini recording), WQXR, 10:30.

Saturday—P. M.: Britten's String Quartet, Op. 36, No. 2, WQXR, 3:30; Haydn's Quartet, Op. 74, No. 2 Schubert's Trio, Op. 99, WQXR, 11.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 13

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROVES BRILLIANT AT WOOLSEY HALL

That superb "musical instrument," the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, making its first appearance of the season last evening at Woolsey Hall, projected upon the ears of a truly appreciative audience the tonal perfections for which it is justly famous. While the playing o fthe orchestra was noteworthy, which is to be expected, the program was even more so, eschewing for the most part the usual "war horses" in favor of works with more or less modern flavor.

The Boston Orchestra gave the first American performance of Honegger's "Symphony for String Orchestra" about a year ago. By what one may suspect was more than coincidence, it was also the initial work on last night's program.

Some critics are in favor of relegating this composition to the fate of "Pacific 231," another controversial Honegger work, which has disappeared from symphonic repertories, but this reviewer believes that its obvious musical qualities, however dissonant in harmonic structure, deserve a much happier destiny.

The playing of this work last evening exemplified a facet of Koussevitzky's musical interpretations for which he is noted; his uncanny ability to attain a perfection in balancing string sonorities. The viola figures in the first movement as well as the viola ostinato of the second movement were never obscured and the third section was a marvel of precision in execution.

Regardless of its musical substance, which it would be at once presumptuous and patently unfair to evaluate at a first hearing, the work will unquestionably be retained in the symphonic repertoire for some time, if only as a showpiece,. It is definitely in the virtuoso category and the rendition of last evening encompassed superbly its tecnical as well as its dynamic requirements.

The performance of "Daphnis and Chloe," orchestral excerpts, (second suite), which followed, was the highlight of the first half of the program, and in many respects, of the entire concert. The playing of the last movement of Ravel's masterpiece represented the artistry of the orchestra at its zenith, glorifying all of the subtlties in nuance inherent in the composer's marvelous orchestration, with its alternating delicate pianissimos and overpowering fortissimos.

The eminent conductor's tendency to overblow the brasses was most obvious here, though it was likewise apparent in the short and incongruous part for trumpet which intruded in the last movement of the Honegger work.

The second half the program included the Prokofieff "Classical" Symphony and the Symphony No. 4, by Brahms, the most mature and dramatic of the latter composer's symphonic compositions. The observance of all the musical amenities characterized the renditions here, particularly in the Prokofieff work.

While the writer did not time the performance of the Brahm's symphony, he is reasonably safe in saying that Dr. Koussevitzky's flair for the dramatic resulted in a hurrying of tempps throughout though this in no wise detracted from a superlative rendition.

G. E. A.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

NOV 13 1947

Music

Boston Symphony Plays Cut Bruckner Eighth

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

Whether it is legitimate to perform cut versions of composers' symphonies was a problem posed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert last night in Carnegie Hall. Serge Koussevitzky chose to play Anton Bruckner's Eighth Symphony in a considerably cut edition, a procedure that upset Bruckner devotees not a little.

In perusing the published journals of the Bruckner Society of America, Inc., I discovered that Mr. Koussevitzky performed the same symphony in 1939, also in a sliced version, commented upon at that time by various members of the press. Bruno Walter, on the other hand, in 1940 played it with the Philharmonic-Symphony unabridged, with impressive results.

While the technical perfection of the Boston ensemble gave frequent potency to the music, the composition's structure was lopsided. If chunks are cut from something as integrated as a symphony, obviously an unbalance results.

Mr. Koussevitzky's argument may be that unless a deletion is made in symphonies which take over an hour to perform in entirety, they will be left on the shelf too long. It's a dangerous policy nonetheless. Better to get the composer unadulterated, even if less frequently. His work will be intact when we do hear him.

After the intermission, the ensemble played Ravel's "Mother Goose Suite," offered undoubtedly as an antidote to Bruckner's seriousness. The orchestration is colorful and amusing and altogether it added up to pleasant listening. "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet Suite No. 2 closed the program.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

NOV 13 1947

Music

Koussevitzky and Bostonians Back

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

With marked daring, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony opened their first seasonal visit to New York with a performance of Anton Bruckner's Eighth Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night.

Years ago, the mere mention of Bruckner would have brought on a stampede toward the nearest exit. Today the Austrian composer, who has been called half-peasant and half-mystic, is rated by many sound critics as the "Fourth B" of music. Hardly anybody now slips out of the hall between movements.

Mr. Koussevitzky billed the Bruckner Eighth last night with two pieces by Ravel—the cleverly nostalgic "Mother Goose" Suite and the second "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite. Both these glistening spans are naturals for the Boston unit. They accent the orchestra's hallmark of bright, luscious tone.

High-Powered Brilliance.

But the center of gravity—both in weight and quality—was the huge Bruckner symphony last night. Even the half-hearted Brucknerites in the audience had to admit every phrase of the hour-long epic was crammed with high-powered brilliance.

On that point the symphony is almost tailormade for Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra. Fortissimos come like cloudbursts and the long stretches of scoring for massed strings bring out the band's known flair for unctuous speech. And there are plenty of spots for Mr. Koussevitzky's brass units to go to town on all valves.

There may be room for argument as to whether last night's performance shared every potentiality of the score on the poetic side. A few places called for deeper probing, and one or two passages, deceptively naive and childish, were overstressed, almost inviting the charge of banality often brought against Bruckner.

Worth Waiting For .

Those were small matters beside the over-all effect of the reading. With his known gift for the dramatic, Mr. Koussevitzky managed to pack excitement into all four movements.

The big moments were worth waiting for in the Eighth Symphony—moments like the blunt, square-toed buffoonery of the Scherzo, the eerie crescendo of the Adagio just before the brasses blare out a lush Wagnerian motif, and the piling sonorities of the finale.

Mr. Koussevitzky was in his glory last night, and so was the Boston Symphony. With one or two reservations in point of interpretation, Anton Bruckner was in the same company.

Anyway, you could have recognized the Boston unit last night with your eyes closed. It hasn't changed since last season.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 13 1947

Koussevitzky Conducts Bruckner's Eighth

Perhaps in recompense for programming Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2, a piece that has been subjected to excessive work this season, Serge Koussevitzky presented Bruckner's Eighth Symphony on the occasion of the Boston Symphony's first visit of the season to Carnegie Hall. This symphony is rarely played; its orchestration is tremendous, its length forbidding. Koussevitzky retainted the orchestration, while caring for the length by making a few cuts which brought it down to less than an hour's playing time.

To the Bruckner devotees this probably was desecration; to this listener it made the music seem only less overlong. The symphony follows the normal Bruckner course, opening with a string tremolo over which portentous thematic fragments are tossed. On the basis of those fragments, and on a recollection of Bruckner's previous symphonic modus operandi, one was enabled to visualize what was to come, somewhat as a scientist with a fosilized bone makes an accurate reconstruction of an extinct animal. Like all Bruckner symphonies, it has the overpowering sincerity—and volubility—of an evangelist who believes the importance of his words. More than any other composer Bruckner poured out his soul without inhibition, though the outpouring, despite the impressive declamation, resolves into only a few trembling drops.

Koussevitzky labored mightily here, but his most grateful results occurred in Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye," which was given an artful, refined performance with some delicate shading in the "Beauty and the Beast" section which will not soon be forgotten.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

NOV 13 1947

New York Cheers Boston Symphony

NEW YORK, Nov. 12 (AP)—The Boston Symphony, most revered of the major orchestras which come to Carnegie Hall to show off their wares, paid the first visit of its 67th season to this city tonight.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra, offering a program which looked unusual and sounded grand, received an enthusiastic welcome from the capacity audience, and cries of bravo greeted the performance of the first and principal work, Bruckner's Symphony No. 8.

Only other composer represented was Ravel whose "Mother Goose" pieces for children are on the whole fine for grownups, too, though this time they sounded rather slight, overweighed perhaps by the Bruckner. The program closed with the familiar second suite from the "Daphnis Et Chloc" ballet music, which New Yorkers will start to hum if they hear it many more times.

The somber and rugged Bruckner was cut a little more for this occasion than it had been for Bostonians. It takes a stout audience to sit through the complete symphony, and one of the customers complained because it was "too long-winded," but Bruckner lovers always want the whole works.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

NOV 13 1947

Koussevitzky At Carnegie

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra checked in at Carnegie Hall last night. For their first concert they offered as formidable a work as Bruckner's Eighth Symphony, Ravel's "Ma Mere L'Oyle" and the "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2. The orchesta appeared in top form.

Bruckner's brooding symphony sounds a bit old-fashioned, perhaps because it was never altogether new. As a monumental work, it calls for the lush treatment it received from the Bostonians. This music, however, has depths which Koussevitzky did not plumb.

It should be stated that the audience was quite engrossed. There was a time when it would have been more restive, but times have changed and Bruckner has grown in favor.

Not to be outdone by the other orchestras playing in Carnegie, Koussevitzky had to include the "Daphnis and Chloe" in his opening program. That performance should now be sufficient for the work which was heard more than any other last year. Three times and out.

* * *

"Manon" Restored

Massenet's "Manon" slipped back into the repertory at the Metropolitan Opera House last night. Its unobtrusive entrance became more important as the performance unfolded. Half way through the evening, it blossomed out with better singing and more dramatic impact.

Raoul Jobin as Des Grieux and Licia Albanese as Manon found themselves midway in the third act. Their respective arias challenged their abilities as nothing had up to that point.

Thereafter Jobin sang as well as he ever has, and Albanese began to sing more like her old self. Until then she had encountered considerable difficulty keeping her top tones focused on one note.

Credit is due Martial Singher for a solid characterization of Lescaut. He appeared in excellent voice. Alessio de Paolis carried through dependably as Guillot.

The rest of the cast, including Melchierre Luise making her debut, were adequate. Louis Fourestier's conducting followed routine. Again the general direction of the whole show lacked the necessary integration.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 14 1947

The Bostonians

Orchestra Presents Bruckner Symphony in First Concert

By Jerome D. Bohm

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, concert in Carnegie Hall Wednesday night. The program:
Symphony No. 8 .... Bruckner
Ma Mere l'Oye; Daphnis et Chloe, Suite No. 2 .... Ravel

It is always a pleasure to hear the translucently glowing sounds produced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Wednesday night's opening concert of the season by this organization under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction in Carnegie Hall gave evidence that its ability to ravish the listener's ear has not diminished in the least.

This writer had been prepared to felicitate Mr. Koussevitzky on his choice of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony to open his series of concerts here; for the great Austrian master's products in this form have been unjustly neglected by most conductors of our major symphony orchestras. But such a performance as that given this stupendous creation on this occasion can only serve to further the false legends spread by Bruckner's detractors during his lifetime and later both in his native land and in this country, that he had no sense of form; that his symphonies were the sprawling effusions of a composer who had noble ideals, but who was unable to master the architectonics of his art.

Mr. Koussevitzky sought to fit Bruckner into a musical bed of Procrustes. Since his Eighth Symphony requires well over an hour to traverse, he committed mayhem upon its structure in order to reduce it to what he evidently considers the right size for a symphony for consumption by the subscribers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Only the scherzo was unfolded in its entirety. The remaining three movements, even the matchless, angelically serene adagia, were truncated. Small wonder that the work emerged this time really as a shapeless, patchwork quilt, its colors poorly matched; its material shoddy. The interpretation was, and how else could it be, under the circumstances with approximately a third of its pages deleted, a superficial one. A conductor who has so little regard for a composer can scarcely be expected to interpret his music understandingly. I could only think of Tovey's comment on the performance of excerpts in concert of Wagner's music-dramas: "bleeding chunks of butcher's meat."

A more perceptive account was given of Ravel's poetic "Ma Mere l'Oye" which has been a far less frequent item on Mr. Koussevitzky's programs than the "Daphnis et Chloe" suite, for which he has an inordinate affection.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

NOV 14 1947

Orchestra Under Koussevitzky Gives Masterful Performance

By ELEANOR BILLMYER

The concert program of the Boston ~~Symphony Orch~~estra last night in the Rutgers Gymnasium, an auspicious opening to the Rutgers University concert series, summarized the range of musical feeling.

Opening with the classical precision of the Bach "Overture No. 3," the concert offered a contrasting romantic example, Ravel's "Mother Goose" piece, and climaxed the evening with the powerful "Fourth Symphony" of Brahms, combining the intellectualism of a classical approach with great emotion.

The large work of the evening, the Brahms symphony created an atmosphere of strong feeling. Beginning forcibly, the work still progressed to a finale of unrepressed passion. Its most serene moments, in the second movement, were contemplative rather than light, a tone of melancholy, underlying every phrase marked by the emotional pressure of the wind instruments' striving melodies.

In the last movement, all restraint lifted, the music soared into a frenzy of feeling of full, solid tones, leading into the abrupt and mournful finality of the final chord.

The Bach number shows well the qualities of the composer—the amazing interweaving of the different voices, the occasional emphasis on inner parts and the strong precision of the rhythm.

After the poignancy of the "grave" movement in the Overture, the increase of tempo and volume bring the listener gradually to the final "Gigue," a gay and Skillful combining of instruments and parts.

The "Air," difficult in interpretation because of its extreme popularity, still seemed fresh because of the conscientious portrayal and because of its setting with the other movements.

Lighter Number Pleasant

The Ravel selection offered a charming episode, performed throughout with a delicacy that made the number refreshingly dreamy. The mood was a fairytale one, of distant, miniature music. Its gayest passages contained a wistful quality, its most serious ones, a lack of melancholy.

Especially thrilling was the finale of the fourth section, the conversion of the beast into a charming prince, with its resolution of the quavering dissonance into a final chord of ethereal fineness.

Attempting to analyze the performance of the orchestra brings sympathy with the girl in a recent "New Yorker" cartoon, who exclaims, at a symphony program, "Why, they're good!"

The conscientious attention of each player, the unanimity in phrasing, in tone, in levels of volume, in timing, especially in pizzicato passages, all combined to make the music of a great orchestra, under a great conductor.

Serge Koussevitzky showed an abandon to the mood of the music, conducting with a minimum of motion, but the effective use of facial expression and slight gestures of his arms, hands or even fingers, accomplished the polished music that formed the concert.

The second concert in the series, a program by Bidu Sayao, soprano, will be held on December 1 in the Rutgers Gymnasium.

THE NEW YORK SUN, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1947.

The Music Makers

By IRVING KOLODIN

Neveu Makes Lively Debut With Muench.

Charles Muench, who was the incoming conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall a week ago, was the outgoing one last night. This matched, for symphonic circles, the turn-about record of but twenty-five hours in port recently posted by the Queen Mary. Nevertheless, the conductor managed to unload a valuable cargo, plus the promise of another call in December.

Cargo as distinguished from baggage may be a small matter in shipping circles; but one does not doubt that Ginette Nevue, the youthful French violinist who played for the first time with the Philharmonic last night, would prefer to be called the former rather than the latter. As an even more youthful violinist, she made some appearances here, pre-war; without reference to them, one may grant her a clean slate and inscribe thereon as the first words: "dynamic, incisive, enlivening.

Since the means of earning these adjectives was the Brahms violin concerto, it must follow that Miss Neveu can play her instrument as well as make an impression with it. There were some moments after the beginning—a rough and nervous one—when that judgment hung in the balance, but as competent phrase succeeded competent phrase, it was evident that there was involved, merely, too much effort rather than a lack of skill. The settling process reached firm ground by the time she came to the adagio, which was delivered with fine lyric feeling and a tone that had roundness as well as point. Certainly she is a ranking violinist, who brings to her music the mental fervor that makes for sense, as well as the rhythmic solidity which makes for interest. The Muench accompaniment was sometimes in the spirit of Lalo, but it sufficed.

In a later portion of the program, Muench restored himself to the high point of respect he reached here last season in the Berlioz "Fantastique" with a performance of the Franck symphony that was impelling, lucid and invariably interesting. The secret of his method was not obscure—largely it consisted of faster, less "dramatic" tempos than are usually employed. However, it was the balance and relation of them, plus a superb feeling for the idiom, which made the total impressive, rather than any mere mathematical equating of time values. Something of the same technic—without similar feeling for the idiom—made the opening Handel concerto grosso (A minor, opus 6, No. 4) overstressed and uncertain. The audience had warmth for Miss Neveu's Brahms, ecstasy for Muench's Franck.

Paul Makovsky In Violin Recital

There were several important works on the program of Paul Makovsky, who gave a Town Hall violin recital last night, but the one that stays in the memory is a little piece by Mozart. A short set of variations entitled "Helas! j'ai perdu mon amant," it is rarely played today. Yet it is a more absorbing piece than its Koechel listing might indicate (K. 360) and for sheer beauty mixed with sadness it belongs with the great works of the last period.

Makovsky played it very well, as, indeed, he played Stravinsky's "Duo Concertant" and Bach's Sonata in C minor very well. He is a reliable violinist who plays with consistent purity of tone and intonation. One notices a more vibrant quality than was present in his recital last year, and also a more assured interpretative outlook. In the Bach the dynamic scale sometimes was a little too calculated—abrupt pianissimo tones alternating with rugged fortes—but the sonata was played with musicianship and considerable spirit. Stravinsky's collection of five short pieces, not one of his most successful attempts, was delivered with as much conviction as the music would permit. A Beethoven sonata (in E flat, Op. 12, No. 3) and works by Ries, Watson and Wieniawski also were programmed. Scott Watson was the helpful accompanist.

HAROLD SCHONBERG.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 15 1947

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Its Season in Brooklyn

By JOHN BALL Jr.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, opened its Winter series of Brooklyn concerts last night at the Academy of Music. The program consisted of William Schumann Third Symphony, Mendelssohn's First Piano Concerto and the Beethoven Fifth Symphony.

Of the Beethoven there is little to say. This greatest of all symphonic works received a good reading (great ones are exceedingly rare), particularly in the changed atmosphere of the last movement.

The Mendelssohn work is, of course, a familiar one. Lukas Foss, the Boston Symphony pianist, was soloist and played, we would say, prettily. Mr. Foss' piano tone is a small one; his playing is highly deft but distinctly lacks muscles. This is not too inappropriate to Mendelssohn, with the result that the concerto went well.

His reading was distinctly a surface one. It might be called a whipped cream performance. We would like to call attention to the fact that the audience was enthusiastic and Mr. Foss, together with Dr. Koussevitzky, was called back repeatedly to bow.

The same happy reception, unfortunately, did not greet Mr. Schumann's symphony, despite the fact that the performance Dr. Koussevitzky gave the score was an excellent one and that the music itself has much to recommend it

It was to be expected that the soloist of the evening would attract the major attention. Combine that with the natural charm of Mendelssohn's music and you have good reason for the very fine reception of the concerto.

Mr. Schumann's music is of a different sort. This is not Haydn, Mozart, Mendelssohn or Beethoven. It is, rather, a contemporary, unusually skillful American composer who is expressing himself in a different way.

Listening to a work like this does not consist in waiting for half a dozen pages until the conductor reaches an anticipated melody. The music as a whole paints its own picture.

We have all watched storms gather in Summer. The signs are familiar, the bending of trees to the wind, the rustling of grass, the building up of the clouds, the first signs of darkening, and so on.

We take it all in as a composite picture and let it stir our emotions as it will. This is a good way to listen to less familiar music. There is no point in straining an ear for familiar or catchy melody; it is the entire score with which we are concerned.

When a piece of music such as this much better than average contemporary work (notice that we did not say modern) appears, it invites being taken as a whole, listened to as receptively as possible, and without waiting either for obvious melody or familiar overtones.

Heard in this manner, many such a relatively new score gets another opportunity to reveal itself. Under such circumstances it is the listener who, sometimes to his own surprise, receives an unexpected reward.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 16 1947

BOSTONIANS HEARD IN SUPERB CONCERT

Koussevitzky Leads Brahms, Schuman Symphonies—Foss Plays Mendelssohn Work

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, presented a noble program, resplendently performed, at its concert yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. Mendelssohn's Piano Concerto No. 1, in G minor, with Lukas Foss as soloist, had the central position on the list, which also included William Schuman's Third Symphony and the fourth Symphony of Brahms.

The afternoon of memorable music-making opened with a reading of the Schuman work, which left nothing undone to publish the virtues of that significant and outstanding contemporary American score, which took the first award of the Music Critics Circle of New York in 1942. It is a composition which makes a deeper impression at each rehearing and must be reckoned among the most important native contributions to the orchestral literature.

The symphony is remarkable alike for its transparency of texture imaginative and original coloring, and contrapuntal skill. Furthermore, it numbers among its many merits, genuine eloquence in the knowing development of its thematic material, and that material is both effective and economical.

Dr. Koussevitzky's unfoldment of the opus was noteworthy for richness of tinting, exuberance and deft capturing of the music's wide range of moods. The manifold difficulties of the symphony seemed mere child's play to the orchestra, which overcame them with striking virtuosity.

Especially alluring in the opening Passacaglia was the treatment of the splendid fourth variation with its murmuring figuration in the strings and the climactic final variant. The fugue, led to a particularly powerful close, was as masterly in its handling of the complicated and highly varied content. The chorale, with its melancholy contemplative atmosphere formed a decided contrast to these movements and the final toccata, with its jazz elements, was brilliantly and vitally set forth.

The Mendelssohn Concerto in G minor received a performance that was a pronouncement of unalloyed beauty. The rewarding display-piece is rarely given with so remarkable a realization of its style and character. Mr. Foss played the three movements in a manner that disclosed to the full the scintillating nature of the solo part, and with all the required drive, elegance, refinement and rhythmic charm.

So splendidly did he capture and convey the essential spirit of this lovable creation that one had the feeling Mendelssohn himself must have delivered its message in much the same manner. It was alive with youthful exuberance, had just the right amount of vigor and restraint. The Andante and the other lyric sections were most poetically and tastefully presented, and from start to finish, whether in delicately purling passages, or those requiring corruscating verve, Mr. Foss was always the sensitive and comprehending interpreter.

The support provided by Dr. Koussevitzky in the concerto could not be overpraised for its perfect adjustment and the admirable way in which it brought out the meaning and intentions of the whole. The concert concluded with the conductor's familiar account of the Fourth Brahms Symphony, which he never has led with more expansiveness of feeling or greater tonal glory.

N. S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 16 1947

The Bohemians

Koussevitzky Will Be Guest at Dinner Dec. 21

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the guest of honor of the noted New York musicians' club known as The Bohemians at its annual benefit dinner at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel on Sunday evening, Dec. 21. The proceeds will go to the Musicians' Foundation, maintained by The Bohemians for aid to musicians in need. Information about reservations is obtainable from Clyde Burrows, 30 West Seventy-second Street.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
NOV 17 1947

Chaim Weizmann Testimonial Nov. 25

Dr. Chain Weizmann, former president of the Jewish Agency for Palestine, will be honored on Nov. 25 when Serge Koussevitzky will bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra to New York to play in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel.

The affair, for which guests will pay $250 per plate, the funds going to the Weizmann Institute, will mark both Dr. Weizmann's 73rd birthday and completion of the physics and chemistry building of the Weizmann Institute of Science. The American Committee of the Weizmann Institute, headed by Edmund I. Kaufmann, is sponsoring the event.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 16 1947

Boston Symphony

Afternoon Series Opened With Schuman Work

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, first afternoon concert of its New York series yesterday in Carnegie Hall. Soloist, Lukas Foss, pianist. The program:

Symphony No. 3..............William Schuman
Piano Concerto No. 1, in G minor, Op. 25 Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 4, in E minor...........Brahms

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's conductorship, began and ended yesterday afternoon's concert in Carnegie Hall with a passacaglia. Brahms, indeed, did not call the finale of his fourth symphony a passacaglia, although its form is unmistakable, as well as its imposing musical eloquence. The passacaglia that opens William Schuman's third symphony is a notable example of the effective use of a classic form in music which is modern in character as well as in date.

It has often been said that rehearings are as important as premieres, or more so, in obtaining recognition for worth-while contemporary American works. In regard to his third symphony, the talented president of the Julliard School of Music has been fortunate; Dr. Koussevitzky introduced it to New York six years ago, and, at intervals of two years, it has also been played here by the Philharmonic and the New York City Symphony. It deserves repetition, on account of its musical ideas, their formal treatment and the skill shown in Mr. Schuman's orechestration.

One can note that a sense of variety within a particular movement is not always accompanied by one of over-all broad contrasts of mood in the symphony as a whole; there is an occasional suggestion of preoccupation with the deftly wrought structure of the work. But it has much expressive force as well as structural skill, and the composer was called to the stage to acknowledge warm applause.

Lukas Foss, the Boston Symphony's official pianist, is already well known, at the age of twenty-five, both as a composer and an interpreter. Mendelssohn's G minor concerto fared well under his skillful fingers in a performance that gave an impression not only of a notably well developed technique, but also of interpretative sensitiveness. Fluency was accompanied by unerring clarity, and the momentum of his playing never became mechanical. In certain passages marked mainly by lightness and display, the musical and appealing tone quality seemed slightly on the sober side, but the performance as a whole told of the pianist's essential musicianship and his understanding of this particular concerto. He won fervent applause.

The conductor and orchestra did their best for the American work and the Mendelssohn concerto, and closed the program with a satisfying interpretation of Brahm's familiar music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 17 1947

Honor for Weizmann By Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony and its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will give tomorrow night in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel a program in honor of the seventy-third birthday of Dr. Chaim Weizmann and the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovoth, Palestine. The orchestra will open the concert with the "Star-Spangled Banner" and Kurt Weill's orchestration of "Hatikvah."

The event, which will forego the usual speeches and banquet proceedings in deference to the musical program, is sponsored by the American Committee of the Weizmann Institute, whose patrons include Dr. Albert Einstein, former Governor Herbert H. Lehman, the former Secretary of the Treasury, Henry Morgenthau Jr., and William S. Paley. Guests will pay $250 per plate for a midnight supper, the proceeds to go to the institute.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
NOV 17 1947

2 American Works Offered

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Two American works graced the orchestral concerts of the week-end. Koussevitzky played William Schuman's Third Symphony with the Boston Symphony on Saturday afternoon. Muench gave the first hearings of Earl George's Introduction and Allegro with the Philharmonic-Symphony at both its weekend concerts.

The Schuman wears well on repeated hearings. The vitalized performance it received emphasized its rhythmic life, thereby somewhat minimizing its melodic content. The music has strength which is more than that of a well-constructed score. Its proportions are impressive.

While Mr. George's piece is nothing startling, the music is quite alive. There is talent here beyond an obvious grasp of technical matters.

Two pianists were soloists: Lukas Foss in the Mendelssohn G Minor Concerto with the Bostonians; Jacques Abram in the Beethoven G Major with the Philharmonic - Symphony. Mr. Foss emerged as a concert pianist with this performance.

Both acquitted themselves brilliantly! The brilliance, however, belonged more to the Mendelssohn than to the Beethoven. The latter is a more personal work than Mr. Abrams sought to make it.

Muench terminated his fortnight with the Philharmonic with two notable performances of French Music: Faure's Suite from "Pelleas and Melisande" and Ravel's "La Valse." The Ravel was electrifying.

* * *

Poor "Tosca"

One of those performances where good intentions bog down came at the Metropolitan Opera House Saturday afternoon. The season's first "Tosca" followed a singularly undistinguished course. Occasionally it had dramatic possibilities, but these smolderings never broke through into what "Tosca" can and must be.

Elen Dosia's debut in the title role was disturbing. Young and attractive, she sang unevenly. Some strange hollow sounds suggested complete lack of support. Though she showed acting ability, her self-conscious movements often appeared school-girlish. She was not ready for Tosca on this occasion.

Jan Peerce fared adequately as Mario. Francesco Valentino was earnest, but hardly scratched the surface of such a character as Scarpia. Mr. Antonicelli conducted too deliberately and let the orchestra play too loud. The afternoon was not a happy one.

* * *

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 17 1947

Weizmann Birthday Party to Aid Jews; Boston Symphony to Play

Serge Koussevitsky and the 107-man Boston Symphony Orchestra will come to New York to play a full concert at a birthday party for Dr. Chaim Weizmann at the Waldorf-Astoria on Tuesday night, Nov. 25.

Dr. Weizmann, the world's most famous Zionist and one of its best-known scientists, will be seventy-three on the following Thursday, Thanksgiving Day.

The American Committee of the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovoth, Palestine, sponsors of the affair, in announcing the plans yesterday, said that 2,000 persons are expected to pay $250 each to attend the party, which will also mark the completion of the physics and chemistry building at the institute. The committee expects to gross $500,000 from the party, net proceeds of which will go to the institute. Among the sponsors is Dr. Albert Einstein.

Will Play as a Benefit

The Boston Symphony, according to its manager, George Judd, is playing the concert as a benefit performance and will receive only its traveling expenses. The second half of the concert, from 9:30 to 10:30 p. m., will be broadcast as the regular Boston Symphony program from the stage of the Waldorf's Grand Ballroom over WJZ and the American Broadcasting Company network, Mr. Judd said.

He added that the Boston Symphony regularly plays two or three benefits a year. When the institute committee approached them on the matter, he said, "Everybody wanted to do it."

Guests at the party will hear only one address—from Dr. Weizmann. Before the concert at 8:45 p. m., Abraham Feinberg, chairman of the Reception Committee of 100, will make a brief introductory statement. The concert will open with "The Star-Spangled Banner," and a special orchestration of "Hatikvah," the Jewish national anthem, by Kurt Weill.

Mr. Judd said that the concert program was not completed yet, but that he thought the first half would be all Mendelssohn, and the broadcast portion all Beethoven.

Morgenthau to Talk

After the concert, Henry Morgenthau jr., former Secretary of the Treasury, will introduce Dr. Weizmann. Following his talk, a buffet supper will be served.

Among other patrons of the dinner are former Governor Herbert H. Lehman, William S. Paley, chairman of the board of the Columbia Broadcasting System, and Mr. Morgenthau. Edmund I. Kaufmann is chairman of the American Committee of the Weizmann Institute.

Mr. Judd said that the Boston Symphony had never played at the Waldorf before, and that it was "a lucky thing that it's an all-classical program not requiring an augmented orchestra."

He explained that the Grand Ballroom stage is only a foot less in depth than the stage of Symphony Hall in Boston, but has rounded corners at the back, whereas Symphony Hall doesn't.

"It'll be tight, but all right," he said, "and I think we can fill the hall—with sound, I mean."

[30]

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 17 1947

Symphony Guest May Be Next Conductor

BETWEEN REHEARSALS: Charles Muench (left) and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky fraternize over a box of graham crackers in the latter's backstage studio at Symphony Hall. Muench will conduct the Bostonians here Tuesday night.

WHEN tall, broad-shouldered Charles Muench walks from the wings of the Metropolitan Theater Tuesday night and mounts the podium before the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Providence music-lovers may be getting their first look at the next permanent conductor of that famous organization.

Ever since Muench, who had acquired a large reputation as a musician in France, appeared as guest conductor of the Bostonians last season, he has been regarded as the probable successor of the aging Dr. Serge Koussevitzky when the latter decides to retire.

On Friendly Terms

Muench's return engagements with the Boston organization this season are taken as further evidence that he is being groomed for the place. If that is really the program of the Symphony's backers, and Koussevitzky is aware of it, he must approve because he and Muench are on excellent terms.

Whatever the future holds in store for Muench, he has had a brilliant past. He was born in 1895 in Strasbourg in Alsace where his father was founder of the Saint Guillaume Choir. As a lad, under his father's stern and able guidance, he studied the violin, harmony and singing.

Before World War I, Muench went to Paris and studied with the violinist-composer Louis Lucien Capet. In 1919, the year after the war ended, he was made professor at the Strasbourg University and later became conductor of the orchestra there. He gained further experience working with Wilhelm Furtwangler at the famous Gewandhaus Concerts in Leipzig.

Charles Muench Will Lead Orchestra at Concert Tuesday

After several busy years in Strasbourg, he returned to Paris and there in 1930 founded the Orchestra de la Societe Philharmonic. Seven years later, he succeeded Philippe Gaubert as conductor of the Societe Concerts du Conservatoire.

Appeared Last Season

His first important engagement in this country was with the Boston Symphony last season. He appeared at three concerts in Boston and later made his New York debut with the Philharmonic-Symphony which he is now conducting.

Muench is a 6-footer with the build and the grace of an athlete. His hair is iron-gray; his voice is deep. He bears a striking resemblance to the Belgian writer, Maurice Maeterlinck.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Where do these conductors get their energy? As though guiding a hundred men through the intricacies of a modern score were not enough to do, they must needs put on an act that may be described as a cross between a workout in a gym and interpretative dancing. One of the busiest of these podium athletes is Charles Muench of Paris, who yesterday returned to the Symphony Concerts. When Mr. Muench appeared here a year ago he made a favorable impression which, in these particular ears, was not strengthened yesterday.

There was on this later occasion no re-creative feat comparable to what Mr. Muench did last season with the C minor Symphony of Saint-Saens, nor was there anything in the new music he had to offer as arresting as the String Symphony of Honegger and the Suite from Rousel's "Ariadne and Bacchus." Both of these composers were, in fact, represented yesterday, the former by his Third Symphony, "Liturgique" (new to Boston) and the latter by his Third Symphony, written for our orchestra's 50th anniversary. The other numbers on the current list are a suite from Rameau s another local novelty though more than two centuries have passed since the opera was written, and Debussy's "Iberia."

The music of Rameau has an old-world charm, but there are plenty of composers of the same period, or even earlier, whose music offers something more than that today. Few commissioned pieces turn out very well. Certainly, Roussel's Symphony is not standing up. There is next to nothing in the first movement. The adagio has its points, but it can't make up its mind whether it is that or an allegro agitato; the scherzo is pleasantly inconsequential; and the finale, except for a pleasing slow interlude, comes close to being plain silly.

One of Latest Works

The Symphony of Honegger was also commissioned (by the Swiss) and is one of its composer's latest works. The three movements are entitled "Dies Irae," "De Profundis Clamavi" and "Dona Nobis Pacem." There is considerable drama in the music and there are passages of great beauty, but you cannot escape the feeling that the work is too long for what it contains and that in the more strenuous passages the composer has fallen back upon well-used tricks of rhythm and dissonance.

The serene conclusion, however, puts one in the mood to forgive and forget and the audience's reception of the piece was decidedly cordial. We have heard more imaginative performances of "Iberia" from conductors who are not French. Mr. Muench was disposed to coarsen the first and last movements, though happily all the poetry of the second did not escape him.

The program will be repeated this evening, and tomorrow afternoon. Mr. Muench will offer the Debussy and Honegger items, adding to them Faure's "Pelleas and Melisande" music and the Symphony of Franck.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 19 1947

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Under Charles Munch Plays Concert at Met

BY RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the second concert of the season last night at the Metropolitan Theater, with Charles Munch as guest conductor. The program was devoted to music by Debussy, Roussel, Faure and Franck. The orchestra played with its accustomed virtuosity and responded implicitly to the directions of Mr. Munch, who conducted the entire concert without a score.

The program:

Debussy .... "Iberia"
("Images" for Orchestra, No. 2)
I. Par les rues et par les chemins
(In the streets and byways)
II. Les parfums de la nuit
(The fragrance of the night)
III. Le matin d'un jour de fete
(The morning of a festival day)
Roussel. Symphony No. 3 in G minor, Op. 42
I. Allegro vivo
II. Adagio
III. Vivace
IV. Allegro con spirito
Intermission
Faure Suite from the Incidental Music to Maeterlinck's Tragedy, "Pelleas et Melisande," Op. 80
Prelude quasi adagio
"Fileuse," Andantino quasi allegretto
Adagio
Sicilienne
Franck .... Symphony in D minor
I. Lento; allegro non troppo
II. Allegretto
III. Allegro non troppo

Power and vigor are two elements of the exhilarating style of conducting employed by Mr. Munch. Yet he has at his command an extraordinary capacity to create effects of extreme delicacy. To this listener, a most exciting effect was obtained after a huge climax of tone had been piled up with accelerated tempo. The sustained deliberation of the resolutions of phrases was measured in beautiful proportions. And incidentally, when Mr. Munch increases a tempo, he really goes about it with dispatch. He had a way of pouncing on a sforzando accent that doubled its value.

The "Iberia" had not been heard here too recently. Its interpretation was pure Debussy and the delicate pastel colors of the second section were exquisite sounds. Rhythms were gay in the festival scene and altogether, this number seemed to serve well to warm up both the orchestra and the audience to what it was to hear in the Roussel.

This symphony brought most devoted attention from both conductor and players. French musicians are eternally writing or paying "homage a" some other French musician. It is a beautiful custom and the playing of the Roussel 3rd was another such gesture. The work has moments of very interesting writing. It stays within the limits of one's comprehension and is not controversial music. It is too soon to say that it is great music but portions of it as Mr. Munch interpreted them, were very moving.

There are not words enough to describe the Faure "Pelleas et Melisande." It is enough to say that from the virtuoso instrumentalists of the Boston Symphony, something of a special tribute to this great Frenchman was offered as they responded to the suggestions of Mr. Munch. Throughout this fascinating score, there was created an atmosphere of magical effect. One almost wondered if the music had really been heard, it was so delicate in spots. The playing of the violins in the "Fileuse" defies description.

Certainly everyone present last evening has heard a traditional interpretation of the Cesar Franck Symphony in D. minor. It is safe to say that they have never heard from such an interpretation, the nobility and optimism which was evoked by the vitality of Mr. Munch's reading of the last movement. Parts of the first movement were new in thought also. It was thought-provoking. There should be dinner conversation for several evenings about last evening's program.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Changed programs have been the rule at the Symphony Concerts this season. Those who expected to hear yesterday Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" and Mendelssohn's Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" got instead the Eighth Symphony of Bruckner. The Schumann Piano Concerto with Dame Myra Hess as soloist kept its place, though it was moved from the middle of the program to the end.

Bruckner is always good for a debate, an argument, or even a first class row. When Sir Adrian Boult was last here he made the not entirely original suggestion that Bruckner's music could not be successfully transplanted. It was all right in Linz (the Austrian master's birthplace and once the scene of an annual Bruckner festival) but no go in London. In point of fact, Bruckner's music can be transplanted, but only a conductor entirely sympathetic to his music, his peculiar style and idiom, can do the job. Dr. Muck was such a one and so is Bruno Walter, who last year gave us an unforgettable performance of the Ninth. Dr. Koussevitzky's Bruckner is up and down. When he revived the Eighth a year ago last month he hit it off better than he did yesterday, when his interpretation tended to be hysterical; and the Bruckner brass, which should be nobly sonorous, became mere brazen blare, so that what should have been the glory of the Symphony became its worst blemish.

Then there is the matter of the considerable and wholly unwarranted cut in the great Adagio. Dr. Koussevitzky's excuse last year was that by this excision he did the composer a service. To deprive any work of its most beautiful portion is not some people's idea of service. And if the length of the Symphony is such an obstacle, it were far better to discard the finale entirely, since after the Adagio, this labored movement is only an anti-climax.

Dame Myra's performance of the Schumann Concerto has long been familiar to us. Moreover, it has been preserved on the records for the benefit of future generations, who are not likely to hear a more poetic version of this most poetic of concertos than hers. The only flaw in her performance is to be found in the final movement. Here, and here only, is there opportunity for virtuoso display, and technically and temperamentally Dame Myra hasn't got it in her. She was rapturously received by the audience, which had already warmed to the Symphony of Bruckner.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 20 1947

PALESTINE MUSICIANS VIE FOR SCHOLARSHIP

The Esco Foundation for Palestine is holding a competition, open to Palestinian composers, for a scholarship, the winner of which will be brought to the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass., next summer for post-graduate studies. The contest will be judged by committees in Palestine and New York.

Palestine-born or naturalized Jews, Arabs, or Christians, and Palestinian composers now in the United States may enter the contest. The scholarship includes transportation to and from the Center, room and board during the six-week session, tuition cost for the composition course, and admittance to all concerts, lectures and general activities at the Center.

Leonard Bernstein, composer-conductor, heads the United States committee of judges. Other members of this committee are Henry Cowell, Frederick Jacobi, Wallingford Riegger and Stefan Wolpe, composers, and Ethel S. Cohen, musicologist. Dr. Peter Gradenwitz, composer, heads the Palestine committee. Dr. Judah L. Magnes, American-born president of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, has offered the facilities of that institution as administrative center for the competition.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

For reasons which he has not [illegible] to the public, Serge Koussevitzky changed the program for [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra [illegible] Symphony Hall [illegible] The [illegible] Mendelssohn [illegible] make [illegible] Bruckner's Eighth Symphony [illegible] Schumann Concerto [illegible] forms [illegible] Dame Myra [illegible]

[illegible] Bruckner [illegible] remains [illegible] later [illegible] to [illegible] viola, [illegible] solo [illegible] romantic [illegible]

[illegible] Hess [illegible] regarded [illegible] one of the [illegible] form [illegible] She has always [illegible] Boston but seldom [illegible] Symphony Hall resounded [illegible] The audience [illegible] last [illegible] the music. [illegible] performance [illegible] brilliant [illegible] showing off, although Miss Hess could do so if she chose. But she is too good a musician for mere fireworks. The [illegible] of her work lay not only in [illegible] mastery but in the way she made the concerto "sing" and the beautiful and subtle interplay between piano and orchestra. That is the highest type of virtuosity.

In these days it probably is necessary to make cuts in the monumental scores of Bruckner, with their long sequences and what Felix Weingartner called "terraced progression." Mr. Koussevitzky accordingly does make cuts in three movements, leaving only the scherzo intact. But why does he find it essential to cut out anything of the adagio which, to make a very unoriginal observation, is the finest movement of the four? Surely no audience would grow restive while music of such celestial beauty was going on!

Yesterday's performance was indeed a miracle of orchestral magnificence, with all intricate details, wealth of counterpoint coming out in superlative clarity and detail. As in the Schumann Concerto, everything "sang" all the way. The brass sections, which are the foundation of Bruckner's orchestra, covered themselves with glory—and, probably, exhausted themselves at the same time, for the Austrian composer demanded a lot of hard blowing. The quality of the four "Bayreuth tubas," especially, was rich and poised.

Next week the orchestra makes its first trip to New York. Two weeks hence, Charles Muench, the first guest conductor, will offer this program: Rameau: Suite from the opera "Dardanus"; Honegger: "Liturgical" Symphony (first times in Boston); Debussy: "Iberia"; Roussel: Third Symphony.

BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 22,

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

BY CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Muench, gifted and impressive Alsatian, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this week as first guest of the season. As on the occasion of his American debut here a year ago, his program is all-French, bringing Rameau's Suite from the opera "Dardanus"; Honegger's "Liturgical Symphony; "Iberia" by Debussy and Roussel's Third Symphony.

Once again Mr. Muench showed that he is a conductor of enormous technical skill, athletic gestures, excellent taste and high sensitivity. His delicate "echo" effects in the little "Sleep Rondo" of Rameau's Suite (new to these concerts) were almost unearthly. Yet he can whoop up the full orchestra, as in Honegger and Roussel, to terrific volume which is yet always musical. He insists upon grace of phrase and the purest of tone. When he returns later in the season I hope he will show us his prowess with non-French music.

Honegger's "Liturgical" Symphony, dedicated to Mr. Muench and new to Boston, runs in three movements named after sections of the Mass, "Dies Irae," "De Profundis Clamavi" and "Dona Nobis Pacem." What is further signified remains for the composer to tell. The first movement and much of the last are [illegible] and powerful, as if all the Furies were let loose at once. The orchestra is made to snarl and bark, with some of the abrupt rhythmic tricks and off-beats of Honegger's once famous "Pacific 231." The Symphony is probably much too long, and apart from a tender slow section at the end, uncompromisingly dissonant. It will take repeated hearings to figure out what it is all about. Yet, as aforesaid, the main impression is one of unusual power.

Debussy of "Iberia" was nicely done, not too fussed up, and Roussel's polished, well-proportioned and heavily orchestrated trivialities had a good advocate in Mr. Muench. But Roussel coming on top of Debussy and Honegger made too much spice for my taste. A cooling touch of Brahms or something like that would have been better.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

Tanglewood Award Is Established for Palestine Composer

[illegible] Foundation for Palestine [illegible] scholarship [illegible] composer [illegible] Berkshire [illegible] wood, it was [illegible] This will [illegible] and [illegible] next [illegible] Tanglewood [illegible] Boston Symphony [illegible] Berkshire Festival [illegible] the winner [illegible] judged by [illegible] and New [illegible] composers [illegible] naturalized in [illegible] to accredited [illegible] now in the

---

DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS
NOV 20 1947

SYMPHONY AND THE RADIO

To the Editor of The News:

Why is it that local radio stations will not devote one hour a week to a symphony program? The Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic are heard no more. Not even a crumb of great music can be found on the menus of local stations. Why?

Well, business is business, ain't it? Hooper surveys indicate that symphonies, operas or even a heavenly choir could not hope to compete for popular favor with boogie-woogie. It follows, therefore, that the greater number of listeners should be given what they want, not just part of the time but all of the time—Sundays included. Then they'll go out and buy more Slippery Elm soap, and the sponsor will be content.

So the boys from Tin Pan Alley have taken over in the Valley, and the Muse walks sadly off the stage. They've signed off the symphony, and all of the lights are out. Who cares?

I know a kid who might care a little. One moonlight night in France he heard a symphony orchestra play Tschaikowsky's Fifth. And he asked his buddy, "How long has this been going on? I've never heard music like this before." He and his buddy never missed a symphony concert after that if they could help it. And thousands of the boys sidestepped other entertainment to listen to symphonies. It seems that after they got away from the business of fighting a war for a little while, it was an exalting experience to listen to great music. It was hard for them to describe it, but it did something to them and for them.

It's just possible that there are a lot of people within hearing distance of local stations who like to listen to such music. And many more might learn to appreciate it, if given the chance. Surely they are entitled to at least one hour. And they buy soap, too.

Dayton. O. D.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 19 1947

Music

BY RUTH TRIPP

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played ~~the second concert of~~ the season last night at the Metropolitan Theater, with Charles Munch as guest conductor. The program was devoted to music by Debussy, Roussel, Faure and Franck. The orchestra played with its accustomed virtuosity and responded implicitly to the directions of Mr. Munch, who conducted the entire concert without a score.

The program:

Debussy .... "Iberia"
("Images" for Orchestra, No. 2)
- I. Par les rues et par les chemins (In the streets and byways)
- II. Les parfums de la nuit (The fragrance of the night)
- III. Le matin d'un jour de fete (The morning of a festival day)

Roussel .. Symphony No. 3 in G minor, Op. 42
- I. Allegro vivo
- II. Adagio
- III. Vivace
- IV. Allegro con spirito

Intermission

Faure .. Suite from the Incidental Music to Maeterlinck's Tragedy, "Pelleas et Melisande," Op. 80
- Prelude quasi adagio
- "Fileuse," Andantino quasi allegretto
- Adagio
- Sicilienne

Franck .... Symphony in D minor
- I. Lento; allegro non troppo
- II. Allegretto
- III. Allegro non troppo

Power and vigor are two elements of the exhilarating style of conducting employed by Mr. Munch. Yet he has at his command an extraordinary capacity to create effects of extreme delicacy. To this listener, a most exciting effect was obtained after a huge climax of tone had been piled up with accelerated tempo. The sustained deliberation of the resolutions of phrases was measured in beautiful proportions. And incidentally, when Mr. Munch increases a tempo, he really goes about it with dispatch. He had a way of pouncing on a sforzando accent that doubled its value.

The "Iberia" had not been heard here too recently. Its interpretation was pure Debussy and the delicate pastel colors of the second section were exquisite sounds. Rhythms were gay in the festival scene and altogether, this number seemed to serve well to warm up both the orchestra and the audience to what it was to hear in the Roussel.

This symphony brought most devoted attention from both conductor and players. French musicians are eternally writing or paying "homage a" some other French musician. It is a beautiful custom and the playing of the Roussel 3rd was another such gesture. The work has moments of very interesting writing. It stays within the limits of one's comprehension and is not controversial music. It is too soon to say that it is great music but portions of it as Mr. Munch interpreted them, were very moving.

There are not words enough to describe the Faure "Pelleas et Melisande." It is enough to say that from the virtuoso instrumentalists of the Boston Symphony, something of a special tribute to this great Frenchman was offered as they responded to the suggestions of Mr. Munch. Throughout this fascinating score, there was created an atmosphere of magical effect. One almost wondered if the music had really been heard, it was so delicate in spots. The playing of the violins in the "Fileuse" defies description.

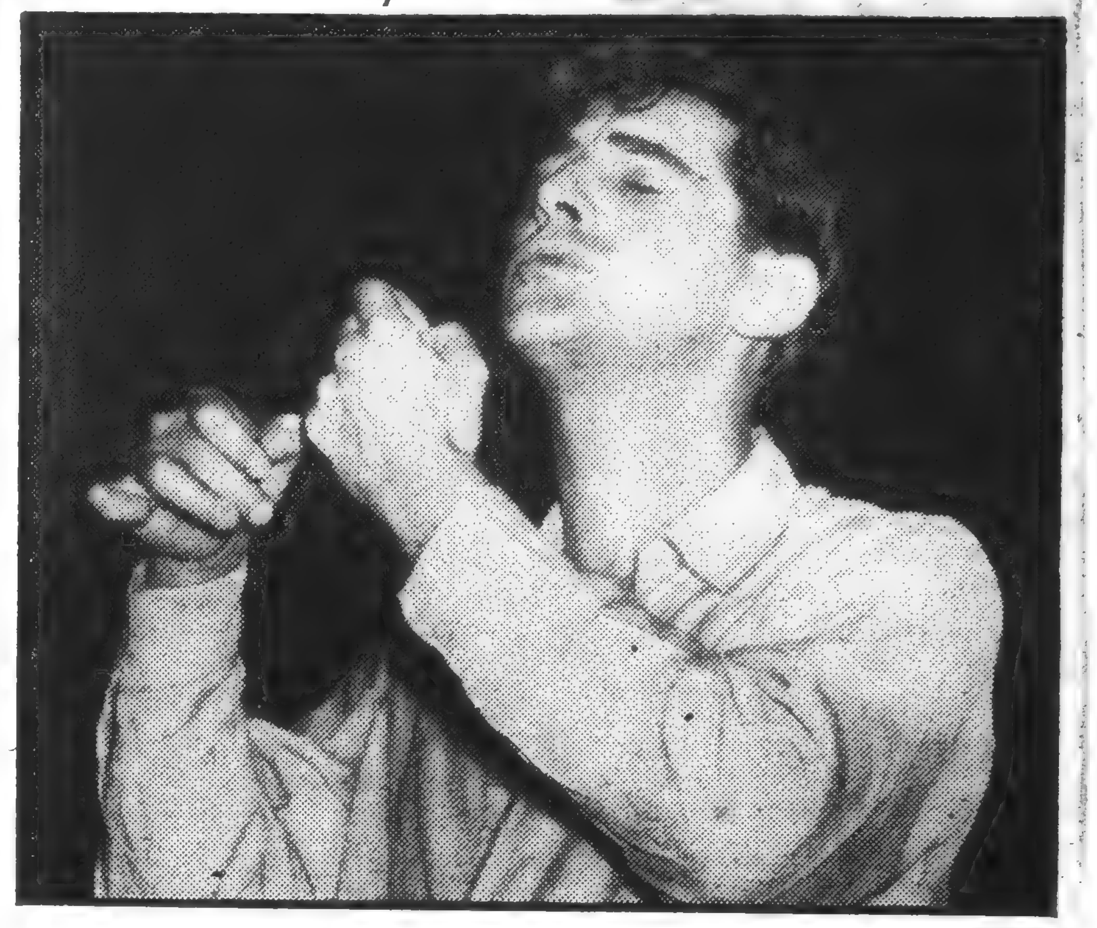
Certainly everyone present last evening has heard a traditional interpretation of the Cesar Franck Symphony in D. minor. It is safe to say that they have never heard from such an interpretation, the nobility and optimism which was evoked by the vitality of Mr. Munch's reading of the last movement. Parts of the first movement were new in thought also. It was thought-provoking. There should be dinner conversation for several evenings about last evening's program.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
MIRROR
NOV 23 1947

ONLY HUMAN

Do Re Mi—But No Dough

By SIDNEY FIELDS



As a conductor, composer, or pianist Leonard Bernstein shakes music from himself as a bird shakes a song from its throat. His enthusiasm is endless. He's like the young musician who just got a steady job and will never cease being elated about it. At 29 he already has a remarkable record of achievement and could easily earn fabulous sums anywhere. But for the past three years he's practically given up all work everywhere to direct the New York City Symphony—without pay.

IT was at a rehearsal and his secretary, Miss Helen Coates, explained that "Lennie" was preparing a piece by Vaughan Williams. Miss Coates taught Bernstein piano when he was 14 back in Boston, and everybody from the newsdealer to the 80 men and women in the orchestra always call him "Lennie." During a lull one violinist queried a passage in the score . . .

"Natch," said Lennie. "You gotta be exact. With Zarathustra you can get away with murder. Here you can't."

He's medium height, stocky, fiery, and handles his muscular arms and eloquent hands like an expert fighter—no wasted motion. He never uses a baton. But he also loves boogie-woogie, is expert in rhumba and conga, and his versatility as a composer makes you breathless. His symphony "Jeremiah" won the 1944 N. Y. Music Critics Circle Award. He wrote two ballets, "Fancy Free" and "Facsimile," and the musical, "On The Town."

After the rehearsal he wiped the sweat from his face, threw a sport coat over his shoulders, and stopped long enough to settle a score of little aches and problems of his musicians. Then we went down to his office. Miss Coates reminded him of a dozen odd details he had to look after for a dinner concert that same night, and he tried to answer his phone, arrange for the week's program, and talk to me all at once.

He comes from Boston and Harvard, and his father wanted him in his beauty parlor equipment business . . . "I even worked in the shipping room one Summer and hated it." At ten his Aunt Clara stored her upright piano in the Bernstein home. Lennie looked, touched it . . .

"It made pretty sounds, and I screamed, 'Ma, I want piano lessons'."

He's never been away from music since. After a degree in music at Harvard he spent two years at the Curtis Institute, studied under Fritz Reiner. Koussevitzky taught him conducting at Tanglewood, scene of the Berkshire Festivals. Bernstein is now a teacher at Tanglewood. At 23 he wrote, published and premiered his first work, a clarinet sonata. Rodzinski then hired him as an assistant conductor for the N. Y. Philharmonic.

One night, with Rodzinski away, guest conductor Bruno Walter took sick. Bernstein just had one hour talking to Walter about the program, stepped in, and vaulted to fame overnight.

He's very unhappy when he's not composing, and the light he follows is to make music in every conceivable way. But he hasn't composed anything since he took over the City Symphony three years ago. It's always been a struggle. There's always a deficit and no generous private citizens to make it up . . .

"Everyone thinks the City Symphony is supported by the city. It isn't. They try to make up the deficit by renting the place for ballet and other things. It's a real estate business."

There's no manager so he assumes the duties, persuades friends like Rose Bampton, Jennie Tourel, Sampson Francois, Joseph Szigeti to appear as soloists for free. Last year when he returned from Europe he went to teach at Tanglewood, thereby cutting himself out of the fattest fee ever offered a conductor at the Hollywood Bowl. This year he cancelled his entire European tour, refused one for South America and Australia. He'll just spend some time in Boston, Houston and Minneapolis, and then he'll conduct the Palestine Philharmonic for six weeks with no salary . . .

"But I've put aside next April, May and June just for composing. It will probably be something for the theatre."

When he wants to conduct while playing a solo from the piano at City Center he can't move the piano from the stand in the rehearsal hall to the floor. The stagehands want $70 for that. So he has to do it all from the piano stand. One piece calls for 12 violas, he has only eight. He stays up all night rearranging it.

"And we have to merge our orchestra with the opera orchestra. Some men can play 'Traviata' backwards with their eyes closed, but they can't read two notes of a symphony. Then the critics want to know why we don't sound like the Philharmonic . . . Hey, I've got another rehearsal for the dinner concert tonight. Miss Coates, will you have my tux ready, please?"

"Lennie, you should wear a white tie and tails," Miss Coates said firmly.

"Nonsense," he said, pulling on his raincoat. "Wouldn't think of wearing that at a dinner concert. Tails are silly for a Mozart sonata. The tux, please."

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

[illegible] to make cuts in the monumental scores of Bruckner, with [illegible] long sequences and what Felix [illegible] called "terraced progression." Mr. Koussevitzky accordingly does make cuts in three ovements, leaving only the scherzo tact. But why does he find it sential to cut out anything of the agio which, to make a very uniginal observation, is the finest ovement of the four? Surely no audience would grow restive while music of such celestial beauty was going on!

Yesterday's performance was indeed a miracle of orchestral magnificence, with all intricate details, wealth of counterpoint coming out in superlative clarity and detail. As in the Schumann Concerto, everything "sang" all the way. The brass sections, which are the foundation of Bruckner's orchestra, covered themselves with glory—and, probably, exhausted themselves at the same time, for the Austrian composer demanded a lot of hard blowing. The quality of the four "Bayreuth tubas," especially, was rich and poised.

Next week the orchestra makes its first trip to New York. Two weeks hence, Charles Muench, the first guest conductor, will offer this program: Rameau: Suite from the opera "Dardanus"; Honegger; "Liurgical" Symphony (first times in Boston); Debussy: "Iberia"; Roussel: Third Symphony.

BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 22,

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

BY CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Muench, gifted and impressive Alsatian, conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this week as first guest of the season. As on the occasion of his American debut here a year ago, his program is all-French, bringing Rameau's Suite from the opera "Dardanus"; Honegger's "Liturgical Symphony; "Iberia" by Debussy and Roussel's Third Symphony.

Once again Mr. Muench showed that he is a conductor of enormous technical skill, athletic gestures, excellent taste and high sensitivity. His delicate 'echo' effects in the little "Sleep Rondo" of Rameau's Suite (new to these concerts) were almost uncanny. Yet he can whoop up the full orchestra, as in Honegger and Roussel, to terrific volume which is yet always musical. He insists upon grace of phrase and the purest of tone. When he returns later in the season I hope he will show us his prowess with non-French music.

Honegger's "Liturgical" Symphony dedicated to Mr. Muench and new to Boston, runs in three movements named after sections of the Mass: "Dies Irae," "De Profundis Clamavi" and "Dona Nobis Pacem." What it further signified remains for the composer to tell. The first movement and much of the last are [illegible] clangorous and powerful, as if all the Furies were let loose at once. The orchestra is made to snarl and bark with some of the abrupt rhythmic tricks and off-beats of Honegger's once famous "Pacific 231." The Symphony is probably much too long, and apart from a tender slow section at the end, uncompromisingly dissonant. It will take repeated hearings to figure out what it is all about. Yet, as aforesaid, the main impression is one of unusual power.

Debussy of "Iberia" was nicely done, not too fussed up, and Roussel's polished, well-proportioned and heavily orchestrated trivialities had a good advocate in Mr. Muench. But Roussel coming on top of Debussy and 'Honegger made too much spice for my taste. A cooling touch of Brahms or something like that would have been better.

DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS
NOV 20 1947

SYMPHONY AND THE RADIO

To the Editor of The News:

Why is it that local radio stations will not devote one hour a week to a symphony program? The Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic are heard no more. Not even a crumb of great music can be found on the menus of local stations. Why?

Well, business is business, ain't it? Hooper surveys indicate that symphonies, operas or even a heavenly choir could not hope to compete for popular favor with boogie-woogie. It follows, therefore, that the greater number of listeners should be given what they want, not just part of the time but all of the time—Sundays included. Then they'll go out and buy more Slippery Elm soap, and the sponsor will be content.

So the boys from Tin Pan Alley have taken over in the Valley, and the Muse walks sadly off the stage. They've signed off the symphony, and all of the lights are out. Who cares?

I know a kid who might care a little. One moonlight night in France he heard a symphony orchestra play Tschaikowsky's Fifth. And he asked his buddy, "How long has this been going on? I've never heard music like this before." He and his buddy never missed a symphony concert after that if they could help it. And thousands of the boys sidestepped other entertainment to listen to symphonies. It seems that after they got away from the business of fighting a war for a little while, it was an exalting experience to listen to great music. It was hard for them to describe it, but it did something to them and for them.

It's just possible that there are a lot of people within hearing distance of local stations who like to listen to such music. And many more might learn to appreciate it, if given the chance. Surely they are entitled to at least one hour. And they buy soap, too.

Dayton. O. D.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

Tanglewood Award Is Established for Palestine Composer

[illegible] Palestolarship composer Berkshire [illegible] was [illegible] This will [illegible] and [illegible] next Tangle[illegible] Sym[illegible] Fes[illegible] winner [illegible] judged by [illegible] e and New [illegible] composers [illegible] turalized in [illegible] accredited [illegible] now in the

---

Herald Nov 22 .TH

MU

Symphony Concert

The 6th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Muench conducting, waas given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program is as follows:

Suite from the Opera, "Dardanus"	Rameau
Symphony No. 3, "Liturgique"	Honegger
"Iberia"	Debussy
Symphony No. 3 in G minor Op. 42	Roussel

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Charles Muench renewed yesterday the highly favorable impression as interpreter which we had formed of him when he conducted the orchestra last season. After yesterday's unusual and stimulating concert it is comforting to reflect that he will be with us later in the season for two more pairs of concerts. He has exceptional command of the orchestra and gets the finest results in tone quality and in the personality of his readings.

Honegger is at last coming into his own in Boston after long years of neglect between his visit here in 1929 and this post-war interest in his music. The Liturgical Symphony, which was played for the first time in Boston, is a very different work from his Symphony for Strings. Partly this may be that the latter was written in the darkest days of the war, while the former was composed immediately after it. Mr. Muench sees in it "man's revolt against the higher will" and a final reconcilation to it. As the Symphony is dedicated to Mr. Muench and since he gives a dynamic performance of it, his view of the emotional content should be considered with respect.

The first movement, "Dies Irae," is violent and stormy, with brusque rhythms and the most savage dissonances of the whole work. It is also exciting and dramatic music. The adagio, "De Profundis Clamavi," is a hymn of a tragic and yet peaceful nature. It rises to a climax and then subsides to a quiet conclusion, this last being a feature of each movement. The finale, "Dona Nobis Pacem," also reaches a tremendous, dissonant climax, at which some in the audience started clapping, though what sort of peace they thought Mr. Honegger had achieved I can't imagine. Finally the Symphony closes in a mood of ineffable, tranquil beauty. The entire Symphony is an immensely impressive work. The audience for the most part obviously liked it, and there were bravos mingled with the applause.

Another modern French masterpiece is Roussel's Third Symphony, one of the best scores to emerge from our orchestra's 50th anniversary. By now it should be fairly familiar. The energentic bustle of the first movement, the intellectual interest of the adagio and the towering good spirits of the scherzo and finale no longer need either explanation or weighing in the balance. The Symphony has arrived, so to speak. Mr. Muench and the orchestra gave it a superb performance.

Mr. Muench began the concert with a charming Suite from Rameau's opera, "Dardanus." The first two movements, "Entree" and "Rondeau du sommell," are slow and stately, with some curious echo effects in the latter. The last two are as lively as can be. Edited by Vincent d'Indy, the Suite is a pleasant addition to the concert repertoire.

After the intermission and before the Roussel we had a sensitive performance of Debussy's "Iberia." Mr. Muench brought aut the extraordinary rhythmical variety to be found in it and the spicy and subtle quality of the orchestration. This may not be Debussy's greatest orchestral work, but it is certainly one of his cleverest.

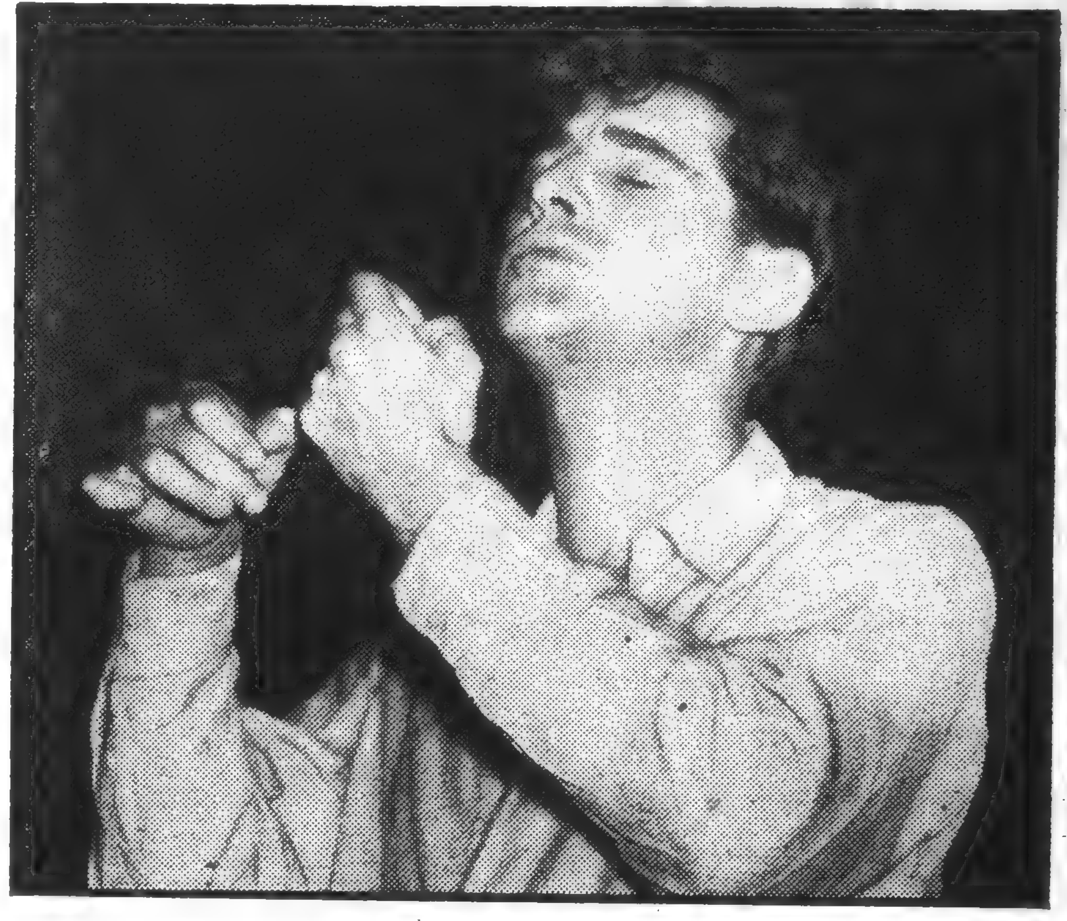
The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Serge Koussevitzky returns to conduct Mozart's Divertimento K. 287, Ravel's 2nd "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
MIRROR
NOV 23 1947

ONLY HUMAN

Do Re Mi—But No Dough

By SIDNEY FIELDS



As a conductor, composer, or pianist Leonard Bernstein shakes music from himself as a bird shakes a song from its throat. His enthusiasm is endless. He's like the young musician who just got a steady job and will never cease being elated about it. At 29 he already has a remarkable record of achievement and could easily earn fabulous sums anywhere. But for the past three years he's practically given up all work everywhere to direct the New York City Symphony—without pay.

IT was at a rehearsal and his secretary, Miss Helen Coates, explained that "Lennie" was preparing a piece by Vaughan Williams. Miss Coates taught Bernstein piano when he was 14 back in Boston, and everybody from the newsdealer to the 80 men and women in the orchestra always call him "Lennie." During a lull one violinist queried a passage in the score . . .

"Natch," said Lennie. "You gotta be exact. With Zarathustra you can get away with murder. Here you can't."

He's medium height, stocky, fiery, and handles his muscular arms and eloquent hands like an expert fighter—no wasted motion. He never uses a baton. But he also loves boogie-woogie, is expert in rhumba and conga, and his versatility as a composer makes you breathless. His symphony "Jeremiah" won the 1944 N. Y. Music Critics Circle Award. He wrote two ballets, "Fancy Free" and "Facsimile," and the musical, "On The Town."

After the rehearsal he wiped the sweat from his face, threw a sport coat over his shoulders, and stopped long enough to settle a score of little aches and problems of his musicians. Then we went down to his office. Miss Coates reminded him of a dozen odd details he had to look after for a dinner concert that same night, and he tried to answer his phone, arrange for the week's program, and talk to me all at once.

He comes from Boston and Harvard, and his father wanted him in his beauty parlor equipment business . . . "I even worked in the shipping room one Summer and hated it." At ten his Aunt Clara stored her upright piano in the Bernstein home. Lennie looked, touched it . . .

"It made pretty sounds, and I screamed, 'Ma, I want piano lessons'."

He's never been away from music since. After a degree in music at Harvard he spent two years at the Curtis Institute, studied under Fritz Reiner. Koussevitzsky taught him conducting at Tanglewood, scene of the Berkshire Festivals. Bernstein is now a teacher at Tanglewood. At 23 he wrote, published and premiered his first work, a clarinet sonata. Rodzinski then hired him as an assistant conductor for the N. Y. Philharmonic.

One night, with Rodzinski away, guest conductor Bruno Walter took sick. Bernstein just had one hour talking to Walter about the program, stepped in, and vaulted to fame overnight.

He's very unhappy when he's not composing, and the light he follows is to make music in every conceivable way. But he hasn't composed anything since he took over the City Symphony three years ago. It's always been a struggle. There's always a deficit and no generous private citizens to make it up . . .

"Everyone thinks the City Symphony is supported by the city. It isn't. They try to make up the deficit by renting the place for ballet and other things. It's a real estate business."

There's no manager so he assumes the duties, persuades friends like Rose Bampton, Jennie Tourel, Sampson Francois, Joseph Szigeti to appear as soloists for free. Last year when he returned from Europe he went to teach at Tanglewood, thereby cutting himself out of the fattest fee ever offered a conductor at the Hollywood Bowl. This year he cancelled his entire European tour, refused one for South America and Australia. He'll just spend some time in Boston, Houston and Minneapolis, and then he'll conduct the Palestine Philharmonic for six weeks with no salary . . .

"But I've put aside next April, May and June just for composing. It will probably be something for the theatre."

When he wants to conduct while playing a solo from the piano at City Center he can't move the piano from the stand in the rehearsal hall to the floor. The stagehands want $70 for that. So he has to do it all from the piano stand. One piece calls for 12 violas, he has only eight. He stays up all night rearranging it.

"And we have to merge our orchestra with the opera orchestra. Some men can play 'Traviata' backwards with their eyes closed, but they can't read two notes of a symphony. Then the critics want to know why we don't sound like the Philharmonic . . . Hey, I've got another rehearsal for the dinner concert tonight. Miss Coates, will you have my tux ready, please?"

"Lennie, you should wear a white tie and tails," Miss Coates said firmly.

"Nonsense," he said, pulling on his raincoat. "Wouldn't think of wearing that at a dinner concert. Tails are silly for a Mozart sonata. The tux, please."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 23 1947

Dr. Weizmann Outlines Aim of New Institute

Palestine Project Will Seek to Aid Unity of Mankind, Birthday Statement Says

Dr. Chaim Weizmann, who in his role as elder statesman of the Zionist movement has still found time to be one of the world's leading scientists, explained in a statement yesterday what he considers to be the purpose of the Weizmann Institute for Science, now being erected in his honor at Rehoveth, Palestine.

The statement was prepared for Dr. Weizmann's seventy-third birthday party, which will be held Tuesday night at the Waldorf-Astoria and will celebrate the completion of the first of the three units planned for the institute. The project was begun in 1945 at an estimated cost of $3,000,000, of which almost $2,000,000 has already been raised.

First Goal Is Pure Science

The immediate goal of the institute will be pure science, Dr. Weizmann said. By this, he explained, he referred to the broad meaning—the pursuit of scientific knowledge and its application to the special conditions of the country—as well as to basic scientific research. This, he said, may help lead the way to advancement and prosperity for Palestine and the Middle East as a whole.

But as a wider aspect, he continued, the institute may lead to forging stronger links between the scientists of Palestine and those of the Western World. Science can be a most potent force toward achieving the "unity of mankind," he said, and in this way the institute may play its part "with all other men of good will and scholarship among all nations and creeds toward the shaping of a new age of knowledge, justice and peace."

Dr. Weizmann's own life bears out his ideas on the close connection that can exist between science and statesmanship. It was in 1917, after Dr. Weizmann had served Great Britain by discovering a synthetic method of producing acetone, vital to the manufacture of munitions, that the Balfour Declaration was signed, promising a national homeland for the Jews in Palestine.

Boston Symphony to Play

Dr. Weizmann's studies of protein foodstuffs touch another field important to international relations in a world where food shortages are considered a threat to peace. Dr. Weizmann has made progress toward converting proteins in vegetable matter into materials that can be digested in the human body, rather than passing through as waste mater, as is the case with the natural product.

On Tuesday Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at the birthday party. About 2,000 persons are expected to pay $250 apiece to attend the party, of which the proceeds will go to the institute.

In Palestine the unit already completed at the institute is to be devoted to physics and physical chemistry. The other two units are to be for the study of biology and pharmacology and for research on plastics.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 25 1947

Party to Honor Weizmann Will Be Held Tonight

Dr. Chaim Weizmann, former president of the Jewish Agency for Palestine, will be honored tonight at a special concert and midnight supper in the grand ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria. The celebration will mark Dr. Weizmann's seventy-third birthday and the completion of the physics and physical chemistry building of the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovoth, Palestine. Sponsor of the affair is the American Committee for the Weizmann Institute, headed by Edmund I. Kaufmann.

Abraham Feinberg, chairman of the reception committee, will open the proceedings at 8:40 p. m. A concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will follow until 10:30 p. m., at which time Henry Morgenthau jr. will introduce Dr. Weizmann. Proceeds from the guest charge of $250 a person will go to the Weizmann Institute.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 26 1947

Dr. Weizmann Is Honored at 73-Year Dinner

2,000 Pay $250 a Plate to Aid Palestine Institute; Boston Symphony Plays

Dr. Chaim Weizmann, the elder statesman of modern Zionism, was honored last night by 2,000 scientists and Jewish leaders in the grand ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria. The Boston Symphony Orchestra played a full concert in tribute to him at the approach of his seventy-third birthday.

The guests paid $250 a plate for a buffet dinner served after the concert to raise $500,000 to complete the $3,000,000 pledge of the American Committee for the Weizmann Institute of Science under construction at Rehovoth, Palestine.

The almost blind former leader of the Jewish Agency for Palestine spoke briefly. In an optimistic reference to the vote of 25 to 13 in favor of Holy Land partition in the United Nations Palestine Committee at Lake Success, L. I., yesterday, lacking by one vote the required two-thirds majority to approve the partition, Dr. Weizmann said:

"I would not like to prophesy, but maybe tomorrow night the nations of the world will have cast their vote in favor of a Jewish state.

"I hope that tomorrow we will at last stop dreaming and will face hard fact and reality, this time pleasant reality."

"When the Jewish state finally comes into being," he concluded, "then God will look down with a fatherly eye upon his children, who after a long wandering have come home to serve him with a psalm on their lips and a spade in their hands, reviving the old land and making it a center for human civilization."

All day yesterday Dr. Weizmann, who will be seventy-three tomorrow and who has been a Zionist since he was ten, received telegrams from Zionist groups throughout the world, many of them hailing him as "the first president of the Jewish state."

American and Palestine Flags

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky began the concert at 8:45 with the "Star Spangled Banner" and the "Hatikvah"—the Palestinian national anthem. The 110-piece orchestra was crowded on a platform at the north end of the ballroom, which was decorated only with American flags and blue-and-white Palestinian banners bearing a six-pointed star.

The rest of the program was Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony No. 4; Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, the "Eroica." The concert was heard over WJZ and the American Broadcasting Company network from 9:30 to 10:30 p. m.

George Judd, the orchestra manager, said it was "the first time that the Boston Symphony has paid a personal tribute of this kind to any one individual outside the field of music." The orchestra played the concert as a benefit performance, and received only its travel expenses.

Among the guests were former Governor Herbert H. Lehman; William S. Paley, chairman of the board of the Columbia Broadcasting System, and former Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau jr., who introduced Dr. Weizmann. Among the scientists present were Dr. Otto Loewi, of New York University, and Dr. I. Rabi, of Columbia University.

It was the first time that the Boston Symphony has played in any hotel ballroom. Tests which were made by the A. B. C. in advance of the concert proved the spacious hall acoustically satisfactory.

The dinner marked the completion of the physics and physical chemistry building of the Weizmann Institute in Palestine.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

NOV 26 1947

Weizmann Dinner Swells Zion Fund

The American Committee for the Weizmann Institute, now being completed in Palestine, today was richer by $500,000 as the result of a $250-per-plate dinner in honor of Dr. Chaim Weizmann, elder statesman of Zionism, last night in the Waldorf-Astoria.

Proceeds will be used to further the progress of the institute which is at Rehovath, Palestine. The dinner served to mark the 73d birthday of the guest of honor and the completion of a major unit at the institute.

The evening was replete with tributes to the famous scientist, including a concert in his honor by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—its first tribute to an individual — and acclaim of a suggestion to make him first president of the proposed new Jewish state in Palestine.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 23 1947

MUSIC ON THE RADIO

By B. H. HAGGIN

IT WAS interesting to hear Prokofieff's Classical Symphony as it was played by Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony on their Nov. 11 broadcast over A. B. C., and then, a few days later, to hear what Toscanini made of it with the N. B. C. Symphony. The Koussevitzky-Boston Symphony performance—particularly of the first and last movements—is all sound, fabulous in its radiance and refinement, the incorporeal lightness with which it floats off as it is tossed in the air; and as such it is one of the wonders of modern orchestral performance. On the other hand the Toscanini performance is all texture—extraordinarily clear, and enlivened by sharp phraseological inflection; and certainly it is wonderful in its own way.

But on Nov. 15 it was like nothing by the side of what Toscanini's taste as a musician and powers as a conductor achieved with Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony. For those who had been made contemptuous of this work by the overemphatic, vehement distortions of it that have become traditional it must have been a shock, and to some it may have been a revelation, to hear the symphony with all the traditional distortions removed—to hear it, that is, played as Tchaikovsky himself directs, and with beautifully integrated tonal values and plastic proportions which restored to it the organic coherence, the dramatic power and the artistic validity of which the Koussevitzkys and Stokowskis, great and small, had robbed it.

* * *

I was able to hear only part of what was broadcast over WNYC from the Juilliard School's three concerts of Ernest Bloch's music. I was especially interested in two interludes from the opera "Macbeth" (1910) that I had never heard before; and was astonished to hear how completely the first one was in the French idiom of the period, but equally astonished to hear in the second only the unmistakable beginnings of Bloch's own idiom. Some other works that I heard for the first time—"Prelude" (1924), "Night" (1925) "In the Mountains" (1925) for string quartet, the two Psalms (1912-1914)—struck me as feeble, and the Piano Sonata (1936) as a rehashing of old ideas. Of the familiar works I did not hear the Viola Suite (1919) and "Schelomo" (1915), which haven't impressed me as they used to. But the "Israel" Symphony (1916) now seemed to me one of Bloch's best works—the Quintet for piano and strings (1924) being another.

One thing I must speak of is the wonderful playing of the Juilliard School student orchestra—the kind of playing which, as a friend observed, one would get only from such young, as well as brilliantly gifted, musicians, and we had got from the young musicians of the Philadelphia Orchestra many years ago.

* * *

Accustomed to seeing the N. B. C. String Quartet marked "except WNBC" on the network announcement, I didn't notice that WNBC was to be included last Sunday. When I discovered it and tuned in the performance of William Schuman's Quartet No. 3 was about half-completed; however, the remaining quarter-hour of what was portentous utterance to Mr. Schuman but only raucous ranting to me was quite enough. It turned out that WNBC had been included only for this special occasion; and the N. B. C. Quartet's performances of Mozart and Beethoven will continue not to be heard by New York listeners.

On A. B. C.'s Coffee Concert last Sunday the Halvorsen fantasia on Handel's Passacaglia from his Harpsichord Suite No. 7, played by Harry Cykman, violinist, and Emanuel Vardi, violist, left time for only one movement of Mozart's Duo K.423. I would have had it the other way around.

I listened to the WNYC broadcast from the Frick Collection last Sunday only long enough to hear that use of the normal concert microphone had corrected the faulty balance of treble and bass in the sound of the piano as it had been transmitted previously, and was now transmitting a sound that was natural and clear throughout (though a little dull, possibly because of the way the instrument was being played by Albert Spalding's accompanist or because of its distance from the microphone).

This afternoon, at the Frick Collection, the Albeneri Trio plays Mozart's K.548, Beethoven's Opus 97 and a Trio by Artur Schnabel. On Saturday Toscanini and the N. B. C. Symphony will play Debussy's "La Mer." And here are some additional programs of the week:

Today—A. M.: Mozart's Quintet for piano and winds, played by the New York Woodwind Quintet, WNYC, 11:30. P. M.: Quartets of Mozart and Schubert, played by the WQXR Quartet, WQXR, 6; Brahms's Variations on a theme of Schumann, played by Artur Balsam, WNYC, 8; Purcell's Golden Sonata, WQXR, 10.

Monday—P. M.: Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 11, WNYC, 7; Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 1, Wagner's "Faust" Overture, WQXR, 8.

Tuesday—P. M.: Handel's Harpsichord Concerto in B flat, WQXR, 8.

Wednesday—P M.: Rehearsal of the National Orchestral Association, WNYC, 6; Mozart's Violin Concerto K. 219, WQXR, 11:20.

Thursday—A. M.: Mahler's Symphony No. 4, WQXR, 10. P. M.: Mozart's Piano Concerto K 482, Delius's "Walk to the Paradise Gardens," WQXR, 1; Mozart's Symphony K. 338, WQXR, 11.

Friday—P. M.: Mozart's Ballet Music, "Les Petits Reins," WQXR, 6:30; recorded performances by Lotte Lehmann, WQXR, 7; Bartok's Violin Concerto, from the Juilliard School, WNYC, 8:30.

Saturday—P.M.: Haydn's Symphony No. [illegible], WNYC, 2:15; Prokofieff's Scythian Suite, WQXR, 3:30; Mozart's Quartet K. [illegible], WNYC, 4; Mozart's Piano Concerto K. 450, Debussy's "Iberia," WQXR, 8, Haydn's Quartet, Opus 55, No. 3, WQXR, 11.

ld, many of
as "the first ish state."
stine Flags vitsky began ith the "Star l the "Hatikan national ece orchestra tform at the lroom, which ith American White Pale-ring a six-program was n" Symphony Overture to and Bee-
No. 3, the rt was heard e American any network
. m.
he orchestra as "the first n Symphony ribute of this dividual out-ic." The or-concert as a and received ses.
were former
H. Lehman; airman of the ia Broadcastner Secretary nry Morgen-roduced Dr.
the scientists to Loewi, of
, and Dr. I.
niversity.
ime that the as played in Tests which
B. C. in adt proved the tically satis-
l the compleand physical of the Weizalestine.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH

COMING HERE . . . Serge Koussevitzky, pictured as he rehearses the Boston Symphony which he will direct in a May Beegle Concert at the Syria Mosque next Tuesday, under auspices of Orchestra Association

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

N

2,000 at Weizmann Dinner Cheer 'First President of Jewish State'

Testimonial to World Zionist Leader Makes Swift Transition Here Into Something of a Political Rally for Him

A testimonial dinner to Dr Chaim Weizmann, world Zionist leader, made a swift transition last night into something of a political rally to make him the first President of the proposed new Jewish state in Palestine.

The dinner, which was sponsored by the American Committee for the Weizmann Institute, was held at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel and had been scheduled originally to celebrate Dr. Weizmann's seventy-third birthday, which occurs tomorrow; the completion of a major unit of the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovath, and to raise funds to further the progress of the institute.

However, a reference by Abraham Feinberg, chairman of the dinner reception committee, to Dr. Weizmann as "the first President of the new Jewish state" was applauded by the audience of 2,000 that had come to honor him for his years of service to world science and Jewish aspirations for a national home.

The dinner was the type of tribute reserved for few mortals, including as it did a special concert played in his honor by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

Never in its history had the Boston Symphony, for which special arrangements had to be made in the Waldorf's Grand Ballroom, paid so spectacular a tribute to a single individual.

The orchestra, which contributed its services to the occasion, played in addition to "The Star-Spangled Banner" and "Hatikvah," Mendelssohn's "Symphony No. 4," Beethoven's "Egmont Overture" and Beethoven's "Third Symphony." Kurt Weill arranged a special score for "Hatikvah."

Proceeds from the dinner, which was $250 a plate, amounted to an estimated $500,000 that will go into a fund that finances the construction program and work of the Weizmann institute. On Nov. 27, 1944, plans for the institute were first announced, and a year later Dr. Weizmann, again on the anniversary of his birthday, received a $1,250,000 contribution by American Jews as a contribution in part to his science center.

While dedicated to Dr. Weizmann and the institute, the dinner gathering also took cognizance of the virtual achievement of a Jewish national home, one of the principal items on the agenda of the current United Nations Assembly meeting.

This was summed up in Mr. Feinberg's introductory remarks in a dinner brochure that said: "This celebration comes at a specially auspicious moment. The great dream of Dr. Weizmann, to which he devoted the full fire of his heart and mind—the establishment of a Jewish state—appears to be on the threshold of fulfillment. May the Weizmann Institute of Science serve the Jewish homeland as purely and passionately as did the great scientist in whose honor it is named."

These sentiments were repeated in the speech of former Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau Jr., who introduced Dr. Weizmann, hailing him as the spiritual leader of the Jewish people.

"The scientist, the teacher, the British citizen," Mr. Morgenthau said, "become simultaneously the ambassador to the outside world of the countless thousands still condemned to the ghetto. But at long last, the various activities of Dr. Weizmann's life are about to merge—in Palestine."

Equally laudatory messages came from all parts of the world, including one from Dr. Albert Einstein, a sponsor of the dinner, who said, "In these days of fateful decision, you have presented our case before the world with a vision that no other among us could muster."

Dr. Weizmann said that the fight of the Jewish people for a homeland still hung in the balance and that a new setback would have serious consequences.

"But we are inured to setbacks," he said, "and we will carry on our work."

He said he would rather not contemplate such possibilities, adding, "I cannot imagine that this great country, together with the other great powers, will not make a supreme effort to bring to a successful conclusion that task which it so nobly begun."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

NOV 28 1947

The New Records

Two Koussevitzky Reissues — The Art of Menahem Pressler—'High Button Shoes.'

By IRVING KOLODIN.

Considering that both the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven and the "Surprise" of Haydn have been phonographic fare for more than a decade in Victor versions by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra it would seem that, come reissue time, some true evaluation of them should have been reached. That is, the qualifications of Koussevitzky relative to them and to other possible, preferable interpreters.

It is conceivable that instead of having up-to-date versions of both, we might have been denied the better—his treatment of the "Surprise"—and been granted only the inferior (the "Eroica"). Let there be gratitude, then, that RCA, if not critical, is at least generous. The Haydn is a dream of a performance, full of relevant spirit and sensitivity, paced with a full sense of its particular humours and humour. I doubt that there has been a finer playing of the andante ever on records, and the swift but beautifully controlled finale is an even greater credit to the Boston men than such a famous showpiece as "Daphnis and Chloe."

The "Eroica" is hardly recognizable as the work of a musician capable of Koussevitzky's "Surprise." Tempos are held back, rubatos inserted where Beethoven indicated none, and the essential mechanism of the work—especially the first movement—tampered with like a boy investigating a watch to see what makes it go. In neither case is the article as good afterward as it was before. There is much less of this in the funeral march, which is well paced and carefully phrased. The scherzo goes well, but the treatment of the finale is a little casual, without full value of the noble qualities the music contains. Of the two, the Haydn is decidedly a better recording, for the bass in the "Eroica" rumbles and the high end is deficient in clarity. ("Eroica," Victor album 1161; "Surprise," Victor album 1155.)

PRINCESS AT SYMPHONY

Crown Princess Martha of Norway, who has been visiting in Boston, stopped to chat with Henry B. Cabot before going into the Friday Symphony yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall.

[34]

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1947

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Yesterday's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall was another experience of the marvelous—and almost incredible—beauties of modern orchestral performance and interpretation. It left you, at the end, thrilled and exalted and just a little stunned.

Serge Koussevitzky and his orchestra of virtuosi accomplished this feat with Mozart's B-flat Divertimento (K. 287); second of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suites, and "Harold in Italy" by Hector Berlioz. The soloist in the last-named was Joseph de Pasquale, the new first viola of the orchestra.

When you become accustomed to the best orchestral performance, as do those who have the good fortune to hear the Boston Symphony weekly, you are inclined to say: "Ravel's 'Daphnis and Chloe' has never been so well played, and it couldn't be done better."

For once, I think such a claim is justified, for Koussevitzky's reading of it is one of the finest things he has ever accomplished.

This example of "decorative art," as Mr. Koussevitzky himself might call it, requires unlimited technical virtuosity, richness of tone, color of sound and passionate imagination. Yesterday's performance met every requirement. The same was true with Berlioz' fervid romantic masterpiece of musical suggestion and description.

Mr. de Pasquale's share of the performance was admirable in every sense, and the instrument on which he played gave out a truly noble tone. He brought extreme grace of phrasing to the solo part and yet he did not make it stand out above the rest of the score, as might a violist accustomed to playing solos all the time. He is a superb musician.

Mozart's B-flat Divertimento frequently suggests the sad, introspective and troubled Mozart of the Requiem and the last three symphones. It has a recitative-like character in the final movement that looks ahead to Beethoven.

Accordingly, Mr. Koussevitzky was probably entitled to read it as he did, with strong emotional tension. Yet, purely as a matter of individual opinion, I feel that he laid too heavy a hand upon this lovely music, which could have been more relaxed and lyrical. But it did "sound" with incomparable brilliance of string tone.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Whereas at the Symphony Concerts of last week, presided over by Charles Muench, everything was new—new music, new interpretations and a new high in platform strenuosity — yesterday everything was familiar, as to conductor, program and performances. The last part of this statement needs a bit of qualifying. Dr. Koussevitzky's pretext for playing Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" so soon again (we had heard it four times since he revived it in the spring of '42) was that the orchestra has a new first viola, Joseph de Pasquale, and this is the piece in which one displays a new first violist. And perhaps some would say that Mozart's charming Divertimento in B-flat, for strings and two horns, was not exactly familiar, since there have been but two previous performances at Symphony Hall, one in October, '38, and the other in January, '45. There was also a performance at last summer's Berkshire Festival.

Several years ago in New York's Carnegie Hall the late Maurice Ravel heard Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony play the Second Suite from his ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," and he declared that he did not know that his music could sound so well. If he had been in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon he could have made the same comment, no matter how many orchstras and how many conductors he had heard do the piece in the meantime. The music wears well, particularly when presented in such splendiferous fashion. We think of Ravel as a musical etcher; in this work, however, he spreads a large canvas and fills it with colors rich and brilliant. By little other music is the ear so caressed and stimulated.

Neither Mozart nor Berlioz would have believed the evidence of their senses had they heard their respective pieces on this occasion. To be sure, Mozart had no such large body of strings in mind when he wrote this Divertimento at the age of 21. As heard yesterday the work had the sound of a true symphony, and since it lasts well over a half hour, it has also the dimensions of one.

Mr. De Pasquale is an excellent viola player, and the orchestra is fortunate in having him. That his performance made you forget the recent ones by Messrs. Bailly, Primrose and Veissi may hardly be said. And now, Dr. Koussevitzky, will you please give "Harold" a rest? For all the genius that the work exhibits, it is not good enough to deserve such emphasis. And it may be said that no symphony of comparable importance ever began so well only to end so badly.

RDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1947

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 7th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Joseph de Pasquale, violist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Divertimento in B flat major for Strings and Two Horns (K. 287) .... Mozart
Suite No. 2 from "Daphnis et Chloe" . Ravel
"Harold in Italy," Symphony Op 16 . Berlioz

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky were in superb form yesterday and delivered three performances, at least one of which could not have been duplicated, it might safely be hazarded, in the world today. That, of course, was the extraordinarily brilliant realization of Ravel's 2nd "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite. The fact that Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra have done this same miraculous feat so often in the past does but make it the more remarkable that the interpretation is just as fresh and the sonorities as miraculously clear and lovely as ever. That there were bravos after it as well as applause is not surprising.

Mozart's utterly charming Divertimento for strings and two horns, which opened the program, was also beautifully played by those instruments. The piece has come to be reasonably familiar through Dr. Koussevitzky's espousal of it, and it can readily stand repetition. Some of the novelties in the score must have startled the guests at the Countess' party, if they listened at all attentively. I suppose it was more fun for Mozart to compose original and interesting stuff in these occasional pieces to order than to turn out routine work which would have bored him. At any rate the Andante Theme and Variations, to name only one movement, is captivating music and highly ingenious. It is amusing to note the quantity of syncopation he got into it. But all the movements have their special points of beauty, and as a whole the Divertimento is one of those sunny and ingratiating scores which Mozart had the secret of more deftly than anyone else.

Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" was also given a resplendent performance and amply demonstrated the beautiful tone and fine execution of the orchestra's first viola, Joseph de Pasquale. The work has become a great favorite with Dr. Koussevitzky, and I note that he is not neglecting it on the orchestra's amiably named "western" tour next week (ultimum occidental stop—Chicago)! But is it not time that he turned his attention to other, more neglected music by Berlioz?

The solo viola acts as a sort of Byronic meditator on the scenes and music of Berlioz's imagination. Beyond that it would be unwise to explore the influence of Byron on the composer. The finale I find the least satisfactory of the Symphony. The Brigands' Orgy no longer sounds as such a festivity must surely have, and the recollections of the preceding scenes are a little like the turkey warmed over after Thanksgiving. Still there is lots of wonderful music in the other three movements.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for Dec. 12 and 13 offers Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5, with Nadia Reisenberg as soloist, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

Amusement News . .

Music Tryouts Will Be Held In Cincinnati

Auditions for the student orchestras of the Berkshire Music Center will be held in Cincinnati by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who are also members of the school faculty, during their visit on Wednesday, Dec. 3.

The Berkshire Music Center is operated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Dr. Serge Kousevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, as director, and the composer, Aaron Copland, as assistant director. The sixth season of the Music Center will be held at Tanglewood—Lenox, Mass., from July 5 to Aug. 15, 1948. The auditions will be held as follows:

Baldwin Piano Co., 142 W. Fourth-st, Cincinnati—Strings, 10 a. m.; Woodbinds, 11 a. m.; Brass, 11:30 a. m.; Piano, 12 noon.

Music Hall, Cincinnati (backstage): Harp, 7 p. m.; Tympani, 7 p. m.

Formal application for admission to the Music Center may be made at the time of audition. Inquiries regarding the Music Center should be addressed to Thomas D. Perry Jr., Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

1947

ROYALTY AT SYMPHONY—Her Royal Highness, Crown Princess Martha of Norway and Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees of Boston Symphony Orchestra, admire a portrait of Serge Koussevitzky, the noted symphony conductor, during intermission of yesterday's afternoon program.

Crown Princess of Norway Unrecognized at Symphony

By ELIZABETH SCHOPPE

A tall, regal woman, who will some day be Queen of Norway, yesterday afternoon sat in the first balcony at Symphony Hall and, unrecognized by the scores of other music lovers about her, heard the world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

Her Royal Highness Crown Princess Martha unobtrusively entered the hall and left in the same manner, while the Friday afternoon throng of symphony-goers milled about, unaware of her presence.

Princess Martha's attendance at Symphony was believed to be her first public appearance since leaving Phillips House of the Massachusetts General Hospital, where she was released several days ago after a successful spinal fusion operation in September. She is expected to sail for home next week.

The princess, a beautiful woman with a warm smile, wore a simple dark red, two-piece knitted suit, a matching dark red hat with feathers, low-heeled alligator slippers and a double string of pearls.

Accompanied by Dr. Marius Smith-Petersen of Newton, the orthopedic surgeon who performed the operation; Mrs. Smith-Petersen and a lady-in-waiting, Mrs. Ragni Ostergaard, Princess Martha arrived at Symphony Hall about 15 minutes before concert time.

She entered the hall by the stage door and was taken in the freight elevator to the second floor, where she went to the conductor's room. There she received the familiar courtly bow from Dr. Koussevitzky and a curtsy from Miss Marie de Leuchtenberger, the conductor's secretary. Miss de Leuchtenberger [illegible] of the Duchess Anna de Leuchtenberger of Nice France, and a niece of Mrs. Koussevitzky.

The princess was greeted also by Mrs. Koussevitzky, Henry B. Cabot president of the trustees of Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs Cabot and George E. Judd, symphony manager.

Following the concert, during which Princess Martha and her party occupied the Koussevitzky's seats, she expressed her appreciation to Dr. Koussevitzky and left the hall by the stage door.

[35]

Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV 29 1947

Throttled and Unthrottled

2

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 3. "Eroica." Serge Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Victor album 1161, $7.20, or Vinylite V-8, $13.50). Symphony No. 4. George Szell and the Cleveland Orchestra. (Columbia album 705, $5.85).

A new Koussevitzky "Eroica" is about as urgent a requirement as a new Toscanini "Blue Danube" waltz. As in the earlier recording made abroad, Koussevitzky begins the "Eroica" with impressive dispatch and celerity, throttle open, headed at headlong speed for the ultimate destination. Suddenly, however, the second subject appears, and the train of thought becomes a local, noting each little gradation of expression as a hill to be surmounted. Oddly enough, this does not add to its "expressivity." The "Marche Funèbre" is delivered as a eulogy rather than an oration, which is applaudable; and the orchestral playing throughout is, in a word, peerless. However, the ethical implications of the finale are missed, and the several poorly-chosen breaks, the reverberation behind the sound, are no endearing factors.

Szell's No. 4 is clean, crisp, and continent—adjectives of praise were there not better values in the older versions of Toscanini and Weingartner. One hears more of the conductor's conception here than in the older works; but in them, one prefers what can be heard. Since the recent Beecham (Victor) was over-stressed and unsettled, the situation remains at status quo, as regards an improved recording. There is good range in this sound, also fuzziness of texture, and some uncertainties of performance by the solo woodwinds. Szell is specially deficient in the adagio, which asks the tightest kind of control of the orchestra, which he does not achieve.

IRVING KOLODIN.

Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N. Y.
NOV 29 1947

Throttled and Unthrottled

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 3. "Eroica." Serge Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Victor album 1161, $7.20, or Vinylite V-8, $13.50). Symphony No. 4. George Szell and the Cleveland Orchestra. (Columbia album 705, $5.85).

A new Koussevitzky "Eroica" is about as urgent a requirement as a new Toscanini "Blue Danube" waltz. As in the earlier recording made abroad, Koussevitzky begins the "Eroica" with impressive dispatch and celerity, throttle open, headed at headlong speed for the ultimate destination. Suddenly, however, the second subject appears, and the train of thought becomes a local, noting each little gradation of expression as a hill to be surmounted. Oddly enough, this does not add to its "expressivity." The "Marche Funèbre" is delivered as a eulogy rather than an oration, which is applaudable; and the orchestral playing throughout is, in a word, peerless. However, the ethical implications of the finale are missed, and the several poorly-chosen breaks, the reverberation behind the sound, are no endearing factors.

Szell's No. 4 is clean, crisp, and continent—adjectives of praise were there not better values in the older versions of Toscanini and Weingartner. One hears more of the conductor's conception here than in the older works; but in them, one prefers what can be heard. Since the recent Beecham (Victor) was over-stressed and unsettled, the situation remains at status quo, as regards an improved recording. There is good range in this sound, also fuzziness of texture, and some uncertainties of performance by the solo woodwinds. Szell is specially deficient in the adagio, which asks the tightest kind of control of the orchestra, which he does not achieve.

IRVING KOLODIN.

ON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 29, 1947 Art—Music—Theater *5

Koussevitzky with Varied Program

Mozart, Ravel, Berlioz at Week-End Symphony

By L. A. Sloper

[illegible] returned to [illegible] Symphony hall yesterday [illegible] conduct with tremendous [illegible] the seventh program [illegible] season. This consisted of [illegible]'s Divertimento in B flat [illegible] strings and two horns [illegible] Ravel's Second Suite [illegible] the Ballet, "Daphnis et [illegible]" and Berlioz's "Harold in [illegible]" Symphony, with the new [illegible] viola, Joseph de Pasquale, as [illegible].

The Mozart Divertimento had a [illegible] full of zest, as if the [illegible] and the men were en[illegible] to the full the invention, the [illegible], the playfulness of this [illegible] piece written by a boy [illegible] a patron's birthday or [illegible] casual celebration. It [illegible] astonishing that so much musical thought should be expended for such a trivial occasion. Evidently the composer never held [illegible] back, never worried about his inspiration.

The performance was of the utmost virtuosity. The allegro, the theme with variations, the minuet, all sparkled with wit and joy. The [illegible] was perfect except for a little overemphasis in a ritard just before the end. And what a delightful fancy is the play on the idea of a recitative and aria in the final movement.

Alas, this work had the effect of making everything that came after it seem not only labored but empty and pompous. Ravel's Suite, which ordinarily seems so exciting, yesterday sounded repetitious and banal. Had the man only one or two ideas in his head? Can orchestration cover up poverty of thought? Not after Mozart.

So with "Harold in Italy." We have heard this work when it seemed melodious, nostalgic, sentimental, and frenetic. Dr. Koussevitzky worked as hard as ever, but he was unable to make the piece come to life. Partly it was Mozart, still weaving his spell and mocking at all this fuss and fury. Partly it was Mr. de Pasquale, who, perhaps because of nervousness, failed to put life into the work. His tone at the beginning was broad and full, but presently it was drowned by the orchestra, and it never reappeared. Intonation became insecure, the approach was tentative, and the playing lacked assurance, power and authority. No doubt this was due in part to the difficulty of a first performance, and very likely we shall hear Mr. de Pasquale again under happier circumstances.

Sunday, Nov. 30, 1947
The Pittsburgh Press

MUSIC EVENTS of the week include the appearance Tuesday evening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky (above left) the leader.

Boston Symphony Concert at Mosque Sponsored by Orchestra Association

THE WEEK'S MUSIC CALENDAR

TODAY: Pittsburgh Symphony, Fritz Reiner conductor. Syria Mosque, 3 p. m.

MONDAY: Bach Choir, Dr. J. Julius Baird conductor. Carnegie Music Hall, 8:30 p. m.

TUESDAY: Boston Symphony, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor. Syria Mosque, 8:30 p. m.

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will give a concert Tuesday at Syria Mosque. The event is sponsored by the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association. The program comprises Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, Hindemith's "Mathis der Mahler," the prelude to Moussorgsky's "Khovanstchina" and Tschaikowsky's 6th symphony.

Auditions for the Berkshire Center student orchestras will be held Dec. 3 in Cincinnati by Boston Symphony members during the Orchestra's visit there. The Berkshire Music Center is operated by the Boston Symphony headed by Dr. Koussevitzky with Composer Aaron Copland as assistant.

The Center's sixth season at Lenox, Mass., will extend from July 5 to Aug. 15.

The Cincinnati auditions will be held for harp and tympani at 7 p. m. on Dec. 3 in the music hall backstage.

The strings, woodwinds, brass and piano will be heard at the Baldwin Piano Company, 142 West 4th St., Cincinnati, at 10 a. m., 11, 11:30 and noon.

Formal application to the Music Center may be made at the time of audition. Further information is obtainable from Thomas D. Perry, Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

DALLAS, TEX.
TIMES HERALD

On the RECORD

In the recording of Beethoven's "Symphony No. 3" (Eroica), Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra give a performance that lives up to optimistic expectations.

The Koussevitsky interpretation has the directness, technical accuracy and vitality that make a work come to life. Especially is this true of the fourth movement, which has a relentless drive that never relaxes for an instant. For some listeners the reading of the second movement, the celebrated "Marche Funebre," may lack in sympathetic warmth and monumental drama. The Boston Orchestra plays this funeral music with precision and controlled tenderness.

Recording is good. (RCA Victor DM-1161).

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT & LEADER

[illegible]

AUDITIONS FOR

[illegible] orchestras of the Berkshire [illegible] Center will be held [illegible] Chicago by members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, [illegible] members of the school [illegible] their visit to Chicago [illegible] 6th. The Berkshire [illegible] is operated by the Boston Symphony orchestra [illegible] Koussevitsky as director [illegible] Aaron Copland [illegible] The sixth [illegible] Center will be held [illegible] Lenox, Mass. [illegible] August 15, 1948. The [illegible] Chicago will be [illegible] at Orchestra [illegible] at 10 a. m. on [illegible] Tympani at Orchestra [illegible] December 5th at 7:30 p. m. [illegible] Saturday, December [illegible] at the Baldwin [illegible] South Wabash Ave., [illegible] harp at Lyon and [illegible] South Wabash Ave. [illegible] December 6th. Formal [illegible] admission to the [illegible] may be made at the time [illegible].

Pittsburgh Sun Telegraph - Sunday, Nov. 30, 1947

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Give Program Tuesday Night at Mosque

By J. FRED LISSFELT
Sun-Telegraph Music Critic

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA will pay us a lone visit this season under auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association.

Serge Koussevitzky, like so many directors of American symphony orchestras, is constantly watching for talented native as well as foreign composers, and on every possible occasion gives them hearing.

For the concert Tuesday night in Syria Mosque he had originally planned a work of Honegger, whom we should hear in Pittsburgh, but has since changed the program to include Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," which is not unknown in our own orchestra's programs.

Prokofieff's "Classic Symphony" and Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina" may be raised from the casual by Koussevitzky's playing of Tchaikowsky's "Pathetique" Symphony, a style in which he excels.

* * *

RETURNING . . .
Serge Kossevitzky is the world - renowned conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert at Syria Mosque Tuesday night under auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association.

INDIANAPOLIS IND
STAR
NOV 30 1947

MAESTRO—Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert in the Indiana University auditorium Thursday.

Boston Orchestra Will Play Varied Program At Indiana U.

Bloomington, Ind., Nov. 29

ONE OF THE HIGHLIGHTS of Indiana University's current auditorium series will be Thursday evening, Dec. 4, with the appearance on the AA Division of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The orchestra will make only two appearances in Indiana this year, the I.U. concert and another in South Bend Saturday evening, Dec. 6.

More than 800,000 people heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the concerts of its season last year. There are two reasons for the enormous increase in the orchestra's public in recent years. One is its extended activity in the summer season and the other is the manifold means which carry the orchestra to the country at large and other parts of the world by the radio and the phonograph.

When the orchestra appears at the university Thursday evening, the following program will be presented:

"Classical" Symphony in D major,
Op. 25 ....Prokofieff
Allegro
Larghetto
Gavotte: Non troppo allegro
Finale: Molto vivace
Symphony, "Mathis der Maler"...Hindemith
("Matthias the Painter")
Angelic Concert
Entombment
Temptation of St. Anthony
Symphony No. 3, in E flat, "Eroica,"
Op. 55 ....Beethoven
Allegro con brio
Marcia funebre: Adagio assai
Scherzo: Allegro vivace; Trio
Finale: Allegro molto

CINCINNATI, OHIO
TIMES-STAR
DEC 1 - 1947

OVERTONES

BY HOWARD W. HESS

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presented in Music Hall Wednesday night, Dec. 3, by J. H. Thuman as the third attraction on the Artist Series. While in Cincinnati the members of the orchestra who are also faculty members of the Berkshire Music Center will hold auditions for the student orchestras that will be assembled for the sixth season, to be held at Tanglewood—Lenox, Mass.—from July 5 to Aug. 15, 1948.

The auditions will be held at the Baldwin Piano Co., 142 West Fourth Street, Dec. 3: strings at 10 a. m., woodwinds at 11, brass at 11:30 and piano at noon. Harp and tympani auditions will be held back stage at Music Hall at 7 p. m.

Koussevitsky has chosen a program of familiar orchestral works for his Cincinnati appearance. The "Italian Symphony" of Mendelssohn, the "Daphne and Chloe" Suite No. 2 of Ravel, and the Tschaikowsky "Pathetique" Symphony No. 6.

The Boston orchestra was founded in 1881 by Henry Lee Higginson 14 years before the founding of the Cincinnati orchestra.

Sir George Henschel was the first conductor. Koussevitsky has held the post of conductor since 1924, following a long list of eminent conductors including Gerick, Nikisch, Karl Muck, Max-Fiedler, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux. In the two-week respite taken each year by Koussevitsky since 1924 many famous guest conductors have been presented. Eugene Goossens and Chalmers Clifton are two that Cincinnatians have known as residents.

Simon & Schuster have published "Fireside Book of Folk Songs" that should be added to your list of Christmas gifts. The 147 songs include old favorites, sea, shanties, cowboy songs, hymns, railroad songs, songs of valor, spirituals and Christmas carols. 500 color pictures, excellently drawn by Alice and Martin Provensen, illustrate the volumn. Margaret Bradford Boni chose the songs that were arranged for piano by Norman Loyd. Fireside singing is being revived and this work is just right for groups of family and friends.

Susan Reed, captivating ballad singer, will come to Cincinnati Thursday, Dec. 11, for a performance in Wilson Auditorium. Miss Reed, daughter of Playwright Daniel Reed and Isadora Bennett, executive of the American Theater Wing, has sung folk songs and ballads since childhood. She has learned many songs from mountain singers, madrigales at New York's fashionable Church of the Ascension and has a wide repertoiry of all sorts of folk songs and ballads. She has appeared at night clubs at Town Hall and on the Columbia concerts. She has signed a contract for her first motion picture—not so bad for a red-haired, green-eyed girl of 20.

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 3, 1947 PITTSBURGH SUN-TELEGRAPH

Boston Orchestra Hailed By Throng in Mosque

By J. FRED LISSFELT

The combination of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony will always fil. Syria Mosque, as last night's audience proved. This audience is always so secure that I often wonder why we so often hear Tchaikowsky with the many great symphonies awaiting a glowing performance by these players.

Serge Koussevitsky is, however, a devotee of the contemporary composer, and so we heard Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" again in its truly gothic grandeur.

On second hearing of this work, it is just that feature which is so predominant and which Hindemith so aptiy expressed through his flamboyant use of polyphonic forms.

The rich body of sound possible with the Boston's instruments enhances such effect, the mighty medieval hymn soaring with magnificent exaltation beyond the modern dissonances.

HERO SAVED——

The admirable quality of Koussevitsky's Tchaikowsky is that he saves his hero from any submission to despondency and at least brings him earthly salvation.

Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" opened the program, a work now heard played by all the visiting orchestras and our own. With the Boston orchestra it attains a brilliance which is just short of shrillness, rather difficult to avoid with virtuoso players.

A charming interlude before the symphony was Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina," difficult enough to relate to the story of the drama, yet far richer in Russian moods than the oftener heard "Night on Bald Mountain." Momentarily the orchestra here gave us less of volume and considerable more of its magic color.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
DEC 3 - 194

Boston Orchestra Hailed By Throng in Mosque

By J. FRED LISSFELT

The combination of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony will always fill Syria Mosque, as last night's audience proved. This audience is always so secure that I often wonder why we so often hear Tchaikowsky with the many great symphonies awaiting a glowing performance by these players.

Serge Koussevitsky is, however, a devotee of the contemporary composer, and so we heard Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" again in its truly gothic grandeur.

On second hearing of this work, it is just that feature which is so predominant and which Hindemith so aptiy expressed through his flamboyant use of polyphonic forms.

The rich body of sound possible with the Boston's instruments enhances such effect, the mighty medieval hymn soaring with magnificent exaltation beyond the modern dissonances.

HERO SAVED——

The admirable quality of Koussevitsky's Tchaikowsky is that he saves his hero from any submission to despondency and at least brings him earthly salvation.

Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" opened the program, a work now heard played by all the visiting orchestras and our own. With the Boston orchestra it attains a brilliance which is just short of shrillness, rather difficult to avoid with virtuoso players.

A charming interlude before the symphony was Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina," difficult enough to relate to the story of the drama, yet far richer in Russian moods than the oftener heard "Night on Bald Mountain." Momentarily the orchestra here gave us less of volume and considerable more of its

---

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH
DEC 3 - 1947

New Concert Records

By Thomas B. Sherman

BEETHOVEN'S "Eroica" Symphony gets a sumptuous treatment from the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. It is evident that Mr. Koussevitzky is possessed by the idea of its strength and its bigness of scale and the result is effective despite certain personal idiosyncrasies which tend to make it less than heroic. The pace of the first movement is slowed down practically to a halt at the second subject; the Marche Funebre is very slow and lugubrious; the introduction to the finale is deliberate and pompous rather than stormy. The recording undoubtedly was made in an empty hall and, at times, is much too reverberatory. All in all the Columbia version of the "Eroica," directed by Bruno Walter, is still the best on the market. This one is by RCA Victor (six records).

of the Duchess

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
DEC 3 - 1947

Serge Koussevitzky And Boston Symphony Triumph at Mosque

Audience of 4000 Wildly Acclaims Playing Of Tschaikowsky's B-Minor 'Pathetique'

By RALPH LEWANDO, Press Music Critic

As this review goes into type we still feel the glowing power of inspiring music given sublime expression by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the overwhelming interpretative conducting of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Their concert last night in Syria Mosque, under auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Assn., was artistic achievement, one of those great experiences that lifts one heavenward and blots out the trials and tribulations that beset the world.

Mr. Lewando

The ovational applause still throbs in our ears — acclaim that followed the playing of the final program item. Tschaikowsky's great B-minor ("Pathetique") symphony. The acclaim was a memorable tribute.

The program also included Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, Paul Hindesmith's "Mathias the Painter" and Moussorgsky's prelude to "Khovanstchina," all good and impressive music, beautifully played.

Eclipes Everything Else

But we are still intoxicated with the effects of the impelling influence of the Tschaikowsky. We have heard it performed time on end. But its projection last night before an audience of about 4000 eclipsed in expressive power anything heard before in the playing of this work.

Each of the four movements was poetry in tone. Each plumbed the depths and scaled the heights of instrumental evocation. The playing was a transporting delight, a tonal feast that regaled the listeners with the ambrosia of artistry and the nectar of spiritual values.

Genuine Musical Art

Although past 70, Dr. Koussevitzky still retains the exuberanc of the eternal artist, steeped i the glory of his art. The vitalit of his hypnotic personality an his unending energy is communicated amazingly to his players.

He seems to breathe into thei and into their performance the very essence and spirit of the music. Thus it is re-created with a livingness, fascination and appeal that warms the heart, tingles the senses, and brings to one vividly the realization that this is musical art—the kind that is of and for all the people; the kind that sends one on a dream tour.

And the kind that wins the greater number of converts to the art through the fervent ministrations of such an eminent leader as Dr. Koussevitzky, and so perfect an orchestra as the Boston Symphony.

Bravo Dr. Koussevitzky! May you be blessed with many years of continuing superlative activity, unfolding to the people the meaning of real music through the power of your interpretative clairvoyance.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
STAR-TIMES
DEC 3 - 1947

44 — Wed., Dec. 3, 1947. ST. LOUIS STAR-TIMES

MUSIC on RECORDS

BY REED HYNDS

KOUSSEVITZKY.

A Fine 'Eroica'

IT SEEMS odd that there should be so many differing opinions about how such an intimately known classic as Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony should be played. Possibly it is because the "Eroica" is so towering in every way that one feels that a performance can hardly encompass all that Beethoven has to say in it.

Whatever reservations one may have about the new interpretation by Serge Koussevitzky, the recorded sound of the Boston Symphony Orchestra playing it is about as fine as we have had. Certainly no recorded performance of the past has had the wonderful sonority, the crystalline clarity, the richness and balance of tone, heard in this album.

The new recording has the merits of two previous recordings, plus some of its own. In opulence of sound it is superior to that by Bruno Walter and it has the clearcut brilliance of the Toscanini performance without its sharpness and edginess. The playing of the orchestra also is better than in the other recordings. It is about as fine, as a matter of fact, as one can imagine orchestral playing being.

One review that I have seen finds fault with Koussevitzky's conception of the work, but I cannot. Surely there is no one way of playing any symphony. I seems to me that Koussevitzky delivers a full measure of the majesty of the music, in a lithe, poised, full-bodied performance.

There are many felicities in the performance. For example, the transition to the recapitulation in the first movement, which so often presents a difficulty to a conductor, is surmounted fluently and without loss of force. The symphony as a whole is muscular and strong. The Funeral March, which is played in 19 minutes, never has seemed so moving. The handling of the variations of the finale is impressive, too; they build to a magnificent climax. (RCA-Victor 1161; 6 12-inch).

* * *

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
DEC 3 - 1947

Boston Symphony Has All Usual Brilliance

Koussevitzky and Players Acclaimed By Big Audience; Three Exacting Works

By Donald Steinfirst

The incomparable Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by Serge Koussevitsky made its only appearance of the season Tuesday night in Syria Mosque, attracting one of the largest audiences of the year.

The program consisted of three Symphonies, the "Classical" of Prokofieff, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" and Hindmith's "Mathis der Maler" and the Prelude to "Khovanstchina" of Moussorgsky, a solid list, the performance of which spared neither conductor nor players.

The tone of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always amazing. This is particularly true of its woodwinds, which performed with constant and uniform elegance and its brass section, which is mellow and sweet always.

Invested with Regal Splendor

"Mathis der Maler" is always engaging music to hear and its attraction grows with every hearing. Hindemith, always a master of form, is in this symphony a master of orchestration as well, a composer that combines depth of insight with technical perfection so that the paintings of the Isenheim Altar come alive without the listener's being aware that he is hearing anything but absolute music. The Boston Symphony played the symphony with apposite sympathy with the vast score, Dr. Koussevitzky investing it with regal splendor, particularly the final "Temptation of St. Anthony," the brass chorale at the end bringing showers of applause from the audience.

The Moussorgsky Prelude an ethereally beautiful work, is a significant piece of writing, particularly suited so it would seem, for the strings of the Bostonians.

Here the tone was limped and clear, of a peculiarly haunting quality. Here too one heard a pianissimo that seems impossible of achievement so lucid and so clean and so luscious did it sound.

Incandescent Performance

Those kindly souls who follow this column with any degree of consistency know my own personal aversion to the overplayed Tschaikowsky Symphonies (the Boston has performed seven o them in the last 10 years), ye even the most case-hardened anti-Tschaikovsky listener must have softened before the incandescent reading which Dr. Koussevitzky and his men gave of the "Pathetique," It was highly emotionalized, yet not too much so, and the conductor let Tschaikowsky speak for himself without any of the conductor's personality being superimposed onto the score.

Many details of construction stood out in bold relief. But among the credits must be mentioned with pleasure Mr. Laurant's exquisite flute tone and the consistently warm and affectionate brass playing. Too, in matters of balance and tempos, Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra revealed the results of years of association with this Symphony.

The concert opened with the Prokofioff "Classical" now very familiar to Syria Mosque habitues. The orchestra has adopted a slower pace than was frequently heard in this Symphony and while it was comfortable it did not have all the bite and tang that is so often associated with his orchesra and this symphony.

CHICAGO, ILL.
JOURNAL OF COMMERCE
DEC 3 - 1947

By William Leonard

BEETHOVEN : Symphony No. 3, in E flat; Serge Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Victor album DM-1161, six twelve-inch records). The "Eroica" asks a great deal of its interpreters, and Mr. Koussevitzky is one conductor who brings to it all the musicianship it deserves.He lays bare its polyphony without neglecting tonal qualities. He imparts unique momentum to the funeral march without hurrying it. He neglects nothing,and this new recording of the "Eroica" is better than any that preceded it.

* * *

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

Victor Eroica Album Captures Excitement of Live Performance

By WOODSON TRAVERS

I hope all of you were listening the other night when Koussevitsky and the Boston Orchestra played the Beethoven Third Symphony and had the studio audience climbing up on its chairs to applaud.

After the radio was turned off to avoid the commercials that followed, somebody at this house remarked that she had never heard the Eroica played so beautifully, and what a pity we didn't have it.

By parcel post the next day came an album of six Victor records. It was the Eroica, Koussevitsky conducting the Boston Symphony. As nearly as records can, this album captures the excitement of that live performance.

* * *

Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra have recorded the Prokofiev Classical Symphony for Columbia. Two records; surfaces quite good. And the same company is offering a new Andre Kostelanetz interpretation of the Nutcracker Suite in which Mr. Kostelanetz's special talents appear to good advantage. Three records.

While on the subject of Tchaikovsky, Columbia also has issued a three-record album of nine of his songs. A White Russian emigree, Irra Petina of the Metropolitan Opera company, is the singer. Very, very Rooshian and, except for None but the Lonely Heart, all invested with the added pleasure of novelty.

Rachmaninoff's sumptuous Second Symphony has been given a sumptuous reading by Dimitri Mitropoulos and the Minneapolis Orchestra. Six records; Victor.

PITTSBURGH POST-GAZETTE: WEDNESDAY,

Boston Symphony Has All Usual Brilliance

Koussevitzky and Players Acclaimed By Big Audience; Three Exacting Works

By Donald Steinfirst

The incomparable Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by Serge Koussevitsky made its only appearance of the season Tuesday night in Syria Mosque, attracting one of the largest audiences of the year.

The program consisted of three Symphonies, the "Classical" of Prokofieff, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" and Hindmith's "Mathis der Maler" and the Prelude to "Khovanstchina" of Moussorgsky, a solid list, the performance of which spared neither conductor nor players.

The tone of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always amazing. This is particularly true of its woodwinds, which performed with constant and uniform elegance and its brass section, which is mellow and sweet always.

Invested with Regal Splendor

"Mathis der Maler" is always engaging music to hear and its attraction grows with every hearing. Hindemith, always a master of form, is in this symphony a master of orchestration as well, a composer that combines depth of insight with technical perfection so that the paintings of the Isenheim Altar come alive without the listener's being aware that he is hearing anything but absolute music. The Boston Symphony played the symphony with apposite sympathy with the vast score, Dr. Koussevitzky investing it with regal splendor, particularly the final "Temptation of St. Anthony," the brass chorale at the end bringing showers of applause from the audience.

The Moussorgsky Prelude an ethereally beautiful work, is a significant piece of writing, particularly suited so it would seem, for the strings of the Bostonians. Here the tone was limped and clear, of a peculiarly haunting quality. Here too one heard a pianissimo that seems impossible of achievement so lucid and so clean and so luscious did it sound.

Incandescent Performance

Those kindly souls who follow this column with any degree of consistency know my own personal aversion to the overplayed Tschaikovsky Symphonies (the Boston has performed seven of them in the last 10 years), yet even the most case-hardened anti-Tschaikovsky listener must have softened before the incandescent reading which Dr. Koussevitzky and his men gave of the "Pathetique." It was highly emotionalized, yet not too much so, and the conductor let Tschaikowsky speak for himself without any of the conductor's personality being superimposed onto the score.

Many details of construction stood out in bold relief. But among the credits must be mentioned with pleasure Mr. Laurant's exquisite flute tone and the consistently warm and affectionate brass playing. Too, in matters of balance and tempos, Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra revealed the results of years of association with this Symphony.

The concert opened with the Prokofioff "Classical" now very familiar to Syria Mosque habitues. The orchestra has adopted a slower pace than was frequently heard in this Symphony and while it was comfortable it did not have all the bite and tang that is so often associated with his orchestra and this symphony.

THE PITTSBURGH PRESS, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1947

Serge Koussevitzky And Boston Symphony Triumph at Mosque

Audience of 4000 Wildly Acclaims Playing Of Tschaikowsky's B-Minor 'Pathetique'

By RALPH LEWANDO, Press Music Critic

As this review goes into type we still feel the glow power of inspiring music given sublime expression by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the overwhelming interpretative conducting of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Mr. Lewando

Their concert last night in Syria Mosque, under auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Assn., was artistic achievement, one of those great experiences that lifts one heavenward and blots out the trials and tribulations that beset the world.

The ovational applause still throbs in our ears — acclaim that followed the playing of the final program item, Tschaikowsky's great B-minor ("Pathetique") symphony. The acclaim was a memorable tribute.

The program also included Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, Paul Hindesmith's "Mathias the Painter"; and Moussorgsky's prelude to "Khovanstchina," all good and impressive music, beautifully played.

Eclipes Everything Else

But we are still intoxicated with the effects of the impelling influence of the Tschaikowsky. We have heard it performed time on end. But its projection last night before an audience of about 4000 eclipsed in expressive power anything heard before in the playing of this work.

Each of the four movements was poetry in tone. Each plumbed the depths and scaled the heights of instrumental evocation. The playing was a transporting delight, a tonal feast that regaled the listeners with the ambrosia of artistry and the nectar of spiritual values.

Genuine Musical Art

Although past 70, Dr. Koussevitzky still retains the exuberance of the eternal artist, steeped in the glory of his art. The vitality of his hypnotic personality and his unending energy is communicated amazingly to his players.

He seems to breathe into them and into their performance the very essence and spirit of the music. Thus it is re-created with a livingness, fascination and appeal that warms the heart, tingles the senses, and brings to one vividly the realization that this is musical art—the kind that is of and for all the people; the kind that sends one on a dream tour.

And the kind that wins the greater number of converts to the art through the fervent ministrations of such an eminent leader as Dr. Koussevitzky, and so perfect an orchestra as the Boston Symphony.

Bravo Dr. Koussevitzky! May you be blessed with many years of continuing superlative activity, unfolding to the people the meaning of real music through the power of your interpretative clairvoyance.

Thursday, December 4, 1947

NOTE WORTHY

by John P. Rhodes

Standing Room Only For Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky elected to close his last concert in Cincinnati ten years ago with the long sustained and dramatic ending to Richard Strauss's "Heldenleben." Last night he brought his program to an end in Music Hall with a similar coup, the solemn and powerful finale to Tchaikovsky's "Symphonic Pathetique." Upon each occasion, this was a stroke of genius, calculated to leave a deep impression upon his listeners—an impression that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the finest organizations of its kind for all time and that Koussevitsky, himself, is one of the ablest conductors of this or any generation.

It is possible that, if I were a Bostonian and a regular subscriber to the concerts in Symphony Hall, I should have given away my tickets for last night's program and gone home with a good book. And I should have made a mistake. The choice of selections was in no way unusual, considering the frequency with which they may be heard; but the manner in which they were played was far from ordinary.

Koussevitsky, I learned, was prepared to play something more novel—Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, Hindemith's "Mathis der Mahler" and Berlioz's Symphony, "Harold In Italy." He is conducting these pieces in other cities on his current two-week tour. And cities like Cincinnati must usually depend on conductors like Koussevitzky to perform such pieces and orchestras like the Bostonian to do them justice.

I felt momentarily that the choice of progress was patronizing. But apparently Cincinnati did not think so, for Music Hall was filled to overflowing, many customers being content to stand for their admission. It proved one other thing, too. They were willing to listen to a great orchestra alone, without soloists, on the strength of its greatness. Fortunately (and probably because they have more time to devote to symphonic music), soloists are not so necessary in Boston as people seem to think they are elsewhere.

BUT, as I suggested, I should have missed a memorable event in passing by the Tchaikovsky symphony and also the "Daphnis and Chloe" suite by Ravel. One hears many excellent performances of both works, but seldom such individual ones. They both bore the Koussevitzky imprint of imagination, artistic conviction, and disciplined style.

The wonders of the "Pathetique" were many—the contrasted descending brass and string passages in the finale, the winding woodwind phrases that precede the development section in the first movement, the dramatic pause and crashing chord which began the development, the occasional murmuring of double basses, the clear and round tones of the brass in general, especially the trombones. They were precise and effective—no waiting to see what any other man would do except the conductor.

The "Daphnis and Chloe" was equally remarkable. One heard and understood the birdlike flutterings of the strings at breaking dawn, the later upward rushing harp and strings, the flawless flute solos, the frenetic throb of the percussion and of middle and upper registers in the general dance, the liquid flow of melody and its lambent charm in the pantomime.

AND THROUGH the latter parts of the program, one wondered how the same conductor could direct the opening "adagio" theme of the Tchaikovsky symphony and the "andante" of the Mendelssohn one—how the same artistic spirit could make so much of the scherzo-like irony of the "Pathetique" and the dancing gaiety of the opening movement of the "Italian Symphony." There was disparity between the Tchaikovsky "vivace" and the Mendelssohn.

One had the impression that Koussevitzky had not taken the German score so much to heart, that perhaps he had reached no definite convictions with regard to it. It was well-paced and the orchestra responded to all he asked. But the feeling was that he did not ask enough. All hair-splitting aside, the overall effect was impressive and memorable, as I have pointed out. The audience was eminently satisfied.

CINCINNATI, O.
POST

by Bibby Chatfield

Serge Koussevitzky walked onto the stage of Music (time-honored) Hall Wednesday night. His acquiline nose twitched knowingly. He stepped to the podium. He extended in an almost abbreviated gesture, his soft, diminutive hands. With a liquid burst of Mendelssohn, Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra responded.

And a Cincinnati audience, to the first mink, to the last cloth coat, replied with a soul satisfying gasp. "This is it," they murmured settling deep in their orchestra seats; edging restlessly to the rims of their balcony pinnacles. They forgot to flutter their programs, they forgot to squirm in their winter-wrap maneuverings; they forgot to whisper to their aisle-neighbors: they even forgot to hack and wheeze. But they didn't forget to applaud with hand-smarting intensity an artist, an orchestra and music.

Brought to Cincinnati as the third attraction in the Artist Series, Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played to a capacity audience whose size could be judged by Music Hall's Central Parkway car park attendant who sputtered "The gate's shut. The joint is loaded," to the number of cigarette stubs spiking Music Hall foyer's sand urns; to the wide grin on the face of J. Herman Thuman, manager of the Artist Series.

The audience, in size and splendid attire, resembled a May Festival opening. The boxes were filled and evening gowns rustled.

Mr. and Mrs. Lucien Wulsin, occupying their customary symphony season box, entertained in honor of Mr. Koussevitzky following the concert with a reception at the Queen City Club. In their box were Mr. and Mrs. John Wulsin.

Mrs. Erwin P. Bosworth, a past president of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, arrived with Mr. Bosworth following the concert opening. White fox fur and coral chiffon was her concert attire.

Mrs. Harold LeBlond, president of the 1947-48 Women's Committee of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, all in black crepe and mink, was accompanied by Mrs. Robert E. Harrison—in so much mink who cares about the black crepe?

Others glimpsed in the intermission crush were Mr. and Mrs. Robert S. Alter, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Wurlitzer, Mr. and Mrs. Richard R. Deupree (Mrs. Deupree wore sage green taffeta), Mr. and Mrs. John Crawford Pogue, Mr. and Mrs. Frank E. Wood, Mr. and Mrs. James E. Pape, Mrs. Philip Lawwill, Mrs. Frank H. Simpson, Mr. and Mrs. Cornelius Hauck and their daughter, Martie, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Rowe Jr., Mr. and Mrs. James E. Mixter, Dr. and Mrs. Otto Gele, Dorothea Hake.

* * *

PITTSBURGH POST-GAZETTE: WEDNESDAY,

Boston Symphony Has All Usual Brilliance

Koussevitzky and Players Acclaimed By Big Audience; Three Exacting Works

By Donald Steinfirst

The incomparable Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by Serge Koussevitsky made its only appearance of the season Tuesday night in Syria Mosque, attracting one of the largest audiences of the year.

The program consisted of three Symphonies, the "Classical" of Prokofieff, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" and Hindmith's "Mathis der Maler" and the Prelude to "Khovanstchina" of Moussorgsky, a solid list, the performance of which spared neither conductor nor players.

The tone of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is always amazing. This is particularly true of its woodwinds, which performed with constant and uniform elegance and its brass section, which is mellow and sweet always.

Invested with Regal Splendor

"Mathis der Maler" is always engaging music to hear and its attraction grows with every hearing. Hindemith, always a master of form, is in this symphony a master of orchestration as well, a composer that combines depth of insight with technical perfection so that the paintings of the Isenheim Altar come alive without the listener's being aware that he is hearing anything but absolute music. The Boston Symphony played the symphony with apposite sympathy with the vast score, Dr. Koussevitzky investing it with regal splendor, particularly the final "Temptation of St. Anthony," the brass chorale at the end bringing showers of applause from the audience.

The Moussorgsky Prelude an ethereally beautiful work, is a significant piece of writing, particularly suited so it would seem, for the strings of the Bostonians. Here the tone was limped and clear, of a peculiarly haunting quality. Here too one heard a pianissimo that seems impossible of achievement so lucid and so clean and so luscious did it sound.

Incandescent Performance

Those kindly souls who follow this column with any degree of consistency know my own personal aversion to the overplayed Tschaikowsky Symphonies (the Boston has performed seven of them in the last 10 years), yet even the most case-hardened anti-Tschaikovsky listener must have softened before the incandescent reading which Dr. Koussevitzky and his men gave of the "Pathetique," It was highly emotionalized, yet not too much so, and the conductor let Tschaikowsky speak for himself without any of the conductor's personality being superimposed onto the score.

Many details of construction stood out in bold relief. But among the credits must be mentioned with pleasure Mr. Laurant's exquisite flute tone and the consistently warm and affectionate brass playing. Too, in matters of balance and tempos, Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra revealed the results of years of association with this Symphony.

The concert opened with the Prokofioff "Classical" now very familiar to Syria Mosque habitues. The orchestra has adopted a slower pace than was frequently heard in this Symphony and while it was comfortable it did not have all the bite and tang that is so often associated with his orchestra and this symphony.

Thursday, December 4, 1947

NOTE WORTHY

by John P. Rhodes

Standing Room Only For Koussevitzky

Serge Koussevitzky elected to close his last concert in Cincinnati ten years ago with the long sustained and dramatic ending to Richard Strauss's "Heldenleben." Last night he brought his program to an end in Music Hall with a similar coup, the solemn and powerful finale to Tchaikovsky's "Symphonic Pathetique." Upon each occasion, this was a stroke of genius, calculated to leave a deep impression upon his listeners—an impression that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the finest organizations of its kind for all time and that Koussevitsky, himself, is one of the ablest conductors of this or any generation.

It is possible that, if I were a Bostonian and a regular subscriber to the concerts in Symphony Hall, I should have given away my tickets for last night's program and gone home with a good book. And I should have made a mistake. The choice of selections was in no way unusual, considering the frequency with which they may be heard; but the manner in which they were played was far from ordinary.

Koussevitsky, I learned, was prepared to play something more novel —Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, Hindemith's "Mathis der Mahler" and Berlioz's Symphony, "Harold In Italy." He is conducting these pieces in other cities on his current two-week tour. And cities like Cincinnati must usually depend on conductors like Koussevitzky to perform such pieces and orchestras like the Bostonian to do them justice.

I felt momentarily that the choice of progress was patronizing. But apparently Cincinnati did not think so, for Music Hall was filled to overflowing, many customers being content to stand for their admission. It proved one other thing, too. They were willing to listen to a great orchestra alone, without soloists, on the strength of its greatness. Fortunately (and probably because they have more time to devote to symphonic music), soloists are not so necessary in Boston as people seem to think they are elsewhere.

* * *

BUT, as I suggested, I should have missed a memorable event in passing by the Tchaikovsky symphony and also the "Daphnis and Chloe" suite by Ravel. One hears many excellent performances of both works, but seldom such individual [illegible]. They both bore the Koussevitzky imprint of imagination, artistic conviction, and disciplined style.

The wonders of the "Pathetique" were many—the contrasted descending brass and string passages in the finale, the winding woodwind phrases that precede the development section in the first movement, the dramatic pause and crashing chord which began the development, the occasional murmuring of double basses, the clear and round tones of the brass in general, especially the trombones. They were precise and effective—no waiting to see what any other man would do except the conductor.

The "Daphnis and Chloe" was equally remarkable. One heard and understood the birdlike flutterings of the strings at breaking dawn, the later upward rushing harp and strings, the flawless flute solos, the frenetic throb of the percussion and of middle and upper registers in the general dance, the liquid flow of melody and its lambent charm in the pantomime.

* * *

AND THROUGH the latter parts of the program, one wondered how the same conductor could direct the opening "adagio" theme of the Tchaikovsky symphony and the "andante" of the Mendelssohn one —how the same artistic spirit could make so much of the scherzo-like irony of the "Pathetique" and the dancing gaiety of the opening movement of the "Italian Symphony." There was disparity between the Tchaikovsky "vivace" and the Mendelssohn.

One had the impression that Koussevitzky had not taken the German score so much to heart, that perhaps he had reached no definite convictions with regard to it. It was well-paced and the orchestra responded to all he asked. But the feeling was that he did not ask enough. All hair-splitting aside, the overall effect was impressive and memorable, as I have pointed out. The audience was eminently satisfied.

THE PITTSBURGH PRESS, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1947

Serge Koussevitzky And Boston Symphony Triumph at Mosque

Audience of 4000 Wildly Acclaims Playing Of Tschaikowsky's B-Minor 'Pathetique'

By RALPH LEWANDO, Press Music Critic

As this review goes into type we still feel the glow power of inspiring music given sublime expression by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the overwhelming interpretative conducting of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Mr. Lewando

Their concert last night in Syria Mosque, under auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Assn., was artistic achievement, one of those great experiences that lifts one heavenward and blots out the trials and tribulations that beset the world.

The ovational applause still throbs in our ears — acclaim that followed the playing of the final program item. Tschaikowsky's great B-minor ("Pathetique") symphony. The acclaim was a memorable tribute.

The program also included Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, Paul Hindesmith's "Mathias the Painter" and Moussorgsky's prelude to "Khovanstchina," all good and impressive music, beautifully played.

Eclipes Everything Else

But we are still intoxicated with the effects of the impelling influence of the Tschaikowsky. We have heard it performed time on end. But its projection last night before an audience of about 4000 eclipsed in expressive power anything heard before in the playing of this work.

Each of the four movements was poetry in tone. Each plumbed the depths and scaled the heights of instrumental evocation. The playing was a transporting delight, a tonal feast that regaled the listeners with the ambrosia of artistry and the nectar of spiritual values.

Genuine Musical Art

Although past 70, Dr. Koussevitzky still retains the exuberance of the eternal artist, steeped in the glory of his art. The vitality of his hypnotic personality and his unending energy is communicated amazingly to his players.

He seems to breathe into them and into their performance the very essence and spirit of the music. Thus it is re-created with a livingness, fascination and appeal that warms the heart, tingles the senses, and brings to one vividly the realization that this is musical art—the kind that is of and for all the people; the kind that sends one on a dream tour.

And the kind that wins the greater number of converts to the art through the fervent ministrations of such an eminent leader as Dr. Koussevitzky, and so perfect an orchestra as the Boston Symphony.

Bravo Dr. Koussevitzky! May you be blessed with many years of continuing superlative activity, unfolding to the people the meaning of real music through the power of your interpretative clairvoyance.

CINCINNATI, O.
POST
DEC 4 - 1947

by Bibby Chatfield

Serge Koussevitzky walked onto the stage of Music (time-honored) Hall Wednesday night. His acquiline nose twitched knowingly. He stepped to the podium. He extended in an almost abbreviated gesture, his soft, diminutive hands. With a liquid burst of Mendelssohn, Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra responded.

And a Cincinnati audience, to the first mink, to the last cloth coat, replied with a soul satisfying gasp. "This is it," they murmured settling deep in their orchestra seats; edging restlessly to the rims of their balcony pinnacles. They forgot to flutter their programs, they forgot to squirm in their winter-wrap maneuverings; they forgot to whisper to their aisle-neighbors: they even forgot to hack and wheeze. But they didn't forget to applaud with hand-smarting intensity an artist, an orchestra and music.

Brought to Cincinnati as the third attraction in the Artist Series, Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played to a capacity audience whose size could be judged by Music Hall's Central Parkway car park attendant who sputtered "The gate's shut. The joint is loaded," to the number of cigarette stubs spiking Music Hall foyer's sand urns; to the wide grin on the face of J. Herman Thuman, manager of the Artist Series.

The audience, in size and splendid attire, resembled a May Festival opening. The boxes were filled and evening gowns rustled.

Mr. and Mrs. Lucien Wulsin, occupying their customary symphony season box, entertained in honor of Mr. Koussevitzky following the concert with a reception at the Queen City Club. In their box were Mr. and Mrs. John Wulsin.

Mrs. Erwin P. Bosworth, a past president of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, arrived with Mr. Bosworth following the concert opening. White fox fur and coral chiffon was her concert attire.

Mrs. Harold LeBlond, president of the 1947-48 Women's Committee of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, all in black crepe and mink, was accompanied by Mrs. Robert E. Harrison—in so much mink who cares about the black crepe?

Others glimpsed in the intermission crush were Mr. and Mrs. Robert S. Alter, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Wurlitzer, Mr. and Mrs. Richard R. Deupree (Mrs. Deupree wore sage green taffeta), Mr. and Mrs. John Crawford Pogue, Mr. and Mrs. Frank E. Wood, Mr. and Mrs. James E. Pape, Mrs. Philip Lawwill, Mrs. Frank H. Simpson, Mr. and Mrs. Cornelius Hauck and their daughter, Martie, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Rowe Jr., Mr. and Mrs. James E. Mixter, Dr. and Mrs. Otto Gele, Dorothea Hake.

[39]

CINCINNATI, O.
POST

The Proper Bostonians Perform in Music Hall

BY ELEANOR BELL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra believed by many to be the best in the business, played a sure-fine program in Music Hall last night under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, dean of conductors now operating on the nation's podiums.

Mr. Koussevitzky is dean by virtue of his having stuck by his guns in Boston for 24 years, which I believe is the marathon record at the present time among big league conductors. But Mr. Koussevitzky has other claims to eminence besides that of sheer tenacity and longevity. He conducted a whale of a concert last night.

On paper, the program was a disappointment to those of us who relish a challenge along with our listening. There were Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, the "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2 by Ravel and Tchaikovsky's Pathetique, all tried and true, and excepting the Ravel, bordering on the category sometimes impiously designated as "war horses."

The 110 or more Bostonians, equipped with instruments the very best, proceeded by their sheer virtuosity as an organization to knock all such precious premonitions into a large cocked hat. It is a pleasure to report that there is still plenty of good red meat on the bones of the works mentioned above.

The first violins had the pleasure of making the evening's first tonal revelation, for it was their opening ta-DEE-da, ta-DEE-da in the opening bars of the Mendelssohn that brought the local music-minded fraternity up sharp with a tone that was bright and disciplined and altogether fresh.

But after that pleasant shock wore off there were others, for it was an evening of revealing beauty . . . revealing because we in Cincinnati haven't heard the like for years. The articulation of the woodwinds and horns in the Saltarello, the brass tone in the Tchaikovsky, the lavish color of the Ravel. These were almost unbelievably perfect.

It was a reassuring experience to realize that here was an orchestra every member of which was not only capable of playing every note with a reasonable amount of accuracy and in time, but was actually doing so right there before our eyes.

The colors in the Ravel Suite were thrilling (gad, I haven't used that word for many a moon), and the pagan dance never possesse more lids-off abandon.

Even the ripe old Pathetiqu score was invested with beaut that was moving and impressive The 73-year-old conductor and hi henchmen took the trouble to di out the beauty and exploit it un reservedly. It was as simple a that, for obviously the orchestr did not play from a secret manu script, or deal from a fixed decl They just played the notes as th Lord, Mr. Tchaikovsky and M Koussevitzky intended them to b played. And that was that.

CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES-STAR

S. R. O. at Music Hall—

Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony in Great Concert

By HOWARD W. HESS

WELL! It is possible to fill Music Hall to overflowing, in the middle of a busy week, with Cincinnatians who know and who want the best in symphonic music without the extra sales attraction of a soloist, and it is possible for symphonic music to express all the longings and desires of the soul which holds the right to question today's ideals and ideas.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra have the edge on all other orchestras because of the years they have known and have believed in each other; there is still something fine about friendship (even in the arts). On tour every orchestra presents numbers which could be played and conducted with closed eyes and with hands tied behind backs. The program presented Wednesday night was of that kind. The presence of music on the stands was like having a few extra bills in your purse—"just in case."

★ ★ ★

No matter how well known the numbers or how well trained the ensemble, the concert was one of exceptional value. The program began with Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," which at once established a bond of musical warmth between the performers and the audience; Mendelssohn wasn't such an outmoded old dullard as some people think. His music was delightful and charming even when his polite conventionality did get the better of his innate romanticism. The slight overbalance of strings showed only in a part of the first movement. The "Andante" had the proper feel of singing, just for the love of singing. The Third Movement had many superior musical attractions, especially the soft, far-distant horn tones. The "Salterello" and the "Terantella" had vitality without gush.

★ ★ ★

The audience was literally amazed at the imagination which kept the magnificent music of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" flowing as a golden stream. The "Lever du jour—Pantomime and Dance generale" — recalled the entire Greek legend and also revealed the real reason that this great ballet is not on the standard repertory — no ballet company could constantly afford the perfect orchestra needed to produce the right effect. The music when so superbly conducted and played, however, is sufficient, and the audience in Music Hall Wednesday night will forever cherish the understanding of a poetic love of long ago.

Every Symphony patron knows the Tschaikowsky "Symphony No. 6" (Pathetique), but I doubt very much if this greatest of all musical tragedies has ever been more clearly understood by those in the audience who had thought that they had plumbed its emotional depths. The performance was all-inclusive; it was so sublime that dead silence followed the last movement for a period and then Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra were given an ovation seldon accorded any ensemble.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

DEC 4 - 1947

Social Chicago

Boston Symphony's Concert Adds To Pre-Christmas Entertaining

BY LORRAINE KOWALS

ADDED TO the pre-Christmas flurry already under way is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's appearance in Chicago this weekend. Tomorrow evening's concert at Orchestra Hall--for subscribers of the History and Enjoyment of Music Series--is a sellout and only a few main floor seats remain for Sunday afternoon's program. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct.

Mrs. Clive Runnells is bringing her Boston visitors, Mr. and Mrs. Edward A. Taft, tomorrow night after a dinner party at home. The George A. Kuypers have invited George Judd and Mrs. Clyde Carr to share their box and Mrs. Henry Bartholomay and Mrs. William Sherman Hay will occupy another. Mrs. Charles B. Goodspeed is entertaining Lady Burney and Mrs. Wentworth Field and Mrs. Frederic P. Upham will also attend.

* * *

MUSICAL TREAT

Lake Forest will have its musical treat on Sunday evening when the Boston Symphony's string quartet goes out to entertain at the Chamber Music Series' second concert of the season. The Gorton School auditorium will be the scene of the program.

Students from Lake Forest Academy, Lake Forest College, Ferry Hall, Barat College and Lake Forest High School will attend along with prominent North Shore families such as Mr. and Mrs. E. Francis Bowditch, Mrs. D. Mark Cummings, the Alfred Hamills, Mrs. John R. Broeksmit, Mrs. Hollis Letts McLaughlin, the Lawrence Dawsons, the junior Everett L. Millards, the John Taylor Wilsons, Mrs. John P. Wilson, the Stuart Ullmans, the Herman Zischkes, Dr. and Mrs. Pliny Norcross and David Dangler, Jr.

* * *

MORE MUSIC

Luncheon today for members of the American Opera Society means also musical entertainment plus a talk by Arthur Meeker Jr., novelist. The meeting takes place in Sara Siddons Walk of the Ambassador East. Gwendolyn Roberts and Brenda Baum are the duo-pianists.

Mrs. William J. Hoppe is social chairman for the day and her assistants include Mrs. John Foley, Mrs. David Paden, Mrs. Bruce Strong, Mrs. Frederick A. Schaaf and Mrs. Tracy Turner Jr.

* * *

"How to Sail" sessions begin next Thursday at the Highland Park Public Library. The North Shore Yacht Club is presenting the new series of instruction classes.

* * *

The North Shore Auxiliary of the Chicago Maternity Center will hold its benefit luncheon and fashion show, "Flight to Havana," today at the Edgewater Beach Hotel. One fortunate guest will be awarded a trip to Havana.

* * *

Mrs. Nathaniel Leverone is the hostess today at the Alliance Francaise tea following the program featuring Eleanor Weber, soprano. Mrs. Paul Butler and Mrs Thomas Connors will pour.

Tomorrow Mrs. William F. Conlon, president of the woman's board, will entertain that group at luncheon in her home.

* * *

Two Stephens College students given leading roles in Ruth Gordon's play, "Years Ago" (to be presented Dec. 12 and 13 at the school) are Lita Chatfield-Taylor, daughter of Mrs. John T. Landreth of Chicago and Marilyn Janet Stromquist, daughter of the W. C. Stromquists of Glen Ellyn.

* * *

On Sunday Mr. and Mrs. C. Ross Littig of Evanston are giving a party for their daughter, Jean, and her fiance, George Walton Artz. The couple's engagement was announced last week.

BUDGET IF YOU LIKE

BLOOMINGTON, IND.
TELEPHONE

DEC 5 - 1947

Music Lovers Hear Another 'Best' in Symphony Orchestras

By KAY SMITH

Patrons of the Indiana University Auditorium Series have been extremely fortunate in the last few years in hearing some of the best symphony orchestras in the country. They have heard the Philadelphia Symphony conducted by Eugene Ormandy, the Minneapolis conducted by Dimitry Mitropoulos, and last night it was another of these "bests", the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitsky.

The program presented a varied and contrasting selection of some of the best literature, including two modern works which are definitely "here to stay". Opening the concert was Prokofieff's Classical Symphony which the composer wrote as Mozart would write if he were living today. Its gay and light-hearted vein was easily conveyed to the audience by a spirited performance. From the beginning the observer could not help but notice the few and rather small motions employed by Koussevitsky as he used not only his arms and hands, but also facial expressions to convey his wishes to the orchestra members.

Following the Classical Symphony came the Mathis der Mahler Symphony of Hindemith. This modern work expresses the composer's feelings on viewing three paintings by the German artist, Matthias Grunewald. The three movements are each devoted to one of the paintings, "Angelic Concert", Entombment" and "The Temptation of St. Anthony". Here especially the orchestra gave a superb performance of the tonal pictures created by the composer.

The last part of the program was devoted to a vigorous performance of Beethoven's Eroica Symphony, one of the most perfect symphonies ever written. It was all there — the exuberance of the Allegro, the lamentations of the Funeral March, the gay and witty scherzo, and the monumental theme and variations of the Finale.

The entire program was presented brilliantly and vigorously with the contrasting somber and joyful sections falling well into place. We are sure the patrons of the Auditorium Series would welcome another visit by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the near future.

CINCINNATI, O.
POST

The Proper Bostonians Perform in Music Hall

BY ELEANOR BELL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra believed by many to be the best in the business, played a sure-fine program in Music Hall last night under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, dean of conductors now operating on the nation's podiums.

Mr. Koussevitzky is dean by virtue of his having stuck by his guns in Boston for 24 years, which I believe is the marathon record at the present time among big league conductors. But Mr. Koussevitzky has other claims to eminence besides that of sheer tenacity and longevity. He conducted a whale of a concert last night.

On paper, the program was a disappointment to those of us who relish a challenge along with our listening. There were Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, the "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2 by Ravel and Tchaikovsky's Pathetique, all tried and true, and excepting the Ravel, bordering on the category sometimes impiously designated as "war horses."

The 110 or more Bostonians, equipped with instruments the very best, proceeded by their sheer virtuosity as an organization to knock all such precious premonitions into a large cocked hat. It is a pleasure to report that there is still plenty of good red meat on the bones of the works mentioned above.

The first violins had the pleasure of making the evening's first tonal revelation, for it was their opening ta-DEE-da, ta-DEE-da in the opening bars of the Mendelssohn that brought the local music-minded fraternity up sharp with a tone that was bright and disciplined and altogether fresh.

But after that pleasant shock wore off there were others, for it was an evening of revealing beauty . . . revealing because we in Cincinnati haven't heard the like for years. The articulation of the woodwinds and horns in the Saltarello, the brass tone in the Tchaikovsky, the lavish color of the Ravel. These were almost unbelievably perfect.

It was a reassuring experience to realize that here was an orchestra every member of which was not only capable of playing every note with a reasonable amount of accuracy and in time, but was actually doing so right there before our eyes.

The colors in the Ravel Suite were thrilling (gad, I haven't used that word for many a moon), and the pagan dance never possessed more lids-off abandon.

Even the ripe old Pathetiqu score was invested with beaut that was moving and impressive The 73-year-old conductor and hi henchmen took the trouble to di out the beauty and exploit it un reservedly. It was as simple a that, for obviously the orchestr did not play from a secret manu script, or deal from a fixed deck They just played the notes as th Lord, Mr. Tchaikovsky and M Koussevitzky intended them to b played. And that was that.

CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES-STAR

S. R. O. at Music Hall—

Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony in Great Concert

By HOWARD W. HESS

WELL! It is possible to fill Music Hall to overflowing, in the middle of a busy week, with Cincinnatians who know and who want the best in symphonic music without the extra sales attraction of a soloist, and it is possible for symphonic music to express all the longings and desires of the soul which holds the right to question today's ideals and ideas.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra have the edge on all other orchestras because of the years they have known and have believed in each other; there is still something fine about friendship (even in the arts). On tour every orchestra presents numbers which could be played and conducted with closed eyes and with hands tied behind backs. The program presented Wednesday night was of that kind. The presence of music on the stands was like having a few extra bills in your purse—"just in case.".

★ ★ ★

No matter how well known the numbers or how well trained the ensemble, the concert was one of exceptional value. The program began with Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," which at once established a bond of musical warmth between the performers and the audience; Mendelssohn wasn't such an outmoded old dullard as some people think. His music was delightful and charming even when his polite conventionality did get the better of his innate romanticism. The slight overbalance of strings showed only in a part of the first movement. The "Andante" had the proper feel of singing, just for the love of singing. The Third Movement had many superior musical attractions, especially the soft, far-distant horn tones. The "Salterello" and the "Terantella" had vitality without gush.

★ ★ ★

The audience was literally amazed at the imagination which kept the magnificent music of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" flowing as a golden stream. The "Lever du jour—Pantomime and Dance generale" — recalled the entire Greek legend and also revealed the real reason that this great ballet is not on the standard repertory — no ballet company could constantly afford the perfect orchestra needed to produce the right effect. The music when so superbly conducted and played, however, is sufficient, and the audience in Music Hall Wednesday night will forever cherish the understanding of a poetic love of long ago.

Every Symphony patron knows the Tschaikowsky "Symphony No. 6" (Pathetique), but I doubt very much if this greatest of all musical tragedies has ever been more clearly understood by those in the audience who had thought that they had plumbed its emotional depths. The performance was all-inclusive; it was so sublime that dead silence followed the last movement for a period and then Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra were given an ovation seldon accorded any ensemble.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

DEC 4 - 1947

Social Chicago

Boston Symphony's Concert Adds To Pre-Christmas Entertaining

BY LORRAINE KOWALS

ADDED TO the pre-Christmas flurry already under way is the Boston Symphony Orchestra's appearance in Chicago this weekend. Tomorrow evening's concert at Orchestra Hall--for subscribers of the History and Enjoyment of Music Series--is a sellout and only a few main floor seats remain for Sunday afternoon's program. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will conduct.

Mrs. Clive Runnells is bringing her Boston visitors, Mr. and Mrs. Edward A. Taft, tomorrow night after a dinner party at home. The George A. Kuypers have invited George Judd and Mrs. Clyde Carr to share their box and Mrs. Henry Bartholomay and Mrs. William Sherman Hay will occupy another. Mrs. Charles B. Goodspeed is entertaining Lady Burney and Mrs. Wentworth Field and Mrs. Frederic P. Upham will also attend.

* * *

MUSICAL TREAT

Lake Forest will have its musical treat on Sunday evening when the Boston Symphony's string quartet goes out to entertain at the Chamber Music Series' second concert of the season. The Gorton School auditorium will be the scene of the program.

Students from Lake Forest Academy, Lake Forest College, Ferry Hall, Barat College and Lake Forest High School will attend along with prominent North Shore families such as Mr. and Mrs. E. Francis Bowditch, Mrs. D. Mark Cummings, the Alfred Hamills, Mrs. John R. Broeksmit, Mrs. Hollis Letts McLaughlin, the Lawrence Dawsons, the junior Everett L. Millards, the John Taylor Wilsons, Mrs. John P. Wilson, the Stuart Ullmans, the Herman Zischkes, Dr. and Mrs. Pliny Norcross and David Dangler, Jr.

* * *

MORE MUSIC

Luncheon today for members of the American Opera Society means also musical entertainment plus a talk by Arthur Meeker Jr., novelist. The meeting takes place in Sara Siddons Walk of the Ambassador East. Gwendolyn Roberts and Brenda Baum are the duo-pianists.

Mrs. William J. Hoppe is social chairman for the day and her assistants include Mrs. John Foley, Mrs. David Paden, Mrs. Bruce Strong, Mrs. Frederick A. Schaaf and Mrs. Tracy Turner Jr.

* * *

"How to Sail" sessions begin next Thursday at the Highland Park Public Library. The North Shore Yacht Club is presenting the new series of instruction classes.

* * *

The North Shore Auxiliary of the Chicago Maternity Center will hold its benefit luncheon and fashion show, "Flight to Havana," today at the Edgewater Beach Hotel. One fortunate guest will be awarded a trip to Havana.

* * *

Mrs. Nathaniel Leverone is the hostess today at the Alliance Francaise tea following the program featuring Eleanor Weber, soprano. Mrs. Paul Butler and Mrs Thomas Connors will pour.

Tomorrow Mrs. William F. Conlon, president of the woman's board, will entertain that group at luncheon in her home.

* * *

Two Stephens College students given leading roles in Ruth Gordon's play, "Years Ago" (to be presented Dec. 12 and 13 at the school) are Lita Chatfield-Taylor, daughter of Mrs. John T. Landreth of Chicago and Marilyn Janet Stromquist, daughter of the W. C. Stromquists of Glen Ellyn.

* * *

On Sunday Mr. and Mrs. C. Ross Littig of Evanston are giving a party for their daughter, Jean, and her fiance, George Walton Artz. The couple's engagement was announced last week.

BUDGET IF YOU LIKE

BLOOMIN
TELEPHONE

DEC 5 - 1947

Music Lovers Hear Another 'Best' in Symphony Orchestras

By KAY SMITH

Patrons of the Indiana University Auditorium Series have been extremely fortunate in the last few years in hearing some of the best symphony orchestras in the country. They have heard the Philadelphia Symphony conducted by Eugene Ormandy, the Minneapolis conducted by Dimitry Mitropoulos, and last night it was another of these "bests", the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitsky.

The program presented a varied and contrasting selection of some of the best literature, including two modern works which are definitely "here to stay". Opening the concert was Prokofieff's Classical Symphony which the composer wrote as Mozart would write if he were living today. Its gay and light-hearted vein was easily conveyed to the audience by a spirited performance. From the beginning the observer could not help but notice the few and rather small motions employed by Koussevitsky as he used not only his arms and hands, but also facial expressions to convey his wishes to the orchestra members.

Following the Classical Symphony came the Mathis der Mahler Symphony of Hindemith. This modern work expresses the composer's feelings on viewing three paintings by the German artist, Matthias Grunewald. The three movements are each devoted to one of the paintings, "Angelic Concert", Entombment" and "The Temptation of St. Anthony". Here especially the orchestra gave a superb performance of the tonal pictures created by the composer.

The last part of the program was devoted to a vigorous performance of Beethoven's Eroica Symphony, one of the most perfect symphonies ever written. It was all there — the exuberance of the Allegro, the lamentations of the Funeral March, the gay and witty scherzo, and the monumental theme and variations of the Finale.

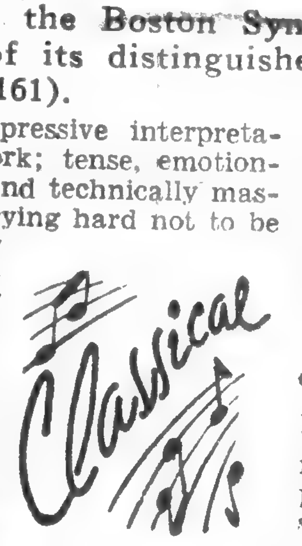
The entire program was presented brilliantly and vigorously with the contrasting somber and joyful sections falling well into place. We are sure the patrons of the Auditorium Series would welcome another visit by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the near future.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

RECORDING the RECORDS

By MILTON WIDDER

Beethoven's the EROICA (the third symphony) is released for the Christmas trade by RCA-Victor this month, recorded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky (M-1161).



It is an impressive interpretation of the work; tense, emotionally sweeping and technically masterful. I am trying hard not to be impressed by the magic combination of "Boston and Koussevitzky," yet I cannot help but pay homage in words to this accomplishment. It is an achievement as fine as has been reached in modern recording.

Particularly telling is the third (slow) movement, which in program material is referred to as the "March Funebre"—it is soul-stirring.

REPEAT PERFORMANCE, a new album by Columbia Masterworks of the Pons-Kostelanetz combination, is the best so far from this pair. The coloratura is on pitch and clear, Kostelanetz at his mediocre best with the stick. Included in the album are THE MAID OF CADIZ, ESTRELLITA, THE LAST ROSE OF SUMMER—all fine encore songs from the repertory of the Met's leading coloratura.

M-G-M Records (a subsidiary of the motion picture company) put out an album of piano works used in the SONG OF LOVE production of the life of Robert Schumann. Menahem Pressler is the pianist in the album and he is sufficiently poetic and able technically to give good performances of TRAEUMEREI, ARABESQUES and CARNANVAL by Schumann and the two Brahms selections presented in the picture.

In the singles this month the traditional SILENT NIGHT, HOLY NIGHT is sung by Lotte Lehmann for RCA-Victor with Richard Lert conducting the orchestra. It is a poignant, beautiful interpretation. O COME, ALL YE FAITHFUL is on the other side of the 10-inch disc.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
5 - 1947

Warm Sea Of Sound

Boston Symphony Heard At I.U.

By Corbin Patrick

Bloomington, Ind., Dec. 4

A CAPACITY AUDIENCE, luxuriated in a warm sea of enchanting sound at the Indiana University auditorium here tonight as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, one of the world's greatest, appeared in concert under the baton of its benevolent czar, Serge Koussevitzky.

It was the first central Indiana performance in nearly 20 years, and music loving gentry came from all parts of the state to hear them.

Those present undoubtedly would have felt amply repaid for the journey to Bloomington, if the program had been nothing more than an exercise in orchestral painting, so brilliantly did the venerable but still dynamic Dr. Koussevitzky display his gorgeous palette of tonel colors. Happily, his imperious command of a sensitively adjusted instrument, his feeling that "music must always sing," his sheer virtuousity, were applied to a program worthy of a rare event.

It included his grandoise but poignant interpretation of Beethoven's powerful "Eroica" symphony and two other works of major proportions, both reflecting his abiding sympathy for the creative struggles of modern composers: Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony and Hindemith's still little known but tremendous "Mathias the Painter."

His illumination of this music, Hindemith's in particular, was brilliant and revealing. It confirmed his standing as their most formidable champion.

THE TECHNICAL proficiency of these very proper Bostonians is fully as great as we had learned indirectly by records and the radio, to consider it. The orchestra is poised, free and pliant, wonderfully flexible and responsive. It produces the finest distinctions in both the color and dynamic ranges. There may be orchestras with superior individual choirs, but there are none we have heard in which the choirs are more judiciously blended and balanced.

Over and above this mechanical genius, it has artistic stature derived from a high standard long maintained, a tradition in which Dr. Koussevitzky's magnetic personality and insistence on detailed perfection have played a decisive part. It has the musicianship to give full voice to Dr. Koussevitzky's eloquence, somewhat ardent, but always broad [illegible] sweeping interpretation[illegible]

His warm, romantic [illegible]ng and large-sized conce[illegible] were beautifully demonstrated in "Mathias, the Painter," which is surely among the most remarkable of modern scores, advanced in its treatment, but not beyond the comprehension of audiences, willing to listen and absorb. The symphony, based on passages from Hindemith's opera of the same title, makes highly effective use of medieval church melodies and old modes. It bears mystical charm.

The movements are named for three paintings by Mathias Grunewald, found on the famous Isenheim altar. The opera, dealing with rebellion against autocracy in the peasants war of 1524, caused Hindemith's music to be banned in Germany by the Nazis. This symphony, as clarified by Dr. Koussevitzky, provided an impressive introduction to one of the most important of modern composers. It represents a simplification of his highly complex art.

Prokofieff's more familiar but no less welcome "classical" symphony was played with subtlety and elan, grace and vigor by Dr. Koussevitzky and his Bostonians. The detail was beautifully limned The mighty Beethoven "Eroica" brought the program to a close the audience, no doubt, will long remember. Dr. Koussevitzky's authority as an interpreter of this work is too well known to need further comment here.

The occasion was another step step toward the fulfillment of well-laid plans to make Indiana University an outstanding center of culture for the entire state. Where else, now, have we heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra since the extravagant 20s?

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
NEWS
DEC 5 - 1947

Bostonians Play Glorious Music

Orchestra Presents 3 Symphonies at I. U.

By WALTER WHITWORTH
The News Music Critic

BLOOMINGTON, Dec. 5—It is good for mankind to be reminded at frequent intervals of those values which never lose their influence and their power through the centuries, because these values do not change. They are part of a growing, living tradition, and one has some need of tradition in an age of confusion, in an age that scoffs at yesterday without quite knowing what to do with today.

PROGRAM
Classical Symphony in D Major....Prokofiev
Symphony, 'Mathis der Maler".....Hindemith
Symphony No. 3 in E-flat Major...Beethoven

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which played in the Indiana University Auditorium last night under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, prompted those first words, for on its program was Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, in which are imbedded a breadth of vision, a depth of insight and a sense of freedom that picture the dignity of man, a dignity that man seems to have lost.

While listening to the music, which retains its vast strength and its vast emotional wisdom, one marvels anew at the titanic genius of the composer. His was a sane and healthy outlook. To him belonged a maturity for which most of us struggle in futile despair. Yet in his measures he brought—and brings—to the listener clear glimpses of cumulative growth in the human race; brings, indeed, to a culminating point all the things we could be, if we would.

It is, of course, axiomatic to say that only genius can interpret and communicate the language of genius, just as it is axiomatic to say that each interpretative genius sheds fresh, individual light on whatever work he chooses to interpret. Assuredly, Dr. Koussevitzky has the requisite command of musical knowledge; has command of the ever-finer knowledge of man, whom composers are eternally striving to explain and to express.

Imbued with the fire of genius, himself, and the fortunate and proud possessor of one of the great orchestras of the world, he can reveal as fully as possible the greatness and the sweep and the profundity of this masterpiece. His methods are inevitably his own, but they are methods tempered by discrimination, so that a sudden emphasis—as, for instance, in the shifting tempo of the final movement—is still an integral part of the whole conception, not a distorted whim for the sake of startling the listener.

And so sensitive is the response of the orchestra that the subtlest nuances are possible. These players, at the will of the conductor, can paint in broad strokes, can paint with the finesse of the miniaturist. They can make the music rise to overwhelming climaxes, can make it fall to the merest susurration. They can change color tones—clean, fresh, pellucid for Prokofiev, so Mozartean in essence, but also so piquant in flavor because of quixotic harmonies; or, again, deep and rich for the drama of Beethoven.

Always there is an awareness of the fitness of things, of proper proportion, of gradual rising to one climax and then a falling away from that peak. Whether it was the cheerful little gravotte, a third movement of the Prokofiev, the slow movement of the Hindemith symphony—which isn't a symphony at all; but three excerpts from the opera of the same name, excerpts symphonic in themselves—or the glorious first movement of the "Eroica," whichever it was from any of the three works on the program, there was the same sureness, the same flawless molding, that same perfect surface and glowing content.

Prokofiev, slightly satirical, as always, but fundamentally serious of purpose, was an excellent beginning. Hindemith, vividly descriptive, more lyric than usual, often truly vigorous, offered excellent contrast. Both, through classic mood and romantic warmth, led smoothly to the gigantic might of Beethoven. In this closing music lay tradition, with its reminders of fulfillment and destiny. Such music is miraculous. Such a performance is a miracle, too.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

LEADS BOSTONIANS

Serge Koussevitzky conducts the Boston Symphony in two concerts at Orchestra Hall, tonight and Sunday afternoon.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

MUSIC TODAY

Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Artur Rodzinski, conductor, Orchestra Hall, 2:15.Handel's Water Music, arranged by Sir Hamilton Harty; Carpenter's "Skyscrapers,"and Prokofieff's Fifth Symphony.

Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, Orchestra Hall, 8:15. Prokofieff's Classical Symphony; Hindemith's"Mathis der Mahler": Berlioz' Symphony, "Harold in Italy."

[41]

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 10th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Eleazar de Carvalho conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:
Prologue and Fugue..........Guarnieri
"Madona". Symphonic Poem..Villa-Lobos
Suite from "El Amor Brujo"........Falla
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, from the "New World," Op. 95......Dvorak

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Mr. de Carvalho's second program offered a more interesting selection of new music than his first but as a conductor he showed to better advantage in the Berlioz than in the Dvorak. Why conductors turn their backs on Dvorak's other symphonies is one of the minor mysteries of their mysterious craft. The "New World" has some lovely things in it, notably the scherzo; but there is altogether too much warming over of the themes which had been sufficiently served in the beginning. Under Mr. de Carvalho's ministrations the slow movement seemed more interminable than ever.

Two new Brazilian compositions were performed for the first time yesterday afternoon. Camargo Guarnieri's Prologue sounds better than his Fugue, and it is perhaps significant that at the end of the latter he returns to the theme of the former. For the rest this is just another of those pieces of dissonant counterpoint, which, I submit, is not very exciting musical news. The composer was present and acknowledged the applause from his seat in the hall.

Mr. de Carvalho then delivered a peculiar interpretation of the orchestral suite from Falla's "El Amor Brujo." He concentrated on detail, so that it was possible to hear many beauties of orchestration which ordinarily escape attention. But the interpretation as a whole was a little on the drowsy side. There was not much of that dramatic excitement which the music can communicate. Restraint is an admirable quality in its way, but "El Amor Brujo" can stand more youthful elan than Mr. de Carvalho brought to it yesterday.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, back from their annual tour of mid-Western cities, gave a concert of only two pieces at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. They were Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto, with Nadia Reisenberg as soloist, and the Sixth, or "Pathetique," Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

Miss Reisenberg, making her first appearance in Boston, proved herself a competent technician and a worthy interpreter of this Concerto. The work rippled along serenely and made its customary effect. But to say it was a distinguished performance, either orchestrally or pianistically, would be wide of the mark. Miss Reisenberg's playing was clear and clean, apart from a clipped phrase here and there. But it did not reveal a force of artistic individuality, nor an ardor of temperament, to lift it into the sphere of striking musical communication.

It is possible the orchestra was tired from its travels, for there were little roughnesses in attack, nuance and rhythm that ordinarily are the last thing you would expect from the Boston Symphony. Even so, yesterday's performance would be grade-A for an orchestra of less than the celestial qualities of this.

Tchaikovsky probably never had an interpreter better qualified or more devoted than Serge Koussevitsky. His reading of the "Pathetique" Symphony, for our time, must be the last word in authority and emotional drive. Yesterday the work had all of its usual persuasion, even though it seemed very fast and very loud in the third movement, and a bit coarse of texture here and there elsewhere in the other three movements. But, as aforesaid, the Boston Symphony's second best is better than the finest of some orchestras.

The program will be repeated tonight. Next week Eleazer de Carvalho will be guest conductor in Schuman's Symphony for Strings; the Chamber Symphony by Arnold Schoenberg, and the "Fantastic" Symphony by Hector Berlioz.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Not a great deal need be said [illegible] yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert. The current program [illegible] but two numbers, both [illegible] familiar: Beethoven's Fifth, [illegible] "Emperor" piano concerto, and the "Pathetic" Symphony [illegible]. The soloist in the [illegible] was Nadia Reisenberg, who [illegible] if I am not mistaken, [illegible] Boston appearance.

[illegible] particular time there was [illegible] for Dr. Koussevitzky [illegible] anything new and elaborate [illegible] Friday and Saturday [illegible]. Last Wednesday evening the orchestra played in Rochester, N. Y., the last city touched [illegible] extensive western tour, and it [illegible] in town Thursday morning. [illegible] either the conductor or the men were wearied by this ordeal [illegible] apparent yesterday. Everything was tip-top.

The Tchaikovsky "Pathetic" was one of the numbers featured on the trip, and to judge from the reviews, the various performances of it served to astonish the natives. This is one of the things that Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony do to perfection. You could go further and say that no other performance can seriously be compared with [illegible].

[illegible] think of the "Emperor" as a [illegible] concerto, and not only because of its title. At least it did not have to be changed to "Empress" for Miss Reisenberg's benefit; the Russian-born pianist played it in the heroic fashion that befits it. If some of her brother pianists have played it with more magnificence of tone, Miss Reisenberg did not let you down, and she shone in the more delicate portions of the work. So discerning a musician, so well-equipped a virtuoso deserves to be better known hereabouts. Yesterday's audience gave Miss Reisenberg the hearty and long-continued applause that was her due.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
BRONX DEMOCRAT
DEC 5 - 1947

SALVATION ARMY STARTS ANNUAL DRIVE

Of yearly interest is The Salvation Army's drive. No more worthy cause evinces itself than this annual campaign, which again seeks to raise $1,000,000 on behalf of its sixty institutions throughout the New York City area.

This year The Salvation Army's Annual Maintenance Appeal will be launched with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. This will be held at the Metropolitan Opera House on Tuesday evening, January 6, 1948. Featured on the program will be Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 6 - 1947

The News of Radio

ABC-Boston Symphony Cooperative Series Awaits Outcome of AFM Negotiations

By JACK GOULD

The American Broadcasting Company and the directors of the Boston Symphony are holding a series of discussions with a view to arranging cooperative sponsorship of the orchestra. The symphony currently is heard on a sustaining basis at 9:30 P. M. Tuesdays. Under the cooperative plan the cost of the concerts would be met by different advertisers in different cities rather than by one concern on a national basis.

If the plans materialize, the Boston Symphony would be the first major orchestra group to be offered on a cooperative basis. At the present time neither the NBC Symphony, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony nor the Boston are sponsored, chiefly because of the appreciable cost and the specialized appeal of symphonic programs. The ABC network hopes that the idea of cooperative sponsorship may prove a way out of such economic limitations.

However, the tentative plans for the Boston Symphony also are contingent on the outcome of negotiations between the networks and James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians. The union's previous ban on cooperatively sponsored musical programs has been lifted only to Jan. 31, the date that the network contract expires. Arrangements for "coops" after that date will have to be worked out.

SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE
DEC 7 - 1947

Boston Symphony Gives Thrilling Performance

The Boston Symphony sustained its world renowned reputation Saturday night before 3,400 South Bend Civic Music association members in the John Adams High school auditorium by its rendition of a classic Sibelius, Strauss and Beethoven program.

Members packed the auditorium, standing in the aisles and sitting on bleachers, to hear the orchestra under the baton of Richard Burgin, first violinist of the symphony. The absence of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, was a disappointment to South Bend music lovers. Mr. Koussevitzky is reported to have decided he could not do justice to his music in the John Adams auditorium because it was not originally constructed for musical productions.

Sibelius Number Thrills.

The orchestra could not have selected a more suitable vehicle than the Sibelius "Symphony No. 1, in E minor, opus 39," to display its great brilliance, tone color, execution and interpretation. The symphony is in four movements displaying all the lights and shades of Sibelius. The orchestra and conductor received an enthusiastic ovation.

As a second number the orchestra selected Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," opus 20. This beautiful work, based on extracts of a poem by Nicolaus Lenal, entitled "Don Juan," is descriptive of human emotions.

As a closing number Ludwig von Beethoven's "Symphony No. 5 in C Minor, opus 67," in six movements, was interpreted. The classic was played as only the Boston symphony can displaying the creative spirit of Beethoven who reared such mighty structures of sound from all resources. The orchestra again received an ovation, the director being called before the curtain five times.

The Boston Symphony orchestra has won its spurs by its brilliance, virtuosity and interpretative warmth.

The Civic Music association is to be congratulated on bringing such a noted musical organization to South Bend.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES
1947

Boston Symphony Orchestra Shows Delicacy and Strength

By HENRY BUTLER
Times Staff Writer

BLOOMINGTON, Ind., Dec. 5—It's a lot more exciting to listen to the Boston Symphony Orchestra than to write about it.

Hearing such a program as Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra played in Indiana University auditorium last night was an experience not easily translated into words. After all, the number of effective superlatives is limited.

Like the shadows in the cave myth in Plato's "Republic," words are vague and feeble substitutes for reality. They simply won't serve to convey the perfection of ensemble, tone quality and musicianship Dr. Koussevitzky and his great orchestra have achieved together.

Not One-Man Achievement

Dr. Koussevitzky would be first to admit that it has not been entirely a one-man achievement. The Boston conductor inherited a fine musical legacy when he took over the orchestra in 1924. Since then, the orchestra's financial condition has been steadily improved by cooperative efforts of many persons, and the Tanglewood summer concerts plus extensive recording have helped make the average Boston Symphony musician's job a real career.

Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra is a wonderful instrument, on which the diminutive and fastidious conductor plays with alternate delicacy and strength. The maestro lives the music, mobile mouth and chin forming the rhythmic patterns. He "be-bops," so to speak, throughout. And with the pencil-sized baton and the occasional limp-wristed gestures of an angry marionette, he contrives somehow to become the incarnation of Prokofieff's, or Hindemith's or Beethoven's musical intentions.

He opened his program with Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony. It's so familiar through the Boston Orchestra's recordings that it needs little comment, except that it was as beautifully precise as always and had that thrilling advantage of depth and quality any real performance has over any recording.

I'd be willing to bet the Boston Orchestra could play that Prokofieff blindfolded, like Indianapolis Magician Sir Edward driving his car through traffic. Anyway, it wasn't a work-out for the maestro, who didn't begin real exertion until the Hindemith "Mathis der Maler" Symphony.

The Hindemith Symphony was the most fascinating of the evening's offerings. (It was a foregone conclusion that Beethoven's "Eroica" would be magnificent.) Paul Hindemith's writing in that symphony disdains obvious or lush effects. It has tragic feeling, but in a generalized, strictly nonliterary way.

Hindemith's polyphony (melody against melody) is punctuated here and there by powerful, chunky blasts from the brass section. In the Boston orchestra, the brass section is something to make any former enlisted man forget his Army-inspired prejudice. How they manage to combine rich tone, big volume and superhuman on-the-dot accuracy of attack is something they and Dr. Koussevitzky would have to explain.

It takes a superlative orchestra, a superlative conductor, to make even the usually dry-sounding developmental passages of Beethoven's Third Symphony seem significant. An amateur orchestra can play the big moments recognizably, even pleasingly. Maestro Koussevitzky, with his Russo-Gallic subtle sense of "comme il faut" (the way it should be), can incline a pursuit-pilot's eloquent hand and draw from his orchestra musical profundity in place of what formerly seemed musical arithmetic.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
DEC 6 1947

Boston Lists Berlioz 4th Symphony

One of the highlights in the Rochester musical season will come Wednesday evening when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky plays in Eastman Theater.

Major work of the evening will be Berlioz' Symphony No. 4, (Harold in Italy) in which Joseph de Pasquale will be soloist.

JOSEPH DE PASQUALE

Joining the Boston Orchestra this season, Mr. Pasquale, native of Philadelphia, succeeded to the post of "first desk" viola at the age of 37. That made him the youngest man to hold that position in any major orchestra in the United States.

Dr. Koussevitzky has such high esteem for him as to present him in Rochester as soloist in the Berlioz symphony, famous test-piece of viola virtuosity.

Mr. de Pasquale served four years in the Marine Band—"The President's" — in Washington, D. C., playing trumpet in band concerts, and viola in the Marine Symphony. Thus he appeared at the White House before such noted guests as Winston Churchill and Charles de Gaulle.

Wednesday night's program also will include the Divertimento in B-flat major for Strings and Two Horns, by Mozart; Serenade for Solo Flute, Harp and Strings, by Dr. Howard Hanson and the Daphnis at Chloe Ballet, Suite No. 2, by Ravel.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
[illegible]

HOT OFF THE WAX

Good Musicianship In Two Symphonies

BY ROBERT H. ALLEN.

BEETHOVEN'S "Eroica," practically a ritual for the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA over the generations, even more than in other musical centers, is beautifully performed by it and excellently recorded by RCA Victor (12 sides). Under SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY the strings are a well-knit, well-blended, well-balanced ensemble. Detail is usually subordinated to the large perspectives, but when it emerges it is fresh and spontaneous.

RACHMANINOFF'S Symphony No. 2, in E Minor, performed by the Minneapolis Symphoy Orchestra, is another triumph of good musicianship and recording (Victor, 12 sides). DIMITRI MITROPOULOS is a fine interpreter of the introverted Slav's valiant effort to triumph over the blues. Probably no composer, before or since Rachmaninoff, has pulled himself up by his boot straps with such an air of the well-appointed guardsman, Quixote with Sancho left out.

BACH'S "Sleepers, Wake!" cantata (Victor, eight 10-inch sides), shows ROBERT SHAW'S RCA Victor Chorale and orchestra at their splendid best. Nicolai's great hymn, familiar to Harvard chapelgoers, sounds gloriously with a mixed choir. PAUL MATTHEN, baritone, who sang so expressively his role in Shaw's recent album of Bach's B Minor Mass, has here the more stolid recitative and duet parts of the Bridegroom and the soprano parts are sung fluently by S. FRIEL. In contrast to these singers' restraint—and how else could they sing the quaint reiterated words of mystic passion,—the tenor narration by R. RUSSELL is exceedingly sentimental and I think this, too, is welcome and called for by the German text. JOSEPH FUCHS, violin, and ROBERT BLOOM, oboe, play decorative obbligatoes and add color to the ensemble.

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR

DEC 7 - 1947

Boston Symphony's Rendition Of Haydn Work Is Exquisite

By Col. L. R. Beals

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Serge oussevitzky, has made a new recording of Haydn's Symhony No. 94, in G, called "Surprise," for RCA Victor in the hree-disk set DM-1155. This orchestra's previous recording f the "Surprise" Symphony was in Victor's album No. 55, hich indicated the need of the new one.

While No. 55 was an excellent re-ording, there have been improveents in engineering and in surces which are taken advantage of No. 1155. The great orchestra ays the melodious work exquisite- and the recording is excellent.

The Rasoumovsky Quartets

Chamber music lovers will reice in RCA Victor's release of eethoven's Rasoumovsky Quartets, layed by the Paganini Quartet. his group is so called because each layer uses a Stradivarius instruent formerly owned by Paganini. hese colossal works of Opus 59 are oused in separate albums; the No. in F, in five-disk DM-1151; the No. , in E minor, in four-disk DM-1152; nd the No. 9, in C, in four-disk DM-153. The quartet's first recording s impressive, its tone brilliant and ts playing having great vitality. The recording is fine. The Rasounovsky Quartets are dedicated to Beethoven's friend and patron, Russian Count Rasoumovsky, and each contains a lively Russian folk tune. They were composed during the same period as the 3rd, 4th, 5th, and 6th Symphonies, and the opera, "Fidelio."

HOUSTON, TEX.
POST

DEC 7 1947

Beethoven: Symphony No. 3 in E Flat ("Eroica"), played by the Boston Symphony orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting (Victor M-1161). Though the Boston orchestra is white-hot and yields up some majestic masses of tone, the same charge must be brought against this "Eroica" that applies to the older Koussevitzky recording with the London Philharmonic. He exerts too much pressure throughout; the music is strident and over-dramatized; the tempos frenetic and arbitrary. Even the virtuosic Boston orchestra can be strained out of its Olympian suavity—as witness the nervousness of the solo horn and flute in the first movement; the pinched, coryza-like tone of the oboe in the Dead March. But if one can accept this pressure-playing, the performance is indeed "heroic" enough. The flying tempo demanded by Koussevitzky in the scherzo is achieved with a wonderful airiness; the climaxes are of shattering force. A superb piece of recording, however, only makes me wish harder that the performance itself were more continent.

HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE

DEC 7

Record Changer

BY ANN HOLMES

Beethoven, Symphony No. 3 (Eroica), Victor:

Another of Beethoven's great monuments is his victory over increasing deafness in his Third Symphony, which at the moment of inspiration he dedicated to Napoleon. As it happened, however Bonaparte proved himself unworthy in the eyes of the grea composer when he proclaimed himself emperor, and the dedication was torn up. The effect o the conqueror is to be felt in the Third Symphony, and while the composer tore the word "Bonaparte" off the title, he dedicated his towering work to "the memory of a great man," and it has since traveled under the name "Eroica."

The symphony is recorded under the masterful baton of Serge Koussevitzky, who conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and is imperative and commanding. Nor is its intricacy and massed force indelicately handled. For all Beethoven fans here is a bright, shining, and well-reproduced "Eroica."

POPULAR.

"Ballerina."
"Near You."
"Golden Earrings."
"Serenade of the Bells."
"Too Fat Polka."

SEMI-CLASSICAL.

"Malaguena."
Morton Gould's "Showcase."

CLASSICAL.

Berlioz "Homeo and Juliet."
Rachmaninoff Second Symphony.

lett O'Hara's vivid experiences are recorded with that symphonic touch by Al Goodman and his orchestra. On the reverse is the "Fantasia Mexicana," remembered as the musical gem from the recent movie "Fiesta."

TRENTON, N. J.
SUNDAY TIMES ADVERTISER

DEC 7 - 1947

The New

A Victor version of the "Eroica" Symphony by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra offers Beethoven lovers heady fare. Over-emphasis in the bass detracts somewhat from the worth of this generous reissue. Koussevitzky deals with the scherzo and the funeral march with a precise touch, but the first movement loses something in his performance. (Victor 1161)

Irra Petina sings for Columbia the richly colored songs of Tchaikovsky. Born in Russia, the daughter of an aide to the Czar, Miss Petina possesses a rich and expressive voice. She sings (in Russian) in this all-Tchaikovsky album "Liza's Aria" from the tragic opera, "Pique Dame"; "It Was Early Spring"; the famous "None But the Lonely Heart"; "Green Grass, I Wish"; the love song, "In This Moonlight Night"; "Don't Doubt Me, Dear"; and another love song, "Whether By Day." (Columbia MM-712)

COLUMBIA, S. C.
STATE

DEC 7 1947

Record Companies Build Two-Year Music Supply To Beat Petrillo Edict

By JEAN MEEGAN
AP Newsfeatures Writer

New York, Dec. 6—(AP)—Enough new music to satisfy America for two years is promised by the phonograph recording people by New Year's Eve when James C. Petrillo's edict, barring his American Federation of Musicians from making records or radio transcriptions, goes into effect.

The million dollar voices are growing husky with fatigue as they go into the stretch; the millionaire orchestra leaders are working (without white tie) through breakfast time at building a backlog that will last America's radio, juke boxes, and phonographs until 1950.

Working Overtime

Harry James hustles out of the Palladium ballroom in Hollywood at 2:30 in the morning and works for the next five hours in a recording studio. Frank Sinatra. working between 1 and 5 a. m. since October 18, when the ban was announced until December 31, when it goes into effect, will have 75 numbers recorded instead of the eight he usually makes in a two-month period.

Dinah Shore is waxing 50 vocals instead of four a month; Frankie Carle and Al Jolson are making 40 sides apiece.

Symphonic maestroes, too, are hastening to record classics they never got around to before. Toscanini and Koussevitsky both are in this ~~pressure cooker~~. Recording equipment has been rushed to the Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, and Cleveland symphonies.

Harrassed And Exhausted

Harrassed, exhausted Kay Kyser in his haste inadvertently recorded the same number twice. A red-eyed arranger slumped in a studio chair and his noisy snore spoiled a Buddy Clarke recording. Sinatra's throat gave out during one all-night session and his personal appearance in a Broadway theater had to be cancelled the next day.

It takes years to train recording technicians. There is no extra help available and the regulars are cranky from the impossible job o handling from 18 to 20 artists a week. If they're lucky four or five numbers can be recorded in a night. Some nights they can get only one or two; other nights nothing at all.

Keen-eared executives of the 175 recording companies are growing "hard of listening." In two months they will have auditioned, selected, and recorded a repertoire that normally would have taken about two years.

Movie Scores on Wax

Scores from next year's movies already are on wax. Music publishers have turned over their 1948-49 lists and the record companies have them ready for release. Show tunes, from musical comedies that won't be in rehearsal until next spring already are in recorded libraries.

"And if this isn't enough," commended the president of one of the largest companies, "we'll make any hit that comes along with vocal backgrounds."

That's the old dodge they used during Petrillo's 1942-1945 ban. Sinatra's comet flashed at that time. Restrained from using musical backgrounds for the new sensation, his recording company used human voices for accompaniment.

Non-Union Musicians

High-powered recording executives figure if worst comes to worst they'll hire non-union musicians. If, for instance, one company's favorite star records an innocuous sounding number that turns out to be a skyrocketing hit, competing companies will put it on wax with their own stars and non-union musicians.

"Every high school and college has some kind of glee club or orchestra," the recorders figure. "There are about 100,000 music schools in this country and some 10,000,000 people play some instrument. We'll record the best of them."

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
PRESS

DEC 7 1947

Turn Out Plenty Records To Beat Petrillo Ban

NEW YORK, Dec. 6 (AP)—Enough new music to satisfy America for two years is promised by the phonograph recording people by New Year's Eve when James C. Petrillo's edict, barring his American Federation of Musicians from making records or radio transcriptions, goes into effect.

The million dollar voices are growing husky with fatigue as they go into the stretch; the millionaire orchestra leaders are working (without white tie) through breakfast time at building a backlog that will last America's radio, juke boxes and phonographs until 1950.

Harry James hustles out of the Palladium Ballroom in Hollywood at 2:30 in the morning and works for the next five hours in a recording studio. Frank Sinatra, working between 1 and 5 A. M. since Oct 18, when the ban was announced, until Dec. 31, when it goes into effect, will have 75 numbers recorded instead of the eight he usually makes in a two-month period.

Dinah Shore is waxing 50 vocals instead of four a month; Frankie Carle and Al Jolson are making 40 sides apiece.

Symphonic maestroes, too, are hastening to record classics they never got around to before. Toscanini and Koussevitsky both are in this ~~pressure cooker~~. Recording equipment has been rushed to the Philadelphia, Pittsburgh and Cleveland Symphonies.

Harrassed, exhausted Kay Kyser in his haste inadvertently recorded the same number twice. A red-eyed arranger slumped in a studio chair and his noisy snore spoiled a Buddy Clarke recording. Sinatra's throat gave out during one all-night session and his personal appearance in a Broadway theatre to be cancelled the next day.

It takes years to train recording technicians. There is no extra help available and the regulars are cranky from the impossible job of handling from 18 to 20 artists a week. If they're lucky four or five numbers can be recorded in a night. Some nights they can get only one or two; other nights nothing at all.

Keen-eared executives of the 175 recording companies are growing "hard of listening." In two months they will have auditioned, selected and recorded a repertoire that normally would have taken about two years.

Vocal Backgrounds

Scores from next year's movies already are on wax. Music publishers have turned over their 1948-49 lists and the record companies have them ready for release. Show tunes, from musical comedies that won't even be in rehearsal until next Spring, already are in recorded libraries.

"And if this isn't enough," commented the president of one of the during Petrillo's 1942-1945 ban. Sinatra's comet flashed at that time. Restrained from using musical backgrounds for the new sensation his recording company used human voices for accompaniment.

High-powered recording executives figure if worst comes to worst they'll hire non-union musicians. If for instance, one company's favorite star records an innocuous sounding number that turns out to be a skyrocketing hit, competing companies will put it on wax with their own stars and non-union musicians.

"Every high school and college has some kind of glee club o orchestra," the recorders figure "There are about 100,000 music schools in this country and some 10,000,000 people play some instrument. We'll record the best o them."

The swift current of rumor tha twists through Tin Pan Alley hint there will be "bootleg" records. I addition to the four major companies: RCA Victor, Columbia Decca and Capitol, there are 2 secondary outfits and about 15 wildcat operations. Petrillo neve has been able to police the latter

Wise heads in the industry sa Petrillo is not out to get the recording companies, his targets ar the small, independent radio sta tions, who live on records but ball at paying for stand-by musicians

---

Boston Orchestra Wins Ovations

By Felix Borowski

Sunday's concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Orchestra Hall offered one of those sure-fire programs which can be raised to a higher power only by a virtuoso organization such as that which Serge Koussevitzky direct. All in all it was an amazing performance, which well explained the tumultous ovations which came from the listeners.

Undoubtedly the high point of the concert was the disclosure of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." In this the golden tone of the orchestra as a whole, the impeccable accomplishments of various woodwind players--notably those of the first flute and first clarinet --the extraordinary brilliance of the playing as a whole, were of almost unbelievable splendor.

Dr. Koussevitzky began his concert with a seldom heard Divertimento by Mozart--one written in 1777 for a string quartet with two horns. On this occasion it was presented by the string orchestra--together with the aforesaid horns--ostensibly to show off the first fiddle section in the difficult music written originally for the violin leader, which, at the first performance was Mozart himself.

The rich tone of the violins was effectively brought out, more especially in the recitative-like Andante preceding the final movement. The finale itself, with the exception of some lack of precision at the beginning of it, was accomplished with remarkable virtuosity.

Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony is an old story with Dr. Koussevitzky's men. They gave an impressive reading of it, one full of drama.

* * *

[43]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

DEC 7 - 1947

RECENT RECORDS

By JEROME D. BOHM

Victor Sets

J[illegible] wh[illegible] Victor [illegible]ould choose [illegible] for [illegible] another recording [illegible] of Beethoven's "Eroica" Sym[illegible] to this reviewer [illegible] excellent ones, in[illegible] so many [illegible], also published [illegible] available. Mr. [illegible] Victor [illegible] had already [illegible] conception of [illegible] Lo[illegible] Phil[illegible] wor[illegible] has discoursed it [illegible]rmonic. [illegible] Boston with the [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra without adding thereby [illegible] his reputation as [illegible] interpreter of Beethoven's [illegible] music. For while the per[illegible] tonally and technically [illegible] the increas[illegible] conductor's [illegible]ness is quite [illegible]

[illegible]maninoff's redundant Sec[illegible] Symphony in E minor is well [illegible] by the Minneapolis Sym[illegible] Orchestra under Dimitri [illegible] perceptive leader-

Love' Duet from the second act of [illegible] by Helen Traubel, Torsten Ralf and [illegible]politan Opera Orchestra under the [illegible] a far more satisfactory recording [illegible] music drama than that made by [illegible]lchior, with Edwin McArthur as

---

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

Frantic Race On to Beat Petrillo's Record Ba

NEW YORK, N. Y.—(AP)—Enough new music to satisfy America for two years is promised by the phonograph recording people by New Year's eve, when James C. Petrillo's edict, barring his American Federation of Musicians from making records or radio transcriptions, goes into effect.

The million dollar voices are growing husky with fatigue as they go into the stretch; the millionaire orchestra leaders are working (without white tie) through breakfast time at building a backlog that will last America's radio, juke boxes and phonographs until 1950.

In Hollywood, Harry James hustles out of the Palladium ballroom at 2:30 in the morning and works for the next five hours in a recording studio. Frank Sinatra, working between 1 and 5 a.m. since Oct. 18, when the ban was announced, until Dec. 31, when it goes into effect, will have 75 numbers recorded instead of the eight he usually makes in a two month period.

Dinah Shore is waxing 50 vocals instead of four a month; Frankie Carle and Al Jolson are making 40 sides apiece.

Big Symphonies Kept Busy, Too

SYMPHONIC maestros, too, are hastening to record classics they never got around to before. Toscanini and Koussevitsky both are in this pressure cooker. Recording equipment has been rushed to the Philadelphia, Pittsburgh and Cleveland symphonies.

Harassed, exhausted Kay Kyser in his haste inadvertently recorded the same number twice. A red-eyed arranger slumped in a studio chair and his noisy snore spoiled a Buddy Clarke recording. Sinatra's throat gave out during one all-night session and his personal appearance in a Broadway theater had to be canceled the next day.

It takes years to train recording technicians. There is no extra help available and the regulars are cranky from the impossible job of handling from 18 to 20 artists a week. If they are lucky, four or five numbers can be recorded in a night.

—By a Journal Staff Artist

Symphony maestros forgo their white ties in rush to get music on records.

Some nights they can get only one or two; other nights none at all.

Keen eared executives of the 175 recording companies are growing "hard of listening." In two months they will have auditioned, selected and recorded a repertoire that normally would have taken about two years.

Scores from next year's movies already are on wax. Music publishers have turned over their 1948-'49 lists and the record companies have them ready for release. Show tunes, from musical comedies that won't even be in rehearsal until next spring, already are in recorded libraries.

"And if this isn't enough," commented the president of one of the largest companies, "we'll make any hit that comes along with vocal backgrounds."

That is the old dodge they used during Petrillo's 1942-'45 ban. Sinatra's comet flashed at that time. Restrained from using instrumental backgrounds for the new sensation, his recording company used human voices for accompaniment.

High powered recording executives plan that if worst comes to worst they will hire nonunion musicians. If, for instance, one company's favorite star now records an innocuous sounding number that later turns out to be a hit, competing companies will then record it with their own stars and nonunion musicians.

"Every high school and college has some kind of glee club or orchestra," the recorders say. "There are abo 100,000 music schools in this countr, and some 10,000,000 people play some instrument. We'll record the best of them."

The swift current of rumor that twists through Tin Pan Alley hints that there will be "bootleg" records. In addition to the four major companies — RCA-Victor, Columbia, Decca and Capitol—there are 20 secondary outfits and about 150 wildcat operators. Petrillo never has been able to police the latter.

Ban Is Directed at Small Radio Stations

WISE heads in the industry say Petrillo is not out to get the recording companies; his targets are the small, independent radio stations, which live on records but balk at paying for stand-by musicians.

Petrillo conceded last summer before a house labor subcommittee in Washington that "the big reason" for his threat to ban recordings was to make 603 radio stations "more susceptible to employing musicians."

When he finally announced his decision Oct. 18 he said: "I don't know who's going out of business, but I know we're going out of business if we continue making records. We don't know of any other business that would make an instrument that would destroy themselves and we're going to stop making the instruments that have been destroying us."

Petrillo took similar action in 1942. After two years and three months the dispute ended in a complete victory for the union when the recording companies accepted union terms to pay the union fees ranging from 1c to 2c a record.

The AFM royalties, Petrillo once said, are used "to spread musical culture and to give employment to musicians, who have been put out of work by the records we have been making."

BARTLESVILLE, OKLA.
ENTERPRISE

Record Industry Hits Stretch In Run To Beat Petrillo Ban

By JEAN MEEGAN
AP Newsfeature Writer

NEW YORK—(AP)—Enough new music to satisfy America for two years is promised by the phonograph recording people by New Year's eve when James C. Petrillo's edict, barring his American Federation of Musicians from making records or radio transcriptions, goes into effect.

The million dollar voices are growing husky with fatigue as they go into the stretch; the millionaire orchestra leaders are working (without white tie) through breakfast time at building a backlog that will last America's radio, juke boxes and phonographs until 1950.

Harry James hustles out of the Palladium ballroom in Hollywood at 2:30 in the morning and works for the next 5 hours in a recording studio. Frank Sinatra, working between 1 and 5 a.m. since Oct. 18, when the ban was announced until Dec. 31, when it goes into effect, will have 75 numbers recorded instead of the eight he usually makes in a two-month period.

Dinah Shore is waxing 50 vocals instead of four a month; Frankie Carle and Al Jolson are making 40 sides apiece.

Symphonic maestroes, too, are hastening to record classics they never got around to before. Toscanini and Koussevitsky both are in this pressure cooker. Recording equipment has been rushed to the Philadelphia, Pittsburgh and Cleveland symphonies.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

DEC 7 1947

Musicians Work Overtime To Beat Petrillo Edict

By JEAN MEEGAN

New York, Dec. 6—(AP)—Enough new music to satisfy America for two years is promised by the phonograph recording people by New Year's Eve, when James C. Petrillo's edict, barring his American Federation of Musicians from making records or radio transcriptions, goes into effect.

The million dollar voices are growing husky with fatigue as they go into the stretch; the millionaire orchestra leaders are working (without white tie) through breakfast time at building a backlog that will last America's radio, juke boxes, and phonographs until 1950.

Harry James hustles out of the Palladium Ballroom in Hollywood at 2:30 in the morning and works for the next 5 hours in a recording studio. Frank Sinatra, working between 1 and 5 A. M., since October 18, when the ban was announced until December 31, when it goes into effect, will have 75 numbers recorded instead of the eight he usually makes in a two-month period.

Dinah Shore is waxing 50 vocals instead of four a month; Frankie Carle and Al Jolson are making 40 sides apiece.

Symphonic maestroes, too, are hastening to record classics they never got around to before. Toscanini and Koussevitzky both are in this pressure cooker. Recording equipment has been rushed to the Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, and Cleveland symphonies.

Sinatra's Throat Fails

Harassed, exhausted Kay Kyser in his haste inadvertently recorded the same number twice. A red-eyed arranger slumped in a studio chair and his noisy snore spoiled a Buddy Clarke recording. Sinatra's throat gave out during one all-night session and his personal appearance in a Broadway theater had to be cancelled the next day.

It takes years to train recording technicians. There is no extra help available and the regulars are cranky from the impossible job of handling from 18 to 20 artists a week. If they're lucky four or five numbers can be recorded in a night. Some nights they can get only one or two; other nights nothing at all.

Keen-eared executives of the 175 recording companies are growing "hard of listening." In two months they will have auditioned, selected, and recorded a repertoire that normally would have taken about two years.

Scores from next year's movies already are on wax. Music publishers have turned over their 1948-49 lists and the record companies have them ready for release. Show tunes, from musical comedies that won't even be in rehearsal until next Spring already are in recorded libraries.

"And if this isn't enough," commented the president of one of the largest companies, "we'll make any hit that comes along with vocal backgrounds."

That's the old dodge they used during Petrillo's 1942-1945 ban. Sinatra's comet flashed at that time. Restrained from using musical backgrounds for the new sensation, his recording company used human voices for accompaniment.

High-powered recording executives figure if worst comes to worst they'll hire non-union musicians. If, for instance, one company's favorite star records an innocuous sounding number that turns out to be a skyrocketing hit, competing companies will put it on wax with their own stars and non-union musicians.

[44]

CHICAGO, ILL.
JOURNAL OF COMMERCE

Boston Symphony Orchestra Excels; Golschmann to Conduct Here

By William Leonard

There was just the proper combination of novelty and familiarity about the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert Friday night at Orchestra Hall—and it was performed with a perfection that would have made even a less balanced program stimulating.

Serge Koussevitzky conducted his marvelously lubricated musical machine in Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony which is a popular item in any symphony's repertoire, and in Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" symphony and Hindemith's "Mathis der Mahler," which are established but still far from threadbare.

The Berlioz, with Joseph de Pasquale, 28-year old Philadelphian, as viola soloist, was an epic of melancholy romanticism, poetically fantastic but convincing in every turnabout of its many moods.

The Hindemith "symphony" improves with each hearing although it still is more impressive for the skill of its composer's technique than for any feeling of compulsion. It has an obvious sincerity without having the ability to convince the listener unless he meets it more than halfway.

* * *

---

22 CHICAGO SUNDAY TRIBUNE:
* Dec.7,1947 Part 1 Page 22

MUSIC BARES NEW IMPACT UPON ARTISTS

Boston Program of High Order

BY CLAUDIA CASSIDY

Today's concert by the Boston orchestra will be devoted to persuasive music of Mozart, Ravel and Tschaikowsky, but the program Serge Koussevitzky chose for Friday evening in Orchestra hall was an arresting illustration (perhaps inadvertent, tho I doubt it) of the impact of the world upon the artist.

Unable to find a Prokofieff Fifth or a Copland Third to introduce to us as in previous seasons, this concert began with Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, in which a man who had just experienced the Russian revolution turned from the clangor of the "Scythian Suite" to music he thought Mozart might have written had he lived in 1917.

Banned In Germany

It continued with what we know as a symphony because we have heard only those three excerpts from the opera, "Mathis der Maler," banned in Berlin in 1934 because the nazi government found its symbolism of the artist in revolt too pointed for comfort - action resulting in Furtwangler's temporary withdrawal from his conducting post and Hindemith's departure from Germany.

And as the motivating impact is not necessarily political, the program ended with "Harold in Italy," written by Berlioz because Paganini was briefly enamored of the viola.

Wins by Fascination

Paganini never played it - it was no score for a man whose reputation hung from a chandelier of fireworks - and it had little beyond Byronic wanderings in common with "Childe Harold." But it survived by his own melancholy fascinations, being bewitched by the "Harold" theme as the Fantastic Symphony is haunted by "The Beloved."

Given such music, a virtuoso orchestra and a conductor of Mr. Koussevitzky's imperious incandescence, you can scarcely achieve a commonplace concert. This one had coruscant splendors, but it was not the spellbinding performance with which the orchestra left us a year ago--a performance, by the way, of which the conductor said, "At last you have really heard the Boston orchestra."

Blaze Of Music

For the greater the orchestra, the more delicately balanced its artistic equilibrium. The weariness of travel, difficult acoustics they tip it out of alignment, but probably will be put in their place by this afternoon.

And less than Boston's best could be many another orchestra's triumph. Magnificence, intermittent or otherwise, is magnificence, and when the orchestra was tinder to the Koussevitzky spark, there was a blaze of music. The Prokofieff finale glittered like a ballet of rapiers. The grandeur of the Hindemith canvas was superbly set forth in its strange blends of the severe and the sumptuous, the mystical and the massive.

Has Molten Radiance

The brass choir had a molten radiance as rare as the winds in the Berlioz, that beguiling fantasy wrought of the febrile and the lyrical (this time with Joseph de Pasquale as violist) which has long been a Koussevitzky triumph. Then why be captious? Simply that you leave a great Boston concert not merely pleased, but walking on air.

Speaking of orchestras, Artur Rodzinski has gone before the board of directors of the Chicago Symphony to ask that if possible the orchestra return to its original home, the Auditorium. For details of the project, see the music section.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
POST

DEC 8 - 1947

On The Record—

New Version Of The 'Eroica' Best Of Week's Offerings

BY DUARD LE GRAND

With, more than likely, an eye on the Christmas shoppers, the major recording companies this week release some new performances of old favorites which should go nicely under the trees of the music fanciers on your list.

Easily at the top of the heap is a new version of Third Symphony by Serge Kou sevitsky and the Boston Symphon
in RCA Victor Album

This new Eroica contains some o
the finest sound you are likely t hear on record. The performanc lacks the excitement of the old collaboration between Bruno Walte and the New York Philharmoni
but it makes up for that deficienc with a precise and analytical read ing which is almost a course i symphony composition. Except fo the incurably romantic, this new Eroica should be just what Santa ordered.

* * *

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

8 - 1947

Bostonians Play With Precision

By Seymour S. Raven

In its first of two weekend concerts at Orchestra Hall Friday night, Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra again gave that kind of demonstration of symphonic playing which has made its coming a musical event of the first order.

The orchestra unlimbered with Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony." Dr. Koussevitzky, confident that his men knew their way about the piece, almost allowed the symphony to conduct itself, and it came off with clock-like precision.

What followed was as exacting an assignment as one could devise for an orchestra in one evening. There came two lofty examples of programmatic writing, separated by a hundred years in time, but much closer together in the matter of orchestral treatment of dramatic values--Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" symphonies.

The works differ, of course, in that Hindemith's work is steeped in mysticism and Berlioz' symphony is the product of a flaming romanticism, with a marked dominance of the flesh over the spirit.

The importance of the two works in the same concert lies in the conclusion that program music is neither dead nor old-fashioned.

Berlioz' fantastic storytelling and his genius at orchestration in advance of his time, and Hindemith's treatment of literary or symbolic materials in modern idiom can add up to a long concert, perhaps, but one that is well worth hearing, especially at the hands of such an excellent organization as the Boston Symphony.

The new principal violist of the group, Joseph de Pasquale, gave a beautiful account of the solo role in "Harold". His tone was warm and soft and he understood fully the interdependence of his instrument and the orchestra.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

Boston Orchestra Wins Ovations

By Felix Borowski

Sunday's concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Orchestra Hall offered one of those sure-fire programs which can be raised to a higher power only by a virtuoso organization such as that which Serge Koussevitzky direct. All in all it was an amazing performance, which well explained the tumultous ovations which came from the listeners.

Undoubtedly the high point of the concert was the disclosure of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." In this the golden tone of the orchestra as a whole, the impeccable accomplishments of various woodwind players--notably those of the first flute and first clarinet --the extraordinary brilliance of the playing as a whole, were of almost unbelievable splendor.

Dr. Koussevitzky began his concert with a seldom heard Divertimento by Mozart--one written in 1777 for a string quartet with two horns. On this occasion it was presented by the string orchestra--together with the aforesaid horns--ostensibly to show off the first fiddle section in the difficult music written originally for the violin leader, which, at the first performance was Mozart himself.

The rich tone of the violins was effectively brought out, more especially in the recitative-like Andante preceding the final movement. The finale itself, with the exception of some lack of precision at the beginning of it, was accomplished with remarkable virtuosity.

Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony is an old story with Dr. Koussevitzky's men. They [illegible] impressive reading

---

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
DEC 8 - 1947

I Dare Say—

Good Music Comes High

By FLORENCE FISHER PARRY

I sat close to the podium so I could watch Koussevitzky's face, the face of a child immersed in a joyous miracle. Music flowed from him, his body its medium. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" became a fresh and wondrous thing; all memory of its stale and cloying abuses gone from mind.

Mrs. Parry

I pictured Reiner in the place of Koussevitsky on the podium. How his baton would have evoked an even more strict, if not so happy, perfection! Here are two masters supreme upon the peak of great musicianship.

But I say we in Pittsburgh are the luckier possessor to have Reiner rule the destiny of our Symphony. He is the youngest of the few great conductors, his greatest accomplishments ahead of him. Do we realize what we have, how fortunate we are, what cause for pride, what incentive to be deserving of the opportunity of making Pittsburgh the great music center it can be?

As long as I can remember it always made me mad when I met up with the implied superiority of the typical Bostonian. He always was bragging about the Boston Symphony, the way a foolish mother might brag about her own child. His sense of possession was so intense, so boastful, that it made him almost objectionable.

As a matter of fact, the Boston Symphony owes much of its reputation and its fame to the people of Boston who, for a half century, have celebrated it in something the same way as the Christian Scientists might celebrate Mrs. Eddy, or Notre Dame its football team.

Boston's Rival

Well, pride is a good thing. It can pass miracles. It's what we need in Pittsburgh, far more of it than that which we now possess. Bostonians may be insufferably proud of their Boston Symphony; but braggarts though they are, look how it has worked! You think of Boston and you think of her Symphony; and although today it deserves all the encomiums that could be heaped upon it, there was a day when it didn't, and when a lot of us felt that it was being crowded down our throats.

Well, now we have OUR Symphony, a great one, with just as much reason to be proud as Boston ever had, and we can make its future into anything. First of all, we possess that most important thing of all: we have music in our hearts here. We are a city of music lovers. Where else does musical effort thrive more?

Within the past few years one magnificently successful musical project after another has taken root and grown into an institution.

We have the Pittsburgh Opera Company, the Civic Opera in summer. We have the Beegle Brothers, brilliantly sustaining the reputation of the high service May Beegle instituted, to bring us each year the great music treats of the world. We have our Bach Choir, which only the other night gave evidence again of its pure vocal mastery. We have one of the most powerful musical groups in America, the Tuesday Musical Club. The death of Harvey Gaul inspired tribute that has already taken impressive concrete shape.

No wonder Syria Mosque has become within a few short years, utterly inadequate to house the great musical events which we are honored with.

But great institutions, even as successful as the Pittsburgh Symphony, cannot—can never be—entirely self-supporting. Perfection comes high; and as long as

CHICAGO, ILL.
JOURNAL OF COMMERCE
8 -47

Boston Symphony Orchestra Excels; Golschmann to Conduct Here

By William Leonard

There was just the proper combination of novelty and familiarity about the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert Friday night at Orchestra Hall—and it was performed with a perfection that would have made even a less balanced program stimulating.

Serge Koussevitzky conducted his marvelously lubricated musical machine in Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony which is a popular item in any symphony's repertoire, and in Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" symphony and Hindemith's "Mathis der Mahler," which are established but still far from threadbare.

The Berlioz, with Joseph de Pasquale, 28-year old Philadelphian, as viola soloist, was an epic of melancholy romanticism, poetically fantastic but convincing in every turnabout of its many moods.

The Hindemith "symphony" improves with each hearing although it still is more impressive for the skill of its composer's technique than for any feeling of compulsion. It has an obvious sincerity without having the ability to convince the listener unless he meets it more than halfway.

* * *

---

22 CHICAGO SUNDAY TRIBUNE:
Dec. 7, 1947 Part 1 Page 22

MUSIC BARES NEW IMPACT UPON ARTISTS

Boston Program of High Order

BY CLAUDIA CASSIDY

Today's concert by the Boston orchestra will be devoted to persuasive music of Mozart, Ravel and Tschaikowsky, but the program Serge Koussevitzky chose for Friday evening in Orchestra hall was an arresting illustration (perhaps inadvertent, tho I doubt it) of the impact of the world upon the artist.

Unable to find a Prokofieff Fifth or a Copland Third to introduce to us as in previous seasons, this concert began with Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, in which a man who had just experienced the Russian revolution turned from the clangor of the "Scythian Suite" to music he thought Mozart might have written had he lived in 1917.

Banned In Germany

It continued with what we know as a symphony because we have heard only those three excerpts from the opera, "Mathis der Maler," banned in Berlin in 1934 because the nazi government found its symbolism of the artist in revolt too pointed for comfort - action resulting in Furtwangler's temporary withdrawal from his conducting post and Hindemith's departure from Germany.

And as the motivating impact is not necessarily political, the program ended with "Harold in Italy," written by Berlioz because Paganini was briefly enamored of the viola.

Wins by Fascination

Paganini never played it - it was no score for a man whose reputation hung from a chandelier of fireworks - and it had little beyond Byronic wanderings in common with "Childe Harold." But it survived by his own melancholy fascinations, being bewitched by the "Harold" theme as the Fantastic Symphony is haunted by "The Beloved."

Given such music, a virtuoso orchestra and a conductor of Mr. Koussevitzky's imperious incandescence, you can scarcely achieve a commonplace concert. This one had coruscant splendors, but it was not the spellbinding performance with which the orchestra left us a year ago--a performance, by the way, of which the conductor said, "At last you have really heard the Boston orchestra."

Blaze Of Music

For the greater the orchestra, the more delicately balanced its artistic equilibrium. The weariness of travel, difficult acoustics they tip it out of alignment, but probably will be put in their place by this afternoon.

And less than Boston's best could be many another orchestra's triumph. Magnificence, intermittent or otherwise, is magnificence, and when the orchestra was tinder to the Koussevitzky spark, there was a blaze of music. The Prokofieff finale glittered like a ballet of rapiers. The grandeur of the Hindemith canvas was superbly set forth in its strange blends of the severe and the sumptuous, the mystical and the massive.

Has Molten Radiance

The brass choir had a molten radiance as rare as the winds in the Berlioz, that beguiling fantasy wrought of the febrile and the lyrical (this time with Joseph de Pasquale as violist) which has long been a Koussevitzky triumph. Then why be captious? Simply that you leave a great Boston concert not merely pleased, but walking on air.

Speaking of orchestras, Artur Rodzinski has gone before the board of directors of the Chicago Symphony to ask that if possible the orchestra return to its original home, the Auditorium. For details of the project, see the music section.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
POST
DEC 8 - 1947

On The Record—

New Version Of The 'Eroica' Best Of Week's Offerings

BY DUARD LE GRAND

With, more than likely, an eye on the Christmas shoppers, the major recording companies this week release some new performances of old favorites which should go nicely under the trees of the music fanciers on your list.

Easily at the top of the heap is a new version of Beethoven's Third Symphony by Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony in RCA Victor Album ~~1161~~.

This new Eroica contains some of the finest sound you are likely to hear on record. The performance lacks the excitement of the old collaboration between Bruno Walter and the New York Philharmonic, but it makes up for that deficiency with a precise and analytical reading which is almost a course in symphony composition. Except for the incurably romantic, this new Eroica should be just what Santa ordered.

* * *

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN
8 - 1947

Bostonians Play With Precision

By Seymour S. Raven

In its first of two weekend concerts at Orchestra Hall Friday night, Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra again gave that kind of demonstration of symphonic playing which has made its coming a musical event of the first order.

The orchestra unlimbered with Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony." Dr. Koussevitzky, confident that his men knew their way about the piece, almost allowed the symphony to conduct itself, and it came off with clock-like precision.

What followed was as exacting an assignment as one could devise for an orchestra in one evening. There came two lofty examples of programmatic writing, separated by a hundred years in time, but much closer together in the matter of orchestral treatment of dramatic values--Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" symphonies.

The works differ, of course, in that Hindemith's work is steeped in mysticism and Berlioz' symphony is the product of a flaming romanticism, with a marked dominance of the flesh over the spirit.

The importance of the two works in the same concert lies in the conclusion that program music is neither dead nor old-fashioned.

Berlioz' fantastic storytelling and his genius at orchestration in advance of his time, and Hindemith's treatment of literary or symbolic materials in modern idiom can add up to a long concert, perhaps, but one that is well worth hearing, especially at the hands of such an excellent organization as the Boston Symphony.

The new principal violist of the group, Joseph de Pasquale, gave a beautiful account of the solo role in "Harold". His tone was warm and soft and he understood fully the interdependence of his instrument and the orchestra.

Su given by the Bost Orchestra at Orchest ffered one of those sur re programs which can be raised to a higher power only by a virtuoso organization such as that which Serge Koussevitzky direct. All in all it was an amazing performance, which well explained the tumultous ovations which came from the listeners.

Undoubtedly the high point of the concert was the disclosure of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." In this the golden tone of the orchestra as a whole, the impeccable accomplishments of various woodwind players--notably those of the first flute and first clarinet --the extraordinary brilliance of the playing as a whole, were of almost unbelievable splendor.

Dr. Koussevitzky began his concert with a seldom heard Divertimento by Mozart--one written in 1777 for a string quartet with two horns. On this occasion it was presented by the string orchestra--together with the aforesaid horns--ostensibly to show off the first fiddle section in the difficult music written originally for the violin leader, which, at the first performance was Mozart himself.

The rich tone of the violins was effectively brought out, more especially in the recitative-like Andante preceding the final movement. The finale itself, with the exception of some lack of precision at the beginning of it, was accomplished with remarkable virtuosity.

Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony is an old story with Dr. Koussevitzky's men. They impressive reading

---

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
DEC 8 - 1947

I Dare Say—

Good Music Comes High

By FLORENCE FISHER PARRY

I sat close to the podium so I could watch Koussevitsky's face, the face of a child immersed in a joyous miracle. Music flowed from him, his body its medium. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" became a fresh and wondrous thing; all memory of its stale and cloying abuses gone from mind.

Mrs. Parry

I pictured Reiner in the place of Koussevitsky on the podium. How his baton would have evoked an even more strict, if not so happy, perfection! Here are two masters supreme upon the peak of great musicianship.

But I say we in Pittsburgh are the luckier possessor to have Reiner rule the destiny of our Symphony. He is the youngest of the few great conductors, his greatest accomplishments ahead of him. Do we realize what we have, how fortunate we are, what cause for pride, what incentive to be deserving of the opportunity of making Pittsburgh the great music center it can be?

As long as I can remember it always made me mad when I met up with the implied superiority of the typical Bostonian. He always was bragging about the Boston Symphony, the way a foolish mother might brag about her own child. His sense of possession was so intense, so boastful, that it made him almost objectionable.

As a matter of fact, the Boston Symphony owes much of its reputation and its fame to the people of Boston who, for a half century, have celebrated it in something the same way as the Christian Scientists might celebrate Mrs. Eddy, or Notre Dame its football team.

Boston's Rival

Well, pride is a good thing. It can pass miracles. It's what we need in Pittsburgh, far more of it than that which we now possess. Bostonians may be insufferably proud of their Boston Symphony; but braggarts though they are, look how it has worked! You think of Boston and you think of her Symphony; and although today it deserves all the encomiums that could be heaped upon it, there was a day when it didn't, and when a lot of us felt that it was being crowded down our throats.

Well, now we have OUR Symphony, a great one, with just as much reason to be proud as Boston ever had, and we can make its future into anything. First of all, we possess that most important thing of all: we have music in our hearts here. We are a city of music lovers. Where else does musical effort thrive more?

Within the past few years one magnificently successful musical project after another has taken root and grown into an institution.

We have the Pittsburgh Opera Company, the Civic Opera in summer. We have the Beegle Brothers, brilliantly sustaining the reputation of the high service May Beegle instituted, to bring us each year the great music treats of the world. We have our Bach Choir, which only the other night gave evidence again of its pure vocal mastery. We have one of the most powerful musical groups in America, the Tuesday Musical Club. The death of Harvey Gaul inspired tribute that has already taken impressive concrete shape.

No wonder Syria Mosque has become within a few short years, utterly inadequate to house the great musical events which we are honored with.

But great institutions, even as successful as the Pittsburgh Symphony, cannot—can never be—entirely self-supporting. Perfection comes high; and as long as

CHICAGO, ILL.
JOURNAL OF COMMERCE

DEC 8 - 1947

Boston Symphony Orchestra Excels; Golschmann to Conduct Here

By William Leonard

There was just the proper combination of novelty and familiarity about the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert Friday night at Orchestra Hall—and it was performed with a perfection that would have made even a less balanced program stimulating.

Serge Koussevitzky conducted his marvelously lubricated musical machine in Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony which is a popular item in any symphony's repertoire, and in Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" symphony and Hindemith's "Mathis der Mahler," which are established but still far from threadbare.

The Berlioz, with Joseph de Pasquale, 28-year old Philadelphian, as viola soloist, was an epic of melancholy romanticism, poetically fantastic but convincing in every turnabout of its many moods.

The Hindemith "symphony" improves with each hearing although it still is more impressive for the skill of its composer's technique than for any feeling of compulsion. It has an obvious sincerity without having the ability to convince the listener unless he meets it more than halfway.

* * *

---

22 CHICAGO SUNDAY TRIBUNE:
Dec.7,1947 Part 1 Page 22

MUSIC BARES NEW IMPACT UPON ARTISTS

Boston Program of High Order

BY CLAUDIA CASSIDY

Today's concert by the Boston orchestra will be devoted to persuasive music of Mozart, Ravel and Tschaikowsky, but the program Serge Koussevitzky chose for Friday evening in Orchestra hall was an arresting illustration (perhaps inadvertent, tho I doubt it) of the impact of the world upon the artist.

Unable to find a Prokofieff Fifth or a Copland Third to introduce to us as in previous seasons, this concert began with Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, in which a man who had just experienced the Russian revolution turned from the clangor of the "Scythian Suite" to music he thought Mozart might have written had he lived in 1917.

Banned In Germany

It continued with what we know as a symphony because we have heard only those three excerpts from the opera, "Mathis der Maler," banned in Berlin in 1934 because the nazi government found its symbolism of the artist in revolt too pointed for comfort - action resulting in Furtwangler's temporary withdrawal from his conducting post and Hindemith's departure from Germany.

And as the motivating impact is not necessarily political, the program ended with "Harold in Italy," written by Berlioz because Paganini was briefly enamored of the viola.

Wins by Fascination

Paganini never played it - it was no score for a man whose reputation hung from a chandelier of fireworks - and it had little beyond Byronic wanderings in common with "Childe Harold." But it survived by his own melancholy fascinations, being bewitched by the "Harold" theme as the Fantastic Symphony is haunted by "The Beloved."

Given such music, a virtuoso orchestra and a conductor of Mr. Koussevitzky's imperious incandescence, you can scarcely achieve a commonplace concert. This one had coruscant splendors, but it was not the spellbinding performance with which the orchestra left us a year ago--a performance, by the way, of which the conductor said, "At last you have really heard the Boston orchestra."

Blaze Of Music

For the greater the orchestra, the more delicately balanced its artistic equilibrium. The weariness of travel, difficult acoustics they tip it out of alignment, but probably will be put in their place by this afternoon.

And less than Boston's best could be many another orchestra's triumph. Magnificence, intermittent or otherwise, is magnificence, and when the orchestra was tinder to the Koussevitzky spark, there was a blaze of music. The Prokofieff finale glittered like a ballet of rapiers. The grandeur of the Hindemith canvas was superbly set forth in its strange blends of the severe and the sumptuous, the mystical and the massive.

Has Molten Radiance

The brass choir had a molten radiance as rare as the winds in the Berlioz, that beguiling fantasy wrought of the febrile and the lyrical (this time with Joseph de Pasquale as violist) which has long been a Koussevitzky triumph. Then why be captious? Simply that you leave a great Boston concert not merely pleased, but walking on air.

Speaking of orchestras, Artur Rodzinski has gone before the board of directors of the Chicago Symphony to ask that if possible the orchestra return to its original home, the Auditorium. For details of the project, see the music section.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
POST

DEC 8 - 1947

On The Record—

New Version Of The 'Eroica' Best Of Week's Offerings

BY DUARD LE GRAND

With, more than likely, an eye on the Christmas shoppers, the major recording companies this week release some new performances of old favorites which should go nicely under the trees of the music fanciers on your list.

Easily at the top of the heap is a new version of Beeth
Third Symphony by Serge Kou sevitzky and the Boston Symphon
in RCA Victor Album 1161.

This new Eroica contains some o
the finest sound you are likely t
hear on record. The performanc lacks the excitement of the old col laboration between Bruno Walte
and the New York Philharmoni
but it makes up for that deficienc
with a precise and analytical read ing which is almost a course i symphony composition. Except fo the incurably romantic, this new Eroica should be just what Santa ordered.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

8 - 1947

Bostonians Play With Precision

By Seymour S.Raven

In its first of two weekend concerts at Orchestra Hall Friday night, Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra again gave that kind of demonstration of symphonic playing which has made its coming a musical event of the first order.

The orchestra unlimbered with Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony." Dr. Koussevitzky, confident that his men knew their way about the piece, almost allowed the symphony to conduct itself, and it came off with clock-like precision.

What followed was as exacting an assignment as one could devise for an orchestra in one evening. There came two lofty examples of programmatic writing, separated by a hundred years in time, but much closer together in the matter of orchestral treatment of dramatic values--Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" symphonies.

The works differ, of course, in that Hindemith's work is steeped in mysticism and Berlioz' symphony is the product of a flaming romanticism, with a marked dominance of the flesh over the spirit.

The importance of the two works in the same concert lies in the conclusion that program music is neither dead nor old-fashioned.

Berlioz' fantastic storytelling and his genius at orchestration in advance of his time, and Hindemith's treatment of literary or symbolic materials in modern idiom can add up to a long concert, perhaps, but one that is well worth hearing, especially at the hands of such an excellent organization as the Boston Symphony.

The new principal violist of the group, Joseph de Pasquale, gave a beautiful account of the solo role in "Harold". His tone was warm and soft and he understood fully the interdependence of his instrument and the orchestra.

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN

9

Boston Orchestra Wins Ovations

By Felix Borowski

Sunday's concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Orchestra Hall offered one of those sure-fire programs which can be raised to a higher power only by a virtuoso organization such as that which Serge Koussevitzky direct. All in all it was an amazing performance, which well explained the tumultous ovations which came from the listeners.

Undoubtedly the high point of the concert was the disclosure of Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." In this the golden tone of the orchestra as a whole, the impeccable accomplishments of various woodwind players--notably those of the first flute and first clarinet --the extraordinary brilliance of the playing as a whole, were of almost unbelievable splendor.

Dr. Koussevitzky began his concert with a seldom heard Divertimento by Mozart--one written in 1777 for a string quartet with two horns. On this occasion it was presented by the string orchestra--together with the aforesaid horns--ostensibly to show off the first fiddle section in the difficult music written originally for the violin leader, which, at the first performance was Mozart himself.

The rich tone of the violins was effectively brought out, more especially in the recitative-like Andante preceding the final movement. The finale itself, with the exception of some lack of precision at the beginning of it, was accomplished with remarkable virtuosity.

Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony is an old story with Dr. Koussevitzky's men. They [illegible] impressive reading

---

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
DEC 8 - 1947

I Dare Say—

Good Music Comes High

By FLORENCE FISHER PARRY

I sat close to the podium so I could watch Koussevitsky's face, the face of a child immersed in a joyous miracle. Music flowed from him, his body its medium. Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" became a fresh and wondrous thing; all memory of its stale and cloying abuses gone from mind.

Mrs. Parry

I pictured Reiner in the place of Koussevitsky on the podium. How his baton would have evoked an even more strict, if not so happy, perfection! Here are two masters supreme upon the peak of great musicianship.

But I say we in Pittsburgh are the luckier possessor to have Reiner rule the destiny of our Symphony. He is the youngest of the few great conductors, his greatest accomplishments ahead of him. Do we realize what we have, how fortunate we are, what cause for pride, what incentive to be deserving of the opportunity of making Pittsburgh the great music center it can be?

As long as I can remember it always made me mad when I met up with the implied superiority of the typical Bostonian. He always was bragging about the Boston Symphony, the way a foolish mother might brag about her own child. His sense of possession was so intense, so boastful, that it made him almost objectionable.

As a matter of fact, the Boston Symphony owes much of its reputation and its fame to the people of Boston who, for a half century, have celebrated it in something the same way as the Christian Scientists might celebrate Mrs. Eddy, or Notre Dame its football team.

Boston's Rival

Well, pride is a good thing. It can pass miracles. It's what we need in Pittsburgh, far more of it than that which we now possess. Bostonians may be insufferably proud of their Boston Symphony; but braggarts though they are, look how it has worked! You think of Boston and you think of her Symphony; and although today it deserves all the encomiums that could be heaped upon it, there was a day when it didn't, and when a lot of us felt that it was being crowded down our throats.

Well, now we have OUR Symphony, a great one, with just as much reason to be proud as Boston ever had, and we can make its future into anything. First of all, we possess that most important thing of all: we have music in our hearts here. We are a city of music lovers. Where else does musical effort thrive more?

Within the past few years one magnificently successful musical project after another has taken root and grown into an institution.

We have the Pittsburgh Opera Company, the Civic Opera in summer. We have the Beegle Brothers, brilliantly sustaining the reputation of the high service May Beegle instituted, to bring us each year the great music treats of the world. We have our Bach Choir, which only the other night gave evidence again of its pure vocal mastery. We have one of the most powerful musical groups in America, the Tuesday Musical Club. The death of Harvey Gaul inspired tribute that has already taken impressive concrete shape.

No wonder Syria Mosque has become within a few short years, utterly inadequate to house the great musical events which we are honored with.

But great institutions, even as successful as the Pittsburgh Symphony, cannot — can never be — entirely self-supporting. Perfection comes high; and as long as genius is so rare and talent so occasional in human beings, great music must be bought with gold and paid for.

This obligation, thus far, has not been met by the Pittsburgh public. The Pittsburgh Symphony still owes its major support to a comparatively few benefactors. It could not exist for a season upon its box office, even with attendance overflowing. That is why this year, the most successful year the Pittsburgh Symphony has ever had, it still shows a deficit of $40,000. And this in spite of the magnificent contributions that have been privately given by music lovers and civic leaders with private means to draw from.

ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
DEC 9 1947

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Orchestra In Fine Concert

By Carl Gehring

Another [illegible] concert by Serge Koussevitzky [illegible] the Boston Symphony [illegible] was added last [illegible] series of [illegible] to Ann Arbor [illegible] these performers [illegible] Hill Auditorium in [illegible] concert of the Choral Union [illegible] Koussevitzky and [illegible] their customary [illegible] performances of a Divertimento [illegible] B Flat Major, for Strings and two Horns (Koechel No. 287), by Mozart; Suite No. 2 from Ravel's [illegible] "Daphnis and Chloe" [illegible] Berlioz "Harold in Italy" Symphony, with Viola [illegible] soloist in the Berlioz [illegible] Joseph de Pasquale, [illegible] soloist in the orchestra.

For the quality of this organization's string section as shown in its performance of Mozart's Divertimento, superlatives of the past are again in order. Written for string quartet and two horns, the work was beautifully negotiated by two horns and the string section which, reduced to its barest essentials, revealed the ultimate in [illegible] musicianship with special emphasis on design and contrasting intonation. Noteworthy was the variety of the instrumental timbre in passages wherein subsidiary parts commented upon the principal line, as in the theme and variations and in the finale, where each part has particular importance in the construction of the movement.

Large Orchestra Takes Over

Thus challenged by so fine a projection by one of its choirs, the balance of the orchestra took over with a vengeance in the full modern style of Ravel and gave off with all of the power, color, integration and blending of parts, instrumental balances and general ensemble which we have come to associate with a performance by the entire Boston Orchestra. The strings, appropriately restrained in Mozart's less effusive music, were lustrous and titanic in the fuller address of Ravel; the woodwinds shimmered; the brasses, so well represented by the exquisite work of the horns in the Divertimento, had great resonance and authority in "Daphnis and Chloe."

The fidelity with which Koussevitzky approaches various kinds of music, remarked upon in the past, was particularly evident in his readings of these two widely contrasting works. While a chronological arrangement of the program would have had the Berlioz intervening between the Mozart and Ravel compositions, the length of the Symphony probably was the factor which had it placed on the concluding half of the event. In any case, the immediate proximity of Mozart and Ravel made for the most interesting and provocative kind of contrast in which Koussevitzky revealed himself as a completely poised and erudite master of the classical style on the one hand and a galvanic interpreter of the modern on the other.

With the romanticist Berlioz, the conductor was likewise most effective. The "Harold in Italy" Symphony incorporates all of the driving energy, long contemplative passages and brilliance of orchestration which are typical of its composer's style, and the manner of its performance was in the very finest Berlioz tradition which Pierre Monteux scarcely could have surpassed. Nothing could have been more authentic than the first movement, with its gorgeous Adagio introduction and the shifting moods of the ensuing Allegro, unless it were the finale, with its typically Berlioz "Orgy of Brigands." Here, as all evening, the orchestra was superb, especially in the climaxes.

The viola soloist, drawn from the ranks of so outstanding a group, hardly could have done other than acquit himself admirably. Playing an instrument which is a 1798 product of Lorenzo Storione, of Cremona, de Pasquale negotiated the solo part with authority and fine musicianship, and sounded especially well against a counter-theme, beautifully intoned in the flute, in the first movement. In the matter of solo playing, for that matter, the long flute passage from "Daphnis and Chloe" must be identified as quite outstanding, and no less effective, if shorter, than the contribution which de Pasquale made to so splendid a concert.

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-AMERICAN

Boston Symphony's Concert Leaves Audience Breathless

BY CHARLES BUCKLEY

A Boston Symphony Orchestra concert is no place for you if you have high blood pressure, or if you dislike such diversions as the roller coaster or the whip-cracker.

We're not implying that Conductor Koussevitzky cracks the whip, but music with him is an exciting, hair-raising experience where the audience hangs on for dear life.

Nor does it make too much difference what he interprets. Koussevitzky creates excitement and is a master showman. There was an aura of excitement last Sunday before the take-off and, in the final chord of the Tschaikowsky Sixth Symphony, Koussevitzky held the audience breathless for seconds after the orchestra had finished audible sound.

His Tschaikowsky was intense, volatile and full of highlighted contrasts. His ideas of interpretation were unfettered by technical weaknesses, because this orchestra is a virtuoso orchestra if there ever was one.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

ON THE AISLE

Koussevitzky Concert, as Toscanini's "Otello, Rich Harvest of Vintage Years in Music

By Claudia Cassidy

If you were fortunate over the weekend you heard two extraordinary performances by two rare men of music, Arturo Toscanini's first of two broadcasts of Verdi's "Otello" and Serge Koussevitzky's second of two concerts with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Orchestra hall. They had these things in common--absolute authority, profound understanding, incandescent communication, the inexhaustible resources of the great gift constantly renewed by the very prodigality of its sharing, and, perhaps most of all, the youthful heart. Neither Mr. Koussevitsky nor Mr. Toscanini was born yesterday, yet they make too many of the world's conductors look--and sound--like tired old men.

If I were a millionaire (I never worry about being one except in just such cases) there would be very little I could do for Mr. Koussevitzky. He has what is probably the finest orchestra in the world, and he has in Tanglewood not only a summer festival but a music center devoted to what is nearest his heart, the discovery and development of talents. But for Mr. Toscanini--well, make it a multimillionaire. For the project would involve a miracle opera house, his unqualified choice of the world's singers, and a non-stop clause on rehearsals. Vintage years should hold no worry beyond the richness of the harvest.

-o-

It was a bumper crop Sunday afternoon in Orchestra hall. Everyone who goes to concerts knows that once in a very great while the sense of rapport is so strong as to be almost tangible, so that orchestra, conductor, and audience share an experience not to be forgotten. This time the Boston orchestra was at the peak of its unique form, Mr. Koussevitzky was at his most eloquent, and the audience was a fourth dimension of acutely sensitive acoustics. It was the same hall, the same orchestra, and some of the same audience as Friday night, but it was a different world of music.

It touches its peak in what was the supreme performance in my experience of the second series of fragments from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe." This was a Koussevitzky masterpiece catching precisely the most illuminating light. It was a great molten mass of orchestral sound set in motion by the merest lift of the conductor's finger, pouring irresistibly to its gleaming climax, yet so rich in light and shade and color, so exquisite in equilibrium, that it was as subtle in detail as it was shattering in impact.

-o-

To preface it Mr. Koussevitsky chose a lovely and little known Mozart Divertimento in B flat (Koechel 287), written for strings and two horns, and this was no dry or dusty or even lacy Mozart. It was gossamer in texture, lyrically vital in spirit.

At the end came Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique," a showpiece in the sense of what a Boston orchestra can do with its yearning melodies and its crackling, headlong march, but something nobler than that, too, in the somber splendor of the adagio lamentoso, which was so darkly, powerfully wrought the audience sat mesmerized until the conductor's gesture of release broke the spell

---

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

Kousevitsky Earns Ovation

BY IRVING SABLOSKY

The ovation tendered the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor Serge Koussevitzky at Orchestra Hall Sunday afternoon voiced more than approval or appreciation.

It was a clamor of half-tearful emotion, tinged with earnest gratitude for the experience of the music that had aroused it.

IT WAS AFTER the revelation of Ravel's 2d Daphnis and Chloe Suite that the feeling reached its peak. But that was only the brilliant climax of a completely extraordinary concert by an orchestra of musicians each seeming to have an enthusiastic conviction about every note of his music--and the conviction of each one coinciding with that of every other.

That conviction emanated from Dr. Koussevitzky whose eloquent baton could turn perfectly each phrase of Mozart's Divertimento in B-flat(K.287) or set Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetique' Symphony seething with smouldering self-annihilation.

THE LUMINOUS 'Mathis der Maler' of Hindemith, the blazing 'Harold in Italy' of Berlioz of the Friday evening concert, and Sunday's Mozart--irresistible even though its soloistic passages weren't quite suited to the full string section -- all led to that indescribable performance of the Ravel.

[46]

CHICAGO, ILL.
JOURNAL OF COMMERCE

9-[illegible]

Boston Orchestra in Second Concert Pergolesi Opera Revived

By William Leonard

The perfection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra no longer is so shocking to Chicago as it was three years ago when Serge Koussevitzky and his men, returning after a five-year absence, literally stunned an Orchestra Hall audience unused to such sumptuousness of tone and precision of execution.

The Bostonians have been here more than half a dozen times since that memorable occasion, and our own orchestra no longer points such a sorry contrast with the visitors, but there still is musical magic under the Koussevitzky baton.

Mr. Koussevitzky featured a resplendently, gloriously colorful reading of the "Daphnis and Chloe" suite of Ravel—one that surpassed even his magnificent recent recording of it.

We have heard the suite frequently in recent years, but too often it has been filled with bombast; Mr. Koussevitzky directed it with no damper on its feverishness, but kept everything in order.

Though it rarely is heard, Mozart's B flat Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns (K.287) is a masterful work, its five movements bursting with worthy melodies. Mr. Koussevitzky brought a wistful serenity to its slow section and caused the finale to sparkle.

The Tschaikowsky "Pathetique," closing the second of the orchestra's two concerts here, was a well-nigh flawless presentation of the work which demands such a master's hand to put a glow of color again in its aging cheeks.

* * *

The orchestra was better than the singers, when the University of Chicago department of music revived Giovanni Pergolesi's opera buffa "The Music Master" at Mandel Hall Sunday evening. Siegmund Levarie and the instrumentalists of the Collegium Musicum put buoyancy and wit into the sprightly score, but only Robert Spiro, of the compact cast, really displayed a voice both large enough for the hall and flexible enough to fit the slippery turns of phrase and effective enough to take full advantage of some genuinely delightful comedy. The adaptation, with spoken dialogue replacing the long vanished recitatives, was clever enough, and Edgar Eager's lyrics were far better than "opera in English" usually finds. The whole thing will be repeated this evening.

"THE MUSIC MASTER"

Comic opera (1731) by Giovanni Pergolesi. Book adapted by Robert Vampery. Lyrics by Edgar Eager. Presented by the department of music and the Renaissance Society of the University of Chicago at Mandel Hall, Dec. 7 and 9, 1947, with this cast:

Lamberto....
....Harold Brindell
Lauretta....
....Dorothea Brodbeck
Colagianni.Robert Spiro
B ppo......Doyne Michie
Dorina...Laurene Hodges
Carlotta.Dorothy Michie
Niccolo..Wendell Osborn

ELMAN, COSSACKS GO ON FOREVER

Time all but stands still for the week-end's recitalists. True, Mischa Elman's usual clarity was reluctant to assert itself in allegro passages at Orchestra Hall Saturday night, but the hushed lyricism of his violin tone retains its beauty. The Jaroff Don Cossack singers have not changed. At the Opera House Sunday afternoon they put on another good show, with almost as much clowning as singing. --C.P.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

DEC 10 1947

Ex-Sailor for Podium

Young Brazilian Musician to Lead the Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Dec. 10 (AP)—In the Port of Boston an ex-Brazilian sailor has a symphony orchestra.

Dec. 16 Eleazar de Carvalho, 32, of Sao Paulo, Brazil—who once carried bull fiddle scores in his seabag—will take command of a noted concert crew, the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Famous conductor Serge Koussevitsky is lending his baton to the young South American musician and composer because, he says, of his "remarkable talent and exceptional gifts."

De Carvalho is to be on the Boston podium for four concerts this season, an unusual series to be granted a young newcomer.

Born to Dutch and Indian parents, de Carvalho spent 10 unschooled years on a mountain wilderness farm. Then he was sent to Sao Paulo where he became the new boy at the city school for apprentice seamen.

In School Band

The new boy joined the school band and played the bull fiddle. Later, de Carvalho served in the Brazilian National Naval Corps and continued his music studies between watches.

When his interest expanded to composing he enrolled at the Institute Rio Branco and later at the University of Brazil, where in 1940 he was awarded a diploma as conductor and composer.

From the university he went to the tuba player's chair in the orchestra of the Teatro Municipal in Sao Paulo and two years later he was on the conductor's stand for the annual opera season.

His compositions include an opera titled "The Discovery of Brazil."

Famed at Tanglewood

South American music critics bravoed de Carvalho not only for his interpretations of native music but for his concerts of European master works such as Brazil's First Beethoven cycle which he inaugurated two seasons ago.

Last Summer at the Boston Symphony Festival at Tanglewood, de Carvalho was applauded for what critics called an "astonishing" performance of the challenging Strauss work, "Death and Transfiguration."

Guest conductor at Tanglewood was the celebrated young American, Leonard Bernstein.

The combination was a nickname natural for festival enthusiasts. They dubbed de Carvalho "the Bernstein of Brazil."

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM

DEC 10 1947

Music On Records

Koussevitsky Leads

A new recording of BEETHOVEN'S MIGHTY EROICA, which I consider the greatest single creation of mortal man, is automatically an event of high importance.

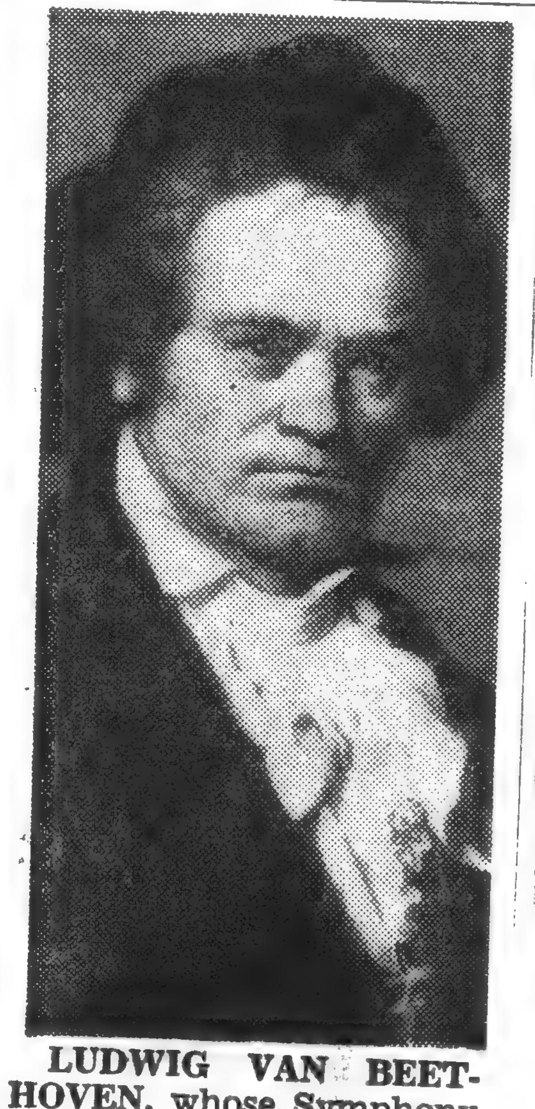
And when it is played by Serge Koussevitsky and the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, as the new RCA Victor Album No. 1161 is, the event takes on an added significance that demands the most active and attentive listening.

Unfortunately, the surfaces of these six 12-inch records (the set costs $7) are rather gravelly. It seems a pity that the great engineering resources of RCA Victor were not applied to making this perfect.

But no new recording of the Eroica will ever be able to take away my devotion to the old Toscanini reading (RCA Victor No. 765) made during an actual performance. It has horrible breaks at the end of nearly every side; there are long pauses, punctuated by coughs from the audience; but the old maestro and his magnificent NBC Symphony Orchestra give this work a workout such as I daresay it never had before or will ever have again.

Koussevitsky gives a more scholarly, a more precisely accurate performance on these new discs. And there is plenty of the essential fire, the high passion, in Koussevitsky's playing.

If you can have two recordings of this Beethoven Symphony No. 3 in E-Flat, have these two and forget about all others. But if you can have only one, I suggest that you stick to Toscanini—it is not likely that that extraordinary performance will ever be surpassed.



LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN, whose Symphony No. 3 in E Flat can now be heard on RCA Victor records, as performed by Serge Koussevitsky.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

DEC 10 1947

Hail Boston Symphony

By JEAN WHITEHEAD

Time after time, last night's audience at Masonic Temple called Dr. Serge Koussevitzky back to the podium to share another bow with the members of his Boston Symphony Orchestra.

As they left the auditorium reluctantly, many concert-goers were overheard proclaiming the performance one of the most brilliant of this season.

Particularly enthusiastic were Mr. and Mrs. John Denler, who had dined earlier at the Women's City Club, as a prelude to the celebration of Mr. Denler's birthday today.

Another party which enjoyed dinner together before the concert included the Frank Coolidges and the Morgan Douglasses who had reservations at the Detroit Athletic Club.

A table for eight was also set up at the DAC to accommodate Mr. and Mrs. W. Barclay Deyo, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Chapman, Mr. and Mrs. Winfield S. Jewell Jr., Miss Edith Lindeman and Harold Gumpper for a pre-concert dinner, while Mrs. Walter Scotten and her son, Oren, dined at the Detroit Club before setting out for the Masonic Temple.

At intermission time, Mary Tiedeman and Christine Caulkins were hard put to find words which could describe the faultless music produced by the Boston musicians. Miss Tiedeman wore a black skirt topped by a high-buttoned aqua blouse, and Miss Caulkins selected a dark green wool dress.

Sharing their box were Mrs. George P. Caulkins, Mrs. Viola Mulhauser and Erwin Fauser.

In another box were Mrs. Richard P. Joy, Mrs. Henry B. Joy, Mrs. Ralph Stoepel and Mrs. Wood Williams.

Mrs. Robert N. Green came in from Bloomfield Hills to join her mother, Mrs. F. W. Hutchings, for the concert. Mrs. Mark Allen was escorted by her son, Richard Allen.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Pyle and Mr. and Mrs. Dan Buhl were unanimous in their approval of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretations of Prokofieff, Hindemith, Debussy and Berlioz.

[illegible]

Bostonians in Program Rich and Rare

By RUSSELL MacLAUCHLIN

A notably rich and varied program was played for about 5,000 eager Detroiters, at the Masonic Auditorium Tuesday evening. The listeners crammed every [illegible] of the hall and wedged themselves into the pit, for a musical event of renown had been foreseeable for some weeks. It was the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky on the stand, that stirred all these agreeable expectations.

It is valid to use superlatives about this orchestra and this conductor because it would need [illegible] to take the negative side on the proposition that the Bostonians compose the most eloquent and sensitive orchestra in America and that their Nestor-like general, in the ripe wisdom of his 73 years, stands solitary at the pinnacle of his craft.

* * *

TO TEST and prove this proposition, the program which the great crowd heard searched every detail of an orchestra's scope and dredged the deeps of a conductor's capacity. For these were its contents: Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," Hindemith's "Matthias the Painter," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy."

So you had a contemporary's avowed imitation of Mozart, a modernist's powerful affirmation of the logic of modernity, one of the best-loved sketches bequeathed us by an unquestionable genius and, finally, an example of obvious "program" music, fashioned long ago by the greatest progammist of them all.

* * *

THE CROWD'S collective ear seemed especially taken by the noble anthem in the brass, which concludes the Hindemith symphony; by Koussevitzky's deepening of Debussy's "blue" combinations to something like indigo; by a general, evening-long unison in the strings that sounded like the ultimate extension of a single instrument; and by Joseph De Pasquale's consistently admirable declaration of "Harold's" mournful tunefulness, on solo viola, in the Berlioz adventures.

Those were the program's popular virtues. The technician must have noted, first and foremost, the conductor's extraordinary control of the great instrument he commanded; how left and right hands functioned frequently as separate mechanisms altogether; the latter establishing tempo in a tiny arc and the former quite unfaltering in the vital concerns of cues and dynamics.

MUSIC

Koussevitzky Builds a Cathedral of Music

BY J. DORSEY CALLAGHAN
Free Press Music Critic

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky as master mason, built a towering Gothic Cathedral in tone at its performance of Hindemith's "Mathias the Painter" at Masonic Temple.

Koussevitzky and the orchestra created the tremendous climaxes and vaulting progressions that make the work one of the greatest of our time.

* * *

BY THE TIME the noble and full-throated brasses had shouted the religious glory of the final chorale, "Lauda Sion Salvatorem," the listener felt spiritually exhausted.

The wonder of it is that a man full of years, as Koussevitzky is, is able to grasp and interpret the thoughts of a much younger contemporary. It bespeaks a continuing youth that defies the years.

To hear this second concert by the Boston orchestra since the war, Detroit marshaled an audience that filled the auditorium.

The concert opened with a performance of Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, in which the conductor set a mood that never flagged during the evening.

* * *

IT SEEMED AS though the program had been designed to present all facets of the orchestra. Debussy's impressionistic "Afternoon of a Faun" brought forth the woodwinds and a solo flute in lines of utter beauty.

One other major work was included, with Joseph de Pasquale as viola soloist. It was the Berlioz symphony, "Harold in Italy." It is one of the few works in a large form in which the silken voice of the viola is given a prominent part.

De Pasquale gave a most satisfying performance, in which the instrument emerged with a bigger voice than is ordinarily heard in this composition.

The last movement of the symphony brought the evening to an end with a feeling of excitement that could be best described by the composer's marking "allegro frenetico." In view of the fact that the European orchestras are practically lost, it seems safe to repeat that the Boston is the greatest.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

Bostonians Do It Again—As Usual

It would be refreshing for reviewers if occasionally Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony came to town and gave a bad performance.

Even if we hadn't heard them, the acclaim voiced by more than 5,000 Detroiters who crowded Masonic Auditorium last night would be more than enough to convince anybody that there's no alternative but to trot out the well-worn superlatives.

Koussevitzky's miraculously tight control over his men and over every phrase of the music was once again the musical phenomenon that his listeners have come to expect.

The program was Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," "Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" symphony, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," and Berlioz "Harold in Italy" with Joseph de Pasquale playing the viola solo.

In the Prokofieff, Koussevitzky [illegible] his power while affecting [illegible] in keeping [illegible] satirical little [illegible]

[illegible] Gothic angularities [illegible] counterpoint of the [illegible] up an intense [illegible] drive that had [illegible] climax in the [illegible] in the last [illegible] Boston's brass [illegible] unforgettable.

[illegible] in "Afternoon [illegible] that he'd [illegible] But Koussevitzky [illegible] orchestra made [illegible] without sacrificing [illegible] flow of the [illegible]

[illegible] performance of the [illegible] Berlioz—a work [illegible] spectacularly and [illegible] seemed occasionally [illegible] subdued, but his

---

De Carvalho Was a Seaman Before He Turned to Music

By CYRUS DURGIN

ELEAZAR DE CARVALHO

Eleazar De Carvalho, who this week is making his first appearances as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is unusual in several respects. For one thing, he is the only native-born Brazilian symphony conductor, and for another he is probably the only conductor to have inherited Dutch and Brazilian blood from his father's side and pure Indian from his mother. For a third, he must in all the history of music be the only conductor who was a merchant seaman before he turned professionally to music.

This stocky young man with the broad shoulders, barrel chest and big muscles followed a rugged and 'round-about path to reach his goal of the conductor's art. Even so he has accomplished a good deal in the 32 years since he was born, June 28, 1915, on a remote farm at Iguatu, in the northwestern interior of the state of Ceara.

He has become conductor of the symphony and opera orchestras in Rio de Janeiro; he has held the chairmanship of the department of musical literature and philosophy at Santa Ursula College of Philosophy; he conducted the first Beethoven cycle ever given in Brazil, and he has been elected to a permanent chair named after him, at the National Academy of Music.

Furthermore, he has written two operas, "The Discovery of Brazil" (1939), and "Tiradentes" (1941), four symphonic poems, three overtures and a quantity of other music.

Would Fit Well in Films

You must not infer that De Carvalho is an academic sort of man. With his black curly hair and a wide smile that seems more a grin, his soft eyes and dark skin, he is decidedly good looking and probably would do very well before the cameras in Hollywood. As the radio announcer said after his Sanders Theatre concert in Cambridge Tuesday night: "The ladies have been paying Mr. De Carvalho attention all evening long."

At the age of 10 De Carvalho was put in school in Fortaleza, the seaport capital of Ceara. But he was considered "wild" and was expelled from one school after another until about a year later he was entered at the City School for Apprentice Seamen. About the same time came his first contact with music. This was the bass tuba, which he played aboard ship afternoons. Mornings he scrubbed deck and did other chores and at night did "book learning." That went on for nine years.

While still a seaman De Carvalho knew he must be a musician and he began to study the various theoretical branches. Now he has a total of 18 diplomas in these subjects. For three years he went to dental school at night, but eventually gave that up. He became a practical musician by playing the tuba and double bass in bands, cabarets, dance bands and orchestras.

Pleased Koussevitzky

A year ago last June De Carvalho came to this country, hoping to guest conduct its major orchestras. In his picturesque but broken English (12 months ago he knew hardly a word of our tongue) De Carvalho tells jokingly of how he expected to begin at the top in the United States of America since he was already a conductor in Brazil.

Someone suggested he study with Serge Koussevitzky at Tanglewood, and the young man took a train to Stockbridge. But applications had closed and the season just opened when he arrived. Koussevitzky finally consented to let him conduct for five minutes and then, if he seemed to have talent, to allow him to stay on as a listener. The upshot was that Koussevitzky took on De Carvalho as an extra pupil and arranged for him to stay in Boston all last Winter where he studied more. Now he has received the accolade of being invited to be guest conductor of the world's greatest orchestras.

Incidentally, De Carvalho pronounces his name "Ell-ee-uh-ZAR day Car-VAHL-yo."

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

DEC 11 1947

Boston Orchestra Magnificent

By A. J. WARNER

The incomparable Boston Symphony Orchestra and its illustrious conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, brought their sovereign art to the Eastman Theater last night, thereby signalling the apex of our music season.

No Rochester audience of the year seems to be as discerning and as cosmopolitan in its response as the assemblage which gathers to pay homage to Boston's great orchestral organization, and last evening the house was packed. Dr. Koussevitzky and his musicians were received with acclamation, and at the close of the final number were accorded a prolonged ovation. It was a remarkable concert from every point of view, and the entire performance was one to cherish in one's gallery of beautiful recollections. The program was brilliant in its arrangement and in sheer orchestral effect the Ravel and Berlioz works were overwhelming.

Mozart Diverting

The evening began with the Divertimento in B flat (Koechel No. 287) for Strings and Two Horns by Mozart, the scoring of which, as is characteristic of Mozart's music of the serenade type, has greater diversification than his symphonies, the divertimenti being more "diverting" in their instrumentation. The one heard last night employed a favorite medium of the composer—strings and two horns—and its performance was the very distillation of aural sunshine. Dr. Koussevitzky is a master of the Mozartean idiom, and he led his music con amore, with grace and elegance and the perfection of restraint.

Howard Hanson's Serenade for Solo Flute, Harp and Strings, presenting Georges Laurent, flutist, and Bernard Zighera, harpist, which came next, was played with exquisite delicacy. It is a short piece that is easy to hear, and the audience gave it a warmly cordial reception. The second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite of Ravel brought the first half of the program to a glittering close. This score appears often on orchestral program, but even when other orchestras play it exceedingly well they cannot hope to compare with the triumphant virtuosity which marks its proclamation at the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Sympony. Under their ministrations Ravel's ingenuity, his intensely French character, and the profound simplicity that underlies the sonorous colorings of his music were magically projected.

Ear Ravished, Mind Fascinated

Following the intermission Dr. Koussevitzky and his magnificent orchestra, with Joseph de Pasquale as the accomplished viola soloist, gave a vividly revealing account of "Harold in Italy" by Hector Berlioz, who stands besides Victor Hugo and Delacroix as one of the great leaders in French Romanticism, an initiator, not an imitator. The astonishing resourcefulness of the Berlioz' symphony and the creative imagination of its ideational content were exhaustively unfolded, the performance possessing a kind of kaeidoscopic opalescence that ravished the ear and fascinated the mind.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

DEC 11 1947

Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Plays Superbly at Eastman

By NORMAN NAIRN

DR. SERGE Koussevitzky waved the magic wand last night at the Eastman, and an audience which included hundreds of standees heard another stunning performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
. . . waves magic wand.

Again there was the treat of the incomparable tone which characterizes this orchestra, its superbly adjusted balance and sensitivity. It might almost be called a sort of collaborative virtuosity

It was a rich program, too, showing the incredibly precise blending of the strings, and the unusually effective tone of the brass—the kind of brass playing which one hears rarely. There was every reason why the ovation was of memorable intensity.

One hardly could have wished for a more exquisite number to open a program than the Mozart Divertimento in B-flat major, for Strings and Two Horns. Written for string quartet with two horns, it is one of Mozart's most charming works, especially as played so perfectly last night. And it almost could be said that the adagio movement was of heavenly beauty.

Dr. Koussevitzky honored Dr. Howard Hanson by playing his mellifluous Serenade for Solo Flute, Harp and Strings, which had Georges Laurent as flutist and Bernard Zighera as harpist. And after a particularly warm presentation, the composer was brought out on stage by Dr. Koussevitzky to share the plaudits.

The work, commissioned by Station WHAM, has had numerous performances. Koussevitsky's tempi all through are much slower than we've heard in its presentations here.

Koussevitzky evidently has quite an affection for the Ravel Second Suite from the Ballet "Daphnis et Chloe," as it appears frequently on his programs. It was exciting last night again in its instrumental colors and brilliantly telling.

Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," symphony in four movements, with viola solo, was another adventure in sound magic. The title is suggested by Byron's wandering hero, but the four movements do not follow musically the action of the poem.

The theme representing the hero runs through all four movements, first announced by the solo viola. Here particularly was another exhibition of the tonal sumptuousness of the Bostonians. The second movement produced some of the most beautiful woodwinds pianissimo that this reviewer ever has heard.

Joseph de Pasquale, the violist, played with authority and warmth, with luminous tone and complete mastery of all the problems of the music. His was real artistry.

Incidentally, John N. Burk's program notes concerning Dr. Hanson's Serenade were misinforming. He had Mrs. Hanson a flutist attending the Eastman School. Hardly! She never played the flute and never was a student here.

Four former Eastmanites, Harold Meek, horn; Henry Freeman and Willis Page, string basses, and John Holmes, oboe, members of the orchestra, had quite a time yesterday renewing acquaintance

Dr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky almost did not get to Rochester After a performance in Detroit the preceding night, a regular plane flight was grounded and the conductor and his wife had to charter a private plane. While in Rochester they were guests of the Alan Valentines.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

DEC 12 1947

Boston Symphony on Air Locally Sponsored in '48

The American Broadcasting Company announced yesterday that it will present the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a co-operative program with local sponsorship beginning Tuesday. Jan. 13.

The network said this will be the first time the radio programs of a major symphony orchestra have been available for local sponsorship. Mark Woods, president of the network, explained that "to present the Boston Symphony Orchestra programs on the air obviously would be beyond the financial ability of any individual local enterprise."

From 1940 until late last month members of the American Federation of Musicians, an affiliate of the American Federation of Labor, were barred from participating in co-operative programs which are carried by a network but with the sponsorship shared by local enterprises through local stations.

The A. B. C. said the broadcasts of the orchestra would be continued each Tuesday from 9:30 to 10:30 p. m., although James C. Petrillo, president of the A. F. M., in lifting the ban on co-operative programs, announced only that the ban would be lifted as an experiment until Jan. 31, the expiration date of contracts between the unions and the radio networks.

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

DEC 13 1947

Koussevitzky's 'Eroica' Album On Victor List

RCA Victor's release of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, recorded by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a noteworthy follow up to the Beethoven cycle presented by Dr. Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Music Festival dur the summer of 1947. The "Eroica," perhaps Beethoven's best-known symphony, has been a challenge to every conductor and orchestra during its 141-year history. Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony meet this challenge magnificently in an interpretation that is notable for its breadth, superb handling of orchestral choirs and instrumental coloring.

This performance has the stamp of authenticity and emerges in the great elegaic spirit with which it was conceived, combining superb recording technique with flawless playing. Dr. Koussevitzky brings to the music a perfect fusion of reflectiveness and animation, fortified by remarkable balance between string, wind and percussion instruments. Exceptional acoustical quality makes this a great addition to any record collection.

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES

DEC 11 1947

OUR TIMES

By Vera Brown

Ben Hur's Out:

Ever since the Michigan Theater opened its doors 20 years ago there's been a gold chariot with two horses on the mezzanine in which two generations of youngsters have played at being Ben Hur.

MISS BROWN

The object d'art has stood up pretty well under such rugged treatment, but recently the horses' tails fell off and the gold paint began to peel.

The whole thing's been refurbished, a two-week rush job, and the chariot and horses are back and resplendent. But the chariot is now only to be looked at. This new generation will never know the joy of pretending to drive that Roman chariot of gold.

* * *

Sick Leave:

Arthur Gordon, who's Cosmopolitan Magazine's big editor-in-chief, is back at his desk after three weeks in bed. He had the measles. Was plenty sick, too.

* * *

Come of Age:

Detroit audiences have completely cut their musical wisdom teeth and we're big time. When Boston's music wizard, Serge Koussevitzky, led his boys through that Masonic Temple concert, not a hand clap was out of place.

The packed auditorium, which overflowed into the aisles, held all applause for the right spots; they knew the scores.

Here's an odd item about the music master, according to Jerry Seigel. Koussevitzky, as a young man, played the bass fiddle. That's how Europe knew him first; as the greatest of his day on that instrument.

* * *

RDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 8th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Nadia Reisenberg, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Piano Concerto in E flat major Op. 73 ....Beethoven Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetique" ....Tchaikovsky

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

After completing its most arduous tour of the season it must be a great temptation for the orchestra to coast on its return. But, if the Pathetique Symphony is hardly a news event of great interest on a program of orchestral music, the performance yesterday was neither tired nor stale. It is a piece which Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony play superlatively well. Each time this symphonic monument to melancholia is recreated with shattering eloquence.

Such again was the case yesterday, and you would never have known from their playing that the orchestra could scarcely have been rested or fresh for their task. The performance revealed the extraordinary interpretative talent of Mr. Koussevitzky as well as the virtuosity of the entire orchestra.

Beethoven's best known and liked Piano Concerto, rather foolishly known as the "Emperor," was given, I regret to say, far from an electrifying performance. The soloist, Nadia Reisenberg, played either in a loud and brittle fashion or so softly that it was a strain to listen to. Though her technique is certainly adequate, the runs were neither as clear nor as effortless as they can be. She had a rhythmically awkward way of playing the opening theme of the finale which differed considerably from the way the orchestra stated it. It may be that there was not much time for rehearsal, but the total result was one of the dullest performances of this masterpiece on record.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be conducted by Eleazar de Carvalho, who has chosen the following program: William Schuman's Symphony for Strings, Schoenberg's Chamber Symphony Op. 9 and Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

DEC 12 1947

ON THE RECORD

The Boston "Eroica," Levant's Debussy, And of Bach, Schubert, and Musical Comedy

By Claudia Cassidy

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 3, in E flat major, "Eroica," played by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky (Victor DV-8; ~~six 12 inch~~ records). What a treasure record shelves would be if superlative performances automatically received perfect reproduction. We could have caught Artur Rodzinski's "Tristan and Isolde" while it was blazing, and Koussevitzky's "Daphnis and Chloe" when it struck a new peak - and beyond a doubt we would have the Boston orchestra's "Eroica" as Koussevitzky played it here several years ago. I have not heard another such performance of that noble work. The new recording of it, available in vinylite if you prefer, obviously has its fine qualities. With such a combination, how could it be otherwise? But records simply don't capture the orchestra's full palette of tone and dynamics, or the radiance of spirit sometimes communicated in audience performance. These records do capture a good deal of power and brilliance - and an echo.

PIANO MUSIC OF DEBUSSY: "Reflections On the Water," "Serenade for the Doll," "The Little Shepherd," "Minstrels," "Evening in Granada," "General Lavine - Eccentric," "The Sunken Cathedral," "Arabesques 1 and 2," and "La Plus Que Lente," played by Oscar Levant (Columbia M-710; four 12 in. records). A pleasant album for Levant fans and in some cases a pleasant surprise to skeptics. Oddly, instead of being at his best in crisper works, Mr. Levant does his most admirable playing in the Debussyan realm of the liquid and the crepuscular. The recording is good.

BACH: Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, played by Roman Totenberg and the Musicraft Chamber Orchestra (Musicraft 78; two 12 in. records). Technically competent but rather superficial performance, with some noisy surfaces.

SCHUBERT: Sonata for Piano, in E flat major, Opus 122, played by Kathleen Long (London, Decca EDA 26; Three 12 in. records). I never heard Miss Long Play except on records, so I have no way of knowing whether her playing really is as colorless and characterless as records make it sound.

[99]

Dr. Koussevitzky's impressive reading

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

DEC 12 1947

The New Records

A List of Christmas Suggestions From the Year's Albums, Both Grave and Gay.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

Even a listener who heard all of the following releases in the line of duty during the year was surprised, in assembling [illegible] version of a list that has been an annual custom [illegible] years, to discover how many first-class issues [illegible] been since January. I can indorse all of those [illegible] for worthiness of material, quality of performance and fidelity of reproduction.

ORCHESTRAL ALBUMS.
(Symphonies).

Beethoven: "Pastorale," Bruno Walter directing the Philadelphia Orchestra. (Columbia).

Berlioz: "Romeo and Juliet," Arturo Toscanini directing the NBC Orchestra (Victor).

Haydn: "Surprise," Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony. (Victor).

Mahler: No. 5, Walter directing the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. (Columbia).

Mendelssohn: "Reformation," Sir Thomas Beecham directing the London Philharmonic Orchestra. (Victor).

Mozart: No. 20, Edvard Fendler directing a chamber orchestra. (Vox).

Prokofiev: No. 5, Artur Rodzinski directing the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. (Columbia).

Schubert: C major, No. 9, Walter and the Philadelphia Orchestra. (Columbia). This preference stands after a recent hearing of the Toscanini-NBC version scheduled for release shortly. I find the latter overdriven, strained and tempestuous. More of that subsequently.

Shostakovitch: No. 9: Serge Koussevitzky directing the Boston Symphony. (Victor).

ORCHESTRAL ALBUMS.
(Miscellaneous.)

Adam: "Giselle" ballet music, Constant Lambert directing the Royal Opera Orchestra (Columbia).

Dukas: "Sorcerer's Apprentice," Enrique Jorda directing the National Symphony Orchestra (EDA).

Falla: "El Amor Brujo," Fritz Reiner directing the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, with Carol Brice, alto (Columbia).

Handel: "The Great Elopement," Sir Thomas Beecham directing the London Philharmonic (Victor).

Khatchaturian: "Gayne" ballet music, Efrem Kurtz directing the Philharmonic-Symphony (Columbia).

Ravel: "Daphnis and Chloe" (suites 1 and 2), Charles Muench directing the Paris Conservatory Orchestra (EDA).

Strauss, R.: "Bourgeois Gentilhomme," Reiner directing the Pittsburgh Symphony (Columbia).

Tchaikovsky: "Nutcracker" suite (excerpts additional to usual ones), Arthur Fiedler directing the Boston "Pops" Orchestdra (Victor).

Thomson: "Plow That Broke the Plains," Leopold Stokowski directing the Hollywood Bowl Symphony (Victor).

Wagner: "Siegfried Idyll," "Faust Overture," &c., Arturo Toscanini directing the NBC Orchestra (Victor).

Concerto Albums.

Bartok: Concerto No. 3, Gyorgy Sandor, piano, with Eugene Ormandy directing the Philadelphia Orchestra (Columbia).

Beethoven: Concerto in D, Joseph Szigeti, violin, with Bruno Walter directing the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (Columbia).

Chopin: Concerto in F minor, Artur Rubinstein, piano, with William Steinberg directing the NBC Orchestra (Victor).

Prokofieff: Concerto No. 3, Dimitri Mitropoulos as piano soloist and conductor of the Robin Hood Dell Orchestra (Columbia).

Vocal Albums.

Britten: "Serenade," with the composer conducting and Peter Pears, tenor; Dennis Brain, horn, and the Boyd Neel String Orchestra (EDA).

Handel: "Messiah," Sir Malcolm Sargent directing the Liverpool Philharmonic and ensemble. (Columbia).

Mendelssohn: "Elijah," Sir Malcolm Sargent and as above. (Columbia).

Not previously noted here, this production may be indorsed as one of the noblest best-performed thority and conviction. Technically excellent. (Columbia).

American Songs: William Hess, tenor. (Hargail).

Opera Albums.

Humperdinck: "Hansel and Gretel," sung in English under the direction of Max Rudolf, with Rise Stevens, Nadine Conner, &c. (Columbia).

Verdi, &c.: Opera Duets, Leonard Warren, baritone, and Jan Peerce, tenor. (Victor).

Instrumental Albums.

Bach: "Chaconne," Andres Segovia, guitar. (Musicraft).

Chopin: Ballade in G minor, &c. Vladimir Horowitz, piano. (Victor).

Franck: Sonata in A, Zino Francescatti, violin, and Robert Casadesus, piano. (Columbia).

Villa-Lobos, &c.: "Brazilian Piano Music," Guiomar Novaes, piano. (Columbia).

Chamber Music Albums.

Beethoven: "Rasoumovsky" Quartets, played by Paganini Quartet. (Victor).

Mozart: Quintet for Clarinet and Strings, Reginald Kell, clarinet, with Philharmonia Quartet. (Columbia).

Mozart: Quartet in E flat for piano and strings, George Szell, piano, with members of the Budapest Quartet. (Columbia).

(Single records, children's and popular recommendations will be listed next week).

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 14 1947

RECORDS:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, the Eroica. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (Victor, six twelve-inch vinylite disks). This recording has it points, particularly the quality of the ensemble tone. Of course, nearly every conductor who tackles this symphony feels he has to "interpret" it. Mr. Koussevitzky does his share of personal interpretation. It is not a bad performance, though it does not match the top standards of Arturo Toscanini's conducting of the score, which is also available under the Victor imprint. If you wonder why the company issues another, you need only remember that the "Eroica" is a staple of the repertory and all orchestras and conductors probably want their version on the market. Recording, good.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL
DEC 14 1947

With The New Recordings

By THE REVIEWER

VICTOR plays an early Santa Claus to opera lovers (and those who are learning to be) by waxing a quartet of 12-inch operatic records that rate high as ornaments for any tree. Of particular interest to Memphians who will hear her in a Beethoven Club concert this season is Blanche Thebom's mezzo-soprano in "Weiche, Wotan, Weiche!" from Wagner's "Das Rheingold." Erda, the earth-goddess, warns Wotan of the doom of the gods in powerful notes so ominously atmospheric that one suspects Hitchcock movies of being an offspring of Wagner.

Contrasting in mood is the reverse side, which displays Miss Thebom's rich contralto to full advantage in "Voce De Donna O Angelo" from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda."

Another From Gioconda

Another melody from "La Gioconda," sung by baritone Leonard Warren, is the fisherman's ballad, 'Pescator, Affonda L'Esca." A rousing sailors' chanty opens the act, and the lilting solo is supported by an excellent mixed chorus. On the reverse Mr. Warren seems to enjoy the change of expressions—festive excitement, sadness, strong motion—when Tonio, hunchbacked clown, sings the prologue of "I Pagliacci."

Nan Merriman, mezzo-soprano, sings a melodic love song in "O Mio Fernando" from Donizetti's "La Favorita." The lyric passages with English horn and harp are particularly effective.

Thais' Death Is Enthralling

Most dramatic of the eight record sides is "Death of Thais" from Massenet's "Thais" as sung by Dorothy Kirsten, soprano, and Robert Merrill, baritone. The duet becomes a breath-taking trio when the voices of Thais and her lover are joined by an exquisitely sensuous melody in the violins and harp.

For the reverse Miss Kirsten sings "In Quelle Trine Morbide" from Puccini's "Manon Lescaut," in which the heroine explains that present luxury cannot replace lost love. The simple melodic phrases constantly ascending but seldom resolved remind one of Puccini's better-known "Madame Butterfly." Miss Kirsten sings with excellent control.

Russian—But Not Red

Right beside the operatic selections on the gift listing comes an album of three 12-inch records by Columbia called "Irra Petina Sings Songs By Tschaikowsky." This one is Russian without a tinge of red. In nine light songs Tschaikowsky's familiar style paints the plaintive nostalgia, the "tears behind joy" of Russia in tones that are appropriately interpreted by Metropolitan Star Petina's slender soprano. The beautiful but hackneyed "None But the Lonely Heart" gains a surprising freshness in its seldom-heard original Russian. The one operatic selection, "Liza's Aria," from "Pique Dame," is outstanding for its sad love story. "Green Grass" complains against fate with effective oboe and string accompaniment. This album will appeal to those who like something different.

Variety On The Harp

Robert Maxwell is also bent on doing something different as he tries to remove the harp from its usual saccharin music-box role in the album "Harpist's Holiday" waxed by Columbia on four 10-inch records. Variety is the byword in this book of harp solos—Maxwell takes us from the classic quiet of "Clair de Lune" through sparkling original arrangements of "Make Believe," "Smoke Gets in Your Eyes" and "Night and Day" to unbelievable pyrotechnics in "Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2" and "Harping On a Harp," which includes Gershwin and boogie woogie. The man's pedal work is amazing (keys are changed by seven pedals in the harp), and the listener is firmly convinced that he has 40 fingers. His harp gains almost the resonance of a piano or guitar. However, it is, after all, still a harp, and one wonders if so much work is worth the trouble in an instrument that gives back so little for what is put into it.

Columbia Masterworks slipped a bit in one late release. Rise Stevens' glorious mezzo-soprano seems wasted in the simple "Through the Years" and "Bless This House."

Raymond Well Played

Ambroise Thomas' almost-classical "Raymond Overture" is played brilliantly by the City of Birmingham Orchestra under the leadership of George Weldon. This ever-popular number is one to be played over and over by those who enjoy older orchestral numbers.

Offenbach's "Gaite Parisienne," in its complete orchestral form as the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo dances it is played for a Victor album by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra. Here are lilting melodies, largely in waltz time, brought to the mental light of today from out of our subconscious past. Gaily albumed. On four 12-inch discs.

Beethoven's Third At Its Best

Now comes a new and thrilling recording of the Beethoven Third Symphony—the Eroica. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky plays this symphony—one of the world's greatest. Sketched on a lofty plane, the Eroica is compelling in its dramatic intensity from the opening allegro to the picturesque finale. Victor has recorded this symphony on shellac and also on unbreakable vinylite. On six 12-inch records—and magnificent.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
DEC 14 1947

The Bohemians

Hold Annual Benefit Dinner Next Sunday Night

The Bohemians, the well known New York musicians' club founded by Rafael Joseffy in 1907, will give its annual dinner and concert next Sunday night, Dec. 21, at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. The proceeds will go to the Musicians Foundation, maintained by The Bohemians for the relief of musicians in need.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the guest of honor, and Olin Downes, music critic of "The New York Times," will be the guest speaker. The participants in the musical program are Marilyn Cutlow and Frank Rogier, who will present Gian-Carlo Menotti's one-act comic opera, "The Telephone"; Jennie Tourel, mezzo-soprano; Claudio Arrau, pianist, and Mata and Hari, dance satirists. Reservations may be made through The Bohemians' secretary, Clyde Burrows, 30 West Seventy-second Street.

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-AMERICAN
DEC 14 1947

Around the Disc

BY WESLEY HARTZELL

Classical

Although there are several good recordings of Beethoven's Third Symphony already in existence, Serge Koussevitzky's and the Boston Symphony's new version for RCA Victor will be welcome, particularly by those Chicagoans who heard the same group play it in Orchestra Hall several years ago.

Koussevitzky shows a great care for its accents and reveals heretofore neglected rhythmic patterns. Instrumental colors are vivid and solid. Orchestral balance shows off Koussevitzky's perfect control over the group.

Elegaic, animated, dramatic by turns, it is stamped with the Boston maestro's own superb artistry. Chicago fans will note his tempi are brisker than in his Chicago appearance. (Available in non-breakable DeLuxe

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM
DEC 15 1947

—McManus—

HEARD AND

Good News and Bad

Thanks to the lifting of the American Federation of Musicians' ban on co-operative programs, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will become a co-operatively sponsored program beginning Tuesday, Jan. 13 (WJZ-ABC 9:30–10:30).

This is undoubtedly welcome news to regional or local radio sponsors seeking prestige entertainment, but previously faced with buying time with the local-station disc jockey or staying off the air.

However it also may be an unduly optimistic announcement, since the radio industry is now buzzing with portents of a complete walkout of radio musicians on Feb. 1 unless the four major networks, now in negotiation with the AFM, reach agreements suitable to the musicians. First negotiations, conducted in Chicago last week with the AFM president, James C. Petrillo, made no progress.

The musicians, seeking expanded employment via network-run FM stations higher pay and more employment on television and a share of the return from record sales, as well as a limit on record-playing on the air, appear determined to achieve gains in all these directions at once.

The networks are reported to be ready to support the AFM's proposals for legislation giving musicians a share in record income (which would be money out of someone else's pocket) but thus far are standing pat against stepped up pay and employment in television and against admitting that FM is a new and separate medium from present, standard radio. In negotiation, the network spokesmen are stating something they have been extremely reluctant to discuss otherwise: that is that FM must be regarded as an eventual substitute for present-day radio and therefore cannot be looked to as an opportunity for more jobs for musicians.

Unless this impasse is surmounted, the prospects of collecting sponsors for the Boston Symphony or any other program of "live" music cannot be very promising.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
DEC 14 1947

Co-Op Radio Program Activity Renewed

New York, Dec. 13—(AP)—Since the lifting of the musicians' union ban against live instrumental music in Co-Op programs—network shows made available for individual sponsorship by local stations—there has been renewed activity in this field.

The latest came in the announcement by ABC that "for the first time" the Tuesday night Boston Symphony concerts are to become a Co-Op effective Jan. 13. This year the orchestra has not had a sponsor.

The network said that although the change is not to go into effect until a couple of weeks before the expiration date on Jan 31 of the present musicians contract, it was being assumed that the new one now in negotiation would continue to permit live music in Co-Ops.

Meanwhile, the ABC Abbott and Costello Co-Op, which had been using the Les Baxter singers as a vocal orchestra, is replacing them with Matty Malneck's Band. On CBS, the Joan Davis show has decided to continue with its singing group, a 12-voice a cappella choir.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
DEC 16 1947

Boston Co-op

Starting January 13 the Boston Symphony will be offered by the ABC net for co-operative sponsorship. Thus it will be available for local sponsorship in every city where it is heard on the ABC chain. It is expected that a Cleveland concern will sponsor the WJW airings here. The broadcasts continue Tuesday nights at 9:30.

Tonight at that time over WJW Eleazar deCarcalha, noted Brazilian conductor, directs the Bostons in the Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

DEC 16 1947

Petrillo Will Face United Front Of Radio and Record Industries

Leaders to Meet Here Friday on Tactics as Disk Contracts Expire; Backlog of Recordings Made; Broadcasters May Offer Compromise

By Paul Tobenkin

Unified plans for combating James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, an American Federation of Labor affiliate, will be drafted Friday at a meeting of representatives of the radio, record manufacturing, television, frequency modulation and transcription manufacturing industries at the Waldorf-Astoria, it was learned last night.

Mr. Petrillo's contracts with the record manufacturers will expire Dec. 31, and he has served notice that after that date musicians will not be permitted to record because the records, played over the air and in juke boxes, compete with live musicians. In anticipation of the ban, Decca, R. C. A.-Victor, Columbia and scores of smaller recording companies have been working around the clock preparing a backlog of master records.

Many of these recordings have been of standard favorites, for which there is a steady market. But the companies are taking chances on the other records they are making, for if they make poor choices in selecting prospective hits, much money will be lost.

A number of singing stars are understood to have eased somewhat the financial burden of the record companies by agreeing to wait until the records are sold before receiving any payment for their work. Meanwhile, Mr. Petrillo has given no indication of a compromise.

Contracts with the radio chains and independent stations will expire on Jan. 31. The radio chains have three major problems in their discussions with Mr. Petrillo.

1. The usual wage and working conditions demands for musicians;
2. The use of records on broadcasts by networks or individual stations; and
3. The question of permitting "co-operative" musical broadcasts, that is, broadcasts by major orchestras on a nation-wide scale, with the cost being shared by local advertisers in various communities.

For seven years Mr. Petrillo and his union have banned the co-operative broadcast on the grounds that it put musicians out of work. Last Nov. 26, however, he relented and permitted co-operative broadcasts on an "experimental basis" until the contract expires at the end of January.

The union, it was learned, is making a study to see whether the "co-operative" broadcast has lessened the employment of musicians during the trial period. The industry is reported hopeful that Mr. Petrillo can be prevailed upon to continue co-operative broadcasts. The American Broadcasting Company recently announced that it will present the Boston Symphony Orchestra on a co-operative basis.

It is understood that a number of broadcasters favor a compromise with the union on the question of the use of recordings. One suggested plan has been for stations or networks to agree to devote only a specified amount of time each day to recordings, with the balance of the time on the air devoted to live musicians or other programs. Such an agreement, it was felt in some quarters, might answer Mr. Petrillo's argument that canned music is driving live musicians from radio, while not being prohibitive in so far as costs were concerned.

Preliminary discussions have been held between the union and the broadcasters, but intensive negotiations are likely to be delayed until after Dec. 30, when Mr. Petrillo's trial for alleged violation of the Lea act will continue in Chicago.

Mr. Petrillo is accused of calling a strike against Station WAAF there because that station refused to employ three musicians as "librarians" during a program. The case went to the Supreme Court, which rejected Mr. Petrillo's contention that the Lea act was unconstitutional and ordered a trial on the issues.

The new committee to deal with Mr. Petrillo on an industry-wide basis is known as the Industry Music Committee. While several preliminary meetings have been held, next Friday's session will be the one where basic course of action will be decided.

The new group will appoint a legal staff, public relations counsel and a research staff. It is possible that the personnel of co-operating organizations will be used.

Among those who have participated in the preliminary meetings are Frank E. Mullen, of the National Broadcasting Company, for the radio networks; Edward Wallerstein, Columbia Recording Company, for the record manufacturers; Richard S. Testut, Associated Program Service, for transcription manufacturers; Raymond C. Cosgrove, Crosley Corporation, for instrument manufacturers; Hudson Eldridge, of Station WASH, Washington, for Frequency Modulation Association; G. Emerson Markham, General Electric Company, for Television Broadcasters Association; A. D. Willard jr., Don Petty and Richard P. Doherty for the National Association of Broadcasters.

Hartley Weighs Curb

KANSAS CITY, Dec. 15 (AP).—Representative Fred Hartley jr., Republican, of New Jersey, said today Congress will consider legislation designed to curb the "dictatorial" methods of James C. Petrillo, head of the American Federation of Musicians.

He told the Kansas City Advertising and Sales Executives Club that early in January the Labor Committee will hold a series of hearings on the music situation. Mr. Hartley, co-author of the Taft-Hartley law, said he will propose that the Sherman anti-trust act and Clayton act, both designed to combat restraint of trade, be applied to a labor monopoly in the same manner as applied to business monopoly.

Furthermore, he said, he will make a proposal, not dealt with in the Taft-Hartley law, designed as the "right-to-work" bill. The proposed measure, he said, will make it a Federal offense to interfere with a worker's right to go to his job.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES

DEC 16 1947

Exciting Moments in New RCA Albums Koussevitzky's 'Eroica' Is a Milestone

New Paganini Quartet Makes Debut—Music By Bach, Mozart, Rachmaninoff Offered

By CHARLES WEDDLE

Record collectors have exciting moments in store for them in the new RCA Victor concert music releases.

Chances are you are passing up the new offerings during the Christmas rush; buying the records you know for Christmas gifts. If such is the case, clip these reviews—investigate after the yule pandemonium is over.

In a new album recording of Beethoven's Third Symphony ("Eroica"), Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra set up a milestone in symphonic recordings.

Quoting Delos Smith, record reviewer for the United Press:

"Serge Koussevitzky is 73 now, and in the 41st year of his service to music. At least 300 times has he conducted Beethoven's 'Eroica' symphony, but never quite as he conducts it in the six records of RCA Victor's new recording."

Mr. Smith says in this version of the "Eroica" there is "yearning for the faith of man in 1947 when he has the means for his own destruction, and is as quarrelsome as ever.

"The fulfillment of yearning is thrice-sufficient while the music is proclaiming man's god-like stature and his infinite capabilities, all of them good.

"It is a passionate celebration of the heroic in man, this symphony.

"Dr. Koussevitzky seems to conduct it hungrily—as though famished for the very last syllable of its serene assurance."

An album you must hear—12 full 12-inch sides, six Red Seal records. (M/DM 1161.)

* * *

WOMEN'S WEAR DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEC 17 1947

News and Ideas

Tomorrow night at 8, WABD, the Dumont television station in New York, will present "Champagne and Orchids" as a sustaining show. According to station officials, who packaged the show for a store or apparel producer, the presentation will attempt to present women's wear in a new method. Instead of parading models and, as some people believe, confusing the audience, the program will concentrate on one entertainer, Adrienne, who will wear a striking gown and the proper accessories. This, it is hoped, will create a complete look such as is shown in Lord & Taylor newspaper ads which concentrate on one theme.

Music on Co-Ops

Since Petrillo lifted the ban of music on cooperative radio programs, changes have been effected in these programs which are sponsored by many retailers.

Mutual Broadcasting has added music to "Meet Me at Parky's" and "Information Please." Columbia Broadcasting replaced the a cappella choir on "The Joan Davis Show." For the first time in radio, the American Broadcasting Co. is offering a symphony for co-op sponsorship. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is available for local sponsorship for an hour each Tuesday night at 9:30 p.m.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE DEMOCRAT

DEC 17 194

The Music Whirl

By HARRY R. BURKE

CLASSICS FOR CHRISTMAS? Why not, indeed, the enduring work of masters by interpreters who themselves are masters? Perhaps the very cream of recent albums is presented in that group of three from which one arranges a symphonic program this morning. Certain it is that a search for a greater symphony than Beethoven's "Eroica" would be difficult. Here it is, presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting (Victor 5 12-inch discs) admirably edited, beautifully recorded on vinylite in one of the Red Seal De Luxe pressings. It is repetitious to pay tribute here to the flexibility, the responsiveness, the balance of that splendid orchestra. One's chief concern then is with Dr. Koussevitzky's reading.

★ ★

WE ALL KNOW the story of how Beethoven composed it to honor Napoleon in days before Napoleon had disclosed his purpose of usurpation, conquest and tyranny. It was tribute—as event would show—not to a man but to an ideal liberator of the spirit of democracy. A tribute voiced in the drama of music conflict; to a hero far more akin to our yet unborn Lincoln than to Napoleon. To this reviewer it seems that Koussevitzky misses this, and that—which is rare in him—he permits the showmanship of technical virtuosity in conducting to overwhelm the integral sincerity of Beethoven's concept. It is a matter, one suspects, of tempi—not in the sense of time beat, nor yet as rhythmic movement, but in that of pace as speeded up or retarded to achieve emotional stress through dynamic contrasts. But though one rejects that reading he may be and is delighted with the clear sonority of this recording; is fascinated with the inner exture of instrumental voices which it discloses, by the quality of horns and woodwind choirs in the Scherzo, in the chamber music quality of the pizzicato introduction to the Finale and its lacey embellishment by violins of the joyous melody by which a happier world rejoices.

★ ★

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

17 1947

Since the lifting of the musicians union ban against live music on "co-op" programs --network shows made available to individual sponsorship by local stations--there has been renewed activity in the field. The Boston Symphony orchestra concerts are to be run on a "co-op" basis, starting Jan. 13, ABC has announced.

De Carvalho in Symphony Preview—

Christian Science Monitor

Brazilian Conductor to Give Première of Schönberg Work

Eleazar de Carvalho, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week and next, will present a première at his Friday concert. Arnold Schönberg's "Kammersymphonie" will get its first Boston hearing on a [illegible] William Schuman's Symphony for Strings and Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony.

Schönberg's Chamber Symphony for 15 solo instruments was written in 1906 but did not receive its first performance until 1913, in Vienna. Though written before the composer developed his 12-tone style, it is characterized by polytonality, and often, near-atonality.

Its signature is E. It opens and closes in E major, but most of the symphony is remote from tonal centers. Intervals of fourths regularly substitute for the usual [illegible], and the principal theme exploits the whole-tone scale.

* * *

Mr. de Carvalho describes the work as "expressionistic." It does have thematic development, falling into five movements: Exposition, Scherzo, Development, Adagio, and Finale. But, as he interprets it, the important concern is not so much melody as sonority. He thinks of the tonal effects that distinguish the composition in terms of color: for example, "black" chords, where the contrabassoon predominates.

Mr. de Carvalho is quite familar with the "Kammersymphonie." He has included it on programs for the Brazilian Symphony Orchestra, of which he is conductor. And last summer, when he was assistant in the conducting school at Tanglewood, he led a student orchestra through the difficult score with a success that prompted Dr. Koussevitzky to suggest it for a Boston program. The Victor company has asked him to record it with the Boston Symphony, but, of course, the threatened crisis in the record industry has made this prospect problematical.

Mr. de Carvalho became interested in Schönberg through hearing "Verklärte Nacht," written in 1899. He is no devotee of Schönberg's later, extreme experiments, or of the disciples who have imitated and, he thinks, distorted his original ideas.

* * *

Schönberg, says Mr. de Carvalho, has had little influence on Brazilian music, though he is listened to with respect. The only exception he knows of—an important enough exception, at that—is Claude Santoro, whose Schönberg-like compositions won him a Guggenheim Fellowship.

Stravinsky is the number one influence in Brazil, Mr. de Carvalho thinks, with Debussy and Ravel not far behind. Impressionistic works, like Debussy's "La Mer," have intrigued Brazilian composers, he says, and though Villa-Lobos claims inspiration from purely native grounds, he regards him, too, as a highly eclectric craftsman.

Mr. de Carvalho is frankly pessimistic about Brazilian composition. He says that the National School of Music at the University of Brazil gives a thorough training in the techniques of composition—in fact, few students complete their work before they are 30—but, he complains, the graduates do not seem to produce with much originality, tending to lean rather heavily on folk music for their ideas.

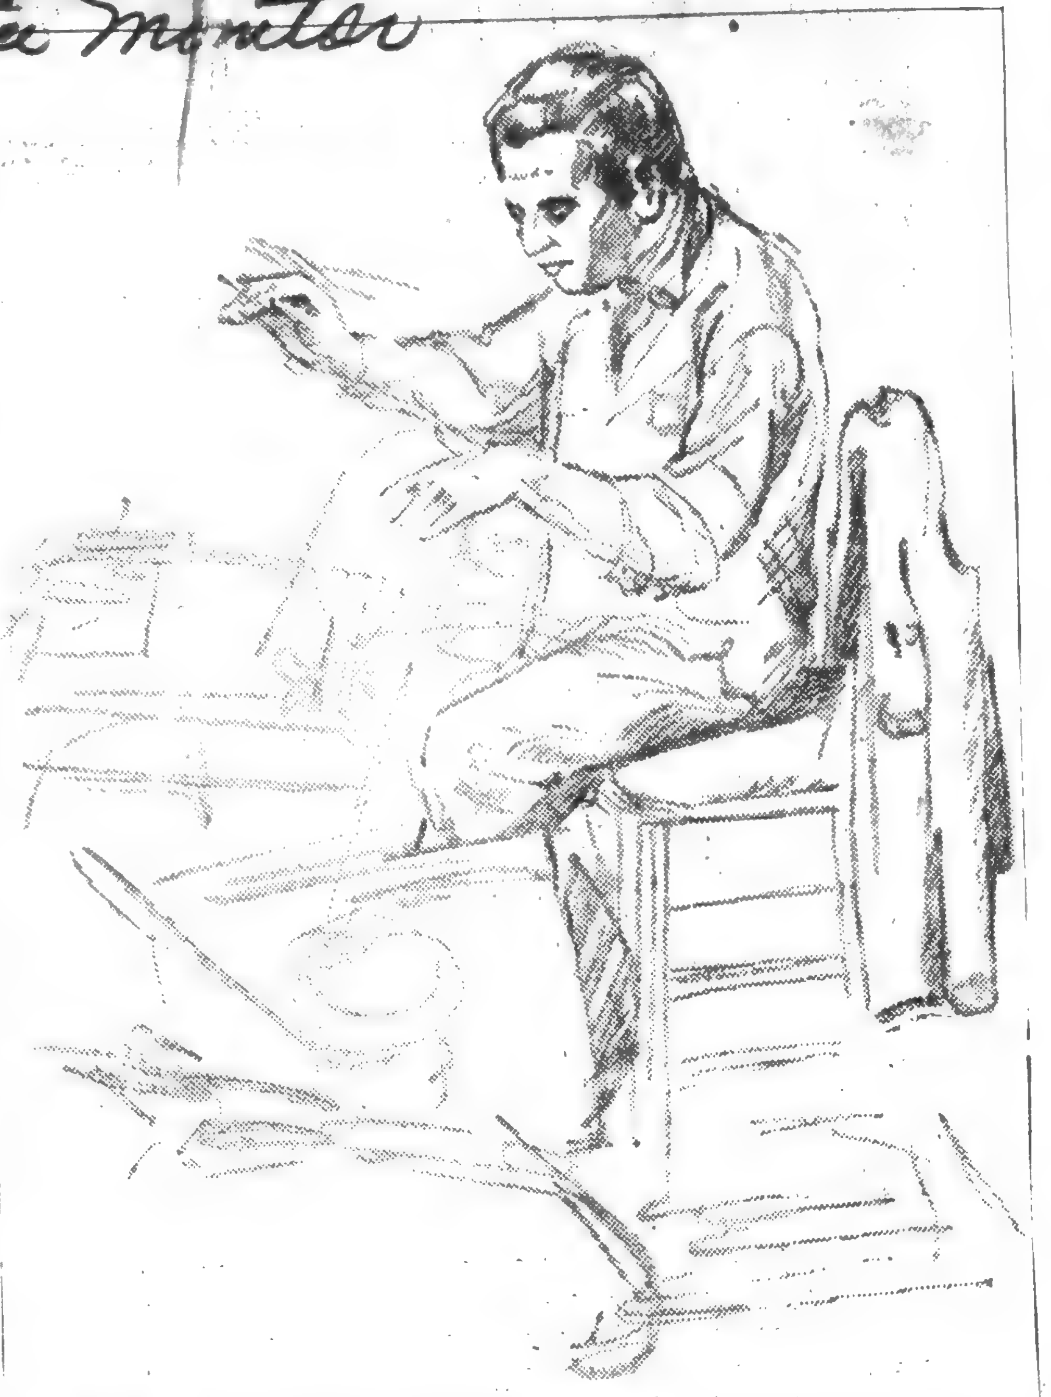
* * *

Perhaps composers are scarce and generally unproductive, he suggests, because their public, at present, is circumscribed. In Brazil, he explains, music is the interest of a clique, in his estimate possibly 1 per cent of the population. The same people go to all the concerts, attend all the operas, buy all the records, and listen to the broadcasts.

To spread interest in music, the government is stocking public libraries with records and earphone phonographs and financing the Brazilian Symphony Orchestra in a concert a month for school children. In addition, regular symphony prices are at a level to attract hesitant investors. Sunday morning popular programs scale their seats at 25 cents and 40 cents. Friday afternoon, Saturday afternoon, and Monday night subscription series have a top price of $2.50.

Mr. de Carvalho himself has notably helped broaden, and deepen, Brazil's musical culture. He presented the first Beethoven cycle, a series of nine programs, and has performed otherwise neglected North American composers on all-United States programs. And though he considers himself primarily a conductor, he has already, at the age of 35, written a symphony, two operas, four symphonic poems, 12 variations for piano and orchestra, three overtures, two trios, two quartets, and a violin and piano sonata.

M. M.



Rehearsal Sketch by Martna Burnham

Eleazar de Carvalho, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week and next.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

DEC 27 1947

Koussevitzky Record Scores

NEW YORK—(UP)—Serge Koussevitzky is 73 now, and in the first year of his service to music. At least 300 times has he conducted Beethoven's third symphony ("Eroica"), but never quite as he conducts it in the six records of RCA Victor's new recording, a fact which surely has relation to it being the year 1947.

From these records you sense a deep yearning in the heart of the venerable master while he and his Boston Symphony Orchestra were making them. Yet simultaneously you are transfixed by an abundant fulfillment of yearning—yours quite as much as his.

The yearning is for faith in man in 1947, when he has the means of his own destruction and is as quarrelsome as ever. The fulfillment of yearning is thrice-sufficient while the music is proclaiming man's god-like stature and his infinite capabilities, all of them good.

It is a passionate celebration of the heroic in man, this symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky seems to conduct it hungrily, as though famished for the very last syllable of its serene assurance.

DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK

DEC 22 1947

By Courtesy of Petrillo

Thanks to James Caesar Petrillo, the American Broadcasting Co. can look forward to relief from a heavy financial burden—at least temporarily. For 21 years the network has broadcast the Boston Symphony programs. But the orchestra's expense and its selective listeners have made it poor sponsor bait. And except for a few advertisers who have carried the broadcast for short times, the network has footed the bill.

Last week, ABC announced that beginning Jan. 13 the symphony was available for local sponsorship. Not until last month had Petrillo permitted music on programs which have several local instead of one national advertiser (NEWSWEEK, Dec. 8). Then he lifted the ban—for trial purposes until Jan. 31.

Naturally ABC is hoping that Petrillo won't clamp down again. And he has good reason not to. For his 100-odd American Federation of Musicians members in the Boston Symphony will make more money with a sponsored show than on a sustainer.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
CHRONICLE

Music—Ginette Neveu, Parisian-born violinist, makes her air debut with the Boston Sympathy at 6:30 this evening over KGO. She will play Beethoven's "Violin Concerto in D Major."

BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—SATURDAY, DECEMBER 27,

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Eleazar De Carvalho, continuing his visit as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave first performance to scores by two of his Brazilian countrymen at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. They were a Prologue and Fugue by Camargo Guarnieri, and the Symphonic Poem "Madona" by Heitor Villa-Lobos. The other numbers were the Suite from "Love, the Sorcerer" by Manuel de Falla, and the "New World" Symphony of Dvorak.

Guarnieri's work no doubt had good intentions, but his fugal writing for orchestra is broken up into bits and snatches to the extent that I couldn't even count all the entrances of the theme. The Prologue is a loud, brassy affair, no more distinctive of material or treatment than the Fugue, and certainly no more sensuous or appealing. The composer was present and bowed from his seat.

Villa-Lobos dedicated his Symphonic Poem to the late Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, in whose memory the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, which commissioned the piece, was established. "Madona" may not prove to be a great masterpiece, but at least it sounds like music with alluring turns and a rich, colorful use of the orchestra.

The lovely interludes from "Love, the Sorcerer," by turn amorous and frenetic, rhythmically subtle and aggressive, and of a grace which characterized Spanish music of a happier day, were welcome indeed. They furnished high color and warmth on a day of dreary, gray and foul New England weather.

What is more they were admirably played, for once again the Boston Symphony put its best foot forward for the talented young guest conductor. Ten years from now Mr. De Carvalho will probably conduct with more personal distinction and more delicate nuances than he did yesterday. All the same, his readings did credit to him for they were musicianly and in good style, with none of the strainings after effect or the tonal whoop-'er-up that are apt to creep into the work of a young but not completely mature conducting talent.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 28 1947

MUSIC SCHOOLS BEGIN 4-DAY BOSTON MEETING

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Dec. 27—A discussion of music school curricula and standards of requirements for graduate music schools, today opened the four-day annual meeting of the National Association of Schools of Music.

The topics were treated at pre-convention meetings of the commission on curricula and the graduate commission. Additional seminar sessions are scheduled for tomorrow, with open sessions beginning on Monday.

The association, which is conducting its twenty-third annual meeting, is the accredited body for all music educational institutions in the United States. Registered for the session are 200 representatives of 150 music schools.

Affiliated organizations that will conduct sessions during or after the meeting are:

The American Musicological Society, Dec. 28-30; College Music Association, Dec. 30-Jan. 1; National Association of Teachers of Singing, Dec. 31-Jan. 2, and the American String Teaching Association, Jan. 1-2.

A special feature of the Musicological Society program will be a rectial of classical and unpublished music by students and faculty members of Boston University on Monday evening.

On Tuesday, delegates to the meeting will be guests at a concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

[illegible] 1947

The New Records

A Further List for Christmas Giving: Single Records, Children's and Popular Disks.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

[illegible] tendency to put more and more single-[illegible] albums has diminished considerably the [illegible] material. Pending the restoration of some [illegible] of recording, the following brief list [illegible] the year's best.

ORCHESTRAL.

[illegible] "Zampa" Overture. [illegible] London [illegible] (English [illegible] No. 26. [illegible] and the Boston [illegible] Orchestra. (Vic-[illegible] and Allegro." [illegible] and the Boston [illegible] Orchestra. (Vic-[illegible] a Dead [illegible] above. (Vic-[illegible]" Overture. [illegible] the City of [illegible] Orchestra. (Colum[illegible] "Waltz and [illegible]" Eugen Onegin). [illegible] Beecham and the [illegible] Philharmonic. (Victor).

[illegible] "Meistersinger" Overture [illegible] Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra. (Victor).

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 21 1947

11-Year-Old Pianist Plays Parts of His Own Opera

By The Associated Press.

WORCESTER, Mass., Dec. 20—John R. Frissora, 11 years old, who started writing an opera four years ago, played part of it today for Clark University music students. His "Leonora" is a tragedy of unrequited love.

The young composer started piano lessons two years ago and studies 'cello under Jacques Langendoen of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The youth said he might have his opera completed in another year.

H. Earle Johnson, Music Professor at Clark, said the score had no errors in harmony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

DEC 23 1947

Anderson to Talk For Salvation Army

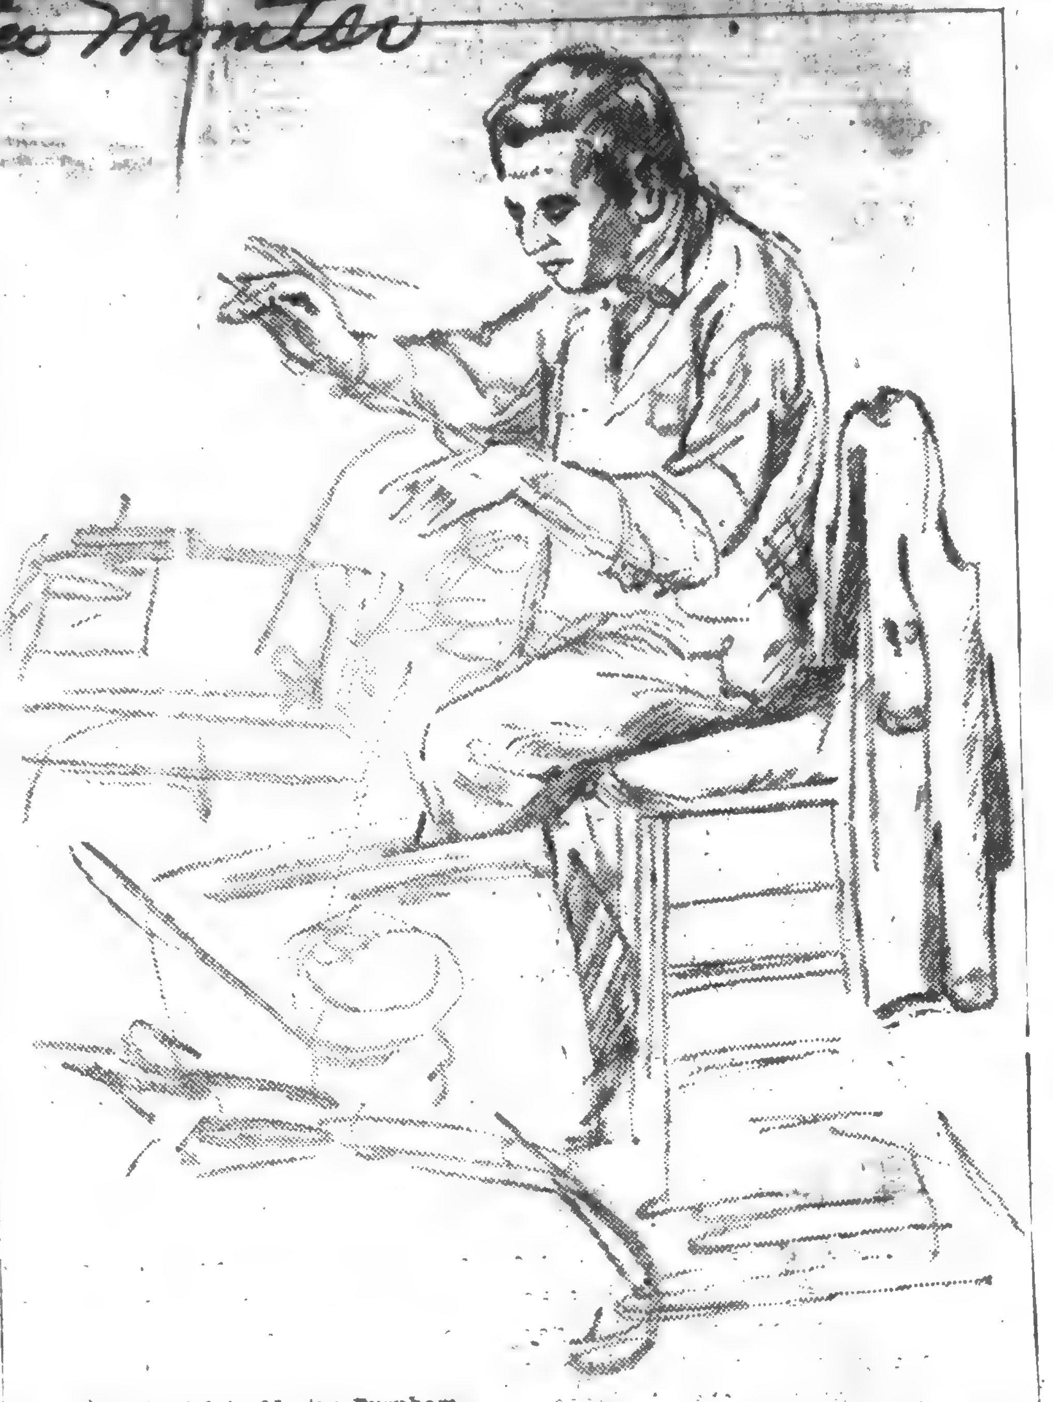
Clinton P. Anderson, Secretary of Agriculture, will be the main speaker Jan. 6 at the opening meeting of the 1948 fund raising campaign of the Salvation Army, Edward J. Noble, campaign chairman, announced today.

The meeting will be held at the Metropolitan Opera House at the intermission of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra held in behalf of the Salvation Army. The fund goal for next year is $1,000,000 to help care for the Army's 60 institutions and services in the Greater New York area.

De Carvalho in Symphony Preview

Dec 1 — Christian Science Monitor

Brazilian Conductor to Give Première of Schönberg Work



Rehearsal Sketch by Martna Burnham

Eleazar de Carvalho, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week and next.

Eleazar de Carvalho, guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this week and next, will present a première at his Friday concert. Arnold Schönberg's "Kammersymphonie" will get its first Boston hearing on a program with William Schuman's Symphony for Strings and Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony.

Schönberg's Chamber Symphony for 15 solo instruments was written in 1906 but did not receive its first performance until 1913, in Vienna. Though written before the composer developed his 12-tone style, it is characterized by polytonality, and often, near-atonality.

Its signature is E. It opens and closes in E major, but most of the symphony is remote from tonal center. Intervals of fourths regularly substitute for the usual thirds, and the principal theme exploits the whole-tone scale.

* * *

Mr. de Carvalho describes the work as "expressionistic." It does have thematic development, falling into five movements: Exposition, Scherzo, Development, Adagio, and Finale. But, as he interprets it, the important concern is not so much melody as sonority. He thinks of the tonal effects that distinguish the composition in terms of color: for example, "black" chords, where the contrabassoon predominates.

Mr. de Carvalho is quite familiar with the "Kammersymphonie." He has included it on programs for the Brazilian Symphony Orchestra, of which he is conductor. And last summer, when he was assistant in the conducting school at Tanglewood, he led a student orchestra through the difficult score with a success that prompted Dr. Koussevitzky to suggest it for a Boston program. The Victor company has asked him to record it with the Boston Symphony, but, of course, the threatened crisis in the record industry has made this prospect problematical.

Mr. de Carvalho became interested in Schönberg through hearing "Verklärte Nacht," written in 1899. He is no devotee of Schönberg's later, extreme experiments, or of the disciples who have imitated and, he thinks, distorted his original ideas.

* * *

Schönberg, says Mr. de Carvalho, has had little influence on Brazilian music, though he is listened to with respect. The only exception he knows of—an important enough exception, at that—is Claude Santoro, whose Schönberg-like compositions won him a Guggenheim Fellowship.

Stravinsky is the number one influence in Brazil, Mr. de Carvalho thinks, with Debussy and Ravel not far behind. Impressionistic works, like Debussy's "La Mer," have intrigued Brazilian composers, he says, and though Villa-Lobos claims inspiration from purely native grounds, he regards him, too, as a highly eclectric craftsman.

Mr. de Carvalho is frankly pessimistic about Brazilian composition. He says that the National School of Music at the University of Brazil gives a thorough training in the techniques of composition—in fact, few students complete their work before they are 30—but, he complains, the graduates do not seem to produce with much originality, tending to lean rather heavily on folk music for their ideas.

* * *

Perhaps composers are scarce and generally unproductive, he suggests, because their public, at present, is circumscribed. In Brazil, he explains, music is the interest of a clique, in his estimate possibly 1 per cent of the population. The same people go to all the concerts, attend all the operas, buy all the records, and listen to the broadcasts.

To spread interest in music, the government is stocking public libraries with records and earphone phonographs and financing the Brazilian Symphony Orchestra in a concert a month for school children. In addition, regular symphony prices are at a level to attract hesitant investors. Sunday morning popular programs scale their seats at 25 cents and 40 cents. Friday afternoon, Saturday afternoon, and Monday night subscription series have a top price of $2.50.

Mr. de Carvalho himself has notably helped broaden, and deepen, Brazil's musical culture. He presented the first Beethoven cycle, a series of nine programs, and has performed otherwise neglected North American composers on all-United States programs. And though he considers himself primarily a conductor, he has already, at the age of 35, written a symphony, two operas, four symphonic poems, 12 variations for piano and orchestra, three overtures, two trios, two quartets, and a violin and piano sonata.

M. M.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
CHRONICLE

Music—Ginette Neveu, Parisian-born violinist, makes her air debut with the Boston Sympathy at 6:30 this evening over KGO. She will play Beethoven's "Violin Concerto in D Major."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

DEC 19 1947

The New Records

A Further List for Christmas Giving: Single Records, Children's and Popular Disks.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

The prevalent tendency to put more and more single-record music into albums has diminished considerably the scope of such material. Pending the restoration of some reason to this phase of recording, the following brief list must suffice for the year's best.

ORCHESTRAL.

Herold: "Zampa" Overture. Basil Cameron and the London Philharmonic Orchestra (English Decca).

Mozart: Symphony No. 26. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (Victor).

Piston: "Prelude and Allegro." Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (Victor).

Ravel: "Pavane for a Dead Princess." Same as above. (Victor).

Thomas: "Raymond" Overture. George Weldon and the City of Birmingham Orchestra. (Columbia).

Tschaikovsky: "Waltz" and "Polonaise" (Eugen Onegin). Sir Thomas Beecham and the London Philharmonic. (Victor).

Wagner: "Meistersinger" Overture. Arturo Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra. (Victor).

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 21 1947

11-Year-Old Pianist Plays Parts of His Own Opera

By The Associated Press.

WORCESTER, Mass., Dec. 20—John R. Frissora, 11 years old, who started writing an opera four years ago, played part of it today for Clark University music students. His "Leonora" is a tragedy of unrequited love.

The young composer started piano lessons two years ago and studies 'cello under Jacques Langendoen of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The youth said he might have his opera completed in another year.

H. Earle Johnson, Music Professor at Clark, said the score had no errors in harmony.

DAYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK

DEC 22 1947

By Courtesy of Petrillo

Thanks to James Caesar Petrillo, the American Broadcasting Co. can look forward to relief from a heavy financial burden—at least temporarily. For 21 years the network has broadcast the Boston Symphony programs. But the orchestra's expense and its selective listeners have made it poor sponsor bait. And except for a few advertisers who have carried the broadcast for short times, the network has footed the bill.

Last week, ABC announced that beginning Jan. 13 the symphony was available for local sponsorship. Not until last month had Petrillo permitted music on programs which have several local instead of one national advertiser (NEWSWEEK, Dec. 8). Then he lifted the ban—for trial purposes until Jan. 31.

Naturally ABC is hoping that Petrillo won't clamp down again. And he has good reason not to. For his 100-odd American Federation of Musicians members in the Boston Symphony will make more money with a sponsored show than on a sustainer.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

DEC 23 1947

Anderson to Talk For Salvation Army

Clinton P. Anderson, Secretary of Agriculture, will be the main speaker Jan. 6 at the opening meeting of the 1948 fund raising campaign of the Salvation Army, Edward J. Noble, campaign chairman, announced today.

The meeting will be held at the Metropolitan Opera House at the intermission of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra held in behalf of the Salvation Army. The fund goal for next year is $1,000,000 to help care for the Army's 60 institutions and services in the Greater New York area.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

DEC 27 1947

Koussevitzky Record Scores

NEW YORK—(UP)—Serge Koussevitzky is 73 now, and in the last year of his service to music. At least 300 times has he conducted Beethoven's third symphony ("Eroica"), but never quite as he conducts it in the six records of RCA Victor's new recording, a fact which surely has relation to it being the year 1947.

From these records you sense a deep yearning in the heart of the venerable master while he and his Boston Symphony Orchestra were making them. Yet simultaneously you are transfixed by an abundant fulfillment of yearning—yours quite as much as his.

The yearning is for faith in man in 1947, when he has the means of his own destruction and is as quarrelsome as ever. The fulfillment of yearning is thrice-sufficient while the music is proclaiming man's god-like stature and his infinite capabilities, all of them good.

It is a passionate celebration of the heroic in man, this symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky seems to conduct it hungrily, as though famished for the very last syllable of its serene assurance.

BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—SATURDAY, DECEMBER 27,

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Eleazar De Carvalho, continuing his visit as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave first performance to scores by two of his Brazilian countrymen at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. They were a Prologue and Fugue by Camargo Guarnieri, and the Symphonic Poem "Madona" by Heitor Villa-Lobos. The other numbers were the Suite from "Love, the Sorcerer" by Manuel de Falla, and the "New World" Symphony of Dvorak.

Guarnieri's work no doubt had good intentions, but his fugal writing for orchestra is broken up into bits and snatches to the extent that I couldn't even count all the entrances of the theme. The Prologue is a loud, brassy affair, no more distinctive of material or treatment than the Fugue, and certainly no more sensuous or appealing. The composer was present and bowed from his seat.

Villa-Lobos dedicated his Symphonic Poem to the late Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, in whose memory the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, which commissioned the piece, was established. "Madona" may not prove to be a great masterpiece, but at least it sounds like [illegible] with alluring turns and a rich, colorful use of the orchestra.

The lovely interludes from "Love, the Sorcerer," by turn amorous and frenetic, rhythmically subtle and aggressive, and of a grace which characterized Spanish music of a happier day, were welcome indeed. They furnished high color and warmth on a day of dreary, gray and foul New England weather.

What is more they were admirably played, for once again the Boston Symphony put its best foot forward for the talented young guest conductor. Ten years from now Mr. De Carvalho will probably conduct with more personal distinction and more delicate nuances than he did yesterday. All the same, his readings did credit to him for they were musicianly and in good style, with none of the strainings after effect or the tonal whoop-'er-up that are apt to creep into the work of a young but not completely mature conducting talent.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

DEC 28 1947

MUSIC SCHOOLS BEGIN 4-DAY BOSTON MEETING

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Dec. 27—A discussion of music school curricula and standards of requirements for graduate music schools, today opened the four-day annual meeting of the National Association of Schools of Music.

The topics were treated at pre-convention meetings of the commission on curricula and the graduate commission. Additional seminar sessions are scheduled for tomorrow, with open sessions beginning on Monday.

The association, which is conducting its twenty-third annual meeting, is the accredited body for all music educational institutions in the United States. Registered for the session are 200 representatives of 150 music schools.

Affiliated organizations that will conduct sessions during or after the meeting are:

The American Musicological Society, Dec. 28-30; College Music Association, Dec. 30-Jan. 1; National Association of Teachers of Singing, Dec. 31-Jan. 2, and the American String Teaching Association, Jan. 1-2.

A special feature of the Musicological Society program will be a recital of classical and unpublished music by students and faculty members of Boston University on Monday evening.

On Tuesday, delegates to the meeting will be guests at a concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
DEC 28 1947

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

Boston to Be Host to Six Conventions in a Week

By ROSS PARMENTER

THE music educators are descending on Boston in droves this week. Six different groups are holding their annual meetings there. Composers and musical authorities, too, are going to the city to read papers and give speeches at the various sessions. And six special concerts have been arranged that will be open for delegates of all the groups.

The four-day meeting of the Music Teachers National Association is the major event. In recent years the meetings of this organization have had a snowball effect. Each year more groups with related interests have chosen to meet in the same city around the same time. The latest one to join is the College Music Association, whose first annual meeting on Tuesday and Wednesday will overlap the first two days of the longer convention.

This year, too, the National Music Council, which generally meets in New York, will go to Boston because so many of its members will be there. The council will hold its annual meeting at a luncheon on Tuesday. That was the only time it could find that something else wasn't going on.

The National Association of Schools of Music is opening the series of meetings. The American Musicological Society will join the procession tomorrow and the National Association of Teachers of Singing on Wednesday. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give the first of the concerts Tuesday night. The Kroll Quartet will give a program the next day. American chamber music, sponsored by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation of the Library of Congress, will be played New Year's Day. The other three concerts will be on Friday. Aaron Copland, Roy Harris, William Schuman and Lucas Foss are among the composers who will be on hand to air their views.

An even larger gathering of the clan is expected next April, when the Music Educators National Conference meets in Detroit.

TRAVEL: Touring has fewer vicissitudes now that peacetime travel has been restored, but for those who fly there's always the weather to make things interesting. Serge Koussevitzky is the latest to run into adventure. Having passed up the last available train, he found himself stranded in Detroit when a snowstorm caused the plane that was supposed to fly him to Rochester to pass over the city without landing. The concert was scheduled for that night. The conductor figured he might make a connection at Cleveland. So he flew across Lake Erie to that city, only to find no planes were leaving from there for Rochester either. Wrapped to his ears in his fur coat, the conductor tramped from hangar to hangar, trying to find a private plane. Finally he found one, chartered it and reached Rochester in the afternoon just as the snow began to fall.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
DEC 28 1947

THE ORCHESTRAS

• • •

"JEANNE d'Arc au Bucher" (Joan or Arc at the Stake), a dramatic oratorio with text by Paul Claudel and music by Arthur Honegger, will have its first performances in this country in the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra's concerts at Carnegie Hall next Thursday night and Friday and Sunday afternoons under Charles Münch's direction. The work takes seventy minutes to perform; the only intermission will be after the prologue, which Honegger added recently to the original score.

Except for the prologue, the work was finished in 1935, and first performed in Basel, Switzerland. It has also been performed in France, Belgium, Holland and Czechoslovakia, and had its South American premiere last October in Buenos Aires. Vera Zorina will speak the title role, with Raymond Gerome, a young Belgian actor and playwright, in the other speaking role of Frere Dominique. Nadine Conner and Jarmila Novotna, sopranos, will sing the Virgin and Marguerite, with Enid Szantho, contralto, as Catherine and Joseph Laderoute, tenor, and Lorenzo Alvary, basso, sharing eight other singing roles. The choruses will be sung by the Westminster Choir, trained by John Finley Williamson.

In Mr. Münch's program for Thursday and Friday, Jan. 8 and 9, Leonard Rose, the orchestra's first cellist, will be the soloist in Tchaikovsky's Rocco Variations.

Dorothy Maynor will sing Bach's solo cantata "Jauchzet Gott" in the Little Orchestra Society's sixth program under Thomas Scherman's direction on Monday night, Jan. 5. in Town Hall, and the following night in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. An octet for clarinet, bassoon, horn and strings by the late Hans Weisse (1892-1940) will have its first public performance. Another unfamiliar item in the program is the "Jena" Symphony, which may or may not be Beethoven.

Philadelphia and Boston

Both the Boston and the Philadelphia Orchestras will be heard here on Tuesday night, Jan. 6. The Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, will give a benefit concert at the Metropolitan Opera House to mark the opening of the Salvation Army's 1948 Maintenance Campaign, playing Aaron Copland's "Appalachian Spring" and Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony. It will return for its second regular visit the following week, playing in Carnegie Hall on Wednesday and Saturday, Jan. 14 and 17, and in Brooklyn on Friday night, Jan. 16. Marina Koshetz, soprano, will be heard with the Bostonians in their next pair of home concerts under Dr. Koussevitzky in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, singing in Debussy's "La Damoiselle Elue," the Letter Scene from "Eugene Onegin" and "The Return of Pushkin" by Nicholas Nabokoff.

Eugene Ormandy's program for the Philadelphia Orchestra's fifth concert of its Carnegie Hall series includes Arthur Honegger's second symphony for strings, which was introduced to New York earlier this season by the Philharmonic-Symphony; Stravinsky's "Fire Bird" suite and Cesar Franck's symphony. The same program will be played in Philadelphia next Friday and Saturday. Menahem Pressler, the young Palestinian pianist who played the Schumann concerto with the Philadelphians in Carnegie Hall on Dec. 9, has been re-engaged as soloist with this orchestra for the next three seasons.

Out of Town

The National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, under Hans Kindler, will give the first performances of two American symphonies in January. One is Robert Ward's second symphony; the other is a work by the Rev George Wargo, chairman of the fine arts division of the Washington Missionary College, Takoma Park, Md. He was a solo violist of the National Symphony for eleven years.

George Szell, returning to the Cleveland Orchestra, will conduct the first local performances of Peter Mennin's third symphony in the concerts of next Friday and Saturday evening. The orchestra's new concertmaster, Josef Gingold, will make his debut as soloist in Lalo's Symphonic Espagnole.

Ezio Pinza, Metropolitan Opera basso, will sing with the Kansas City Philharmonic Orchestra under Efrem Kurtz next Tuesday and Wednesday. Whitney Tustin will also be a soloist, in the first American performance of John Barbirolli's oboe concerto.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
DEC 28 1947

Three Music Groups Hold Conventions

Boston Host to M. T. N. A. While Two Learned Organizations Meet

Three national music societies are holding conventions in Boston and Cambridge during the current holiday week. These include the Music Teachers National Association and the American Musicological Society, which again, as before, have managed to synchronize their annual national meetings in time and place. The recently formed College Music Association is also among organizations meeting at that time.

G. Wallace Woodworth, of the Harvard University Music Division, is chairman of the Boston convention committee of the M. T. N. A., which will have headquarters at the Statler Hotel. Eighteen speakers are scheduled, including Aaron Copland, Archibald T. Davison, Roy Harris, Curt Sachs, William Schuman, Charles Seeger and Olga Samaroff Stokowski. Concerts will also be given in connection with the convention by the Boston Symphony (Symphony Hall, Tuesday evening), Kroll Quartet (Sanders Theater, Cambridge, Wednesday evening), Berkshire Chamber Orchestra and Woodwind Ensemble (Jordan Hall, Thursday afternoon), E. Power Biggs, organist (Harvard University, Friday evening) and the opera department of the New England Conservatory (Jordan Hall, Friday evening). Excerpts, with accompanying screen action, from film scores by Copland, Hugo Friedhofer, Prokofieff, Virgil Thomson and Walton will be heard in New England Mutual Hall, Friday afternoon. Thursday's chamber-music program will be devoted to contemporary Americans: Arthur Berger, Robert Palmer, Walter Piston and Harold Shapero, and the concert of the Kroll Quartet will include the Fourth Quartet of another American, Ross Lee Finney.

The M. T. N. A. convention will extend from Tuesday to Friday, while the other two organizations will confine their meetings to Monday and Tuesday. The Musicological Association will present twelve scholars as speakers. The first annual meeting of the College Music Association, of which Roy Dickinson Welch, of Princeton University, is chairman, will include talks by Paul Lang, of Columbia University; Stephen Tuttle, of University of Virginia, and George Dickinson, of Vassar College. A discussion panel to answer the speakers will include Oliver Strunk, Carroll Pratt, Theodore Finney and Beekman Cannon. Members of the Musicological Society and the College Music Association will be guests at the M. T. N. A. concerts, which are being offered with the collaboration of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation.

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD
NOV 29 1947

Little Red House

Not often does a pianist come to Portland or to any other city with the kind of triple mission that brings Gizi Szanto to Frye Hall tomorrow afternoon at 4. For she is to present not only one of her admirably played concerts to Portland's music-lovers, but is to be the means of rendering two other services—one to literature and another to music.

The Maine Federation of Music Clubs is bringing the talented Miss Szanto here in the interest of the National Federation of Music Clubs' project—restoration of "The Little Red House" at Lenox, Mass., where Nathaniel Hawthorne once lived and wrote; and the Little Red House, when restored, will be used as part of Serge Koussevitzky's famed "Tanglewood" music center.

Maine has strong interest in Hawthorne; and more and more, thanks to organizations such as the Maine Federation of Music Clubs and the National Federation, it is coming to have ever greater interest in music. The concert, Sunday afternoon, is one that provides our people with opportunity to display these interests and to capitalize upon them.

ON THE AISLE

Koussevitzky Concert, as Toscanini's "Otello," Rich Harvest of Vintage Years in Music

By Claudia Cassidy

If you were fortunate over the weekend you heard two extraordinary performances by two rare men of music, Arturo Toscanini's first of two broadcasts of Verdi's "Otello" and Serge Koussevitzky's second of two concerts with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Orchestra hall. They had these things in common--absolute authority, profound understanding, incandescent communication, the inexhaustible resources of the great gift constantly renewed by the very prodigality of its sharing, and, perhaps most of all, the youthful heart. Neither Mr. Koussevitsky nor Mr. Toscanini was born yesterday, yet they make too many of the world's conductors look--and sound--like tired old men.

If I were a millionaire (I never worry about being one except in just such cases) there would be very little I could do for Mr. Koussevitzky. He has what is probably the finest orchestra in the world, and he has in Tanglewood not only a summer festival but a music center devoted to what is nearest his heart, the discovery and development of talents. But for Mr. Toscanini--well, make it a multimillionaire. For the project would involve a miracle opera house, his unqualified choice of the world's singers, and a non-stop clause on rehearsals. Vintage years should hold no worry beyond the richness of the harvest.

-o-

It was a bumper crop Sunday afternoon in Orchestra hall. Everyone who goes to concerts knows that once in a very great while the sense of rapport is so strong as to be almost tangible, so that orchestra, conductor, and audience share an experience not to be forgotten. This time the Boston orchestra was at the peak of its unique form, Mr. Koussevitzky was at his most eloquent, and the audience was a fourth dimension of acutely sensitive acoustics. It was the same hall, the same orchestra, and some of the same audience as Friday night, but it was a different world of music.

It touches its peak in what was the supreme performance in my experience of the second series of fragments from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" This was a Koussevitzky masterpiece catching precisely the most illuminating light. It was a great molten mass of orchestral sound set in motion by the merest lift of the conductor's finger, pouring irresistibly to its gleaming climax, yet so rich in light and shade and color, so exquisite in equilibrium, that it was as subtle in detail as it was shattering in impact.

-o-

To preface it Mr. Koussevitsky chose a lovely and little known Mozart Divertimento in B flat (Koechel 287), written for strings and two horns, and this was no dry or dusty or even lacy Mozart. It was gossamer in texture, lyrically vital in spirit.

At the end came Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique," a showpiece in the sense of what a Boston orchestra can do with its yearning melodies and its crackling, headlong march, but something nobler than that, too, in the somber splendor of the adagio lamentoso, which was so darkly, powerfully wrought the audience sat mesmerized until the conductor's gesture of release broke the spell

SYMPHONY CONCERT

It was generally complained that the program the Brazilian guest conductor Eleazar de Carvalho, prepared for last week's Symphony Concerts was markedly unsuited to [illegible] season whatever interest [illegible] had in its own [illegible] was heard [illegible] repeated this [illegible] somewhat [illegible] from Manuel de Falla's [illegible] Serenade and the [illegible] Symphony of Dvorak. The first part of this program is given over to new music and not [illegible] new music but actual first performances.

The two numbers which enjoyed their world premieres yesterday are [illegible] contemporaries of the conductor, Camargo Guarnieri and the more celebrated Heitor Villa-Lobos. The [illegible] was present in the audience [illegible] of going to the [illegible] fashion, he [illegible] himself with [illegible] from his seat. Both composers have on occasion conducted their own works here. It is interesting to note also that Mr. Guarnieri's Prologo e Fuga was [illegible] composed in honor of his [illegible] countryman's initial appearance with the Boston Symphony.

[illegible] Villa-Lobos' symphonic [illegible] "Madona" without its con[illegible] the Boston orchestra, [illegible] many compositions [illegible] the Koussevitzky [illegible] established [illegible] of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky [illegible] Stravinsky's Ode, of [illegible] memory, this symphonic [illegible] a musical tribute to that great and good lady, even taking the form of a character sketch. The work is definitely romantic, with attractive themes and equally attractive orchestration, and may be described as replete with atmosphere. It is, in fact, a portrait that its subject would surely have found flattering. Mr. Guarnieri's Prologue and Fugue, on the other hand, is just one more example of skillful modern counterpoint, admirable in execution but leaving no very individual impression.

Mr. De Carvalho's easy and undemonstrative command of the orchestra, the intimate knowledge of the music that enables him to dispense with the score, were again in evidence. He appeared to be setting the compositions of Guarnieri and Villa-Lobos in the most favorable light, and he brought to pass wholly satisfying performances of the two familiar numbers. Speaking of Dvorak, is it not high time that we again heard one of his other symphonies? Especially do Nos. 2 and 4 deserve occasional performance.

Bostonians Play With Precision

By Seymour S.Raven

In its first of two weekend concerts at Orchestra Hall Friday night, Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra again gave that kind of demonstration of symphonic playing which has made its coming a musical event of the first order.

The orchestra unlimbered with Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony." Dr. Koussevitzky, confident that his men knew their way about the piece, almost allowed the symphony to conduct itself, and it came off with clock-like precision.

What followed was as exacting an assignment as one could devise for an orchestra in one evening. There came two lofty examples of programmatic writing, separated by a hundred years in time, but much closer together, in the matter of orchestral treatment of dramatic values--Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" and Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" symphonies.

The works differ, of course, in that Hindemith's work is steeped in mysticism and Berlioz' symphony is the product of a flaming romanticism, with a marked dominance of the flesh over the spirit.

The importance of the two works in the same concert lies in the conclusion that program music is neither dead nor old-fashioned.

Berlioz' fantastic storytelling and his genius at orchestration in advance of his time, and Hindemith's treatment of literary or symbolic materials in modern idiom can add up to a long concert, perhaps, but one that is well worth hearing, especially at the hands of such an excellent organization as the Boston Symphony.

The new principal violist of the group, Joseph de Pasquale, gave a beautiful account of the solo role in "Harold". His tone was warm and soft and he understood fully the interdependence of his instrument and the orchestra.

Koussevitzky Builds a Cathedral of Music

BY J. DORSEY CALLAGHAN
Free Press Music Critic

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky as master mason, built a towering Gothic Cathedral in tone at its performance of Hindemith's "Mathias the Painter" at Masonic Temple.

Koussevitzky and the orchestra created the tremendous climaxes and vaulting progressions that make the work one of the greatest of our time.

* * *

BY THE TIME the noble and full-throated brasses had shouted the religious glory of the final chorale, "Lauda Sion Salvatorem," the listener felt spiritually exhausted.

The wonder of it is that a man full of years, as Koussevitzky is, is able to grasp and interpret the thoughts of a much younger contemporary. It bespeaks a continuing youth that defies the years.

To hear this second concert by the Boston orchestra since the war, Detroit marshaled an audience that filled the auditorium.

The concert opened with a performance of Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, in which the conductor set a mood that never flagged during the evening.

* * *

IT SEEMED AS though the program had been designed to present all facets of the orchestra. Debussy's impressionistic "Afternoon of a Faun" brought forth the woodwinds and a solo flute in lines of utter beauty.

One other major work was included, with Joseph de Pasquale as viola soloist. It was the Berlioz symphony. "Harold in Italy." It is one of the few works in a large form in which the silken voice of the viola is given a prominent part.

De Pasquale gave a most satisfying performance, in which the instrument emerged with a bigger voice than is ordinarily heard in this composition.

The last movement of the symphony brought the evening to an end with a feeling of excitement that could be best described by the composer's marking "allegro frenetico." In view of the fact that the European orchestras are practically lost, it seems safe to repeat that the Boston is the greatest.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

DEC 31 1947

music.

Symphony Concert

Beyond much doubt, the high point of these meetings came last evening with the special concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducting. The program:

Suite from the Ballet "Appalachian Spring" .... Copland
Symphony No. 8 in C Minor ..... Bruckner
I. Allegro Moderator
II. Scherzo
III. Adagio
IV. Feierlich (Nicht Schnell)

To put it briefly, both orchestra and conductor were in exceptional form and the results were brilliant in the extreme. Perhaps the simplest way to explain it is to use an excerpt from the citation to Dr. Koussevitsky by the National Music Council. This was the first such citation, and was awarded "with respect, esteem, gratitude and affection, for creative develepoment of music in all the countries of the world. . . . He has made a contribution for which America can never repay him." The audience confirmed it with an ovation at

---

Boston Symphony Orchestra Excels; Golschmann to Conduct Here

By William Leonard

There was just the proper combination of novelty and familiarity about the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert Friday night at Orchestra Hall—and it was performed with a perfection that would have made even a less balanced program stimulating.

Serge Koussevitzky conducted his marvelously lubricated musical machine in Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony which is a popular item in any symphony's repertoire, and in Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" symphony and Hindemith's "Mathis der Mahler," which are established but still far from threadbare.

The Berlioz, with Joseph de Pasquale, 28-year old Philadelphian, as viola soloist, was an epic of melancholy romanticism, poetically fantastic but convincing in every turnabout of its many moods.

The Hindemith "symphony" improves with each hearing although it still is more impressive for the skill of its composer's technique than for any feeling of compulsion. It has an obvious sincerity without having the ability to convince the listener unless he meets it more than halfway.

* * *

Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony in Great Concert

Cincinnati Times

HOWARD W. HESS

WELL! It is possible to fill Music Hall to overflowing, in the middle of a busy week, with Cincinnatians who know and who want the best in symphonic music without the extra sales attraction of a soloist, and it is possible for symphonic music to express all the longings and desires of the soul which holds the right to question today's ideals and ideas.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra have the edge on all other orchestras because of the years they have known and have believed in each other; there is still something fine about friendship (even in the arts). On tour every orchestra presents numbers which could be played and conducted with closed eyes and with hands tied behind backs. The program presented Wednesday night was of that kind. The presence of music on the stands was like having a few extra bills in your purse—"just in case."

★ ★ ★

No matter how well known the numbers or how well trained the ensemble, the concert was one of exceptional value. The program began with Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," which at once established a bond of musical warmth between the performers and the audience; Mendelssohn wasn't such an outmoded old dullard as some people think. His music was delightful and charming even when his polite conventionality did get the better of his innate romanticism. The slight overbalance of strings showed only in a part of the first movement. The "Andante" had the proper feel of singing, just for the love of singing. The Third Movement had many superior musical attractions, especially the soft, far-distant horn tones. The "Salterello" and the "Terantella" had vitality without gush.

★ ★ ★

The audience was literally amazed at the imagination which kept the magnificent music of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" flowing as a golden stream. The "Lever du jour—Pantomime and Dance generale"— recalled the entire Greek legend and also revealed the real reason that this great ballet is not on the standard repertory — no ballet company could constantly afford the perfect orchestra needed to produce the right effect. The music when so superbly conducted and played, however, is sufficient, and the audience in Music Hall Wednesday night will forever cherish the understanding of a poetic love of long ago.

Every Symphony patron knows the Tschaikowsky "Symphony No. 6" (Pathetique), but I doubt very much if this greatest of all musical tragedies has ever bee more clearly understood by thos in the audience who had thougl that they had plumbed its emc tional depths. The performanc was all-inclusive; it was so suk lime that dead silence followe the last movement for a peric and then Koussevitzky and tł Boston orchestra were given a ovation seldon accorded, any er semble.

THE CINCINNATI POST

The Proper Bostonians Perform in Music Hall

BY ELEANOR BELL

The Boston Symphony Orchestra believed by many to be the best in the business, played a sure-fine program in Music Hall last night under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, dean of conductors now operating on the nation's podiums.

Mr. Koussevitzky is dean by virtue of his having stuck by his guns in Boston for 24 years, which I believe is the marathon record at the present time among big league conductors. But Mr. Koussevitzky has other claims to eminence besides that of sheer tenacity and longevity. He conducted a whale of a concert last night.

On paper, the program was a disappointment to those of us who relish a challenge along with our listening. There were Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, the "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite No. 2 by Ravel and Tchaikovsky's Pathetique, all tried and true, and excepting the Ravel, bordering on the category sometimes impiously designated as "war horses."

The 110 or more Bostonians, equipped with instruments the very best, proceeded by their sheer virtuosity as an organization to knock all such precious premonitions into a large cocked hat. It is a pleasure to report that there is still plenty of good red meat on the bones of the works mentioned above.

The first violins had the pleasure of making the evening's first tonal revelation, for it was their opening ta-DEE-da, ta-DEE-da in the opening bars of the Mendelssohn that brought the local music-minded fraternity up sharp with a tone that was bright and disciplined and altogether fresh.

But after that pleasant shock wore off there were others, for it was an evening of revealing beauty . . . . revealing because we in Cincinnati haven't heard the like for years. The articulation of the woodwinds and horns in the Saltarello, the brass tone in the Tchaikovsky, the lavish color of the Ravel. These were almost unbelievably perfect.

It was a reassuring experience to realize that here was an orchestra every member of which was not only capable of playing every note with a reasonable amount of accuracy and in time, but was actually doing so right there before our eyes.

The colors in the Ravel Suite were thrilling (gad, I haven't used that word for many a moon), and the pagan dance never possessed more lids-off abandon.

Even the ripe old Pathetique score was invested with beauty that was moving and impressive. The 73-year-old conductor and his henchmen took the trouble to dig out the beauty and exploit it unreservedly. It was as simple as that, for obviously the orchestra did not play from a secret manuscript, or deal from a fixed deck. They just played the notes as the Lord, Mr. Tchaikovsky and Mr. Koussevitzky intended them to be played. And that was that.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

DEC 31 1947

Koussevitzky Honored

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, Dec. 31. — The National Music Council last night presented to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a citation for his "distinguished contribution to the development of American music."

Koussevitsky Earns Ovation

BY IRVING SABLOSKY

The ovation tendered the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor Serge Koussevitzky at Orchestra Hall Sunday afternoon voiced more than approval or appreciation.

It was a clamor of half-tearful emotion, tinged with earnest gratitude for the experience of the music that had aroused it.

IT WAS AFTER the revelation of Ravel's 2d Daphnis and Chloe Suite that the feeling reached its peak. But that was only the brilliant climax of a completely extraordinary concert by an orchestra of musicians each seeming to have an enthusiastic conviction about every note of his music--and the conviction of each one coinciding with that of every other.

That conviction emanated from Dr. Koussevitzky whose eloquent baton could turn perfectly each phrase of Mozart's Divertimento in B-flat(K.287) or set Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetique' Symphony seething with smouldering self-annihilation.

THE LUMINOUS 'Mathis der Maler' of Hindemith, the blazing'Harold in Italy' of Berlioz of , the Friday evening concert, and Sunday's Mozart--irresistible even though its soloistic passages weren't quite suited to the full string section -- all led to that indescribable performance of the Ravel.

Boston Orchestra in Second Concert; Pergolesi Opera Revived

By William Leonard

The perfection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra no longer is so shocking to Chicago as it was three years ago when Serge Koussevitzky and his men, returning after a five-year absence, literally stunned an Orchestra Hall audience unused to such sumptuousness of tone and precision of execution.

The Bostonians have been here more than half a dozen times since that memorable occasion, and our own orchestra no longer points such a sorry contrast with the visitors, but there still is musical magic under the Koussevitzky baton.

Mr. Koussevitzky featured a resplendently, gloriously colorful reading of the "Daphnis and Chloe" suite of Ravel—one that surpassed even his magnificent recent recording of it.

We have heard the suite frequently in recent years, but too often it has been filled with bombast; Mr. Koussevitzky directed it with no damper on its feverishness, but kept everything in order.

Though it rarely is heard, Mozart's B flat Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns (K.287) is a masterful work, its five movements bursting with worthy melodies. Mr. Koussevitzky brought a wistful serenity to its slow section and caused the finale to sparkle.

The Tschaikowsky "Pathetique," closing the second of the orchestra's two concerts here, was a well-nigh flawless presentation of the work which demands such a master's hand to put a glow of color again in its aging cheeks.

* * *

THE ANN ARBOR NEW

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Orchestra In Fine Concert

By Carl Gehring

Another magnificent concert by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra was added last evening to a long series of similar contributions to Ann Arbor's musical life by these performers. Appearing at Hill Auditorium in the sixth concert of the Choral Union Series, Koussevitzky and his men were at their customary best in performances of a Divertimento in B-Flat Major, for Strings and two Horns (Koechel No. 287), by Mozart; Suite No. 2 from Ravel's Ballet "Daphnis and Chloe," and the Berlioz "Harold in Italy" Symphony, with Viola Solo, Op. 16. The soloist in the Berlioz composition was Joseph de Pasquale, first violist in the orchestra.

For the quality of this organization's string section, as shown in the performance of Mozart's Divertimento, superlatives of the past are again in order. Written for string quartet and two horns, the work was beautifully negotiated by two horns and the string section which, reduced to its barest essentials, revealed the ultimate in basic musicianship with special emphasis on design and contrasting intonation. Noteworthy was the variety of the instrumental timbres in passages wherein subsidiary parts commented upon the principal line, as in the theme and variations and in the finale, where each part has particular importance in the construction of the movement.

Large Orchestra Takes Over

Thus challenged by so fine a projection by one of its choirs, the balance of the orchestra took over with a vengeance in the full modern score of Ravel and gave off with all of the power, color, integration and blending of parts, instrumental balances and general ensemble which we have come to associate with a performance by the entire Boston Orchestra. The strings, appropriately restrained in Mozart's less effusive music, were lustrous and titanic in the fuller address of Ravel; the woodwinds shimmered; the brasses, so well represented by the exquisite work of the horns in the Divertimento, had great resonance and authority in "Daphnis and Chloe."

, The fidelity with which Koussevitzky approaches various kinds of music, remarked upon in the past, was particularly evident in his readings of these two widely contrasting works. While a chronological arrangement of the program would have had the Berlioz intervening between the Mozart and Ravel compositions, the length of the Symphony probably was the factor which had it placed on the concluding half of the event. In any case, the immediate proximity of Mozart and Ravel made for the most interesting and provocative kind of contrast in which Koussevitzky revealed himself as a completely poised and erudite master of the classical style on the one hand and a galvanic interpreter of the modern on the other.

With the romanticist Berlioz, the conductor was likewise most effective. The "Harold in Italy" Symphony incorporates all of the driving energy, long contemplative passages and brilliance of orchestration which are typical of its composer's style, and the manner of its performance was in the very finest Berlioz tradition which Pierre Monteux scarcely could have surpassed. Nothing could have been more authentic than the first movement, with its gorgeous Adagio introduction and the shifting moods of the ensuing Allegro, unless it were the finale, with its typically Berlioz "Orgy of Brigands." Here, as all evening, the orchestra was superb, especially in the climaxes.

The viola soloist, drawn from the ranks of so outstanding a group, hardly could have done other than acquit himself admirably. Playing an instrument which is a 1798 product of Lorenzo Storione, of Cremona, de Pasquale negotiated the solo part with authority and fine musicianship, and sounded especially well against a counter-theme, beautifully intoned in the flute, in the first movement. In the matter of solo playing, for that matter, the long flute passage from "Daphnis and Chloe" must be identified as quite outstanding, and no less effective, if shorter, than the contribution which de Pasquale made to so splendid a concert.

DIRECTOR . . . —Serge Koussevitzky, world-famous conductor of the Boston Symphony since 1924, pictured during a rehearsal session. The 73-year-old director with his orchestra will present a May Beegle Concert at the Syria Mosque next Tuesday evening under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra.

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

JAN 2 1948

Recorded Music

News and Reviews

By CLIF BRADT

Record manufacturers apparently have been working the "backlog" idea in two directions, for in addition to building up their own it would appear they also have been providing reviewers with a backlog and those discussed below are still from the 1947 pre-holiday issues.

Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 ("Eroica") in E Flat, from Victor, obviously is issued to get Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony together on this item, for there are quite a few good recordings available, the same conductor having done it with the London Philharmonic. It is well recorded, adequately read and of value to the wax literature, but not particularly a standout.

The musical byproducts of Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliette" have had a fair year and now Victor adds an album of excerpts from the Berlioz dramatic symphony under that title. However the merits maybe argued as to the value of this music as good Berlioz, Toscanini and the NBC Orchestra play it brilliantly, although there are times the conductor seems to think it will take the Rossini treatment, which is a precision penchant of his. The "Queen Mab" scherzo is missing, having been recorded for a separate disc.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 3 - 1948

Young Women Do as Mothers Did—Sing with Koussevitzky in Boston

Boston, Jan. 2.—(AP)—On the same stage where their mothers sang with the Boston Symphony in the '20's and '30's, soprano Marina Koshetz and contralto Eunice Alberts appeared as soloists today—with the same orchestra and the same conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

Miss Koshetz, daughter of the Russian soprano Nina Koshetz, sang in the first performance anywhere of Nikolai Nabokov's "The Return of Pushkin."

She and Miss Alberts, daughter of the late Adele Alberts, sang later in Debussy's "The Blessed Damozel" with the Wellesley College Choir.

Afterward, the blonde Miss Koshetz on his right and brunette Miss Alberts on his left, Koussevitzky led both soloists to the center of the stage for bows.

Only then did most of the audience spot a brief program note recalling that Miss Koshetz' mother appeared with Pierre Monteux as a symphony soloist in 1922 and later with Koussevitzky, and that Miss Alberts' mother made several appearances with the orchestra, beginning in 1931.

Miss Alberts, a product of the New England Conservatory of Music and The Berkshire Music School, herself has appeared in films and currently is a member of The New England Opera Theater.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 4 - 1948

NEW WORKS: Walter Piston's Symphony No. 3, which Serge Koussevitzky was to play with the Boston Symphony last season, will be played by him with the orchestra this season instead. The first performances will be Friday and Saturday. . . . Ernst Toch's "Hyperion: A Dramatic Prelude," will receive its world première this week by the Cleveland Orchestra, which commissioned it with the Fynette Kulas American Composers' Fund. . . . Dr. Hans Kindler is premièring two new American symphonies during the month with the National Symphony Orchestra: Symphony No. 2 by Robert E. Ward, and a symphony by the Rev. George Wargo, former violist with the orchestra, now pastor of the Seventh Day Adventist Church in Bethesda, Md. . . . Elliott Carter's "Holiday Overture," which won the Independent Music Publishers' Contest of 1945, will be played for the first time in this country on Wednesday by the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra, under Reginald Stewart. The work has been played several times in Germany.

WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 3 - 1948

Soloists Repeat Performance Of Mothers

Boston, Jan. 2—(AP)—On the same tage where their mothers sang with the Boston Symphony in the 20s and 30s, Soprano Marina Koshetz and Contralto Eunice Alberts ppeared as soloists today—with he same orchestra and the same onductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

Miss Koshetz, daughter of the Russian Soprano Nina Koshetz, sang in the first performance anywhere of Nikolai Nabokov's "The Return of Pushkin," three movements for soprano and orchestra.

She and Miss Alberts, daughter of the late Adele Alberts, sang latter in Debussy's "The Blessed Damozel" with the Wellesley College Choir.

Afterward, with blonde Miss Koshetz on his right and brunette Miss Alberts on his left, Koussevitzky led both soloists to the center of the stage for bows.

Only then did most of the audience spot a brief program note recalling that Miss Koshetz' mother appeared with Pierre Monteux as a symphony soloist in 1922 and later with Koussevitzky, and that Miss Alberts' mother made several appearances with the orchestra beginning in 1931.

Miss Albert, a product of the New England Conservatory of Music and the Berkshire Music School, herself has appeared in films and currently is a member of the New England Opera Theater.

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, 1

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 11th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Marina Koshetz, soprano, was the soloist. Assisting were the Wellesley College Choir. Margaret Macdonald Winkler, director, and Eunice Alberts, contralto The program was as follows:

"The Return of Pushkin," Elegy ... Nabokov
"La Demoiselle Elue," Lyric Poem ... Debussy
Air of Tatiana (Letter Scene) from "Eugene Oniegin" .....Tchaikovsky
"Francesca da Rimini" Op. 32 ... Tchaikovsky

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Yesterday's concert offered quite a variety of orchestral fare as a glance at the program would tell, and it was thus undoubtedly sensible to substitute "Francesca da Rimini" for Shostakovitch's 6th Symphony which had been promised. The program began auspiciously with the first performance anywhere of Nikolai Nabokov's "The Return of Pushkin," an elegy in three parts for soprano and orchestra. The composer was present yesterday and came onto the stage to acknowledge the cordial applause.

I imagine that if we knew Russian at all and Pushkin better, for he does not come out too inspiringly in translation, we should have appreciated and understood more of what Mr. Nabokov had to say. His music is not at all flashy, nor does it bristle with dissonant counterpoint. It is, in short, an expressive and imaginative setting of the Pushkin verses. A somewhat lighter section intervenes between two slow and sombre movements. Knowing as little as I did about the poem I nevertheless found the music and Marina Koshetz' singing of it very moving.

We then heard an even more moving work, Debussy's "La Demoiselle Elue." There are reasons for this over and above the actual quality of the music. In the first place we know and are touched by Rossetti's poem and we are that nuch further ahead in appreciating he composer's purpose. Then, too, he contrast of orchestral color with hat of fresh, youthful voices is xtraordinarily effective. Even hough the music is early Debussy, ot entirely released from the hromatic magic of the wizard of Bayreuth, it is deeply felt and most artistically expressed—in a word, a lovely sounding score.

The performance by the Wellesley College Choir was exquisite, even though the words did not come through very clearly. Miss Koshetz's voice did not sound so well in this as in the two Russian pieces. There were several places where the orchestra completely drowned her out for Mr. Koussevitzky did not temper the instrumental wind for her. Nor was the text very audibly enunciated. On the other hand you could hear every word and note of the contralto, Eunice Alberts, who achieved some fine singing.

After the intermission Miss Koshetz was herself again in the famous "Letter Scene" from Tchaikovsky's "Eugene Oniegin." She proved herself an exceptionally sensitive and skilled vocal artist. Though the voice itself is not particularly pleasant, it is intelligently and artistically used, which is much more important. She was warmly received by yesterday's weather-brave audience.

Finally for popular good measure there was Tchaikovsky's Orchestral Fantasia, "Francesca da Rimini." It is one of Tchaikovsky's most bombastic and vulgar pieces, but there is no gainsaying that its noisy climaxes arouse an audience to quite a pitch. All the same I kept wondering what Dante would have thought of it.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Walter Piston's new Symphony No. 3, Prokofieff's 1st Violin Concerto (with Isaac Stern as soloist) and Brahms' 2nd Symphony.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 3 1948

2 Sing With Koussevitzky As Mothers Did

Boston, Jan. 3.—(AP)—On the same stage where their mothers sang with the Boston Symphony in the '20's and '30's, soprano Marina Koshetz and contralto Eunice Alberts appeared as soloists yesterday—with the same orchestra and the same conductor Serge Koussevitzky.

Miss Koshetz, daughter of the Russian soprano Nina Koshetz, sang in the first performance anywhere of Nikolai Nabokov's "The Return of Pushkin."

She and Miss Alberts, daughter of the late Adele Alberts, sang later in Debussy's "The Blessed Damozel" with the Wellesley College Choir.

Afterward, the blonde Miss Koshetz on his right and brunette Miss Alberts on his left, Koussevitzky led both soloists to the center of the stage for bows.

Only then did most of the audience spot a brief program note recalling that Miss Koshetz' mother appeared with Pierre Monteux as a symphony soloist in 1922 and later with Koussevitzky, and that Miss Alberts' mother made several appearances with the orchestra, beginning in 1931.

Miss Alberts, a product of the New England Conservatory of Music and The Berkshire Music School, herself has appeared in films and currently is a member of the New England Opera Theater.

-SATURDAY, JANUARY 3, 1948

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Vocal soloists are all too infrequent at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but this week partial amends are made to the extent that soprano Marina Koshetz is singing in no less than three numbers. First comes Nikolai Nabokoff's "The Return of Pushkin," which is given first performances, then Debussy's "La Demoiselle Elue" by Debussy and the Letter Scene from the opera "Eugen Oniegin" by Tchaikovsky. The one purely instrumental number is Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini," which replaces the originally announced Sixth Symphony of Shostakovich. Serge Koussevitzky conducts.

Miss Koshetz is the daughter of the famous Russian singer, Nina Koshetz, who herself has been a Boston Symphony soloist on several occasions and who yesterday sat in the balcony at Symphony Hall. Marina Koshetz' voice is a high-ranging but not big Russian soprano, on the brilliant rather than the sensuous side, characterized by pronounced vibrato. Befitting the daughter of Nina Koshetz, she sings with great intensity and temperament. On purely vocal grounds she sounded to better advantage in Debussy than Nabokov, for "The Return of Pushkin," a setting of the Russian poet's own verses, is rather clumsily written for voice and makes the singer compete with heavy, thick instrumentation. Nor does Nabokov's work have much character or distinction in its three movements. I thought I noted one tune. The composer was present.

Debussy's "La Demoiselle Elue," that wondrously radiant and delicate score, found Miss Koshetz singing with superb style and enunciating the Sarrazin-Rossetti words with pleasing clarity. The contralto soloist for Debussy was Eunice Alberts, a young Bostonian also the daughter of a late Symphony soloist, who acquitted herself well. The Wellesley College Choir, prepared by Margaret Macdonald Winkler, sang like angels, and the whole performance was a thorough delight.

Between Tatiana's Letter Scene and "Francesca da Rimini" lies the certain difference between the intimate and the bombastic Tchaikovsky. Miss Koshetz again delivered a warm and moving performance. Seldom has Mr. Koussevitzky made Francesca's unhappy tale and he bad weather of the second circle of the Inferno (no worse than Boson's, yesterday) so eloquent and s he did yesterday after-score and the perform-have been loud, but they motionally overpowering

Dr. Koussevitzky
impressive reading

EVANSVILLE, IND.
COURIER
JAN [illegible] 1948

RECORD REVIEWS

Koussevitzky Has Conducted Beethoven's Work 300 Times

NEW YORK, Jan. 3.—[illegible] Serge Koussevitzky is 73 now, and in the [illegible] year of his service to music. At least 300 times has he [illegible] third symphony ("Eroica"), but never quite conducted [illegible] records of RCA Victor's new recording, [illegible]

[illegible] countries, such as "Waltzing Mathilda" of Australia.

Alan Hovhannes, who composes in an interesting style, has two of his pieces, "Lousadzak" and "Tzaikerk," recorded for the first time by Disc. The instrumental album has a modern spirit with an original charm.

New Singles:

"My Old Flame" produced by Spike Jones for Victor is the best zany tune his outfit has ever performed.

Buddy Clark sings contentedly on "Ballerina" and "It Had To Be You" (Columbia) . . . Benny Goodman's revival of "Ooooh! Look-a There, Ain't She Pretty?" makes pleasing listening.

A new orchestra added to the M-G-M stable, George Paxton, has two good numbers in "The Best Things in Life Are Free" and "I Never Loved Anyone." . . . The Soft Winds have what should be a sure juke box number in "That's the Kind of Gal I Dream Of" (Majestic.)

"Song of New Orleans" (Victor) gives nimble fingered Larry Green another chance to show his "sweet boogie" piano genius.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

Salvation Army Opens Appeal For $1,000,000

Anderson and the Boston Symphony at Ceremony at Metropolitan Opera

Secretary of Agriculture Clinton P. Anderson and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, opened the 1948 $1,000,000 campaign of the Salvation Army in New York at the Metropolitan Opera House last night.

Speaking before 2,500 volunteer workers in the Army's Annual Maintenance Appeal and more than 100 uniformed Army workers, Secretary Anderson said the country had a two-fold mission of kindness in 1948—one at home, through organizations like the Salvation Army, and one abroad, through decisive implementation of the Marshall plan.

Secretary Anderson predicted that debate and checking of this country's ability to provide under the Marshall plan will precede any final action, but "after weighing the alternatives, we shall see that only by great and decisive action on our part can the world hope for peace or freedom."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, contributing its services gratis, made a speciel trip for the occasion. It played Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony and Aaron Copland's "Appalachian Spring." Part of the concert and Secretary Anderson's speech were broadcast from 9:30 to 10:30 p. m. by the American Broadcasting System.

Edward J. Noble, chairman of the campaign, reported the Salvation Army's budget for greater New York was $2,500,000, of which the Army itself raises $1,500,000. He said advance subscriptions totaling $296,000 had already been received toward the goal of $1,000,000.

[illegible] JANUA[illegible] 10, 1948

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra
By CYRUS DURGIN

The first half of the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon was one of the most novel, varied and absorbing hours we've had all season. It brought the first performance of the new Third Symphony by Walter Piston of Harvard University, and a revival of Prokofieff's First Violin Concerto with Isaac Stern as soloist. Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra were at the top of their fabulous form, and so the total result was music and music-making of extraordinary interest. After intermission came the comfortable old Brahms of the Second Symphony.

Commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, the Third Symphony is the best large composition that Walter Piston has written. It is masterfully set forth for a very big orchestra and every detail comes over clearly. It is music of good ideas and emotional "juice," and speaks out with a rugged grandeur equaled only in these times by Paul Hindemith. The scherzo is a real scherzo with rhythmic drive and melodic bounce.

The slow movement is the least communicative, and it may be too long. For some reason it soon loses that rapt mood with which it starts and which is the desideratum of any symphonic adagio. Then the finale picks up and within 30 seconds you are excited all over again. Mr. Piston bowed from the stage in acknowledgment of applause for what may prove to be one of the great masterpieces of American symphonic music.

Perhaps the finest compliment one can pay Mr. Stern, who made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony yesterday, is to say that while I had no recollection of the 1935 performance of Prokofieff's First Violin Concerto, I shall never forget the way Mr. Stern did it. This was fiddle-playing of the highest brilliance in a piece that must be one of the most fearsomely difficult ever written. It is full of soloistic tricks and orchestral sorcery.

Every measure came off beautifully, and what was more, it was all musical. Mr. Stern is much more than a wizard of bow and fingerboard. Beyond his dazzling technic—which makes all the fiddlers' tricks look easy—is a profoundly musical instinct and a fine musical brain. He has a marvelous legato, also, carried on a light but lush tone that never becomes "fat" or "oozy." Mr. Stern deserved every last handclap of the rousing ovation he received.

Brahms' D major Symphony is still one of the 19th century masterworks, but somehow it was almost lost after Piston and Prokofieff-Stern.

Isaac Stern as Violinist In Prokofiev Concerto No. 1

By L. A. Sloper

Walter Piston's Third Symphony had its first public performance at the twelfth Friday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, yesterday afternoon. Isaac Stern, appearing for the first time with this orchestra, played the Prokofiev Violin Concerto No. 1. The other item on the printed program was the Second Symphony of Brahms.

When Mr. Piston's Second Symphony was played here, in the spring of 1944, we noted that this scholarly modern composer had been visited by the spirit of romanticism. That spirit seems to have found a welcome, for this symphony is also animated by lyricism.

It is somewhat unconventional in form: Andantino, Scherzo, Adagio, Allegro. This seems to be the fashion nowadays—soft, loud, soft, loud. The Andantino begins with a gentle theme given to the oboe, and develops to an emotional climax of much power.

The Scherzo is rhythmically alive and varied, full of humor. It is interrupted by a Trio of engaging simplicity. The Adagio is a long—perhaps a too long—slow movement with a variety of themes which do not quite justify the time spent on them. The final Allegro is a lively movement having an irresistible march theme with which it concludes.

This symphony gives us new hope of the composers of the present. Mr. Piston does not like to talk about his music, much less to have anybody seek a program in it, but surely he would not mind our saying that without forgetting his erudition, he has succeeded in expressing melancholy, wit, pastoral reflectiveness, and buoyancy. That is, he has used his materials and his learning to say something which is accessible to any listener. He joins the great company of communicative composers.

Mr. Stern is a violinist of formidable technique and unassuming demeanor. He performed Prokofiev's tricky Scherzo with the greatest of ease, and, for all the hustle and bustle, managed to reveal a broad tone and an impeccable intonation. This concerto is not classed among the display pieces in its field, yet it doesn't omit a trick of the violinist's art. Mr. Stern without any of the mannerisms of the virtuoso mastered all the tricks and gave a good exposition of the music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 7 - 1948

SALVATION DRIVE OPENED AT CONCERT

$1,000,000 Fund Sought Here —Secretary Anderson Heard in Intermission Speech

The Marshall Plan was described last night as "the greatest rehabilitation program in history" by Secretary of Agriculture Clinton P. Anderson at the Metropolitan Opera House. He made the chief speech at a concert by the Boston ~~Symphony~~ Orchestra opening the Salvation Army's 1948 campaign for $1,000,000 for its maintenance fund.

"We are about to embark on the fulfillment of the plan," he said. "We shall have debates about the amounts and kinds of help to give. We shall want to assure ourselves that we are able to carry through what we begin. We shall try to be thoroughly practical. We shall weigh the alternatives and see that only by great and decisive action on our part can the world hope for peace and freedom."

America's selfish interest behind the plan, he said, is in seeking to maintain and extend its own freedom by helping create the conditions in which freedom can flourish. It wanted a better life for all, supported by the restoration of world production and trade.

He praised "the America of good-will," saying it showed itself in its good works abroad and at home. The Salvation Army, he remarked, had "found a most practical way of expressing the ideal of brotherhood." Americans could prove their good-will in their own country by supporting it, he added.

Edward J. Noble, chairman of the board of the American Broadcasting Company and general chairman of the Salvation Army's appeal, who introduced Mr. Anderson, said that the campaign would continue till Feb. 21, but that $297,876 had been raised by advance subscriptions. The Army, he explained, operates on a budget of $2,500,000. It has raised $1,500,000 by its own efforts, but needs the rest from its "civilian friends."

The fund drive is being carried out by 200 committees, Mr. Noble said. He singled out the following chairman for especial thanks. Mrs. Walter Hoving and Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith of the concert committee, Mrs. Taylor Cochran and Walter Hoving, head of the women's and men's divisions; David Sarnoff, in charge of commerce and industry; Walbridge Taft in charge of the foundations; Bill Beckers, the general treasurer; Paul Landon and Urbain C. LeGoest of the Bronx, and Lester R. Mahoney of Queens.

Commissioner Donald McMillan, Eastern Territorial Commander, introduced the speech making, which came after the intermission. The program after the intermission, including Mr. Anderson's speech, was broadcast as part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's regular Tuesday evening concert over the network of the American Broadcasting Company.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra played two numbers, Aaron Copland's Suite from the Ballet "Appalachian Spring" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. The orchestra played on the stage, which was converted for concert purposes by a mulberry-colored orchestra shell that the orchestra had brought from Boston.

[illegible]AY, JANUARY 6,

CLEVELAND ORCHESTRA ADVANCING

Gives Fine Program in Expanded Season of Concerts

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

CLEVELAND, Jan. 4—Now in its 30th season, the Cleveland Orchestra cannot be described as either one of the older or one of the newer ones. It has long been recognized as one of the better ones, and now, under the able guidance of George Szell, it is on its way to becoming one of the very best.

MEMBERS ADDED

Indeed, when Mr. Szell took over, he stated that it was his ambition to lift the orchestra to an even higher place than that which it already occupied.

Its membership has been increased from 88 to 96 and there are now more local concerts per season. On the basis of the one I heard last evening, the orchestra personnel is strong in every department and it now remains for Mr. Szell to mould it into his particular image. What we call a "crack" orchestra cannot be fashioned any other way.

Mr. Szell is no stranger to Boston. I only wish that we could be even better acquainted with him than we are. We have heard him with the Metropolitan Opera Company, the position he abandoned to come here, and as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony. The composers in whose music he shone at Symphony Hall were Schubert, Schumann and Smetana.

Of Czechoslovakian blood, though born in Hungary, his is the central European tradition that at one time prevailed in this country, and he naturally excells as interpreter of the Czechs, Germans and Austrians. It was his performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral," by the way, which made Cleveland decide that it couldn't do without him.

In view of all this, it is interesting to note that last evening's program offered music by an American (Peter Mennin), a Frenchman, (Edouard Lalo) and a Russian (Tschaikovsky). Pennsylvania-born Mennin, now in his 25th year, was represented by his Third Symphony (none of his music has yet been heard in Boston). Not so hard to listen to as some contemporary works, this Symphony showed that Mr. Mennin has something to say and knows how to say it.

Lalo is chiefly known today through the "Spanish" Symphony for violin and orchestra, in which the soloist at this particular pair of concerts was the orchestra's brilliant new concertmaster, Josef Gingold. And, of all things under the sun, Mr. Szell regaled a visiting Bostonian with that Koussevitzkyan specialty, Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

I wouldn't have missed that performance of the "Pathetic" for a good deal; I heard things that I hadn't heard before, one argument for not always hearing the same work from the same conductor (or the same orchestra). However, I am still willing to concede that Koussevitzky's version must be the definitive one. Mr. Szell's performance, moving and exciting, measurably lacked the accustomed morbidity, melodrama and hysteria. These things may not be admirable of themselves, but it they that have set the "Pathetique," and particularly Koussevitzky's "Pathetique," apart from all other music . . . Of Cleveland's beautiful concert hall and other matters, more anon.

EVANSVILLE, IND.
COURIER
JAN 4 - 1948

RECORD REVIEWS

Koussevitzky Has Conducted Beethoven's Work 300 Times

NEW YORK, Jan. 3. (UP)—Serge Koussevitzky is 73 now, and in the 41st year of his service to music. At least 300 times has he conducted Beethoven's third symphony ("Eroica"), but never quite as he conducts it in the six records of RCA Victor's new recording, a fact which surely has relation to it being the year 1947.

From these records you sense a deep yearning in the heart of the venerable master while he and his Boston Symphony Orchestra were making them. Yet simultaneously you are transfixed by an abundant fulfillment of yearning—yours as much as his.

The yearning is for faith in man in 1947, [illegible] he has the means of his own destruction and is as quarrelsome as ever. The fulfillment of yearning is [illegible] while the music is proclaiming man's god-like stature and his infinite capabilities, all of them good.

It is a passionate celebration of the heroic in man, this symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky seems to conduct it hungrily, as though famished for the [illegible] last syllable of its serene assurance.

Decca has issued three new folk song albums: "Sod Buster Ballads," "Burl Ives, Vol. 2" and "Songs of Many Lands." The first includes songs of the West with Lee Hayes, Pete Seeger and Woody Guthrie. Ives, who is supposed to be the best ballad singer of them all, produces some find old laments and love songs. The "Songs of Many Lands" are sung by Josef Marais and Miranda in an enchanting style—they include such old American songs as "Go Tell Aunt Rhody" and ones representative of other countries, such as "Waltzing Mathilda" of Australia.

Alan Hovhannes, who composes in an interesting style, has two of his pieces, "Lousadzak" and "Tzaikerk," recorded for the first time by Disc. The instrumental album has a modern spirit with an original charm.

New Singles:

"My Old Flame" produced by Spike Jones for Victor is the best zany tune his outfit has ever performed.

Buddy Clark sings contentedly on "Ballerina" and "It Had To Be You" (Columbia) . . . Benny Goodman's revival of "Ooooh! Look-a There, Ain't She Pretty?" makes pleasing listening.

A new orchestra added to the M-G-M stable, George Paxton, has two good numbers in "The Best Things in Life Are Free" and "I Never Loved Anyone." . . . The Soft Winds have what should be a sure juke box number in "That's the Kind of Gal I Dream Of" (Majestic.)

"Song of New Orleans" (Victor) gives nimble fingered Larry Green another chance to show his "sweet boogie" piano genius.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

Salvation Army Opens Appeal For $1,000,000

Anderson and the Boston Symphony at Ceremony at Metropolitan Opera

Secretary of Agriculture Clinton P. Anderson and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, opened the 1948 $1,000,000 campaign of the Salvation Army in New York at the Metropolitan Opera House last night.

Speaking before 2,500 volunteer workers in the Army's Annual Maintenance Appeal and more than 100 uniformed Army workers, Secretary Anderson said the country had a two-fold mission of kindness in 1948—one at home, through organizations like the Salvation Army, and one abroad, through decisive implementation of the Marshall plan.

Secretary Anderson predicted that debate and checking of this country's ability to provide under the Marshall plan will precede any final action, but "after weighing the alternatives, we shall see that only by great and decisive action on our part can the world hope for peace or freedom."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, contributing its services gratis, made a speciel trip for the occasion. It played Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony and Aaron Copland's "Appalachian Spring." Part of the concert and Secretary Anderson's speech were broadcast from 9:30 to 10:30 p. m. by the American Broadcasting System.

Edward J. Noble, chairman of the campaign, reported the Salvation Army's budget for greater New York was $2,500,000, of which the Army itself raises $1,500,000. He said advance subscriptions totaling $296,000 had already been received toward the goal of $1,000,000.

SATURD[illegible] JANUA[illegible] 10, 1948

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The first half of the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon was one of the most novel, varied and absorbing hours we've had all season. It brought the first performance of the new Third Symphony by Walter Piston of Harvard University, and a revival of Prokofieff's First Violin Concerto with Isaac Stern as soloist. Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra were at the top of their fabulous form, and so the total result was music and music-making of extraordinary interest. After intermission came the comfortable old Brahms of the Second Symphony.

Commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, the Third Symphony is the best large composition that Walter Piston has written. It is masterfully set forth for a very big orchestra and every detail comes over clearly. It is music of good ideas and emotional "juice," and speaks out with a rugged grandeur equaled only in these times by Paul Hindemith. The scherzo is a real scherzo with rhythmic drive and melodic bounce.

The slow movement is the least communicative, and it may be too long. For some reason it soon loses that rapt mood with which it starts and which is the desideratum of any symphonic adagio. Then the finale picks up and within 30 seconds you are excited all over again. Mr. Piston bowed from the stage in acknowledgment of applause for what may prove to be one of the great masterpieces of American symphonic music.

Perhaps the finest compliment one can pay Mr. Stern, who made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony yesterday, is to say that while I had no recollection of the 1935 performance of Prokofieff's First Violin Concerto, I shall never forget the way Mr. Stern did it. This was fiddle-playing of the highest brilliance in a piece that must be one of the most fearsomely difficult ever written. It is full of soloistic tricks and orchestral sorcery.

Every measure came off beautifully, and what was more, it was all musical. Mr. Stern is much more than a wizard of bow and fingerboard. Beyond his dazzling technic—which makes all the fiddlers' tricks look easy—is a profoundly musical instinct and a fine musical brain. He has a marvelous legato, also, carried on a light but lush tone that never becomes "fat" or "oozy." Mr. Stern deserved every last handclap of the rousing ovation he received.

Brahms' D major Symphony is still one of the 19th century masterworks, but somehow it was almost lost after Piston and Prokofieff-Stern.

Isaac Stern as Violinist In Prokofiev Concerto No. 1

By L. A. Sloper

Walter Piston's Third Symphony had its first public performance at the twelfth Friday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, yesterday afternoon. Isaac Stern, appearing for the first time with this orchestra, played the Prokofiev Violin Concerto No. 1. The other item on the printed program was the Second Symphony of Brahms.

When Mr. Piston's Second Symphony was played here, in the spring of 1944, we noted that this scholarly modern composer had been visited by the spirit of romanticism. That spirit seems to have found a welcome, for this symphony is also animated by lyricism.

It is somewhat unconventional in form: Andantino, Scherzo, Adagio, Allegro. This seems to be the fashion nowadays—soft, loud, soft, loud. The Andantino begins with a gentle theme given to the oboe, and develops to an emotional climax of much power.

The Scherzo is rhythmically alive and varied, full of humor. It is interrupted by a Trio of engaging simplicity. The Adagio is a long—perhaps a too long—slow movement with a variety of themes which do not quite justify the time spent on them. The final Allegro is a lively movement having an irresistible march theme with which it concludes.

This symphony gives us new hope of the composers of the present. Mr. Piston does not like to talk about his music, much less to have anybody seek a program in it, but surely he would not mind our saying that without forgetting his erudition, he has succeeded in expressing melancholy, wit, pastoral reflectiveness, and buoyancy. That is, he has used his materials and his learning to say something which is accessible to any listener. He joins the great company of communicative composers.

Mr. Stern is a violinist of formidable technique and unassuming demeanor. He performed Prokofiev's tricky Scherzo with the greatest of ease, and, for all the hustle and bustle, managed to reveal a broad tone and an impeccable intonation. This concerto is not classed among the display pieces in its field, yet it doesn't omit a trick of the violinist's art. Mr. Stern without any of the mannerisms of the virtuoso mastered all the tricks and gave a good exposition of the music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 7 - 1948

SALVATION DRIVE OPENED AT CONCERT

$1,000,000 Fund Sought Here —Secretary Anderson Heard in Intermission Speech

The Marshall Plan was described last night as "the greatest rehabilitation program in history" by Secretary of Agriculture Clinton P. Anderson at the Metropolitan Opera House. He made the chief speech at a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra opening the Salvation Army's 1948 campaign for $1,000,000 for its maintenance fund.

"We are about to embark on the fulfillment of the plan," he said. "We shall have debates about the amounts and kinds of help to give. We shall want to assure ourselves that we are able to carry through what we begin. We shall try to be thoroughly practical. We shall weigh the alternatives and see that only by great and decisive action on our part can the world hope for peace and freedom."

America's selfish interest behind the plan, he said, is in seeking to maintain and extend its own freedom by helping create the conditions in which freedom can flourish. It wanted a better life for all, supported by the restoration of world production and trade.

He praised "the America of good-will," saying it showed itself in its good works abroad and at home. The Salvation Army, he remarked, had "found a most practical way of expressing the ideal of brotherhood." Americans could prove their good-will in their own country by supporting it, he added.

Edward J. Noble, chairman of the board of the American Broadcasting Company and general chairman of the Salvation Army's appeal, who introduced Mr. Anderson, said that the campaign would continue till Feb. 21, but that $297,876 had been raised by advance subscriptions. The Army, he explained, operates on a budget of $2,500,000. It has raised $1,500,000 by its own efforts, but needs the rest from its "civilian friends."

The fund drive is being carried out by 200 committees, Mr. Noble said. He singled out the following chairman for especial thanks. Mrs. Walter Hoving and Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith of the concert committee, Mrs. Taylor Cochran and Walter Hoving, head of the women's and men's divisions; David Sarnoff, in charge of commerce and industry; Walbridge Taft in charge of the foundations; Bill Beckers, the general treasurer; Paul Landon and Urbain C. LeGoest of the Bronx, and Lester R. Mahoney of Queens.

Commissioner Donald McMillan, Eastern Territorial Commander, introduced the speech making, which came after the intermission. The program after the intermission, including Mr. Anderson's speech, was broadcast as part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's regular Tuesday evening concert over the network of the American Broadcasting Company.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the orchestra played two numbers, Aaron Copland's Suite from the Ballet "Appalachian Spring" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony. The orchestra played on the stage, which was converted for concert purposes by a mulberry-colored orchestra shell that the orchestra had brought from Boston.

DAY, JANUARY 6,

CLEVELAND ORCHESTRA ADVANCING

Gives Fine Program in Expanded Season of Concerts

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

CLEVELAND, Jan. 4—Now in its 30th season, the Cleveland Orchestra cannot be described as either one of the older or one of the newer ones. It has long been recognized as one of the better ones, and now, under the able guidance of George Szell, it is on its way to becoming one of the very best.

MEMBERS ADDED

Indeed, when Mr. Szell took over, he stated that it was his ambition to lift the orchestra to an even higher place than that which it already occupied.

Its membership has been increased from 88 to 96 and there are now more local concerts per season. On the basis of the one I heard last evening, the orchestra personnel is strong in every department and it now remains for Mr. Szell to mould it into his particular image. What we call a "crack" orchestra cannot be fashioned any other way.

Mr. Szell is no stranger to Boston. I only wish that we could be even better acquainted with him than we are. We have heard him with the Metropolitan Opera Company, the position he abandoned to come here, and as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony. The composers in whose music he shone at Symphony Hall were Schubert, Schumann and Smetana.

Of Czechoslovakian blood, though born in Hungary, his is the central European tradition that at one time prevailed in this country, and he naturally excells as interpreter of the Czechs, Germans and Austrians. It was his performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral," by the way, which made Cleveland decide that it couldn't do without him.

In view of all this, it is interesting to note that last evening's program offered music by an American (Peter Mennin), a Frenchman, (Edouard Lalo) and a Russian (Tschaikovsky). Pennsylvania-born Mennin, now in his 25th year, was represented by his Third Symphony (none of his music has yet been heard in Boston). Not so hard to listen to as some contemporary works, this Symphony showed that Mr. Mennin has something to say and knows how to say it.

Lalo is chiefly known today through the "Spanish" Symphony for violin and orchestra, in which the soloist at this particular pair of concerts was the orchestra's brilliant new concertmaster, Josef Gingold. And, of all things under the sun, Mr. Szell regaled a visiting Bostonian with that Koussevitzkyan specialty, Tschaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony.

I wouldn't have missed that performance of the "Pathetic" for a good deal; I heard things that I hadn't heard before, one argument for not always hearing the same work from the same conductor (or the same orchestra). However, I am still willing to concede that Koussevitzky's version must be the definitive one. Mr. Szell's performance, moving and exciting, measurably lacked the accustomed morbidity, melodrama and hysteria. These things may not be admirable of themselves, but it they that have set the "Pathetique," and particularly Koussevitzky's "Pathetique," apart from all other music . . . Of Cleveland's beautiful concert hall and other matters, more anon.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 11 1948

ARTIST'S PLACE

His Social Function and Position Have Changed in Our Century

By OLIN DOWNES

AT the dinner recently given him by the Bohemians in this city, Dr. Koussevitzky made some particularly timely remarks upon the position of the artist in the society of today. The keynote of his argument lay in the statement that whereas the artist in the nineteenth century could exist outside the social, political, and economic concerns of his age, the artist in the twentieth could not, and should not do so. Dr. Koussevitzky sees the contemporaneous artist not only as the interpreter of masterpieces, but also as the interpreter of the human and social issues of his period.

Dr. Koussevitzky continued: The blame for existing conditions in this respect rests not only upon the age, the present period, and the traditional order of the society in which they exist, but upon the artists themselves.

The artists, he implied, have been all too willing to leave the difficult fundamental problems of society and government to those who are perfectly willing to assure the musician, the poet, or the painter that they are better qualified than he is to look after these "practical" affairs. The tacit agreement to this effect which exists between the prevailing type of artist and the prevailing type of Mr. Common Citizen or Man of Affairs impresses Koussevitzky, as it does the writer, as an astounding perversion of logic. It is, in fact, a fallacy which can only proceed from a general misconception of the place that an art and its exponents should—indeed must—have, in a civilized society.

We hold the theory that citizens of average intelligence and experience are the ones competent to shape the affairs of the community, while individuals of exceptional intelligence and leadership in fields of thought and beauty are incapable of doing so, to be as disproportionate as it is antediluvian. Modern society should have gotten farther than that by this time. It is an idea born of a civilization as complacent and opportunistic in its methods as it is fearful of any and all ideas not completely in accord with regimented precepts of the past, and its incapacity to predict the consequences of its actions from any other than this purblind viewpoint.

Premier to Pianist

The doctrine was well exemplified by the remark attributed to Georges Clemenceau, then Premier of France, when he met Ignace Paderewski, then Premier of Poland, at the Versailles Conference: "Paderewski, the greatest pianist in the world! Paderewski, the Premier of Poland! My God, what a come-down!"

The witty collocation and the Gallic concision of this remark, bruited far and wide at the time it was reported, delighted everybody, and went generally unquestioned on grounds of logic at the time. It is the beauty of aphorisms of this sort that the public's mind is captivated by their sound, while few remember or take the trouble to find out how such a generally approved doctrine, carried into effect, really works.

Had this been done—had an actual investigation of consequences been undertaken, and the findings of such a long-range inquiry assessed on a really objective basis, a number of misleading and superficial habits of thought could have been relegated to the ash-heap. Thus it could be claimed that if Clemenceau's policies for France had been colored by some measure of the foresight and liberalism which characterized the policies that Paderewski sought to put into effect for Poland, the position of France would have been different, happier and more powerful than it is today. As for Poland, had its people elected to follow Paderewski's policies rather than the chauvinistic and militaristic leadership of Pilsudski and his clique, Poland would have been in a far better and firmer position than she was in the twenty-five years between the two great wars, and would have avoided much calamity. Admitted, that if Paderewski had had Clemenceau's long experience of government and organization when he accepted the leadership of Poland, and if the underpinning of the Polish state which Paderewski wished to reshape had been firmer, he might have been able to effect the truly constructive aims that he entertained. But that does not invalidate the argument.

What Might Have Been

It is easy, of course, to speculate upon what might have happened.

Perhaps no one could have pulled Poland out of her innumerable difficulties, consequent not only upon her internal problems, but the state of the world at the time. But it can be added here, to fill out the picture a little, that the state of the world of Paderewski's day of power, and the destruction of all liberal international policy then advocated by a certain Professor Wilson and a League of Nations which he sought permanently to establish, had most destructive consequences; assured the second World War, and can quite possibly become the source of a third.

But we still hear, from so-called practical citizens and men of affairs, of the "impractical" ideas, the lack of astuteness in politics, of a certain stubborn professor and a certain visionary piano-player. As it eventuates, they were the two, and virtually the only two liberal and thoughtful leaders in the set of political bellwethers who gathered at Versailles; the only two who placed reason and justice ahead of national fanaticism and political expediency at that time of crisis. The men who opposed them, above all the high-powered political and financial groups in America; the group which, following the Wilson defeat, took over the direction of the country, were the allegedly clearsighted persons, "with their feet on the ground," who led the country into the worst depression of modern times—thus far—and made the peace of the world, for the time being, a fantastic proposition.

This, of course, is only a parable. As those who write novels say, none of the characters represented herein is an existing person. Yet we think that Dr. Koussevitzky struck at the root of the matter in his criticism of the position commonly assigned to the artist by a superficially educated society. It is high time, indeed it is a most urgent necessity of this our society, that the existing gap between the perspective and creative thinking of the artist, and the effectuation of his thought in terms of social and political development, be ended.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA
GAZETTE

JAN 11 1948

Hartley Sharpens His Saw for Mr. Petrillo

By J. A. Livingston
(Business Analyst.)

WASHINGTON—James Caesar Petrillo, the son of a ditch-digger who learned to play first the trumpet and then union politics so that today he heads the American Federation of Musicians at a $46,000-a-year salary, has got himself far out on a limb. And Congressman Hartley (R-N. J.), co-author of the Taft-Hartley law, is sharpening his saw.

Hartley's house education and labor committee starts hearings Tuesday on what might be called "the Petrillo situation." Among the witnesses will be representatives of broadcasting networks, record manufacturers, radio manufacturers, television companies and, finally, Mr. Music, himself—Petrillo.

The question Hartley will try to find an answer to is this: Is further legislation to restrain Petrillo necessary? Do we have to make the Clayton and Sherman acts apply to labor unions? Hartley once tried to get such legislation through congress, failed. Now Petrillo may make it easy for him.

Threatens Broadcasting.

Already Petrillo has barred members of his union from: (1) making records; (2) making transcriptions, which can be played over the radio; (3) participating in television broadcasts—so you can't see Koussevitzky except in an auditorium; (4) participating in a regular (AM) broadcast which is relayed over an FM station; (5) participating in international pickups of musical programs, so that a U.S. network cannot engage, say, in an exchange arrangement with the British Broadcasting System.

And now Petrillo is threatening to pull all his "boys" out from network broadcasting altogether. Which means that the New York or Philadelphia symphony orchestras could play on one station and one station only at a time.

Petrillo's edicts have a common origin. He collects dues from live musicians. He can't fill his treasury from royalties from records. That's barred under the Taft-Hartley bill. And no longer will local radio stations maintain a standby crew of musicians as a "goodwill" gesture toward the union. The Taft-Hartley law bars such featherbedding.

Can Go Just So Far.

Petrillo probably won't go through with his threat to ban all network broadcasting. Too many customers. He can ban television; he can ban duplicate AM-FM broadcasts. That's because television and FM-listening public isn't large. But let him try to stop all music over the air—let him say nay to Spike Jones, Vaughn Monre, Tommy Dorsey, Duke Ellington or Guy Lombardo and then he'll run head-on into the millions of hepcats and their mamas and papas. Depriving a radio-minded nation of music would compare with stopping the railroads or not mining coal.

Mr. Music can do what he does because of the structure of his union. There are about 200,000 members. Of these, about 150,000 are part-time musicians—carpenters, bricklayers, lawyers, doctors, and others who like to play the piano, violin, or piccolo and pick up extra cash in the process. Their dues are a major source of Petrillo's salary, the car he drives, and other emoluments of union stewardship. Of the 50,000 full-time musicians, about 5,000—or 10 percent—are top flight, what the industry calls first-chair men.

The Little Fellows Count.

These 5,000 are in the name bands; they're the ones that get the call for network broadcasts, for performances in the first-rate night clubs, for jobs in musical shows. They're scarce, in demand, and they receive far higher pay than the average run-of-the-mill tune-monger. But they don't throw much voting weight around in Petrillo's union, and the dues Petrillo collects from them are but a fraction of what he gets from his less-talented, job-hungry members. So naturally Petrillo encounters economic pressure within his own union. When people listen to juke boxes or the radio, local players who can't get work complain of technological unemployment.

Petrillo's hold on the 5,000 first-chair musicians is his success. He has raised musicians' wages all over the nation. In Chicago, for instance, wages have gone up from $22 a week in 1922 to $75, $90 and above. Chicago union members were so delighted with this achievement that in 1938 they presented Petrillo a spacious home on Lake Geneva. It cost $25,000 then.

Consequently, no member of the AFM wants to lose his union card; bad times might come again. Therefore he won't play any place which Petrillo calls "unfair." Nor will a network, radio station, hotel or night club hire non-union talent and get on Petrillo's blacklist. That would mean it couldn't get AFM talent.

And no big bandleader, even though he can get all the assignments he now wants, dares risk being on the blacklist. In the first place, he wouldn't be able to recruit AFM musicians; in the second place, few hotels, night clubs, record manufacturers or radio companies would hire him, because they'd in turn court a blacklisting. So it makes a closed circle, entirely surrounded by Petrillo.

And that's what the procession of witnesses will point out to Hartley next week—the nature of Petrillo's power and its resemblance to a monopoly. Meanwhile, Petrillo and his attorneys undoubtedly will seek a way to get Petrillo off the limb—without losing too much face. The deadline is Jan. 31. It's then that the AFM contract with the broadcasting companies expires.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

JAN 12 1948

Symphony Has Fine Program This Evening

Tonight the New Haven Symphony Orchestra will welcome as its guest Conductor Paul Hindemith, world famous composer and Battell professor of the Theory of Music at Yale University.

Hindemith will be on the podium for the fourth concert of the New Haven Symphony which will be held in Woolsey Hall beginning at 8:30 P. M. Tickets for the musical event —one of the outstanding events of the season in this city—will go on sale at the Woolsey Hall box office beginning at 6 o'clock.

The program will feature also two selections being presented for the first time by the local symphonic group and the appearance of a Boston Symphony pianist to round out the orchestra.

The Overture to "Euryanthe" by Carle Maria von Weber will open the concert tonight. This is being restored to the New Haven Symphony repertory after an absence of several years.

One of the highlights of the program will be the presentation of "Theme and Variations: The Four Temperaments," which was written by Paul Hindemith. This composition was written in 1940 by the New Haven composer as a ballet for George Balanchine and Lincoln Kirstein for a Latin-American good will tour of the American Ballet. Its first stage performance was by the Ballet Society in New York in 1946.

Lukas Foss, pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will play the important piano part of Hindemith's work. Foss is one of the most promising of the younger pianists and is also a composer who is well known.

The other major work to be presented is the "Symphony No. 3 in D minor" by Anton Bruckner. This composition has a majestic theme which requires special conditions for effective presentation. Conductor Hindemith brings to this symphony an understanding and enthusiasm springing from years of familiarity with it.

Postlude Post 1/13/48

Bill of Boston Orchestra Wins Praise

By Paul Hume

If I could write my heart out as the Boston Symphony Orchestra played for its conductor genius last night, words would melt your hearts and bring tears to your eyes.

Koussevitzki

But journalistic words seldom have such power, nor can the effect of music be expressed in common speech. Simply know then, that the Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky played Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, Hindemith's Mathis der Maler, and Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony before a packed Constitution Hall.

President and Mrs. Truman and Margaret were in Box 13, to hail the mighty leader from Boston and they were indeed privileged, as was every other listener in that vast hall. Such music is seldom heard.

The Boston players' Prokofieff is without rival, in the wit and flawless facets of its sparkling humor. The symphony does not tire, nor its attractions lessen, even when we know from measure to measure what is to happen next.

Koussevitsky's Mathis was new to our ears, and a beauty surrounds it which we had not heard since the late Frederick Stock displayed its tonal tapestries before Chicago audiences a decade ago. A pace leisurely in conception and perfect in execution made its three parts the mirror for the altar paintings which are its inspiration.

But for many in the hall, the final revelation came with the sixth symphony of Tschaikowsky. How many times we have heard this, and yet with what renewed, what revealing majesty the patrician hand of Koussevitsky gave it to us again!

In total design the symphony overwhelmed the beholders, showing them again and again what they had forgotten or perhaps never known of its real beauties.

Here was playing of an order unique in a day of orchestral excellences, a day when such insight comes but once a year to Washington.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

[illegible] 1948

Carvalho Has 'Appeal'

Brazilian Conductor Gives Interview While Dining at the Sheraton

[illegible] Brazil- [illegible] Auditor- [illegible] Spring- [illegible] has [illegible] even [illegible] has Vic- [illegible] rippling [illegible] his head, [illegible] and re- [illegible]

[illegible] "Car-vayo" [illegible] we?) [illegible] country's [illegible]

The [illegible] to Spring- [illegible] with [illegible] stemming [illegible] Music Festival [illegible] countryman and [illegible] enjoyed [illegible] with an intimate little group in [illegible] before the concert. [illegible] when he spotted [illegible] Waitresses, but managed to recover admirably and tuck away a healthy meal.

"Supposing I tell you," said Carvalho, opening the interview and at the same time not missing a forkful in his attack on a large baked potato, "that I am happy to be here and I would like to send my congratulations to all who have helped give the Springfield Symphony Orchestra its assistance. It is a going symphony, eh? It is very easy for a city to let some other cities establish a symphony orchestra but Springfield people don't think this way and make their own symphony.

"They Are to Be Praised"

"Now," he continued, knifing with his right and conveying a steady stream of baked potato with his left. "I would like to say some words about the people of Springfield—not the people but the board of the symphony and the manager and the conductor and everybody. They are to be praised for what they have done."

"Your story will be in tomorrow morning, eh?" said Carvalho, and he switched into past tense to say that "I enjoyed the concert very much and am very happy to be here."

This, you will remember, was an hour or so prior to the concert, but critics' reviews probably bear out his past-tense prediction.

Carvalho went on to say that music can make a definite contribution to the life of a community, that "music can be something special."

"Natch," came a voice from across the table.

EL PASO, TEXAS
TIMES

Trumans Applaud Russian Classics

Washington. (UP) — President and Mrs. Truman and their daughter [illegible] joined in a tre- [illegible] Thursday night for the Boston Symphony's performance of two Russian classics.

[illegible] at Constitution Hall, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, featured Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony" and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique." Hindemith's symphonic "Mathis der Maler" rounded out the program.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

JAN 1[illegible] 1948

Hub Symphony Superlative

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Seldom of late has Koussevitzky been more in the vein. He conducted the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night like a man reborn and revitalized. The Bostonians were in top form, so the concert was superlative.

There were three symphonies: Prokofieff's "Classical," Hindemiths "Mathis der Maler," and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique." Two of these were Koussevitzy warhorses. The Hindemith is rapidly qualifying for the same distinction.

As many times as he has played the Prokofieff, this performance was the finest within memory. It effervesced with a heady kind of exuberance. It was as near perfection as one could imagine the music could be played. There is no more to say.

Played with Intensity

The Hindemith is on the way to being one of the "classic" contemporary works.

Set forth with much intensity last night, it apparently still sounded strange to the Boston Symphony audience. They received it politely instead of enthusiastically.

Yet it is a noble creation, more persuasive than most of Hindemith's works.

While he played the Tchaikovsky with loving care, Koussevitzky took it a shade faster than his customary pace. The result was an exceptionally communicative and thoroughly dynamic interpretation.

It revealed the Bostonians in their full glory and the music in its most compelling power.

This was a truly inspiring evening, one of magnificent performances.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

JAN 15 1948

Music

Koussevitzky Conducts Boston Symphony Concert

By JOHN BRIGGS

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared in Carnegie Hall last evening in a program calculated to reveal the best features of both orchestra and conductor.

There was, to begin with, the "Classical" Symphony of Prokofieff, done gracefully and with light-fingered dexterity by the Bostonians. Every note in the score asserts that the Prokofieff is a bit of good clean fun and not to be taken too seriously. It was performed in precisely that spirit, with the happiest of results. Charm is not an attribute generally associated with a modern symphony orchestra, most of which run to power and grandeur; but the Bostonians demonstrated last evening, as on other occasions, that when the mood is upon them they can disseminate the admirable intangible of charm as well. It was a performance full of innocent delight.

Hindemith's "Mathis der Mahler," which came next, was another story. It is an earnest work of gigantic proportions, thoroughly over-scored, and in its untamed state capable of an almost unendurable assault on listeners' eardrums. I have felt at performances of this strident piece as if the top of my head were coming off. But last night's was happily not one of them. The finicky Boston maestro, and the artists under his baton, who seemingly cannot endure to play otherwise than beautifully, transformed the rude energy of "Mathis" into something more suggestive of musical performance, and, if they did not make it altogether suave, at least blunted the wire edge of its instrumentation.

As for the Bostonians' performance of Tchaikovsky in B Minor, it is definitive. It does not search the score for nonexistent cerebral values, but takes Tchaikovsky at his musical word. Last evening the woodwinds mooed with admirable pathos, the strings shimmered, the brass fanfares were melodramatic. The orchestra soared to the heights of Tchaikovskian rapture, plummeted to the depths of Tchaikovskian despair, then died away in silence. It was great sport.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 15 1948

Music

Boston Symphony Here With Polished Program

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Trailing clouds of glowing tone, the Boston Symphony Orchestra hit town again last night for its second seasonal program at Carnegie Hall.

With Serge Koussevitzky conducting, the visiting band turned on its full power in a three-symphony program featuring Paul Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler."

The Hindemith score was sandwiched in between two Russian symphonies—Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic," both Koussevitzky specials.

Divergent Styles.

While the selections represented widely divergent styles, there was one theme-song that knit all three together last night—the polish and glint of Mr. Koussevitzky's orchestra.

For, though some of Mr. Koussevitzky's program makes small news on the side of content, the big news is always the clear, fastidious sounds conjured up from all corners of the band.

Last night, the trend in volume was steadily upward, with the Tschaikowsky symphony representing that combination of warmth and sonority that is Mr. Koussevitzky's artistic way of life.

Fastidious Touch.

Yet, for pure finish the Prokofieff symphony carried off first honors. This score is tailor-made for the Boston unit.

Mr. Koussevitzky assumes that the crowd can never tire of the "Classical" Symphony. Certainly he never does, considering the number of times he runs it off.

And maybe it's a good thing having the Prokofieff score around so often. For one thing, it is a reminder of supreme workmanship; for another, it keeps a superlative reading before the public as a sort of standard.

By now, nobody bothers whether the symphony is "classical," pseudo-classical, or just plain Prokofieff. It is good music in any language—which is the only thing that counts.

A New Hindemith.

The Hindemith symphony—assembled from three excerpts from the "Mathis der Maler" opera—is now a dozen years old, with signs of many more years to go before folding up.

And the reason is that Hindemith has packed more than just science and abstract logic into this score. Each movement teems with feeling, and at times the music blazes with real passion.

This was a new Hindemith when the score was first heard here in 1934—and since then the modernist master has generally let more warmth into his symphonic music. It makes easier listening.

Mr. Koussevitzky seemed just as much at home in the Hindemith symphony as he did among Prokofieff's lacy delicacies and Tschaikowsky's shrieking forecasts of death.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 15 1948

BOSTONIANS PLAY HINDEMITH WORK

Koussevitzky Offers 'Mathis der Maler' With Prokofieff, Tchaikovsky Symphonies

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

There is no longer much argument about Prokofieff's Classical Symphony or Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler," or at least there should not be. Both works seem to have won their way into the repertory. When Serge Koussevitzky coupled them with Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony in last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall he was probably presenting them as a matter of course, as one would any works that had established their right to belong.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who is not averse to fighting hard for new scores in which he believes, does an equally important service when he programs contemporary works in the routine way one would schedule any staple of the repertory. However, if the scheduling was without fanfare, the performances last night were anything but routine.

The Hindemith Symphony, the more difficult and ponderable of the two scores, was played with a spaciousness and impact worthy of its subject. This work, written in 1934, may turn out to be one of Hindemith's best; in it matter and manner have been matched perfectly. The composer seems to catch the emotional flavor of an era long past and at the same time to reflect upon it illuminatingly from a modern vantage point.

The performance by the Bostonians had dignity and breadth of line without losing the sense of pathos that underlies the music. Conductor and musicians, never in better form, gave the work color, stride and power. The brass section in particular distinguished itself, but on the whole it was an outstanding job of team-work.

The Prokofieff Symphony, a gay, charming work written more than thirty years ago, was done with lightness, precision and clarity, qualities it needs to shine forth at its best. As for the Tchaikovsky Symphony, its interpretation by Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra is so familiar in its virtuosity and passion that nothing further need be added.

Boston ra raise

Hume
my heart out phony Orchestra
nductor genius would melt your

Koussevitzki
Koussevitsky,
Classical Sym-
Mathis der owsky's Pa-fore a packed

Truman, and x 13, to hail from Boston,
d privileged,
tener in that ic is seldom

s' Prokofieff
the wit and ts sparkling ny does not tions lessen, rom measure to happen

his was new beauty sur-ad not heard ck Stock disstries before decade ago.
conception cution made irror for the are its in-the hall, the with the sixth owsky. How heard this, enewed, what he patrician gave it to e symphony lders, show-again what or perhaps eal beauties.

of an order rchestral ex-en such ina year to [60]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
JAN 15 1948

The Music Makers

By IRVING KOLODIN

A Three-symphony Program by Koussevitzky.

A program of three symphonies is a thing a conductor feels called upon to offer at least once a season, perhaps by some unwritten law of the fraternity. Serge Koussevitzky's ingenious approach to the problem last night with the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall followed one which was virtually an overture (Prokofiev's "Classical"), with another which was in effect a tone poem (Hindemith's "Mathis der Mahler") as prelude to the conventional kind (Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic") at the end.

Since the Prokofiev and Tchaikovsky works are more than merely house specialties of the maestro and his men, the musical interest of the evening centered in the playing of the Hindemith. The accepted view that this is one of the most expressive works of Hindemith was not dimmed by the forceful, brilliantly colored replica that Koussevitzky presented. Indeed, the light, luminous patina of the playing made it, if anything, more pictorial than at most times.

It would be instructive, on some occasion, if a conductor were to offer this work on the same program with Hindemith's "St. Francis." It is the conviction here that the ballet score is a more compact (and emotional) statement of much the same impulses. Regardless of superiority, it is plain enough that Hindemith has worked with skill, tact and sensibility in both. The juxtaposition would be worth the performing effort.

One could scarcely avoid the impression that the slight sonorities of the Prokofiev, which began the evening, rather effectively determined the scale of what followed. There was a kind of chamber music precision and balance to its playing which is rarely heard when a full orchestra is working. It was most exquisitely perfect, and also a bit desiccated, as if the humor Prokofiev wrote into the piece had been deemed unworthy of so many learned men's valuable time. However, there was nothing but virtue in the Tchaikovsky.

Dorothy Minty Plays Dohnanyi Sonata

An unusually high-minded program, performed on a high plane of excellence, placed last night's Town Hall recital by Dorothy Minty among the notable events of the season. It is a rare feat for a young artist to win an audience with a program of three large, uncompromising works, and nothing else. However, the genuine demonstration accorded the violinist by the sizable audience was every bit deserved, for Miss Minty is a violinist of stature.

Dohnanyi's (Opus 21) Sonata opened the program: a warm-blooded work so like Brahms (good Brahms, though) as to cause some wonderment. Miss Minty's tone was small and sweet, her phrasing and her attacks clean and accurate. Here, as elsewhere, special mention must be made of the sensitive, beautifully shaded accompaniments of Brooks Smith. The Hindemith Violin Concerto, heard last season at a Boston Symphony concert, paled, as many do, in its violin-piano setting, but remained a fluent creation, with a slow movement of somber beauty. Miss Minty's conception wanted vigor at times, but was set forth with remarkable technic and secure understanding.

Following the intermission, Chausson's Concerto for Violin, Piano and String Quartet provided a climax of fine ensemble work. Opportunities for display are few here, and Miss Minty and her accompanist wove their patterns consistently into the background adroitly provided by the Galimir Quartet. The result was a texture of notable smoothness. The concerto, old-fashioned and heavily brocaded, had a lovely sound. That Miss Minty dared to amass a program so musical yet so uncommon speaks well for her honesty and purpose; that she carried the evening with such brilliant success speaks amply for her talent.

ALLAN RICH.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

Superbly Played Program Presented by Koussevitzky

By Alice Eversman

Headed by President Truman and his family in the official box, a special and distinguished audience turned out last night for the annual appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Constitution Hall. This sole visit of the famous group is not enough to accommodate all who wish to hear it. The house had been sold out for many weeks, which would indicate that C. C. Cappel, under whose auspices the orchestra is presented here, could fill the hall for several yearly concerts if the symphony's schedule permitted. It could have no more appreciative or absorbed audience than that which listened to a superbly played program under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

The conductor was never in better form. The three works that comprised the program — Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" and Tschaikowsky's "Symphony No. 6"—offered the right challenge to his interpretive powers. There was not a moment without tense drama or ravishing loveliness in his readings or, in more material terms, any occasion when his technical grasp of their delivery was not arresting. He has created a different tonal quality to that of other symphonic groups, one more evenly blended and more compact. With it he can do amazing things, for it is extremely flexible in a continual undulation of sound very necessary for the particular effects he seeks.

The different sections of the orchestra step into the picture at the appropriate moment and fade out for the prominence of another group. This creates not only flashing tonal colors but a passing prismatic display. When combined with his knowledge of dynamics, his structural sense, the poise that keeps an even spacing of the themes, never hurrying one on top of the other, and, above all, his dramatic vision, there is formed a splendid interpretive medium.

Its applicability was disclosed in the three works. Of these the well-filled score of Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler" was the less familiar, although it has been performed twice by the National Symphony. It offers problems in execution as well as in interpretation and Dr. Koussevitzky's delivery was majestic with every detail carefully wrought. It lacked somewhat the spiritual illumination that lighthens the weight of its musical material and gives its own emotional substance to each of the movements. But for sheer mastery of delineation and conception of the descriptive puissance of the orchestral tone, it was a magnificent performance. Its clarity, finesse and sculptured form was impressive.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

See Brazilian as Conductor

May Succeed Rodzinski

Eleazar De Carvalho, 32 year old Brazilian composer and conductor, may be the successor to Dr. Artur Rodzinski as conductor of the Chicago symphony orchestra, according to reports from Boston.

De Carvalho will conduct the orchestra in its Milwaukee concert Feb. 16 and will be at the helm in Chicago concerts Feb. 10, 12 and 13. He will come from Boston, where his work as a conductor has won high praise, on the invitation of the Chicago Orchestral association's board of directors.

Comment from Boston is that no conductor would be asked to fulfill as many as four engagements unless there was some understanding with the management. At the moment, De Carvalho is in New York. He has not commented on the possibility of a post in Chicago.

The young Brazilian has the advantage of being a protege of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony. His recent appearances with that orchestra—all with Koussevitzky's blessing—won the plaudits of Boston critics and the public.

De Carvalho is the composer of the opera, "The Discovery of Brasil." He became interested in music when he started tuba practice between watches as a young seaman in the Brazilian naval corps.

Dr. Rodzinski was discharged from his post with the Chicago orchestra last Tuesday. The dismissal will take effect after the current season. De Carvalho's engagement had been announced before that.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

JAN 16 1948

Brazilian Conductor May Get Top Position

ELEAZAR DE CARVALHO

BRAZILIAN SAID CONSIDERED FOR RODZINSKI'S JOB

Eleazar De Carvalho May Head Chicago Symphony; Was Guest Here Tues. Night

Boston, Jan. 16—Published but unconfirmed reports here today were that Eleazar de Carvalho, 32, brilliant Brazilian maestro, might succeed ousted Artur Rodzinski as conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra.

De Carvalho will guest-conduct the Chicago Orchestra Feb. 10, 12, 13, and 16, and the reports were that the trustees already had discussed him as a possible permanent conductor.

On Tuesday evening of this week, De Carvalho was introduced to Springfield audiences from the platform of the Auditorium by the conductor of the Springfield Symphony Orchestra, Alexander Leslie. The two met in Tanglewood last summer, and at that time the Brazilian conductor was invited to hear a performance by the local orchestra. This had been his first opportunity to accept.

Mr. Leslie called him, "One of the most popular conductors in South America," and added, "and one of the most popular in North America, also."

A former sailor in the Brazilian navy, De Carvalho reportedly is regarded as a "conducting genius" by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. De Carvalho was a pupil at the Tanglewood School of Conducting in the Berkshires last summer and appeared as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony in December.

Before coming to the United States, De Carvalho conducted opera at the Teatro Municipal in Sao Paulo and led the Brazilian Symphony Orchestra.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST JA

Postlude

Bill of Boston Orchestra Wins Praise

By Paul Hume

If I could write my heart out as the Boston Symphony Orchestra played for its conductor genius last night, words would melt your hearts and bring tears to your eyes.

Koussevitzki

But journalistic words seldom have such power, nor can the effect of music be expressed in common speech. Simply know then, that the Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitsky, played Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, Hindemith's Mathis der Maler, and Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony before a packed Constitution Hall.

President and Mrs. Truman, and Margaret were in Box 13, to hail the mighty leader from Boston, and they were indeed privileged, as was every other listener in that vast hall. Such music is seldom heard.

The Boston players' Prokofieff is without rival, in the wit and flawless facets of its sparkling humor. The symphony does not tire, nor its attractions lessen, even when we know from measure to measure what is to happen next.

Koussevitsky's Mathis was new to our ears, and a beauty surrounds it which we had not heard since the late Frederick Stock displayed its tonal tapestries before Chicago audiences a decade ago. A pace leisurely in conception and perfect in execution made its three parts the mirror for the altar paintings which are its inspiration.

But for many in the hall, the final revelation came with the sixth symphony of Tschaikowsky. How many times we have heard this, and yet with what renewed, what revealing majesty the patrician hand of Koussevitsky gave it to us again!

In total design the symphony overwhelmed the beholders, showing them again and again what they had forgotten or perhaps never known of its real beauties. Here was playing of an order unique in a day of orchestral excellences, a day when such insight comes but once a year to Washington.

Brazilian Conductor

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This week's symphony concerts are offering something new in the line of conductors. Filling Dr. Koussevitzky's shoes through the rest of this month is a young protégé of his from Brazil, Eleazar de Carvalho. Having won his spurs as assistant conductor of the Brazilian Symphony Orchestra of Rio [illegible], Mr. de Carvalho came [illegible] the summer of 1946 with a clear goal in mind: [illegible] conduct either the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra or the Philharmonic Symphony of New York.

On the advice of friends, the [illegible]-year-old leader betook himself to Tanglewood where he joined Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting class. Last summer he was Dr. Koussevitzky's assistant and now his ambition to direct one of the major North American orchestras has been fulfilled. Mr. de Carvalho's actual debut took place Tuesday evening at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge and since the second half of the Symphony's Tuesday evening concerts goes on the air, he immediately addressed himself to the great radio audience, conducting for it the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz. This work will be repeated at the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening and preceded by the String Symphony of William Schuman and the Chamber Symphony for 15 instruments by Schoenberg.

On his father's side Mr. de Carvalho inherits Dutch blood and on his mother's pure Brazilian Indian. His parents were poor farm laborers, and until the age of 10 he worked with them in the torrid northwestern interior of Brazil, where he was born. He then moved to the seacoast and, for the first time in his life, went to school, or rather to schools, since he was repeatedly expelled. At the age of 14 he entered a school for apprentice seamen, and at the same time started his musical career by playing the double bass in the school band. Eventually he entered the Brazilian navy, from which he was discharged in 1936. He then studied dentistry for three years, but gave that up to devote himself entirely to music. He has composed operas, symphonic works and chamber music. Though he has a golden opportunity to present himself to us as composer he has declined to take advantage of it but will present next week works by his countrymen, Guanieri and Villa-Lobos. In appearance Mr. de Carvalho is short and stocky, and because of his Indian blood, dark of skin. When he arrived here he spoke no English, and he is not exactly fluent in it yet. But he can convey his intentions to the men of the orchestra and that is what matters. And he follows the prevailing practice of conducting without a score.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Three works make the current Symphony program, one of them [illegible] new, one still little known and the third about as well known as anything in the current repertory. The new piece is the Third Symphony of Walter Piston, one of the many works commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and dedicated to the memory of Natalie Koussevitzky, in whose name the foundation was established. Receiving its third presentation in Boston, or at least its third pair of performances here with orchestra, is the First Violin Concerto of Prokofieff, with Isaac Stern making his Symphony Hall debut as the soloist. (He had already been heard here in a Jordan Hall recital.) Dr. Koussevitzky probably decided that after so much that was neither new or unfamiliar, the audiences of yesterday afternoon and this evening would welcome the Second Symphony of Brahms, a work without which no season would be complete.

[illegible] that is admirable [illegible] Mr. Piston's new Symphony, [illegible] lofty in conception [illegible] hardly necessary [illegible] wrought. Mr. [illegible] attained mastery [illegible] and of orchestral [illegible] contemporary [illegible] their business [illegible]. However, [illegible] to state as a pure[illegible] that the new [illegible] was un[illegible] measurably [illegible] desirable qualities, [illegible] and a style im[illegible] as its au[illegible] first hearing I was [illegible] by the [illegible] section of [illegible] close. [illegible] conducted [illegible] customary devotion [illegible] brought the [illegible] after which [illegible] more than [illegible] Concerto, [illegible] popularity [illegible] of the com[illegible] it is wholly [illegible] individual. [illegible] other concertos in [illegible] is less showy [illegible]. In fact, it took [illegible] on the composer's part to [illegible] so quiet a conclusion. If the audience was let down by this anti-climactic finish it speedily recovered [illegible] and heaped upon young Mr. [illegible] applause that he so richly [illegible] and technically [illegible] already discovered, [illegible] was born in Russia [illegible] brought up in San Fran[illegible] well equipped beyond the

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 17 1948

MAY SUCCEED RODZINSKI

Koussevitzky Protege, Eleazar de Carvalho, Is Candidate

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Jan. 16—Music sources here expressed belief today that Eleazar de Carvalho, Brazilian protégé of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, would be the next conductor of the Chicago Symphony. Mr. de Carvalho will be guest conductor in Chicago on Feb. 10, 12 and 13. Dr. Artur Rodzinski was dismissed as Chicago conductor this week.

Mr. de Carvalho, a former merchant seaman who gained fame as a composer and conductor in his own country, attracted Dr. Koussevitzky's attention at the Tanglewood School in the Berkshires last summer. He received laudatory notices when he conducted the Boston Orchestra in December.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The new year was treated to an auspicious musical start yesterday afternoon when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through one of the most varied programs heard in Symphony Hall in many a day. It has been rare enough lately to have any vocal work on a week end symphony program. Yesterday we had three in a row, with Marina Koshetz, soprano, soloist in all three.

Miss Koshetz made her first appearance in Nabokov's "The Return of Pushkin," an Elegy in three parts for high voice and orchestra. This work, dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, and heard here for the first time, would be a difficult assignment for any singer. Young Miss Koshetz sang with style and imagination and, after warming up a bit, with good vocal command. Her middle voice was mellow and colorful and in the latter part of the program her top voice lost the tight quality in evidence during this first work.

Much advance interest had been expressed in Miss Koshetz, partly because she is the daughter of the well known soprano, Nina Koshetz, and partly because of her roles with the Centre Opera in New York. Of interest was the fact that she had previously sung here at the Copley Plaza, and the musical distance between the Oval Room and the stage of Symphony Hall is a great one. Few musicians make it.

After the Elegy, Dr. Koussevitzky gave Debussy's "La Damoiselle Elue," which follows Rosetti's poem, "The Blessed Damosel."

Miss Koshetz sang the part of the Damozel with Miss Eunice Alberts singing the contralto role of the narrator. The Wellesley College choir sang the stanzas for chorus with a delicacy of tone most appropriate to the gossamer Debussy score. Here again, unusual interest was expressed in the soloists for Miss Alberts is also the daughter of a famous mother, Adele Alberts, who sang several times with the symphony. Both young artists performed with evident feeling for the dramatic line of the text.

Miss Koshetz really came into her own with the "Air of Tatiana" from Tchaikovsky's "Eugene Oneigin." The climatic last part of the aria was somewhat lost because the soprano's voice was not large enough to be heard over the sonorous orchestral background, although it would take a voice of unusual size to be heard clearly over the amount of volume produced by the orchestra at this point yesterday. What Miss Koshetz lacked in volume she made up in charm, enthusiasm and sincerity and her impression on the audience was distinctly favorable.

After all the vocal performances, Dr. Koussevitzky ended the concert with Tchaikovsky's orchestral fantasy, "Francesca da Rimini." This is a virtuose tour de force at any time. Since the doctor is a specialist at virtuosity and especially virtuose Tchaikovsky, it made one of the most brilliant endings ever heard on a Friday afternoon. The audience loved it.

BOSTONIANS PLAY NABOKOV NUMBER

Koussevitzky Leads Premiere of 'The Return of Pushkin'—Marina Koshetz Soloist

By OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky, gave the first performance of Nicolas Nabokov's score for soprano and orchestra, "The Return of Pushkin," at its concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The soprano was Marina Koshetz, daughter of Nina Koshetz. The composition, thoroughly in the "modern" vein, is the autobiographical verse of Pushkin, exiled to the Crimea in the early Eighteen Thirties, and later returned to the scenes of his early days.

The verses are set in three parts, in as many different tempi, and with musical inter-relationships between the different movements. At first one was a little repelled by the harmonic scheme as well as by the often unvocal character of the writing. There are "derivations" in the music, some of them obviously Stravinskian of origin. But a young composer will inevitably be some years in finding his personal idiom. It was soon clear that Mr. Nabokov, who long since had learned how to write effectively for the instruments and also for the stage, had his artistic objective clearly in his mind and in his hand.

He has not sought the quotation of Russian folk-songs to suggest the poet's return to his soil. Nor has he—the composer—sought to be historical or archaeological in his idioms. In other words, Mr. Nabokov has written as a young musician of our day, with a perhaps studied avoidance of anything that might give the impression of being old home stuff and an equally solicitous avoidance of what might threaten to be too obvious. At the same time, he has tried to say, simply and in an unadorned manner, some of the things that Pushkin apparently had said in his native verse.

Music of True Tenderness

The composer has fit his text more closely to the original Russian than sometimes was apparent. But the orchestra, too, is there to tell the tale. Between the nostalgic melancholy of the slow movement and the music of true tenderness and introspection which makes the final section, the listener is moved; he admires more the craftsmanship and the expressive genius which brought this forth.

Of Miss Koshetz' singing we had a poorer opinion than we had of the verse and music. The concert proceeded with what must have been balm of Gilead to ears troubled by Mr. Nabokov's dissonances. It was the very early, very obvious—if you like—"La Damoiselle Elue" of Debussy. Immature! In places unoriginal—yes! But there is something in an early work of genius which cannot possibly be imitated, and is precious beyond measure. That is the bloom of its tenderness and untarnished fancy. The opening measures of the orchestra, alone, would set the key and betoken the arrival of new genius. Here the instruments utter their prayer to beauty.

Decisive Contrasts

The harmonic planes, so clearly and yet decisively contrasted, glow with a beauty which is like that of a stained glass or a medieval tapestry. The coloring is so exquisite and so sensitive that not only are the instruments put next to or in the most striking contrast to each other on the composer's palette, but the orchestral backgrounds set off, in most astonishing fashion, the textures of the voices.

The performance of the orchestra was priceless in respect to translucency and texture of tone. Miss Koshetz was joined by Eunice Alberts, contralto, in this performance. The choral parts were carried by the Wellesley College Choir, of which Margaret Winkler is director. Greatly are Dr. Koussevitzky and his forces to be thanked for bringing us this youthful and inimitable music of Debussy.

In the second half of the program Miss Koshetz sang the "Letter Scene" from Tchaikovsky's "Eugene Onegin," and the orchestra played the lurid score in a manner that elicited particular applause.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
JAN 26 [illegible]

Critic's Notebook:

Bostonians And Maestro in Carnegie Hall

By Virgil Thomson.

NEW YORK, Jan. 25.—An elegy in three movements for voice and orchestra, entitled "The Return of Pushkin," by Nicholas Nabokoff, was the chief news item of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. There was also, however, as further novelty, a whole recital (practically speaking) by Marina Koshetz, soprano; some pretty singing by the Wellesley College Choir and the New York debut (so far as this reporter's knowledge goes) of a whopping good Boston contralto, Eunice Alberts.

Of no news interest whatsoever, and very little musical, was Serge Koussevitzky's rendering, at the end, of Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini." Miss Koshetz's recital had begun with the Nabokoff piece, gone on through Debussy's cantata "La Demoiselle Elue" (Rosetti's "Blessed Damosel") and the whole Letter Scene from Tchaikovsky's "Eugene Onegin."

Nakoboff's work is an evocation of Pushkin's return in 1835 to the country estate where some ten years before he had suffered a two-year exile. The text, in Russian, is Pushkin's poem on the subject. The music is nostalgic and poetic, serene for the most part and phychologically, rather than geographically, atmospheric. His tone is elevated, its composition elegant. Neo-Romanticism is its school.

Miss Koshetz, who sang the vocal part in Nabokoff's elegy, has a pleasant lyric voice that may well develop into a dramatic soprano later. Just now it is weak at the bottom and buzzy at the top. Certainly she was beyond her range, both ends of it, in the Tchaikovsky aria.

She sang the piece with dramatic style, however; and she has that instinct for brilliance of tone characteristic of old-style Russian opera singers, of whom her mother, Nina Koshetz, was so striking an example. Miss Koshetz has high possibilities as an artist, but she is not yet quite mature, either vocally or technically.

Eunice Alberts, who sang the contralto solo part in Debussy's "Demoisells Elue" (Miss Koshetz did the role of the Damosel), revealed a voice of great power, warmth and beauty. Her vocal training and musical style, judged from one hearing, are without flaw. It is hoped we may hear her again soon and often. The Wellesley Choir sang charmingly, too, as prettily, indeed, as your reporter has heard any ladies' chorus do in some years.

Mr. Koussevitzky conducted all afternoon long, save in the "Eugene Onegin" aria, as badly as one has heard him do in as long a time. In the Nabokoff piece he produced some strangely unconvincing balances, and at least once he lost the beat entirely. In the final "Francesca da Rimini" he gave often no beat at all, messing up thus several wood-wind entrances and all the pizzicati chords.

Everywhere he forced the brass in the tuttis, allowed the trumpets to scream and the trombones to bray. All the readings, excepting that of "Eugene Onegin" aria, were without buoyancy, desultory and lacking in trajectory, in forward movement, in confidence.

The orchestra did what it could to keep the music from dying in its tracks, succeeded not badly up to "Francesca da Rimini." Here there was nothing to do but let the good Doctor, in his first solo work of the afternoon, have himself a time. If one's eyes are to be believed, he experienced a deep enjoyment of the piece. From auditory evidence there was cause to wonder if he were not perhaps merely transported and not listening at all.

(Copyright, 1948, by the New York Tribune, Inc.)

BOSTON HERALD, SAT

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 12th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The soloist was Isaac Stern, violinist. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 3 .... Piston
Violin Concerto No. 1 Op. 19 .... Prokofieff
Symphony No. 2 in D major
Op. 73 .... Brahms

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The sensation of yesterday afternoon's exceptionally rewarding concert was the Prokofieff First Violin Concerto, unheard here since 1935, and Mr. Isaac Stern's breath-taking performance of it. The score is ferociously difficult, abounding in technical hurdles of the most alarming description. Yet Mr. Stern not only made light of these but even contrived to seem to forget them in the interest of the music itself. Nor is the orchestral part at all easy to synchronize with the solo role. Here Mr. Koussevitzky's talent entered; and the result was a superb and memorable performance.

Prokofieff's First Violin Concerto will never be as popular as his Second, which is more ingratiating as to style and more conventional as to form. But that is no reason to neglect the First, for at certain points it surpasses the other in imagination and it is certainly more original. Surely there is no other violin concerto which opens and ends with a moderately slow movement and practically confines the violinist's opportunity for display to the scherzo, while at the same time requiring him to play almost without pause. In the finale he is hardly given time to put on the sordino.

While the scherzo is the most brilliant and the most typically Prokofieff, recognizably stamped with his personality, there are pages both in the first and final movements which are of extraordinary inspiration. I refer to the closing pages of both, where the composer has woven an enchanting web of sound through which the solo violin is just perceptibly stirring. It is a fascinating effect. In fact, the entire Concerto is remarkable; and we owe a considerable debt to Mr. Stern for choosing it to play here. Though it is not at all the ovation type of concerto Mr. Stern was nonetheless warmly applauded.

Walter Piston our most distinguished local composer and equally one of the first in America, was present to acknowledge the applause for the first performance of his Third Symphony. It is an impressive work, the best score by an American we have heard here since Copland's Third. By far the most attractive movement, if not the most original, is the finale, the vigorous impulse of which sweeps the listener off his feet.

The other movement also easily grasped at a first hearing is the scherzo. Piston never writes an ineffective scherzo and this is one of his best. The opening prelude and the adagio are intellectually interesting, but they are more difficult to follow. I never felt that Mr. Piston was as completely at home, inspired if you like, in his slow movements. At any rate the new Symphony is a worthy addition to the not over-long list of first-rate American works on a large scale.

A stirring and dramatic interpretation of Brahms' Second Symphony brought this highly satisfactory program to an end. It was sociologically interesting to note that a good many in the audience left at intermission. Can it be that the day of Brahms' overwhelming popularity is waning?

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be out of town. For the concerts of Jan. 23 and 24 Leonard Bernstein will conduct Beethoven's Symphony No. 2, David Diamond's Symphony No. 4 and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 17 1948

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard at Academy of Music

By JOHN BALL Jr.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared last night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music playing its second subscription concert of the current season. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The soloist of the evening was Marina Koshetz, soprano.

The program for the evening was all Russian, which is another way of saying that it was right up Dr. Koussevitzky's alley. He opened his program with Sergė Prokofieff's "Classical Symphony," which has been a Boston Symphony Orchestra standby for several years. As usual, the performance was spotless.

Marina Koshetz, the soloist of the evening, was next introduced to sing "The Return of Pushkin," by Nikolai Nabokov. This contemporary work proved to be a vocally difficult but interesting piece of composition, somewhat overshadowed by DeBussy, whose style it resembles in structure.

We divide most new music, heard for the first time, into those pieces which we want to hear again several times, those which we wish to hear again, and those which we wish to hear again but in no great rush. This score is one which we desire to rehear and in the reasonably near future.

Marina Koshetz is an excellent illustration of what can be done with fairly slender vocal resources when they are intelligently developed and used to the best advantage. Miss Koshetz displayed remarkably good judgment in the selection of her mother who is none other than the reknowned Nina Koshetz. Nina Koshetz is a magic name to many.

Madame Koshetz' daughter is gifted with intelligence and some voice. Together, mother and daughter set out to make of the voice what they could. They did not have a great vocal gift with which to work, which is all the more credit to them for what they accomplished. Singing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a major assignment; Miss Kosehtz took the stage like a veteran and sang as though she had been there a hundred times before (actually it was her New York orchestral debut).

We admired both her manner and her singing intelligence. Our attention, we admit, wandered slightly when we made the happy discovery that, in the audience, following every note intensely, was Nina Koshetz herself, there to hear her daughter sing.

After intermission Miss Koshetz joined Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra in the "Letter Scene" from Tchaikovsky's opera "Eugene Onegin." (This same 'Letter Scene' served, not too many years ago, to introduce Nina Koshetz and was the number which she chose to close, we hope temporarily, her own singing career).

The concert concluded with Tchaikovsky's "Francesca Da Rimini." Once again the orchestra and its conductor were in their element, to which no further comment need be applied.

We cannot help adding the observation that while on diplomatic and propaganda levels the United States and Russia are exploring their differences, in the concert halls the music of the two nations seems to be working to the opposite end.

With no admiration for the Russian economic system to be inferred, we cannot help, but hope that the music may yet win out in the end and become a means for mutual understanding. Once that has been established, the rest of the job becomes a far easier task to accomplish.

Koussevitzky Will Be Guest For Juilliard

Jan 18

Boston Leader Directs School Forces May 9 in Last of 3 Concerts

The chorus and orchestra of the Juilliard School of Music will give three concerts this season at Carnegie Hall. In the third and last of these, on Sunday night, May 9, Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the guest conductor in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

In the first concert, on Sunday night, Feb. 22, Edgar Schenkman, head of the school's orchestra department, will conduct David Diamond's Fourth Symphony, which Leonard Bernstein and the Boston Symphony will introduce to Boston and Cambridge this week. This will be its first New York performance. Igor Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements, which was introduced by the Philharmonic-Symphony on Jan. 25, 1946, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony complete the program. In the second concert, whose date is not yet announced, Robert Shaw, the school's director of choral music, will present Bach's St. John Passion in full. He will also train the chorus for the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony under Dr. Koussevitzky.

The series is given with the cooperation of Local 802 of the American Federation of Musicians. The proceeds will go to the school's student aid fund. Tickets will be sold in advance only by subscription for the three concerts; these may be obtained by writing to the Concert Office, Juilliard School of Music, 120 Claremont Avenue, New York 27.

Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N. Y.

JAN 17 1948

The New Recordings

COMPOSITION, PERFORMER, ALBUM NUMBER, NUMBER OF RECORDS	ENGINEERING		PERFORMANCE AND CONTENT
	Recording Technique	Surface
COUPERIN, MARIN MARAIS, SUITES FOR VIOLA DA GAMBA AND HARPSICHORD. Alfred Zighera, gamba; Putnam Aldrich, harpsichord. Technichord T-9 (5 10")	An extended range, but noise in shellac spoils it. Data furnished states turnover is at 1,000 (unusually high). This shld. be on vinylite—much of music is soft, needs quiet surface.	B to B+	Rarely heard, first-rate music, played with complex ornaments done right. Gamba sounds hoarse, ineffective at first, grows on rehearing. This an authentic "original" performance, reasonably inspired.
PIANO MUSIC
BEETHOVEN - LISZT, ADELAIDE, OPUS 108. Egon Petri, piano. Columbia 72163-D (1)	Victor and Columbia currently treat the piano quite differently. Victor's is concert-hall style, brilliant, live, even tinny. Soft spots inaudible, big climaxes. Col. piano is suave, close-to, studio-like, fine bass, better surfaces.	A	A stylistic monstrosity—the unabashed Liszt mixed with simplicity and honesty of Beethoven! Not a happy idea.
SCHUMANN, AUFSCHWUNG, LISZT, UN SOSPIRO. Ania Dorfmann, piano. Victor 11-9672 (1)		B+	An unsympathetic, hurried performance of Schumann, "expressive" in the wrong places. Liszt is mostly arpeggios.
SCHUBERT, IMPROMPTU IN G, OP. 90, 3; WALTZES. Laryla Jonas. Columbia 72047-D (1)	Again a smooth, suave, quiet-surfaced record, studio style, but remarkably clear.	A	Neat Schubert playing, if not profound. Strange rubati in the waltzes.
DE FALLA, EL AMOR BRUJO: RITUAL FIRE DANCE, DANCE OF TERROR. Artur Rubinstein. Victor 10-1326 (1 10")	This one very loud (due to music, as well as pianist!) Good: Victor's loud piano is best.	A—	Clean, dry, percussive pianism in the Rubinstein way. Good show—this is his meat.
SCHUMANN-BRAHMS-LISZT, played by Artur Rubinstein. Victor M 1149 (3)	A strange album, most of it recorded so faintly that music drowns in surface noise.	B to A—	Rubinstein is not at home in Schumann and Brahms, esp. Brahms. His is too much the outward performance. Liszt is OK!
SCHUMANN, ARABESQUE, OPUS 18. José Iturbi, piano. Victor 10-1325 (1 10")	Louder, nearer-to than the 12" Victor piano records. Some percussive peaks.	B+	Brash piano, but seems close to Schumann spirit, in spite of it. Not bad. (But hardly tops.)
SYMPHONIC MUSIC
FILTZ, SYMPHONY IN E FLAT. Boyd Neel String Orch, Neel. Decca London K 1680 (1)	This string group recorded somewhat less live and echoful than bigger FFRR's—and is the better for it.	A	Mozart-like music. Filtz was one of pre-Mozart "Mannheim"-style composers who developed symphony orch., the "Mozart" style. This is delightful, if not up to Mozart.
BEETHOVEN, SYMPHONY #3 ("EROICA"). Boston Symphony, Kousevitsky. Victor DV 8 (5 plastic)	Continues Victor policy of good, live, restricted-range recording for average home machine; for which this is undeniably suited, tho it's not as satisfactory on fancy outfits.	AA	In spite of a few eccentricities, this is a reliable version, if not ideal. Fine acoustics, smooth plastic; recently lowered prices make it best version available and a pleasure to own.
PROKOFIEFF, ROMEO AND JULIET SUITE #2 (Pts. 1, 2, 4, 7). Boston Symph. Koussevitsky. Victor M 1129 (2) $3 Comparison: Moscow State Orch. Prokofieff conducting. a) Disc 754 (6) $8.78 b) Compass 101 (6 10") $7.50	Complete Russian version was dubbed by Disc on 12" records (also pressed on plastic); Compass imported original. Disc is quiet (on plastic), but wavers; quality reduced. Compass noisy, more faithful.	A	A welcome recording of excerpts from this monumental ballet, from a well-known P. protagonist. But complete version is worth owning for some in spite of technical impediments. P's own conducting is good, sometimes beats Koussevitsky's (Comp version best bet).

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 18 1948

TOSCANINI AND KOUSSEVITZKY EVENTS

ARTURO TOSCANINI will conduct Verdi's "Requiem" at a special concert at Carnegie Hall on Apri 26. Like all his recent appearances at which admission has been charged, it will be a benefit performance. This time the beneficiary will be the New York Infirmary for Women and Children, which has been staffed entirely by women doctors since it was founded ninety years ago by America's woman medical pioneer, Elizabeth Blackwell.

It is likely to profit to the tune of about $50,000, for seats will be sold in the form of contributions. It will take a $25 contribution to sit in the orchestra, one of $15 to sit in the first balcony and one of $10 for the second balcony. Those who want a box seating six will have to contribute $250. The money will be turned in as part of the infirmary's current drive for $5,000,000 to build a new hospital. Mrs. David Sarnoff is heading the committee organized to support the concert.

Mr. Toscanini will use the Collegiate Chorale trained by Robert Shaw. Both Mr. Shaw and the singers are donating their services and Local 802 of the American Federation of Musicians has given members of the NBC Symphony Orchestra permission to waive a performance fee should they choose to do so. The soloists are still to be announced, though it is believed the soprano will be Herva Nelli, who was the Desdemona in the conductor's recent broadcasts of "Otello."

Mr. Toscanini's last public concert in Carnegie Hall was in February, 1945, when he conducted a benefit for the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis. His last performance of Verdi's "Requiem" took place in November, 1940, for the Alma Gluck Zimbalist Memorial of Roosevelt Hospital.

To Lead Juilliard Band

Serge Koussevitzky is coming to New York in May to conduct the Juilliard Orchestra and Chorus in a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The concert is part of a plan to give students of the school the chance to play under master conductors.

It will also boost the prestige of the school's public concerts at Carnegie Hall, which were started last season. Dr. Koussevitzky's appearance will be the last of a series of three.

The series last year consisted of two concerts, both devoted to contemporary American music. This year David Diamond's Fourth Symphony will be the only United States work. It will be played at the first concert on Feb. 22, along with Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements and Beethoven's Seventh. Edgar Schenkman, head of the school's orchestra department, will conduct. Bach's "Passion According to St. John," conducted by Robert Shaw, will comprise the second concert on April 5.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

RECORDS: DIM OUTLOOK FOR COMPOSERS

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

AMONG the hardest hit victims [illegible] stoppage in recording, assuming that the stoppage continues for long, [illegible] the contemporary composers, especially Americans. [illegible] composers of other lands [illegible] also but there is more [illegible] that their music will be recorded in their own countries and [illegible]. But how many places [illegible] bother to record [illegible] of living Americans?

There is no need to pretend that the recording makers in this country have been doing all that they should in the way of recording the music of our own live composers, but they have done something, and it seems a pity that even this should cease.

In the best of times, American scores, particularly those for large ensemble, are recorded generally as an aftermath of performance by some important musical organization that happens to be under contract to a recording company. The reasons are not difficult to fathom. Recording is an expensive business, rehearsing is equally expensive. If a score has been prepared for public performance the recording can be made without additional rehearsal expense. This is an important factor in the decision to record any work, and it is probably controlling when it comes to contemporary scores which are not likely to have so large a market as familiar, established music.

There Will Be Some

Contemporary scores on records will be forthcoming in the months to come because a good many were made in the past year or so, and they will be spaced out over an extensive period. However, it is regrettable that the new works that come to performance from now on cannot benefit from the fact of being placed on the programs of our major ensembles. And you know how it is with conductors and contemporary works. The emphasis, more often than not, is on premières. Once these have been ticked off, not many conductors seem to care to revive scores for second, third or tenth performances.

In the meantime, several contemporary scores are at hand. The most ambitious is Howard Hanson's Symphony No. 3 in A minor, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky (Victor, five twelve-inch disks). It is easy to say that Mr. Hanson's music stems, both spiritually and technically, from the style of Sibelius and other so-called northern composers, but it has been said many times before, and Mr. Hanson freely admits at least the comment about northern inspiration when he writes:

"The Third Symphony springs definitely from the north and has its genesis in the composer's reverence for the spiritual contribution that has been made to America by the sturdy race of northern pioneers who as early as 1638 founded the first Swedish settlement on the Delaware and who were in later centuries to constitute such a force in the conquering of the West."

Granting Mr. Hanson whatever orientation is natural to him, his music is composed with skill and sincerity in the style that he chooses. Its themes are full-blooded and spacious, and his instrumentation relies heavily on the brasses for sonorous, massed effects. Mr. Koussevitzky is, of course, a past master of this kind of music, and he and the Bostonians give it a rich, rhapsodic performance. On the tenth side, appropriately enough, is a short work by Sibelius, Maiden with the Roses, Op. 54, which seems simple and subdued by the side of Mr. Hanson's bardic muse.

Associated Press

Howard Hanson, whose Third Symphony has been recorded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky.

Apeda

Morton Gould.

Morton Gould's Interplay for Piano and Orchestra (American Concertette) is a brief, sprightly work that makes clever use of the jazz idiom in a symphonic investiture. Mr. Gould has developed a slickness in this style that has probably brought him a great deal of profit and that will amuse his admirers. He conducts the work and plays the piano solo in this recording with the Robin Hood Dell Orchestra of Philadelphia (Columbia, two twelve-inch disks).

Written in 1943

"Interplay" was composed at the urging of and for performance by José Iturbi in 1943. A couple of years later it was turned into a ballet. Standing alone, it has wit and verve, especially its middle A movements, Gavotte and Blues.

In similar vein, there is Mr. Gould's Minstrel Show, played colorfully on a twelve-inch disk by the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra under Dimitri Mitropoulos (Victor). Another item involving the same composer is Morton Gould Showcase, in which Mr. Gould and his orchestra play a number of popular tunes [illegible] Peanut Vendor [illegible] Beguine in Mr. Gould's arrangements (Columbia, four twelve-inch disks).

There are three other contemporary compositions in new recordings, though not by Americans. Pierre Monteux and the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra play with admirable clarity and comprehension of style, Jacques Ibert's Escales (Ports of Call). The composer records impressions, not literally by any means, of stops in Palermo, Tunis-Nefta and Valencia; they make a charming, sensuous work. It has been recorded on vinylite (Victor, two twelve-inch disks).

Even though Respighi died in 1936, his Feste Romane (Roman Festivals), composed in 1929, may be called properly a contemporary work as to time, if hardly in idiom or spirit. Its descriptions are more literal and less interesting than Ibert's. Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra, however, give the work a brilliant performance (Columbia, three twelve-inch disks).

Khatchaturian's suite, Masquerade, has all the ingredients for popularity, with its swinging tunes and juicy orchestration. Arthur Fiedler and the Boston "Pops" Orchestra have made the latest recording (Victor, two twelve-inch disks), and a lively one it is.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 18 1948

Koussevitzky Will Be Guest For Juilliard

Boston Leader Directs School Forces May 9 in Last of 3 Concerts

The chorus and orchestra of the Juilliard School of Music will give three concerts this season at Carnegie Hall. In the third and last of these, on Sunday night, May 9, Serge Koussevitzky, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the guest conductor in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

In the first concert, on Sunday night, Feb. 22, Edgar Schenkman, head of the school's orchestra department, will conduct David Diamond's Fourth Symphony, which Leonard Bernstein and the Boston Symphony will introduce to Boston and Cambridge this week. This will be its first New York performance. Igor Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements, which was introduced by the Philharmonic-Symphony on Jan. 25, 1946, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony complete the program. In the second concert, whose date is not yet announced, Robert Shaw, the school's director of choral music, will present Bach's St. John Passion in full. He will also train the chorus for the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony under Dr. Koussevitzky.

The series is given with the cooperation of Local 802 of the American Federation of Musicians. The proceeds will go to the school's student aid fund. Tickets will be sold in advance only by subscription for the three concerts; these may be obtained by writing to the Concert Office, Juilliard School of Music, 120 Claremont Avenue, New York 27.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 18 1948

BOSTONIANS PLAY NABOKOV NUMBER

Koussevitzky Leads Premiere of 'The Return of Pushkin'—Marina Koshetz Soloist

By OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky, gave the first performance of Nicolas Nabokov's score for soprano and orchestra, "The Return of Pushkin," at its concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The soprano was Marina Koshetz, daughter of Nina Koshetz. The composition, thoroughly in the "modern" vein, is the autobiographical verse of Pushkin, exiled to the Crimea in the early Eighteen Thirties, and later returned to the scenes of his early days.

The verses are set in three parts, in as many different tempi, and with musical inter-relationships between the different movements. At first one was a little repelled by the harmonic scheme as well as by the often unvocal character of the writing. There are "derivations" in the music, some of them obviously Stravinskian of origin. But a young composer will inevitably be some years in finding his personal idiom. It was soon clear that Mr. Nabokov, who long since had learned how to write effectively for the instruments and also for the stage, had his artistic objective clearly in his mind and in his hand.

He has not sought the quotation of Russian folk-songs to suggest the poet's return to his soil. Nor has he—the composer—sought to be historical or archaeological in his idioms. In other words, Mr. Nabokov has written as a young musician of our day, with a perhaps studied avoidance of anything that might give the impression of being old home stuff and an equally solicitous avoidance of what might threaten to be too obvious. At the same time, he has tried to say, simply and in an unadorned manner, some of the things that Pushkin apparently had said in his native verse.

Music of True Tenderness

The composer has fit his text more closely to the original Russian than sometimes was apparent. But the orchestra, too, is there to tell the tale. Between the nostalgic melancholy of the slow movement and the music of true tenderness and introspection which makes the final section, the listener is moved; he admires more the craftsmanship and the expressive genius which brought this forth.

Of Miss Koshetz' singing we had a poorer opinion than we had of the verse and music. The concert proceeded with what must have been balm of Gilead to ears troubled by Mr. Nabokov's dissonances. It was the very early, very obvious—if you like—"La Damoiselle Elue" of Debussy. Immature! In places unoriginal—yes! But there is something in an early work of genius which cannot possibly be imitated, and is precious beyond measure. That is the bloom of its tenderness and untarnished fancy. The opening measures of the orchestra, alone, would set the key and betoken the arrival of new genius. Here the instruments utter their prayer to beauty.

Decisive Contrasts

The harmonic planes, so clearly and yet decisively contrasted, glow with a beauty which is like that of a stained glass or a medieval tapestry. The coloring is so exquisite and so sensitive that not only are the instruments put next to or in the most striking contrast to each other on the composer's palette, but the orchestral backgrounds set off, in most astonishing fashion, the textures of the voices.

The performance of the orchestra was priceless in respect to translucency and texture of tone. Miss Koshetz was joined by Eunice Alberts, contralto, in this performance. The choral parts were carried by the Wellesley College Choir, of which Margaret Winkler is director. Greatly are Dr. Koussevitzky and his forces to be thanked for bringing us this youthful and inimitable music of Debussy.

In the second half of the program Miss Koshetz sang the "Letter Scene" from Tchaikovsky's "Eugene Onegin," and the orchestra played the lurid score in a manner that elicited particular applause.

[64]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 18 1948

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, second afternoon concert of its series yesterday at Carnegie Hall. Assisting artists: Marina Koshetz, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto, and the Wellesley College Choir, Margaret MacDonald Winkler, director. The program:

The Return of Pushkin, an Elegy in Three Parts for High Voice and Orchestra . Nabokoff
First performance in Manhattan
La Demoiselle Elue, for women's chorus, soprano and contralto solos and orchesrta . Debussy
Air of Tatiana (Letter Scene) from "Eugene Oniegin" . . . . Tchaikovsky
Francesca da Rimini . . . . Tchaikovsky

In Careless Vein

AN ELEGY in three movements for voice and orchestra, entitled "The Return of Pushkin," by Nicholas Nabokoff, was the chief news item of yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. There was also, however, as further novelty, a whole recital (practically speaking) by Marina Koshetz, soprano; some pretty singing by the Wellesley College Choir and the New York debut (so far as this reporter's knowledge goes) of a whopping good Boston contralto, Eunice Alberts. Of no news interest whatsoever, and very little musical, was Serge Koussevitzky's rendering, at the end, of Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini." Miss Koshetz's recital had begun with the Nabokoff piece, gone on through Debussy's cantata "La Demoiselle Elue" (Rosetti's "Blessed Damosel") and the whole Letter Scene from Tchaikovsky's "Eugene Oniegin."

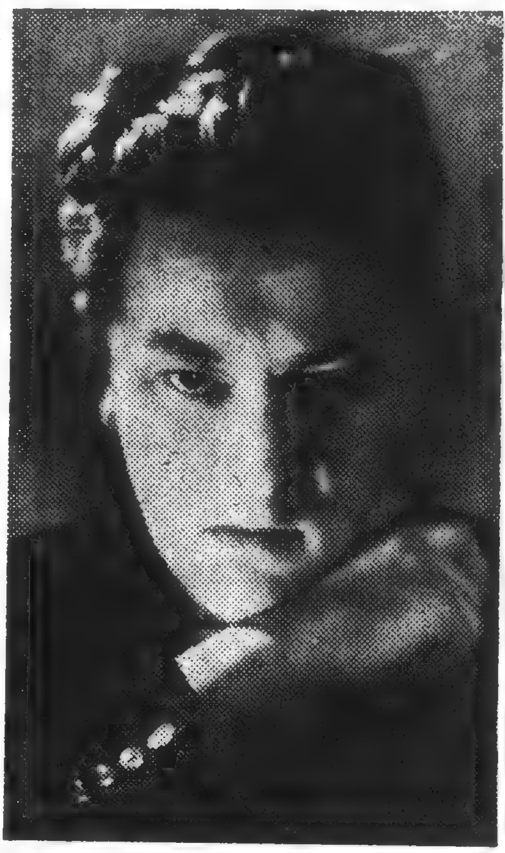
* * *

Nabokoff's work is an evocation of Pushkin's return in 1835 to the country estate where some ten years before he had suffered a two-year exile. The text, in Russian, is Pushkin's poem on the subject. The music is nostalgic and poetic, serene for the most part and psychologically, rather than geographically, atmospheric. His tone is elevated, its composition elegant. Neo-Romanticism is its school. Henri Sauguet is its most noticeable influence. It is a distinguished work and a beautiful one. Unfortunately, the fact that program-notes were available only to those who knew where the man could be found that passes them out on the steps of building rendered the poetic content of the piece incomprehensible to most of the audience. It would seem that a New York firm has a concession for all the advertising distributed in Carnegie Hall and that a Boston firm has a similar concession regarding the program-books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As a result, Boston's notes cannot be handed out inside Carnegie Hall, and most people never find out how to acquire them.

* * *

Miss Koshetz, who sang the vocal part in Nabokoff's elegy, has a pleasant lyric voice that may well develop into a dramatic soprano later. Just now it is weak at the bottom and buzzy at the top. Certainly she was beyond her range, both ends of it, in the Tchaikovsky aria. She sang the piece with dramatic style, however; and she has that instinct for brilliance of tone characteristic of old-style Russian opera singers, of whom her mother Nina Koshetz was so striking an example. Miss Koshetz has high possibilities as an artist, but she is not yet quite mature, either vocally or technically.

Nicholas Nabokoff



Whose "The Return of Pushkin" was performed yesterday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

* * *

Eunice Alberts, who sang the contralto solo part in Debussy's "Demoiselle Elue" (Miss Kochetz did the role of the Damosel), revealed a voice of great power, warmth and beauty. Her vocal training and musical style, judged from one hearing, are without flaw. It is hoped we may hear her again soon and often. The Wellesley Choir sang charmingly, too, as prettily, indeed, as your reporter has heard any ladies' chorus do in some years.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky conducted all afternoon long, save in the "Eugene Oniegin" aria, as badly as one has heard him do in as long a time. In the Nabokoff piece he produced some strangely unconvincing balances, and at least once he lost the beat entirely. In the final "Francesca da Rimini" he gave often no beat at all, messing up thus several woodwind entrances and all the pizzicati chords. Everywhere he forced the brass in the tuttis, allowed the trumpets to scream and the trombones to bray. All the readings, excepting that of "Eugene Oniegin" air, were without buoyancy, desultory and lacking in trajectory, in forward movement, in confidence.

The orchestra did what it could to keep the music from dying in its tracks, succeeded not badly up to "Francesca da Rimini." Here there was nothing to do but let the good Doctor, in his first solo work of the afternoon, have himself a time. If one's eyes are to be believed, he experienced

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 18 1948

RECENT RECORDS

By Jerome D. Bohm

VICTOR has issued Alexander Brailowsky's performances of the completes Etudes of Chopin. Mr. Brailowsky's comprehensive command of the mechanics of the piano enables him to give accurate and sometimes exciting accounts of some of the most formidable of these studies from the purely technical angle. What is missing from his conceptions is the poetic touch without which no interpretation of the Polish master's music can achieve complete realization of his message. This want of musical perceptiveness is of course more noticeable in the Etudes in slow tempo than in the majority which are quickly paced. But even in these the listener misses the tactile and tonal sensibility associated with the most satisfying revelations of Chopin.

Symptomatic of Mr. Brailowsky's approach to these Etudes is his treatment of the instrument as incapable of producing a singing tone. Everything is played staccato, even, for example, the basses of the G sharp minor study, Op. 25, No. 6, despite the phrasing marks which clearly show the composer's desire for an unbroken melodic line in the left hand. Mr. Brailowsky achieves meticulous transparency of texture at all times but he often does scant justice to Chopin's inner values. The sound of the piano emerges clearly and faithfully and the surfaces for the most part are free from disturbing noises.

Other Victor Sets

Erica Morini's traversal of Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto with the assistance of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra directed by Desire Defauw is unrivaled in its complete realization of the composer's ideas. Miss Morini's discourse of this music is discerning in every way; for not only does she account for its exacting technical problems masterfully, but her sensuous, full bodied tone never loses quality even in the most intricate, rapid passages and her ardent temperament, always held in check by unassailable taste, enables her to impart the essential vital spark to the corner movements, contrasting with the solacing serenity of the slow movement, which is conveyed with poised artistry. The accompaniment is a well proportioned one and the recording as such is good.

Arturo Toscanini's disclosure of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony (K.385) with the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra is hall-marked by the concentrated rhythmic energy which is never missing from his interpretations. But in this instance his approach seems too inflexible to permit the graciousness and joyousness of the music to emerge. Sir Thomas Beecham's conception of this symphony played by the London Philharmonic Orchestra and published by Columbia does the composer greater justice.

Hanson's Third Symphony in A minor, set forth by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's leadership, is recommended to admirers of Sibelius's symphonies who will find themselves on familiar ground in this transference of the Finnish scene to Nebraska. Was it irony which persuaded the publishers to fill the tenth side of this set with an excerpt from Sibelius's "Swanwhite"? Performance and recording are excellent.

Victor's latest "de-luxe" recording on vinylite holds Ibert's "Escales" played by the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux's direction. This music owes as much to Debussy and Ravel as Hanson's Third Symphony owes to Sibelius. Fine performance smoothly recorded.

Khatchaturian's symphonic suite, "Masquerade," a rehash of Russian romantic cliches, is brilliantly played by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler. Good recording.

Victor Twelve Inch Singles

The "Ave Maria" and "Willow Song" from Verdi's "Otello" are delivered in labored fashion by Licia Albanese. The RCA Victor Orchestra under Frieder Weissmann's direction provides the accompaniments.

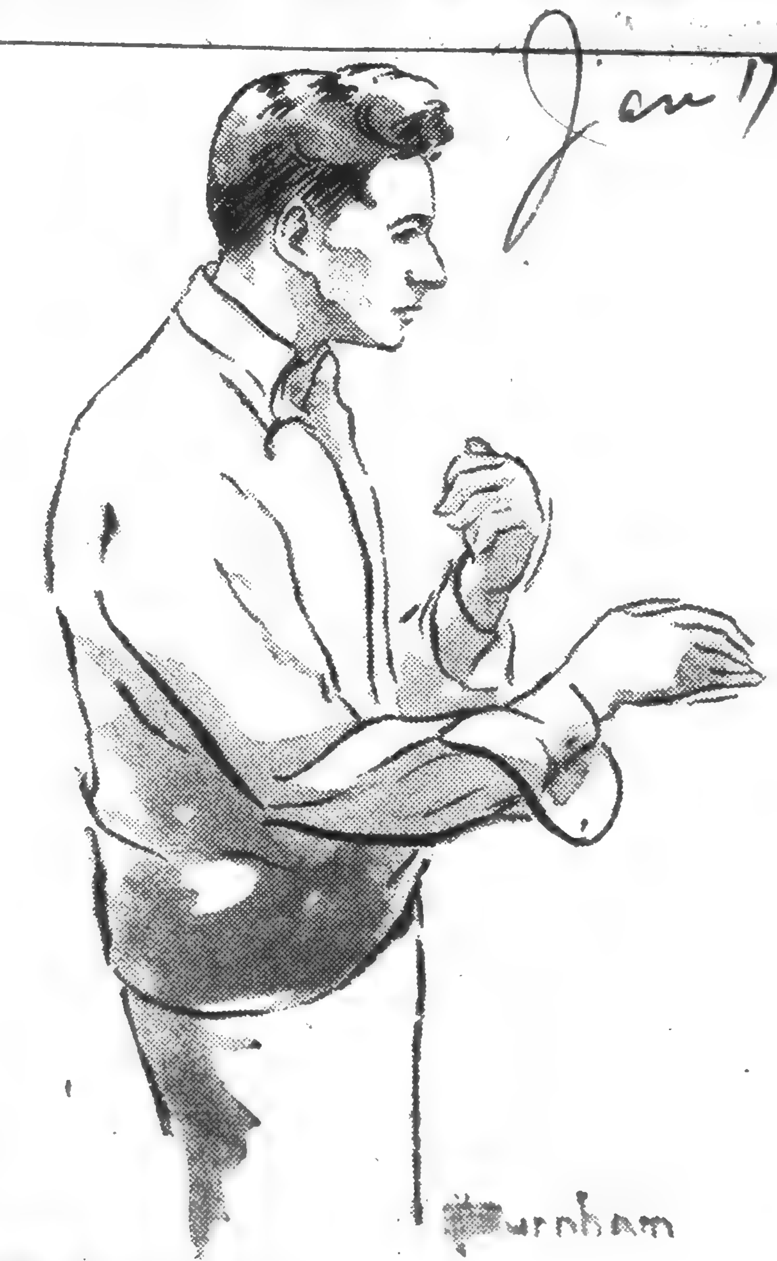
Berlioz's "Le Corsaire" Overture is exhilaratingly performed by the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra directed by Sir Thomas Beecham. The opening slow section of Weber's "Oberon" Overture issues forth without mood but the ensuing brilliant pages are tellingly conveyed in the recording by the Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by Mr. Koussevitzky.

---

rt—Music—Theater 'THE CHRISTIAN S

y Love' at Twin Hou

Jan 17



Rehearsal sketch by Martha Burnham

Leonard Bernstein, guest conductor at next week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[65]

Dr. Koussevitzky gave an impressive reading

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 13 1948

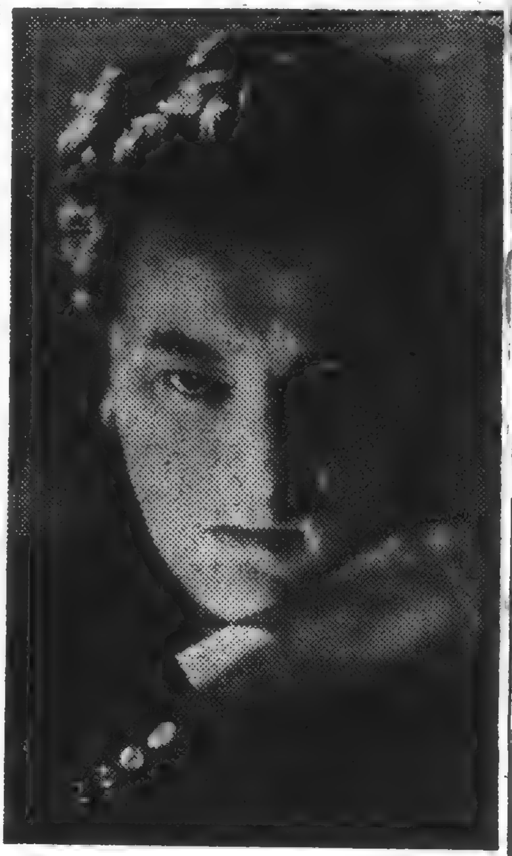
MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, second afternoon concert of the series yesterday at Carnegie Hall. Assisting artists: Marina Koshetz, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto, and the Wellesley College Choir, Margaret MacDonald Winkler, director. The program:

The Return of Pushkin, an Elegy in Three Parts for High Voice and Orchestra. Nabokoff
First performance in Manhattan
La Demoiselle Elue, for women's chorus, soprano and contralto solos and orchesrta ... Debussy
Air of Tatiana (Letter Scene) from "Eugene Oniegin" .... Tchaikovsky
Francesca da Rimini .... Tchaikovsky

Nicholas Nabokoff



Whose "The Return of Pushkin" was performed yesterday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra

In Careless Vein

AN ELEGY in three movements for voice and orchestra, entitled "The Return of Pushkin," by Nicholas Nabokoff, was the chief news item of yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. There was also, however, as further novelty, a whole recital (practically speaking) by Marina Koshetz, soprano; some pretty singing by the Wellesley College Choir and the New York debut (so far as this reporter's knowledge goes) of a whopping good Boston contralto, Eunice Alberts. Of no news interest whatsoever, and very little musical, was Serge Koussevitzky's rendering, at the end, of Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini." Miss Koshetz's recital had begun with the Nabokoff piece, gone on through Debussy's cantata "La Demoiselle Elue" (Rosetti's "Blessed Damosel") and the whole Letter Scene from Tchaikovsky's "Eugene Oniegin."

* * *

Nabokoff's work is an evocation of Pushkin's return in 1835 to the country estate where some ten years before he had suffered a two-year exile. The text, in Russian, is Pushkin's poem on the subject. The music is nostalgic and poetic, serene for the most part and psychologically, rather than geographically, atmospheric. His tone is elevated, its composition elegant. Neo-Romanticism is its school. Henri Sauguet is its most noticeable influence. It is a distinguished work and a beautiful one. Unfortunately, the fact that program-notes were available only to those who knew where the man could be found that passes them out on the steps of building rendered the poetic content of the piece incomprehensible to most of the audience. It would seem that a New York firm has a concession for all the advertising distributed in Carnegie Hall and that a Boston firm has a similar concession regarding the program-books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As a result, Boston's notes cannot be handed out inside Carnegie Hall, and most people never find out how to acquire them.

* * *

Miss Koshetz, who sang the vocal part in Nabokoff's elegy, has a pleasant lyric voice that may well develop into a dramatic soprano later. Just now it is weak at the bottom and buzzy at the top. Certainly she was beyond her range, both ends of it, in the Tchaikovsky aria. She sang the piece with dramatic style, however; and she has that instinct for brilliance of tone characteristic of old-style Russian opera singers, of whom her mother Nina Koshetz was so striking an example. Miss Koshetz has high possibilities as an artist, but she is not yet quite mature, either vocally or technically.

* * *

Eunice Alberts, who sang the contralto solo part in Debussy's "Demoiselle Elue" (Miss Kochetz did the role of the Damosel), revealed a voice of great power, warmth and beauty. Her vocal training and musical style, judged from one hearing, are without flaw. It is hoped we may hear her again soon and often. The Wellesley Choir sang charmingly, too, as prettily, indeed, as your reporter has heard any ladies' chorus do in some years.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky conducted all afternoon long, save in the "Eugene Oniegin" aria, as badly as one has heard him do in as long a time. In the Nabokoff piece he produced some strangely unconvincing balances, and at least once he lost the beat entirely. In the final "Francesca da Rimini" he gave often no beat at all, messing up thus several woodwind entrances and all the pizzicati chords. Everywhere he forced the brass in the tuttis, allowed the trumpets to scream and the trombones to bray. All the readings, excepting that of "Eugene Oniegin" air, were without buoyancy, desultory and lacking in trajectory, in forward movement, in confidence.

The orchestra did what it could to keep the music from dying in its tracks, succeeded not badly up to "Francesca da Rimini." Here there was nothing to do but let the good Doctor, in his first solo work of the afternoon, have himself a time. If one's eyes are to be believed, he experienced

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 18 1948

RECENT RECORDS

By Jerome D. Bohm

VICTOR has issued Alexander Brailowsky's performances of the completes Etudes of Chopin. Mr. Brailowsky's comprehensive command of the mechanics of the piano enables him to give accurate and sometimes exciting accounts of some of the most formidable of these studies from the purely technical angle. What is missing from his conceptions is the poetic touch without which no interpretation of the Polish master's music can achieve complete realization of his message. This want of musical perceptiveness is of course more noticeable in the Etudes in slow tempo than in the majority which are quickly paced. But even in these the listener misses the tactile and tonal sensibility associated with the most satisfying revelations of Chopin.

Symptomatic of Mr. Brailowsky's approach to these Etudes is his treatment of the instrument as incapable of producing a singing tone. Everything is played staccato, even, for example, the basses of the G sharp minor study, Op. 25, No. 6, despite the phrasing marks which clearly show the composer's desire for an unbroken melodic line in the left hand. Mr. Brailowsky achieves meticulous transparency of texture at all times but he often does scant justice to Chopin's inner values. The sound of the piano emerges clearly and faithfully and the surfaces for the most part are free from disturbing noises.

Other Victor Sets

Erica Morini's traversal of Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto with the assistance of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra directed by Desire Defauw is unrivaled in its complete realization of the composer's ideas. Miss Morini's discourse of this music is discerning in every way; for not only does she account for its exacting technical problems masterfully, but her sensuous, full bodied tone never loses quality even in the most intricate, rapid passages and her ardent temperament, always held in check by unassailable taste, enables her to impart the essential vital spark to the corner movements, contrasting with the solacing serenity of the slow movement, which is conveyed with poised artistry. The accompaniment is a well proportioned one and the recording as such is good.

Arturo Toscanini's disclosure of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony (K.385) with the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra is hall-marked by the concentrated rhythmic energy which is never missing from his interpretations. But in this instance his approach seems too inflexible to permit the graciousness and joyousness of the music to emerge. Sir Thomas Beecham's conception of this symphony played by the London Philharmonic Orchestra and published by Columbia does the composer greater justice.

Hanson's Third Symphony in A minor, set forth by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's leadership, is recommended to admirers of Sibelius's symphonies who will find themselves on familiar ground in this transference of the Finnish scene to Nebraska. Was it irony which persuaded the publishers to fill the tenth side of this set with an excerpt from Sibelius's "Swanwhite"? Performance and recording are excellent.

Victor's latest "de-luxe" recording on vinylite holds Ibert's "Escales" played by the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux's direction. This music owes as much to Debussy and Ravel as Hanson's Third Symphony owes to Sibelius. Fine performance smoothly recorded.

Khatchaturian's symphonic suite, "Masquerade," a rehash of Russian romantic cliches, is brilliantly played by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler. Good recording.

Victor Twelve Inch Singles

The "Ave Maria" and "Willow Song" from Verdi's "Otello" are delivered in labored fashion by Licia Albanese. The RCA Victor Orchestra under Frieder Weissmann's direction provides the accompaniments.

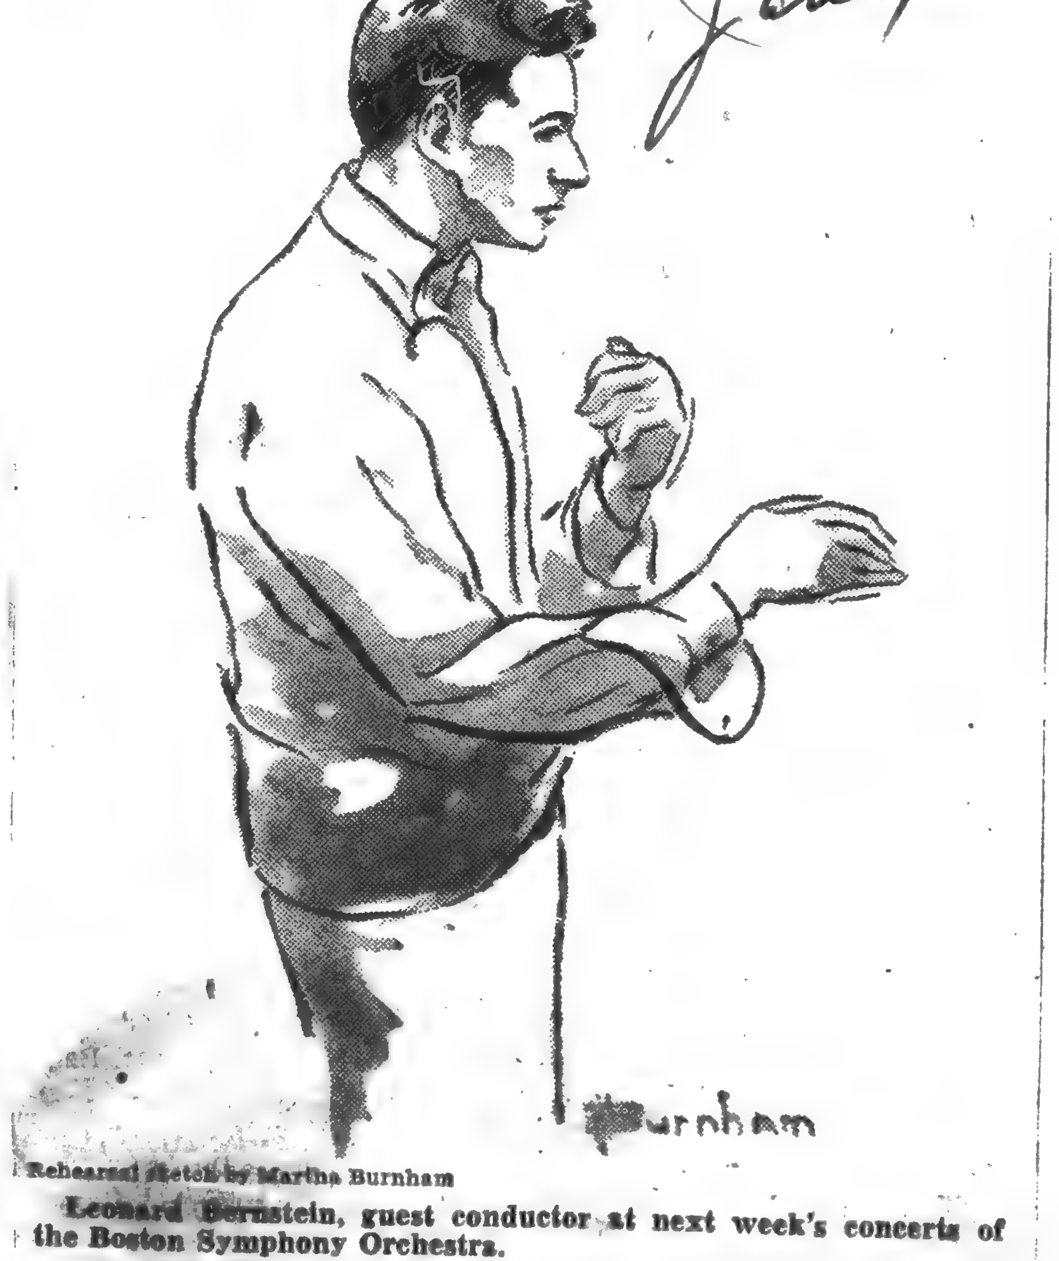
Berlioz's "Le Corsaire" Overture is exhilaratingly performed by the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra directed by Sir Thomas Beecham. The opening slow section of Weber's "Oberon" Overture issues forth without mood but the ensuing brilliant pages are tellingly conveyed in the recording by the Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by Mr. Koussevitzky.

---

rt—Music—Theater 'THE CHRISTIAN S

y Love' at Twin Hou

Jan 17



Rehearsal Sketch by Martha Burnham

Leonard Bernstein, guest conductor at next week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[65]

Jan 18

CHILDREN'S CONCERTS SHOULD BE REVISED

Music Critic Finds Wednesday Orchestra Programs Here "Over the Heads" of Little Listeners---Cleveland's System Rated Far Superior to Ours

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There was mention here last week of the elaborate system of youth concerts in Cleveland, with the attendant suggestion that our own [illegible] [illegible]. Surely anyone [illegible] [illegible] that orchestral concerts for the young are a desirable thing. They have long flourished here in one guise or another, and most cities that boast orchestras devote some time to them. However, the Boston situation needs some sort of adjustment, and it is with it, rather than with the Utopian setup in Cleveland that I am now concerned. Possibly the Ohio city's thoroughgoing regime wouldn't be practicable here, but the matter is certainly worth considering.

When Wheeler Beckett instituted the present Symphony Hall series, now in its 10th season, he expressly stated that he was not going to play down to his audiences. He has been as good as his word, presenting what are virtually Symphony concerts plus an occasional lighter item.

Youngsters Like It

That a considerable portion of his juvenile public has risen to this bait is incontestable. The announcement that next time he will play a major Symphony or Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" draws shouts of approval. The critiques that his young people have submitted and the countless letters that he has received all attest to the wisdom of his approach. For some time, indeed, everything went so well that questionings were not in order. Then came the war and transportation difficulties, and the attendance fell off as was only natural. What wasn't natural was that it should keep on falling off, and it has. The first concert of the current series of six, given on the afternoon before Thanksgiving (and that may well have had something to do with) attracted little more than half a house, whereas, the concerts used to be crowded.

When the founder-conductor of the present series ruled out the pieces suitable to the very young, he plainly counted on excluding the very young along with them. The difficulty is that of late the average age has dropped together with the attendance, though the character of the program remains unchanged. On the afternoon in question I was in my accustomed place in the first balcony, surrounded by tiny tots, who evidently found Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and the "Lohengrin" Prelude of Wagner hard going; and they sat there with as much of patient resignation as is possible at that time of life. Older people have been known to seek refuge in the program book, but what Mr. Beckett had set down in his notes was as much over the heads of these moppets as the music of Beethoven, Schubert and Wagner.

Liked the Cymbals

Then came an illuminating episode. At the climax of the "Lohengrin" Prelude the clash of cymbals aroused a degree of interest that the music itself had failed to provoke. Youthful necks were craned in the effort to locate the cymbal player. However, sauce for the gosling (male) is not always sauce for the gosling (female). The last number on this particular program was the "Romeo and Juliet" Overture of Tchaikovsky. When the Russian composer wished to portray the quarrelling Montagues and Capulets he worked the percussion section pretty hard. By all this din one child was visibly perturbed. Weeping, she hid her head in mama's lap.

In Cleveland

In Cleveland, as I said last week, the programs, and there are 24 of them, are carefully graded. Primary school students and high school students are not fed the same musical fare.

A second difficulty is the hour. Since the concerts are regarded as extra-curricular, they must needs take place when school is not in session. As long as they are given in the afternoon it means a starting time of 3:30 and, beginning with this Wednesday's concert, a closing hour of 4:45. A petition of the music educators to dispense with the intermission, so that the concerts may end a quarter of an hour earlier, has been granted. Even so, the hour is still late for any but the oldest members of the audience. To harp once more on the Cleveland string, not only do the concerts there take place during school hours, the schools take care of the transportation end of it.

Well, Cleveland is Cleveland and Boston is Boston. No doubt the concerts will go on as they have, and let us hope that the interest in them will be revived. Yet I trust I have made it clear that this hit-or-miss system is hardly the ideal one. This week's program lists Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," the Symphony of Franck and the "Nutcracker" Suite of Tchaikovsky. A prize of two tickets for the three remaining concerts will be awarded for the best letter or essay on the Franck Symphony.

Bernstein to Conduct

Leonard Bernstein will conduct this week's Symphony Concerts, presenting Beethoven's Second Symphony, the new Fourth Symphony of David Diamond and Stravinsky's "Petrouchka." Next Sunday he will conduct the Beethoven and Stravinsky items and Ravel's "La Valse."

Horowitz Here

Vladimir Horowitz, pianist, will be heard at Symphony Hall this afternoon. Maggie Teyte, soprano, will sing at Jordan Hall on Thursday evening.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM
JAN 19 1948

Miss Koshetz Sings With Bostonians

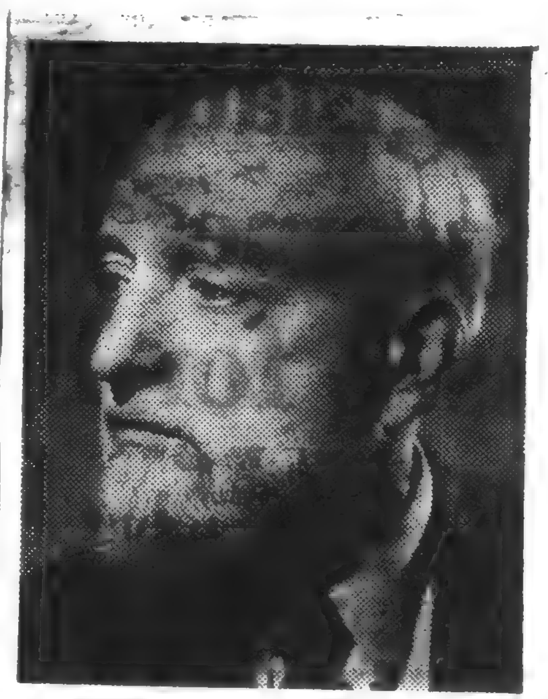
Vocal music predominated on the program presented by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. Only one of the four offerings, Tchaikowsky's Francesca de Rimini, was for orchestra alone. And since that orchestral fantasia is a musical expression of what Dante wrote about those famous 13th century lovers, Paolo and Francesca, in his Inferno, it wouldn't be stretching a point very far to say that the whole afternoon was deeply rooted in literature. Indeed, it was a sort of musico-literary high tea, over which Dr. Koussevitzky presided as a benign and perfect host.

• • •

The concert opened with the first local performance of Nikolai Nabokov's elegy, The Return of Pushkin—a setting, for high voice with orchestral accompaniment, of the impressions the Russian poet put into verse in 1835 upon returning to the scene of his youthful exile. In turn pastoral, nostalgic and reflective, with toward the end a touch of the dramatic, the music goes its neo-romantic way fluently and inoffensively. The scoring is skillful and fairly transparent, and generally maintains an equitable balance between voice and orchestra. Marina Koshetz, daughter of Russian singer Nina Koshetz, communicated Pushkin's words with commendable artistry, and the playing of the orchestra was up to the high level one expects from the Bostonians.

• • •

Miss Koshetz's clear, bright-textured soprano was also heard in the title role of Debussy's lyric poem, La Damoiselle Elue, based on Dante Gabriel Rossetti's The Blessed Damozel—and she looked the part, too, with her flowing white gown and hair "yellow like ripe corn." Contralto Eunice Alberts sang the part of the Narrator expressively; and the fresh, young voices of the Wellesley College Choir joined in truly heavenly harmony in the work's choral sections. The orchestra, too, produced celestial sounds—gleaming and irridescent, of great purity and delicacy. All in all, it was an enthralling performance of a beautiful work.



Ernest Ansermet, current guest conductor of the NBC Symphony.

After the intermission, Miss Koshetz returned to sing Tatiana's air, the Letter Scene, from Tchaikowsky's Eugene Onegin, which she delivered with considerable dramatic feeling, and Dr. Koussevitzky brought the afternoon to an end by pumping vigorous life into the same master's Francesca da Rimini. The guilty lovers were whirled about in the violent winds of Hell most convincingly, and the concluding orchestral agonies of the damned brought prolonged applause from the audience. —R. A. H.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
JAN 18 1948

on the Aisle

by Claudia Cassidy

What now? - asks musical Chicago, and I wish I knew the answer. All I know is that when I come down to THE TRIBUNE each morning and see those signs blaring the advent of "The Magnificent Mile," I wonder why it is not possible to have a magnificent inch of music.

The Chicago Opera company, once a justly renowned institution, has been run, or mis-run, so deeply into the ground it apparently has dug a hole to oblivion. The Chicago Symphony orchestra seems to be following suit. When Frederick Stock died we had one of the four major orchestras of the country. It was solidly financed, it owned - and still owns - its own building, and it had a big, dark ripe tone capable of glowing music, notably the finest Brahms, Strauss and Wagner to be found in many a long orchestral journey.

Such an orchestra was at once a blessing, a major asset and a sacred trust. It was unthinkable that it should be intrusted to any but a conductor of outstanding ability and unquestioned distinction. For reasons best known to its inner circle, the orchestral association turned the orchestra over to Desire Defauw, a Belgian conductor known to Chicago on the strength, or weakness, of one superficial concert as guest conductor.

The results were deplorable. The orchestra declined in quality and reputation. Its royalties from record sales fell off, it began broadcasting over a local radio station with something less than half its personnel tho blandly billed as the Chicago Symphony orchestra. Altho it had been announced that Mr. Defauw was the unanimous choice of the board of directors, more than one director remarked wryly that he first knew of the appointment when it was disclosed to him as a fact.

All of this was common knowledge, yet Mr. Defauw was arbitrarily retained for four ruinous seasons. When, last season, it was announced that he had resigned and that Artur Rodzinski had been appointed musical director and conductor of the orchestra, a good many of us thought the news too good to be true. Perhaps, in Shavian terms, we meant it was too true to be good. For less than a year later Mr. Rodzinski has been summarily dismissed by that same arbitrary group which holds the future of the Chicago Symphony orchestra in what I can only call, choosing my words with care, a death grip.

Mr. Rodzinski is accused of many things. Of spending too much money. Of not always appearing at concerts he is expected to conduct. Of wanting to present opera and move the orchestra back to the Auditorium. These are the crucial items in a long text signed by Edward L. Ryerson, president of the orchestral association--signed by typewriter, I mean, since when it was made public Mr. Ryerson had already taken off to the far east, where he could scarcely be reached for consultation.

Mr. Rodzinski had not seen these charges, so he was scarcely in a position to answer them either before or immediately after they were made. As to spending too much money, that, presumably, is in the department of the business manager. Season plans were announced in advance, and except for a couple of added soloists, relative unknowns who probably played for peanuts, there have been no changes. That the two opera performances ran over the budget is not surprising. Neither "Tristan and Isolde" nor "Elektra" is child's play even with a first rank orchestra. Mr. Rodzinski accomplished musical miracles, and what they did for the orchestra's prestige is beyond a price tag.

As for appearing at concerts, he has been absent only from exhaustion or actual illness. It is precisely the job of an assistant conductor to assist when needed. What else do you pay him for? As for wanting to present opera and hoping to restore the Auditorium, Mr. Rodzinski said at his first press conference here that opera was part of his plan. Mr. Ryerson stood by smiling and stated that all Mr. Rodzinski had to do was to give us fine music, the board would do the rest. As for the Auditorium, it is world renowned as the possesser of superb acoustics. It has larger capacity for concerts, now sold out in Orchestra hall. It has theater facilities. Chicago loves it. Mr. Rodzinski could scarcely consider himself a subversive element for sharing that affection.

Yet the real problems confronting Mr. Rodzinski did not reach that devastating indictment. He had been told what music to play and when to play it. He had been ordered to play encores at the "Pop" concerts and to play light music, whatever that means outside a beer garden. He had been told he could make no changes in the orchestra if those changes involved paying any more money in salaries. In almost every conceivable way his hands were tied, and, as musical director, he was a dead duck. As an illustration -- so far in our run-down orchestra he was so superbly reconstructing, Mr. Rodzinski had made almost no changes. Philip Farkas is back as a superb first horn, Stefan Bardas is an expert new pianist. Do you know that when Serge Koussevitzky took over the Boston orchestra he changed 53 players in three seasons,

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The new Symphony for Classical Orchestra by Harold Shapero was given first performance by guest conductor Leonard Bernstein at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The piece came between Weber's Overture to "Der Freischuetz" and the "Spring" Symphony of Robert Schumann.

In Mr. Shapero's work we have another commission of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and another dedication to the memory of Mme. Natalie Kousevitzky. The composer wrote for an orchestra of classical proportions, which is to say Beethovenish, and cast his work in the classical sonata-allegro layout, with slow movement (adagietto) and scherzo. There is no comparison between this Symphony, which lasts 45 minutes, and the short, minature "Classical Symphony" of Prokofieff, which is a satire on 18th Century symphonic manners.

Why Mr. Shapero, in 1947, wished to write for classical orchestra in classical form is his own affair. What concerns the public and those who write about music is the result, the music itself. Here, with the best will, I must say this seemed to me a singularly empty, uncommunicative and academic piece, written about twice too long though with good command of the orchestral instruments.

The slow introduction to the first movement is sluggish and groping, and the finale grinds on interminably. The scherzo is a compact, neat movement and the best of all. The Symphony seems rooted, esthetically, in Brahms, and even in Beethoven during the scherzo and finale. But the technic and harmonic structure are modern and eclectic, with recognizable influences of Stravinsky, Copland and others. Through page after page run jigging figurations full of repeated notes until they seem almost like a huge ostinato. Mr. Shapero bowed from the stage, in response to applause.

Mr. Bernstein read the Shapero Symphony, which sounded very tricky, with spirit and conviction. Weber's Overture and the "Spring" Symphony (which sounded lovely on a day of beastly cold weather) were eloquently and persuasively done. But there were technical details of nuance and attack, notably in the Schumann, that were, as last week, untidy, and out of place at Boston Symphony concerts. Mr. Bernstein's tempi for Schumann were a bit hurried here and there. But, as I observed last Saturday, this talented young man is improving season by season, and that is the important fact. You don't master the entire concert repertory in a short time.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 21 1948

Bernstein Captivates Audience at Bushnell

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

LEONARD Bernstein made his second appearance in Hartford last night. On the first occasion, last season, with the Rochester Philharmonic he made an emphatically favorable impression.

This time his orchestra was the Boston Symphony and the audience was even more emphatically conquered. Convinced finally that the Bostonians can actually play under a baton other than Koussevitzky, his absence was forgiven; so was the program—Petrouchka and early Beethoven—and the packed house liked tremendously the fascinating and frenetic young man whose conducting mesmerized the eye as his music demanded the ear.

* * *

WHEN THE SLOW movement of Beethoven's Second Symphony was finished there was a restless rumble of conversation and the stir of uncramping limbs. Now there is nothing about this benign larghetto to cramp up anybody but Bernstein was in a hypertense state throughout the evening and music is an excellent conductor of nervous tension. There was little opportunity for anyone to relax; even the opening adagio had you on the edge of your chair.

This was a strange and wondrous Beethoven—perhaps more authentic than we know. Certainly the young man who at 17 and with a sultry fire in his eye first set foot in elegant Vienna 150 years ago was neither suave nor relaxed. He probably wanted music to sound with explosive and portentous accents, its phrases trenchantly clipped, its louds very loud and its softs a whisper. Something volcanic about him no doubt and I found Bernstein's perspective on the D major Symphony quite like that.

It was disturbing to hear su[illegible] old and familiar music sound [illegible] up-to-date. It made you look forward to Stravinsky on the warrant that Bernstein should do well with the moderns (As if men who were born the year Petrouchka was premiered aren't already graying at the temples!)

* * *

ONE MIGHT LOOK at Petrouchka in various ways. As ballet you miss the choreographic better half; as narrative music you need the scenario; as a parade of exotic sonorities it enchants, then palls and becomes at length a bore. It is about the best of Stravinsky and since his pre-eminence as a modern has [illegible] been challenged it is a sad commentary on the barrenness of creative music in our generation.

This performance disclosed little except the fact that the Boston Orchestra lapsed from its proverbial perfection of ensemble. The fault may have been that Berstein, like most young disciples, imitates the faults along with the virtues of the master. His cues were elaborately given but like Koussevitzky he very often didn't trouble with a beat.

The string tone of the orchestra too was often pinched and wirey; it had a cutting edge which provided definition but lacked Boston's usual luminosity. The brass players didn't have a particularly good night of it.

* * *

IT WAS A SHREWDLY built program. After Stravinsky, Ravel's La Valse provided an intensification of the nervous pressure. Its rhythmical sweep, its lushness, its acrid brilliance were overwhelming. Its beauty is the beauty of Phosphorescence and decay; its consumptive pathos is rouged with satire. You stand away from this picture and narrow the eyes to fix the illusion but its realities follow you home.

La Valse is a favorite with the Boston Orchestra and in this instance at least Mr. Bernstein made it speak with the master's voice.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 19 1948

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, second afternoon concert of its series Saturday at Carnegie Hall. Assisting artists: Marina Koshetz, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto, and the Wellesley College Choir, Margaret MacDonald Winkler, director. The program:

The Return of Pushkin, an Elegy in Three Parts for High Voice and Orchestra . Nabokoff
First performance in Manhattan
La Demoiselle Elue, for women's chorus, soprano and contralto solos and orchestra . Debussy
Air of Tatiana (Letter Scene) from "Eugene Oniegin" .... Tchaikovsky
Francesca da Rimini .... Tchaikovsky

In Careless Vein

AN ELEGY in three movements for voice and orchestra, entitled "The Return of Pushkin," by Nicholas Nabokoff, was the chief news item of Saturday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. There was also, however, as further novelty, a whole recital (practically speaking) by Marina Koshetz, soprano; some pretty singing by the Wellesley College Choir and the New York debut (so far as this reporter's knowledge goes) of a whopping good Boston contralto, Eunice Alberts. Of no news interest whatsoever, and very little musical, was Serge Koussevitzky's rendering, at the end, of Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini." Miss Koshetz's recital had begun with the Nabokoff piece, gone on through Debussy's cantata "La Demoiselle Elue" (Rosetti's "Blessed Damosel") and the whole Letter Scene from Tchaikovsky's "Eugene Oniegin."

* * *

Nabokoff's work is an evocation of Pushkin's return in 1835 to the country estate where some ten years before he had suffered a two-year exile. The text, in Russian, is Pushkin's poem on the subject. The music is nostalgic and poetic, serene for the most part and psychologically, rather than geographically, atmospheric. His tone is elevated, its composition elegant. Neo-Romanticism is its school. Henri Sauguet is its most noticeable influence. It is a distinguished work and a beautiful one. Unfortunately, the fact that program-notes were available only to those who knew where the man could be found that passes them out on the steps of building rendered the poetic content of the piece incomprehensible to most of the audience. It would seem that a New York firm has a concession for all the advertising distributed in Carnegie Hall and that a Boston firm has a similar concession regarding the program-books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As a result, Boston's notes cannot be handed out inside Carnegie Hall, and most people never find out how to acquire them.

* * *

Miss Koshetz, who sang the vocal part in Nabokoff's elegy, has a pleasant lyric voice that may well develop into a dramatic soprano later. Just now it is weak at the bottom and buzzy at the top. Certainly she was beyond her range, both ends of it, in the Tchaikovsky aria. She sang the [illegible] with dramatic style, however; and she has that instinct for brilliance of tone characteristic of old-style Russian opera singers, of whom her mother Nina Koshetz was so striking an example. Miss Koshetz has high possibilities as an artist, but she is not yet quite mature, either vocally or technically.

* * *

Eunice Alberts, who sang the contralto solo part in Debussy's "Demoiselle Elue" (Miss Kochetz did the role of the Damosel), revealed a voice of great power, warmth and beauty. Her vocal training and musical style, judged from one hearing, are without flaw. It is hoped we may hear her again soon and often. The Wellesley Choir sang charmingly, too, as prettily, indeed, as your reporter has heard any ladies' chorus do in some years.

Mr. Koussevitzky conducted all afternoon long, save in the "Eugene Oniegin" aria, as badly as one has heard him do in as long a time. In the Nabokoff piece he produced some strangely unconvincing balances, and at least once he lost the beat entirely. In the final "Francesca da Rimini" he gave often no beat at all, messing up thus several woodwind entrances and all the pizzicati chords. Everywhere he forced the brass in the tuttis, allowed the trumpets to scream and the trombones to bray. All the readings, excepting that of "Eugene Oniegin" air, were without buoyancy, desultory and lacking in trajectory, in forward movement, in confidence.

The orchestra did what it could to keep the music from dying in its tracks, succeeded not badly up to "Francesca da Rimini." Here there was nothing to do but let the good Doctor, in his first solo work of the afternoon, have himself a time. If one's eyes are to be believed, he experienced a deep enjoyment of the piece. From auditory evidence there was cause to wonder if he were not perhaps merely transported and not listening at all.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

JAN 19 1948

MUSIC

Competition for a Well-Digger

COMPOSER PISTON
Very reluctant.

A veteran of his own premières, Composer Walter Piston sat halfway back in Boston's Symphony Hall. Said he to a friend: "I'll run like a deer to get backstage, and then come out as if I were very reluctant about it. . . . This sort of thing makes me wonder if it's worth the trouble to write a symphony."

When the Boston Symphony had finished playing Piston's Third Symphony, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky led Piston by the hand onstage for two curtain calls. Koussevitzky, who always has something glowing to say about anything he introduces, told a reporter that the music could have been written only by a "finished master." Next day a Boston critic referred to it as "the best since Copland's Third." Since Boston has had no premières of U.S. symphonies since Aaron Copland's, that was faint praise indeed.

Actually, Piston's Third was less strident and mechanized than most of the music he has written in the past 20 years. Hostile critics have found his music as bony and bare as a blackboard counterpoint exercise in his Harvard classroom. But the Third had three movements of lyrical tranquillity before bursting into a noisy finale. The finale, said Piston, was written in Vermont while a well-driller was digging an artesian well outside his window. "I had to write the music loud enough to overcome the noise outside," said Piston.

In the generally lackluster field of serious U.S. composers, Piston rates high. He rates even higher as a teacher. Originally he intended to be a painter, and earned his way through a Boston art school playing the piano, the violin or the saxophone in restaurant bands. Not until he got out of [illegible] World War I, at 26, did he [illegible]

Truman Braves Cold to Hear Boston Symphony

It may be pure imagination but the "perfect" Boston Symphony Orchestra seemed even a shade more perfect in their annual Constitution Hall concert last night.

Certainly, there was nothing unusual in the program—Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Hindemith's "Mathias the Painter" and Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony. But the orchestra played these familiar works with great [illegible]ness and animation, and the [illegible]table Serge Koussevitzky conducted with greater intensity than ever.

Perhaps the presence of President and Mrs. Truman and daughter, Margaret, provided [illegible] extra-musical inspiration.

Since this was President Truman's second concert in eight days, there is ground for speculation. Either he has come a long way since his "Merry Widow Waltz" days, or he is out [illegible] the music-lover vote.

And with all the serious music on the radio and the vast number of concerts being given in the country, the music vote might easily offset the Wallace defection.

High point last night was the Hindemith. The Boston Symphony's truly brilliant performance gave the listeners new insight into this stirring work. One, perhaps, realized more than ever why Hindemith is one of the towering composers of the day.

The Tschaikowsky, too, was something of a revelation—of the magnificent tonal resources of the orchestra and of Koussevitzky's refusal to take for granted any musical work, no matter how many times he has conducted it before.

948 Jan 31 Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The new Symphony for Classical Orchestra by Harold Shapero was given first performance by guest conductor Leonard Bernstein at the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The piece came between Weber's Overture to "Der Freischuetz" and the "Spring" Symphony of Robert Schumann.

In Mr. Shapero's work we have another commission of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and another dedication to the memory of Mme. Natalie Kousevitzky. The composer wrote for an orchestra of classical proportions, which is to say Beethovenish, and cast his work in the classical sonata-allegro layout, with slow movement (adagietto) and scherzo. There is no comparison between this Symphony, which lasts 45 minutes, and the short, minature "Classical Symphony" of Prokofieff, which is a satire on 18th Century symphonic manners.

Why Mr. Shapero, in 1947, wished to write for classical orchestra in classical form is his own affair. What concerns the public and those who write about music is the result, the music itself. Here, with the best will, I must say this seemed to me a singularly empty, uncommunicative and academic piece, written about twice too long though with good command of the orchestral instruments.

The slow introduction to the first movement is sluggish and groping, and the finale grinds on interminably. The scherzo is a compact, neat movement and the best of all. The Symphony seems rooted, esthetically, in Brahms, and even in Beethoven during the [illegible] finale. But the technic [illegible] monic structure are modern and eclectic, with recognizable influences of Stravinsky, Copland and others. Through page after page run jigging figurations full of repeated notes until they seem almost like a huge ostinato. Mr. Shapero bowed from the stage, in response to applause.

Mr. Bernstein read the Shapero Symphony, which sounded very tricky, with spirit and conviction. Weber's Overture and the "Spring" Symphony (which sounded lovely on a day of beastly cold weather) were eloquently and persuasively done. But there were technical details of nuance and attack, notably in the Schumann, that were, as last week, untidy, and out of place at Boston Symphony concerts. Mr. Bernstein's tempi for Schumann were a bit hurried here and there. But, as I observed last Saturday, this talented young man is improving season by season, and that is the important fact. You don't master the entire concert repertory in a short time.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 21 1948

Bernstein Captivates Audience at Bushnell

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

LEONARD Bernstein made his second appearance in Hartford last night. On the first occasion, last season, with the Rochester Philharmonic he made an emphatically favorable impression.

This time his orchestra was the Boston Symphony and the audience ~~was even~~ more emphatically conquered. Convinced finally that the Bostonians can actually play under a baton other than Koussevitzky, his absence was forgiven; so was the program—Petrouchka and early Beethoven—and the packed house liked tremendously the fascinating and frenetic young man whose conducting mesmerized the eye as his music demanded the ear.

* * *

WHEN THE SLOW movement of Beethoven's Second Symphony was finished there was a restless rumble of conversation and the stir of uncramping limbs. Now there is nothing about this benign larghetto to cramp up anybody but Bernstein was in a hypertense state throughout the evening and music is an excellent conductor of nervous tension. There was little opportunity for anyone to relax; even the opening adagio had you on the edge of your chair.

This was a strange and wondrous Beethoven—perhaps more authentic than we know. Certainly the young man who at 17 and with a sultry fire in his eye first set foot in elegant Vienna 150 years ago was neither suave nor relaxed. He probably wanted music to sound with explosive and portentous accents, its phrases trenchantly clipped, its louds very loud and its softs a whisper. Something volcanic about him no doubt and I found Bernstein's perspective on the D major Symphony quite like that.

It was disturbing to hear su[illegible] old and familiar music sound [illegible] up-to-date. It made you look forward to Stravinsky on the warrant that Bernstein should do well with the moderns (As if men who were born the year Petrouchka was premiered aren't already graying at the temples!)

* * *

ONE MIGHT LOOK at Petrouchka in various ways. As ballet you miss the choreographic better half; as narrative music you need the scenario; as a parade of exotic sonorities it enchants, then palls and becomes at length a bore. It is about the best of Stravinsky and since his pre-eminence as a modern has [illegible] been challenged it is a sad commentary on the barrenness of creative music in our generation.

This performance disclosed little except the fact that the Boston Orchestra lapsed from its proverbial perfection of ensemble. The fault may have been that Berstein, like most young disciples, imitates the faults along with the virtues of the master. His cues were elaborately given but like Koussevitzky he very often didn't trouble with a beat.

The string tone of the orchestra too was often pinched and wirey; it had a cutting edge which provided definition but lacked Boston's usual luminosity. The brass players didn't have a particularly good night of it.

* * *

IT WAS A SHREWDLY built program. After Stravinsky, Ravel's La Valse provided an intensification of the nervous pressure. Its rhythmical sweep, its lushness, its acrid brilliance were overwhelming. Its beauty is the beauty of Phosphorescence and decay; its consumptive pathos is rouged with satire. You stand away from this picture and narrow the eyes to fix the illusion but its realities follow you home.

La Valse is a favorite with the Boston Orchestra and in this instance at least Mr. Bernstein made it speak with the master's voice.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 19 1948

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, second afternoon concert of its series Saturday at Carnegie Hall. Assisting artists: Marina Koshetz, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto, and the Wellesley College Choir, Margaret MacDonald Winkler, director. The program:

The Return of Pushkin, an Elegy in Three Parts for High Voice and Orchestra..Nabokoff
First performance in Manhattan
La Demoiselle Elue, for women's chorus, soprano and contralto solos and orchestra ..... Debussy
Air of Tatiana (Letter Scene) from "Eugene Oniegin" .... Tchaikovsky
Francesca da Rimini .... Tchaikovsky

In Careless Vein

AN ELEGY in three movements for voice and orchestra, entitled "The Return of Pushkin," by Nicholas Nabokoff, was the chief news item of Saturday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. There was also, however, as further novelty, a whole recital (practically speaking) by Marina Koshetz, soprano; some pretty singing by the Wellesley College Choir and the New York debut (so far as this reporter's knowledge goes) of a whopping good Boston contralto, Eunice Alberts. Of no news interest whatsoever, and very little musical, was Serge Koussevitzky's rendering, at the end, of Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini." Miss Koshetz's recital had begun with the Nabokoff piece, gone on through Debussy's cantata "La Demoiselle Elue" (Rosetti's "Blessed Damosel") and the whole Letter Scene from Tchaikovsky's "Eugene Oniegin."

* * *

Nabokoff's work is an evocation of Pushkin's return in 1835 to the country estate where some ten years before he had suffered a two-year exile. The text, in Russian, is Pushkin's poem on the subject. The music is nostalgic and poetic, serene for the most part and psychologically, rather than geographically, atmospheric. His tone is elevated, its composition elegant. Neo-Romanticism is its school. Henri Sauguet is its most noticeable influence. It is a distinguished work and a beautiful one. Unfortunately, the fact that program-notes were available only to those who knew where the man could be found that passes them out on the steps of building rendered the poetic content of the piece incomprehensible to most of the audience. It would seem that a New York firm has a concession for all the advertising distributed in Carnegie Hall and that a Boston firm has a similar concession regarding the program-books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As a result, Boston's notes cannot be handed out inside Carnegie Hall, and most people never find out how to acquire them.

* * *

Miss Koshetz, who sang the vocal part in Nabokoff's elegy, has a pleasant lyric voice that may well develop into a dramatic soprano later. Just now it is weak at the bottom and buzzy at the top. Certainly she was beyond her range, both ends of it, in the Tchaikovsky aria. She sang the [illegible] with dramatic style, however, and she has that instinct for brilliance of tone characteristic of old-style Russian opera singers, of whom her mother Nina Koshetz was so striking an example. Miss Koshetz has high possibilities as an artist, but she is not yet quite mature, either vocally or technically.

* * *

Eunice Alberts, who sang the contralto solo part in Debussy's "Demoiselle Elue" (Miss Kochetz did the role of the Damosel), revealed a voice of great power, warmth and beauty. Her vocal training and musical style, judged from one hearing, are without flaw. It is hoped we may hear her again soon and often. The Wellesley Choir sang charmingly, too, as prettily, indeed, as your reporter has heard any ladies' chorus do in some years.

Mr. Koussevitzky conducted all afternoon long, save in the "Eugene Oniegin" aria, as badly as one has heard him do in as long a time. In the Nabokoff piece he produced some strangely unconvincing balances, and at least once he lost the beat entirely. In the final "Francesca da Rimini" he gave often no beat at all, messing up thus several woodwind entrances and all the pizzicati chords. Everywhere he forced the brass in the tuttis, allowed the trumpets to scream and the trombones to bray. All the readings, excepting that of "Eugene Oniegin" air, were without buoyancy, desultory and lacking in trajectory, in forward movement, in confidence.

The orchestra did what it could to keep the music from dying in its tracks, succeeded not badly up to "Francesca da Rimini." Here there was nothing to do but let the good Doctor, in his first solo work of the afternoon, have himself a time. If one's eyes are to be believed, he experienced a deep enjoyment of the piece. From auditory evidence there was cause to wonder if he were not perhaps merely transported and not listening at all.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
JAN 19 1948

MUSIC

Competition for a Well-Digger

A veteran of his own premières, Composer Walter Piston sat halfway back in Boston's Symphony Hall. Said he to a friend: "I'll run like a deer to get backstage, and then come out as if I were very reluctant about it. . . . This sort of thing makes me wonder if it's worth the trouble to write a symphony."

When the Boston Symphony had finished playing Piston's Third Symphony, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky led Piston by the hand onstage for two curtain calls. Koussevitzky, who always has something glowing to say about anything he introduces, told a reporter that the music could have been written only by a "finished master." Next day a Boston critic referred to it as "the best since Copland's Third." Since Boston has had no premières of U.S. symphonies since Aaron Copland's, that was faint praise indeed.

Actually, Piston's Third was less strident and mechanized than most of the music he has written in the past 20 years. Hostile critics have found his music as bony and bare as a blackboard counterpoint exercise in his Harvard classroom. But the Third had three movements of lyrical tranquillity before bursting into a noisy finale. The finale, said Piston, was written in Vermont while a well-driller was digging an artesian well outside his window. "I had to write the music loud enough to overcome the noise outside," said Piston.

In the generally lackluster field of serious U.S. composers, Piston rates high. He rates even higher as a teacher. Originally he intended to be a painter, and earned his way through a Boston art school playing the piano, the violin or the saxophone in restaurant bands. Not until he got out of [illegible] World War I, at 26, did he [illegible]

David Nilsson

COMPOSER PISTON
Very reluctant.

Truman Braves Cold to Hear Boston Symphony

It may be pure imagination but the "perfect" Boston Symphony Orchestra seemed even a shade more perfect in their annual Constitution Hall concert last night.

Certainly, there was nothing unusual in the program—Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Hindemith's "Mathias the Painter" and Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony. But the orchestra played these familiar works with great freshness and animation, and the excitable Serge Koussevitzky conducted with greater intensity than ever.

Perhaps the presence of President and Mrs. Truman and daughter, Margaret, provided the extra-musical inspiration.

Since this was President Truman's second concert in eight days, there is ground for speculation. Either he has come a long way since his "Merry Widow Waltz" days, or he is out to get the music-lover vote.

And with all the serious music on the radio and the vast number of concerts being given in the country, the music vote might easily offset the Wallace defection.

High point last night was the Hindemith. The Boston Symphony's truly brilliant performance gave the listeners new insight into this stirring work. One, perhaps, realized more than ever why Hindemith is one of the towering composers of the day.

The Tschaikowsky, too, was something of a revelation—of the magnificent tonal resources of the orchestra and of Koussevitzky's refusal to take for granted any musical work, no matter how many times he has conducted it before.

TOSCANINI AND KOUSSEVITZKY EVENTS

19

ARTURO TOSCANINI will conduct [illegible] Requiem" at [illegible] concert at Carnegie Hall [illegible] April 26. Like [illegible] appearances at [illegible] has been charged, [illegible] performance. [illegible] will be [illegible] Women's [illegible] has been [illegible] doctors [illegible] ninety years [illegible] was [illegible] medical [illegible] Elizabeth Blackwell. [illegible] profit to the tune [illegible] seats will be [illegible] contributions. [illegible] take a $25 contribution to [illegible] the orchestra, one of $15 to [illegible] the first balcony and one of [illegible] for the second balcony. Those [illegible] want a box seating six will [illegible] contribute $250. The [illegible] will be turned in as part [illegible] the infirmary's current drive [illegible] to build a new hospital. Mrs. David Sarnoff is heading the committee organized to [illegible] concert.

Mr. Toscanini will use the Collegiate Chorale trained by Robert Shaw. Both Mr. Shaw and the [illegible] are donating their services. Local 802 of the American Federation of Musicians has given members of the NBC Symphony Orchestra permission to waive a performance fee should they choose to do so. The soloists are still to be announced, though it is believed the soprano will be Herva Nelli, who was the Desdemona in the conductor's recent broadcasts of "Otello."

Mr. Toscanini's last public concert in Carnegie Hall was in February, 1945, when he conducted a benefit for the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis. His last performance of Verdi's "Requiem" took place in November, 1940, for the Alma Gluck Zimbalist Memorial of Roosevelt Hospital.

To Lead Juilliard Band

Serge Koussevitzky is coming to New York in May to conduct the Juilliard Orchestra and Chorus in a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The concert is part of a plan to give students of the school the chance to play under master conductors.

It will also boost the prestige of the school's public concerts at Carnegie Hall, which were started last season. Dr. Koussevitzky's appearance will be the last of a series of three.

The series last year consisted of two concerts, both devoted to contemporary American music. This year David Diamond's Fourth Symphony will be the only United States work. It will be played at the first concert on Feb. 22, along with Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements and Beethoven's Seventh. Edgar Schenkman, head of the school's orchestra department, will conduct. Bach's "Passion According to St. John," conducted by Robert Shaw, will comprise the second concert on April 5.

Art—Music—Theater *9

Fourth Symphony

Bernstein Also Conducts Full Score of 'Petrouchka'

By L. A. Sloper

Leonard Bernstein is conducting the Boston Symphony concerts [illegible] week and next, during Dr. Koussevitzky's midwinter vacation. [illegible] the thirteenth program [illegible] season, played yesterday [illegible] in Symphony Hall, Mr. Bernstein submitted the following: [illegible] Beethoven, Symphony No. [illegible] Diamond, Symphony No. 4; Stravinsky, "Pétrouchka," a Burlesque in four [illegible].

Mr. Diamond's Fourth Symphony, [illegible] so many other works [illegible] this season, was [illegible] by the Koussevitzky [illegible] Foundation and is dedicated [illegible] Mme Natalie Koussevitzky. We have heard here Mr. [illegible] Second Symphony, [illegible] a very good impression, and his "Rounds" for Orchestra [illegible] which did not fare so well.

* * *

[illegible] symphony, like the Second, [illegible] remarkable for its odd [illegible] good technique, and [illegible] power expressed [illegible] recognizable themes. The [illegible] has relaxed his customary reticence about its [illegible] the degree of [illegible] work "was [illegible] the idea of life and [illegible] order, which he [illegible] to fill in three [illegible] lasting 18 minutes. [illegible] are very attractive. The first, an Allegretto, has [illegible] a cheerful and carefree mood. You can forget about sonata-form and enjoy it. The second (Andante) is somewhat more serious, with a chorale-like opening theme which returns toward the end. The final Allegro [illegible] bustling movement, which ends by becoming monotonous.

Mr. Diamond speaks of "a Mercury-like, sometimes elfish intrusion which I have invented, whose magical, unpremeditated presence intrudes itself here and there as the movement gains momentum." I think this elfin figure must have been what bothered me. Mr. Diamond is much more persuasive when his feet are planted firmly on the ground.

* * *

The "Pétrouchka" music was said to be the full score of the ballet. It is rather long, but I think it is worth playing. "Pétrouchka" is one of Stravinsky's masterpieces, the product of his youth, before he wandered into barren ways, gave himself up to "back-to-somebody-or-other" movements, and talked music instead of writing it. As a composer he is a master; as a philosopher he is confused. It is well to hear "Pétrouchka" and "Le Sacre" occasionally, just to restore the musician.

Mr. Bernstein secured a flowing performance of the Diamond and a lively one of the Stravinsky, with rhythmic precision but with some details obscure which are better brought out. The reading of the Beethoven was uneven. The first movement went very well and so did the Scherzo, but the Larghetto was over-interpreted instead of being allowed to sing for itself, and the Finale was rushed. Mr. Bernstein in his enthusiasm still tends to dance a symphony (though not so much as Mr. Münch) and he still uses many gestures reminiscent of Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 25 1948

NOVELTY AT OPERA

Forthcoming 'Peter Grimes' Only Break In Familiar Metropolitan Repertory

By OLIN DOWNES

THE one important novelty of the current Metropolitan Opera season, Benjamin Britten's "Peter Grimes," first heard in America at Tanglewood two seasons ago, will have its New York première about two weeks hence.

This opera has undeniably original characteristics. How it will rank as musical theatre, on a big stage, in an immense auditorium in place of the intimate interior at the Berkshire Music Centre, is to be seen. But that is not the first consideration. The first consideration is that Metropolitan audiences have now a right to hear new and important modern opera.

It is true that fewer operas calculated to stick in the repertory have appeared in the last thirty-five years than in any other period of similar length in modern history. Why this is the case is an inquiry far beyond this article. But the fact has often been cited, and has been advanced with plausibility in explaining why the Metropolitan has produced virtually no new operas during Mr. Johnson's regime, now in its twelfth season. The explanation is familiar. It has been repeatedly advanced in these columns. The Metropolitan must balance its budget. New works calculated to pay if they are produced are conspicuous by absence.

Word of Praise

This department has often praised Mr. Johnson and his associates for having made their lyric theatre's repertory as inclusive and as balanced as it has become under these imposed circumstances. As it stands, the repertory is more inclusive of worth-while operas of all schools and periods than the repertory of any other lyric theatre in the world. Nor has this been merely the case in the late war years or those immediately following. The shortage has been in the modern field and in regard to novelties. The Metropolitan has presented fewer new works during the twelve years of Mr. Johnson's incumbency than it did in any one season of the preceding twenty-five years, if one excepts Gatti-Casazza's last season of 1934-35

IN DEBUT

James Abresch

Carmen Gracia, soprano, sings Rosina at Metropolitan Thursday.

But there are certain distinctions, in point of repertory and producing problems, between the past and present regimes at the Metropolitan, which it is perhaps appropriate to reflect upon here.

The Metropolitan since the departure of Gatti-Casazza, and its successful emergence from the depression of the time, has had certain great advantages which Gatti-Casazza did not enjoy.

The Metropolitan, for example, has received as a free gift from the public $1,000,000 in one big donation, to be added to the receipt of an earlier $300,000 and a donation of $50,000 from the Juilliard Foundation. Its theatre has been made tax exempt. It pays its singers less than ever before in its history. It has also receipts from radio broadcasts, and it plays, as already observed, normally to packed houses.

Ensemble Stressed

The Metropolitan abjures "star" casts, less from choice than from necessity. It has a few exceptional voices and exceptional artists in its ranks, but emphasizes the principle of ensemble. On notable occasions, under great conductors, such ensembles have been achieved, but finished ensembles have by no means been the invariable rule, particularly this season. These defects have been explained partly on the grounds of exceptional misfortune in the bad health, not only of expected singers, but of principal conductors. However, in sum it would appear that with considerable financial aid from outside, and other practical advantages, and with production at as low a cost as the constantly rising wage scales of unions and attendant circumstances would permit, the Metropolitan has done considerably less where variety and modernity of repertory and briliancy of casts are concerned, than it did up to the time of Mr. Gatti-Casazza's departure.

He provided a repertory that had new works of every sort and description, averaging from three to six novelties a season, with the inclusion of from one to three American operas and ballets, new or repeated, each season. He paid his singers much more than they are paid today, whereby he had more control of their engagements. He charged what is practically the present rate for seats, and he did this at a very substantial profit. His repertory ranged from "Norma," "Vestale," "Cosi fan tutte," "Serva Padrona," to "Electra," "Turandot," "Johnny spielt auf," "L'Heure Espagnole," Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" (ballet), Taylor's "Peter Ibbetson," Gruenberg's "Emperor Jones," and the première of Hanson's "Merry Mount," the latter three in a single season. This was done at a profit and a saving. Gatti-Casazza tucked away, as a reserve fund, over a million dollars, systematically accumulated in years of Metropolitan prosperity. He was correctly criticized for a certain conservatism and parsimoniousness in such matters, for example, as new scenery necessary for "The Ring"—necessary even then.

Only now, as we know, has this scenery been provided, though not with unmitigated success.

Gatti's years have faded into the distance. But the problems they involved have not disappeared. It is reasonable to ask how he provided so much at the time when it was fashionable and unthinking to minimize his remarkable administrative and artistic achievements, to exaggerate shortcomings and freely to prophesy for the incoming regime extensions of repertory and accessories not as necessary then as they are today, and attendant excellences which at the time were outside the limits of possibility. Now these criticisms, predictions, promissory notes, as it were, have come due. The Metropolitan can no longer excuse artistic limitations of its offerings on grounds of emergency or of insuperable handicaps that prevent representative performances and repertory. The organization must make good in at least the degree that it did in the past or lose reputation.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE

JAN 29 1948

Caroline Dwight Appointed to Festival Position

Miss Caroline B. Dwight

Miss Caroline B. Dwight of Stockbridge, for the past two years secretary of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, has been appointed subscription manager of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, it was announced today by George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Dwight succeeds Miss Elizabeth B. Bliss of Pittsfield, who resigned early this month to take a secretarial position with the Foxhollow School in Lenox.

The daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry W. Dwight of Stockbridge, Miss Dwight was graduated from Smith College in 1944. After graduation she spent a year with the Civil Aeronautics Authority as a research assistant in Washington, resigning to become a Red Cross field assistant attached to the Navy. She served a year and a half, mostly in the Boston area.

The new appointment will mean only a change of rooms in Symphony Hall for Miss Dwight, since her Friends of the Berkshire Music Center job under National Chairman Lewis Perry, former headmaster of Phillips Academy at Exter, required her to work out of the Boston offices of the orchestra during the winter season.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY

JAN 31 1948

MUSICAL EVENTS

Orchestral

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who almost always has some novelty to offer, has now introduced to New York "The Return of Pushkin," an elegy for "high voice and orchestra," recently composed by Nikolai Nabokov. The high voice was that of Marina Koshetz; the orchestra was, of course, the Boston Symphony; and the scene was Carnegie Hall. The music, a setting of a poem in which Pushkin described his impressions on returning to the scene of his exile, is very well written, but possibly a bit more reserved than necessary. Miss Koshetz sang with considerable understanding. She also sang, quite handsomely, the letter scene from Tschaikowsky's opera "Eugene Onegin," based on the Pushkin narrative poem. Mr. Koussevitzky's leadership of the operatics was so persuasive that one wishes he'd go to work on a full-scale opera here sometime. For good measure, there was Debussy's "La Damoiselle Elue," in which the Wellesley College Choir assisted capably and Miss Koshetz and Eunice Alberts were excellent soloists. To send the audience home with a big curtain-dropper, there was a vigorous demonstration of Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

—ROBERT A. SIMON

Braves
Hear Symphony

ure imagination but Boston Symphony Or even a shade more annual Constitution
st night.

ere was nothing un rogram—Prokofieff's mphony, Hindemith's
Painter" and Tschai Symphony. But the ved these familiar at freshness and ani
the excitable Serge onducted with greater ever.

presence of President man and daughter, ided the extra-musi

was President Tru
oncert in eight days,
nd for speculation.
come a long way
rry Widow Waltz" out to get the music

the serious music nd the vast number
g given in the coun vote might easily defection.

ast night was the Boston Symphony's
erformance gave the nsight into this stir e, perhaps, realized why Hindemith is ering composers of sky, too, was some tion—of the mag

sources of the or Koussevitzky's re granted any musi natter how many ducted it before.

---

cellulose, and so might get nourishment from the ising at this writing

TOSCANINI AND KOUSSEVITZKY EVENTS

Jan-19

ARTURO TOSCANINI will conduct Verdi's "Requiem" at a special concert at Carnegie Hall on April 26. Like all his recent appearances at which admission has been charged, it will be a benefit performance. This time the beneficiary will be the New York Infirmary for Women and Children, which has been staffed entirely by women doctors since it was founded ninety years ago by America's woman medical pioneer, Elizabeth Blackwell.

It is likely to profit to the tune of about $50,000, for seats will be sold in the form of contributions. It will take a $25 contribution to sit in the orchestra, one of $15 to sit in the first balcony and one of $10 for the second balcony. Those who want a box seating six will have to contribute $250. The money will be turned in as part of the infirmary's current drive for $5,000,000 to build a new hospital. Mrs. David Sarnoff is heading the committee organized to support the concert.

Mr. Toscanini will use the Collegiate Chorale trained by Robert Shaw. Both Mr. Shaw and the singers are donating their services and Local 802 of the American Federation of Musicians has given members of the NBC Symphony Orchestra permission to waive a performance fee should they choose to do so. The soloists are still to be announced, though it is believed the soprano will be Herva Nelli, who was the Desdemona in the conductor's recent broadcasts of "Otello."

Mr. Toscanini's last public concert in Carnegie Hall was in February, 1945, when he conducted a benefit for the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis. His last performance of Verdi's "Requiem" took place in November, 1940, for the Alma Gluck Zimbalist Memorial of Roosevelt Hospital.

To Lead Juilliard Band

Serge Koussevitzky is coming to New York in May to conduct the Juilliard Orchestra and Chorus in a performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The concert is part of a plan to give students of the school the chance to play under master conductors.

It will also boost the prestige of the school's public concerts at Carnegie Hall, which were started last season. Dr. Koussevitzky's appearance will be the last of a series of three.

The series last year consisted of two concerts, both devoted to contemporary American music. This year David Diamond's Fourth Symphony will be the only United States work. It will be played at the first concert on Feb. 22, along with Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements and Beethoven's Seventh. Edgar Schenkman, head of the school's orchestra department, will conduct. Bach's "Passion According to St. John," conducted by Robert Shaw, will comprise the second concert on April 5.

Art—Music—Theater Ja 24 ★9

Fourth Symphony

Bernstein Also Conducts Full Score of 'Petrouchka'

By L. A. Sloper

Leonard Bernstein is conducting the Boston Symphony concerts this week and next, during Dr. Koussevitzky's midwinter vacation. For the thirteenth program of the season, played yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Mr. Bernstein submitted the following pieces: Beethoven, Symphony No. 2 in D major; Diamond, Symphony No. 4; Stravinsky, "Pétrouchka," a Burlesque in four scenes.

Mr. Diamond's Fourth Symphony, like so many other works we are hearing this season, was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and is dedicated to Mme Natalie Koussevitzky. We have heard here Mr. Diamond's Second Symphony, which made a very good impression, and his "Rounds for Orchestra," which did not fare so well.

* * *

This symphony, like the Second, is remarkable for its odd form, its good technique, and its emotional power expressed through recognizable themes. The composer has relaxed his customary reticence about its possible content to the degree of telling us that the work "was created with the idea of life and death." Quite an order, which he has undertaken to fill in three movements lasting 18 minutes.

The first two are very attractive. The first, an Allegretto, has lively tunes, a cheerful and carefree mood. You can forget about sonata-form and enjoy it. The second (Andante) is somewhat more serious, with a chorale-like opening theme which returns toward the end. The final Allegro is a lively, bustling movement, which ends by becoming monotonous.

Mr. Diamond speaks of "a Mercury-like, sometimes elfish intrusion which I have invented, whose magical, unpremeditated presence intrudes itself here and there as the movement gains momentum." I think this elfin figure must have been what bothered me. Mr. Diamond is much more persuasive when his feet are planted firmly on the ground.

* * *

The "Pétrouchka" music was said to be the full score of the ballet. It is rather long, but I think it is worth playing. "Pétrouchka" is one of Stravinsky's masterpieces, the product of his youth, before he wandered into barren ways, gave himself up to "back-to-somebody-or-other" movements, and talked music instead of writing it. As a composer he is a master; as a philosopher he is confused. It is well to hear "Pétrouchka" and "Le Sacre" occasionally, just to restore the musician.

Mr. Bernstein secured a flowing performance of the Diamond and a lively one of the Stravinsky, with rhythmic precision but with some details obscure which are better brought out. The reading of the Beethoven was uneven. The first movement went very well and so did the Scherzo, but the Larghetto was over-interpreted instead of being allowed to sing for itself, and the Finale was rushed. Mr. Bernstein in his enthusiasm still tends to dance a symphony (though not so much as Mr. Munch) and he still uses many gestures reminiscent of Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 25 1948

NOVELTY AT OPE[illegible]

Forthcoming 'Peter Grimes' Only Break In Familiar Metropolitan Repertory

By OLIN DOWNES

THE one important novelty of the current Metropolitan Opera season, Benjamin Britten's "Peter Grimes," first heard in America at Tanglewood two seasons ago, will have its New York première about two weeks hence.

This opera has undeniably original characteristics. How it will rank as musical theatre, on a big stage, in an immense auditorium in place of the intimate interior at the Berkshire Music Centre, is to be seen. But that is not the first consideration. The first consideration is that Metropolitan audiences have now a right to hear new and important modern opera.

It is true that fewer operas calculated to stick in the repertory have appeared in the last thirty-five years than in any other period of similar length in modern history. Why this is the case is an inquiry far beyond this article. But the fact has often been cited, and has been advanced with plausibility in explaining why the Metropolitan has produced virtually no new operas during Mr. Johnson's regime, now in its twelfth season. The explanation is familiar. It has been repeatedly advanced in these columns. The Metropolitan must balance its budget. New works calculated to pay if they are produced are conspicuous by absence.

Word of Praise

This department has often praised Mr. Johnson and his associates for having made their lyric theatre's repertory as inclusive and as balanced as it has become under these imposed circumstances. As it stands, the repertory is more inclusive of worth-while operas of all schools and periods than the repertory of any other lyric theatre in the world. Nor has this been merely the case in the late war years or those immediately following. The shortage has been in the modern field and in regard to novelties. The Metropolitan has presented fewer new works during the twelve years of Mr. Johnson's incumbency than it did in any one season of the preceding twenty-five years, if one excepts Gatti-Casazza's last season of 1934-35

IN DEBUT

James Abresch

Carmen Gracia, soprano, sings Rosina at Metropolitan Thursday.

But there are certain distinctions, in point of repertory and producing problems, between the past and present regimes at the Metropolitan, which it is perhaps appropriate to reflect upon here.

The Metropolitan since the departure of Gatti-Casazza, and its successful emergence from the depression of the time, has had certain great advantages which Gatti-Casazza did not enjoy.

The Metropolitan, for example, has received as a free gift from the public $1,000,000 in one big donation, to be added to the receipt of an earlier $300,000 and a donation of $50,000 from the Juilliard Foundation. Its theatre has been made tax exempt. It pays its singers less than ever before in its history. It has also receipts from radio broadcasts, and it plays, as already observed, normally to packed houses.

Ensemble Stressed

The Metropolitan abjures "star" casts, less from choice than from necessity. It has a few exceptional voices and exceptional artists in its ranks, but emphasizes the principle of ensemble. On notable occasions, under great conductors, such ensembles have been achieved, but finished ensembles have by no means been the invariable rule, particularly this season. These defects have been explained partly on the grounds of exceptional misfortune in the bad health, not only of expected singers, but of principal conductors. However, in sum it would appear that with considerable financial aid from outside, and other practical advantages, and with production at as low a cost as the constantly rising wage scales of unions and attendant circumstances would permit, the Metropolitan has done considerably less where variety and modernity of repertory and brilliancy of casts are concerned, than it did up to the time of Mr. Gatti-Casazza's departure.

He provided a repertory that had new works of every sort and description, averaging from three to six novelties a season, with the inclusion of from one to three American operas and ballets, new or repeated, each season. He paid his singers much more than they are paid today, whereby he had more control of their engagements. He charged what is practically the present rate for seats, and he did this at a very substantial profit. His repertory ranged from "Norma," "Vestale," "Cosi fan tutte," "Serva Padrona," to "Electra," "Turandot," "Johnny spielt auf," "L'Heure Espagnole," Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" (ballet), Taylor's "Peter Ibbetson," Gruenberg's "Emperor Jones," and the première of Hanson's "Merry Mount," the latter three in a single season. This was done at a profit and a saving. Gatti-Casazza tucked away, as a reserve fund, over a million dollars, systematically accumulated in years of Metropolitan prosperity. He was correctly criticized for a certain conservatism and parsimoniousness in such matters, for example, as new scenery necessary for "The Ring"—necessary even then.

Only now, as we know, has this scenery been provided, though not with unmitigated success.

Gatti's years have faded into the distance. But the problems they involved have not disappeared. It is reasonable to ask how he provided so much at the time when it was fashionable and unthinking to minimize his remarkable administrative and artistic achievements, to exaggerate shortcomings and freely to prophesy for the incoming regime extensions of repertory and accessories not as necessary then as they are today, and attendant excellences which at the time were outside the limits of possibility. Now these criticisms, predictions, promissory notes, as it were, have come due. The Metropolitan can no longer excuse artistic limitations of its offerings on grounds of emergency or of insuperable handicaps that prevent representative performances and repertory. The organization must make good in at least the degree that it did in the past or lose reputation.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
BERKSHIRE EAGLE
JAN 29 1948

C

Caroline Dwight Appointed to Festival Position

Miss Caroline B. Dwight

Miss Caroline B. Dwight of Stockbridge, for the past two years secretary of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, has been appointed subscription manager of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, it was announced today by George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symph[illegible].

Miss Dwight succeeds Miss Elizabeth B. Bliss of Pittsfield, who resigned early this month to take a secretarial position with the Foxhollow School in Lenox.

The daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry W. Dwight of Stockbridge, Miss Dwight was graduated from Smith College in 1944. After graduation she spent a year with the Civil Aeronautics Authority as a research assistant in Washington, resigning to become a Red Cross field assistant attached to the Navy. She served a year and a half, mostly in the Boston area.

The new appointment will mean only a change of rooms in Symphony Hall for Miss Dwight, since her Friends of the Berkshire Music Center job under National Chairman Lewis Perry, former headmaster of Phillips Academy at Exter, required her to work out of the Boston offices of the orchestra during the winter season.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK CITY
JAN 31 1948

MUSICAL EVENTS

Orchestral

w

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who almost always has some novelty to offer, has now introduced to New York "The Return of Pushkin," an elegy for "high voice and orchestra," recently composed by Nikolai Nabokov. The high voice was that of Marina Koshetz; the orchestra was, of course, the Boston Symphony; and the scene was Carnegie Hall. The music, a setting of a poem in which Pushkin described his impressions on returning to the scene of his exile, is very well written, but possibly a bit more reserved than necessary. Miss Koshetz sang with considerable understanding. She also sang, quite handsomely, the letter scene from Tschaikowsky's opera "Eugene Onegin," based on the Pushkin narrative poem. Mr. Koussevitzky's leadership of the operatics was so persuasive that one wishes he'd go to work on a full-scale opera here sometime. For good measure, there was Debussy's "La Damoiselle Elue," in which the Wellesley College Choir assisted capably and Miss Koshetz and Eunice Alberts were excellent soloists. To send the audience home with a big curtain-dropper, there was a vigorous demonstration of Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

—ROBERT A. SIMON

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Two symphonies by young composers of unusual talents, were played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Leanord Bernstein in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was the 14th in the regular week end series and will be repeated tonight. The symphonic offerings followed an ingratiating performance of Weber's Overture to "Der Freischutz."

The first of the two featured works on the program was the Symphony for Classical Orchestra by Harold Shapero, who is a Greater Boston resident in his 28th year. Mr. Shapero composed the work on commission from Dr. Koussevitzky, having previously won outstanding awards, including the Prix de Rome.

The other symphony was the first one by a young man named Robert Schumann, who lived in Leipsic at the time it was published in 1841. One hundred and seven years have not dimmed its beauty, and it is likely that it will still be played another century hence.

To make any such prophecy for the Shapero symphony would be optimistic in the extreme. It is a skillfully wrought work, undoubtedly more cleverly orchestrated than the Schumann. Written in the neo-classic style stemming from Stravinski, it is full of syncopated effects and off beat entrances in an harmonic setting sometimes pungent and sometimes tedious. The most interesting movement was the second due to its better melodic line. The other movements suffer from too many cut up rhythmic figurations. If speed and intensity and punch are criterions for the excellence of the interpretation of the work, Mr. Bernstein did a first rate job with it.

The Schumann "Spring" Symphony, regardless of what the theorists say about its scoring, remains a work of true, musical genius.

How fresh the thematic inventiveness still seems and how persuasive its emotional context. Mr. Bernstein can see eye to eye with Schumann's youthful, white hot enthusiasms and changes of mood. Its typically Schumannesque short figures are just right for the young, American conductor. The longer lines of Beethoven need greater repose than he is able to give, but the exuberance of Schumann is akin to his own. The conductor's failing for excessive speed could not spoil the first movement, and all was gay and appropriate as the ever increasing joys of spring were depicted in the score.

Mr. Shapero and Mr. Bernstein were enthusiastically received by the capacity audience and both were recalled to the stage. With all due credit to both of them, the chief glory of the afternoon remained with Robert Schumann.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky's premier protege, Leonard Bernstein, began a three weeks' term as guest-conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Bernstein is a vital leader, and his programs are never on the negative side. That of yesterday, and this evening, offered the least familiar of the Beethoven symphonies, the Second, the new Fourth Symphony of David Diamond, and, for the first time here in concert form, the complete score of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka."

You really have to hand it to Dr. Koussevitzky; he has made orchestra-conducting a form of big business. In his school at Tanglewood he trains conductors, such as Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho, who has already appeared here this season, while through the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, established in the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, he commissions works, such as this Symphony of Mr. Diamond. Thus, even when his actual presence is not manifest, his influence is felt. At the previous concert we heard a commissioned symphony from Walter Piston and next week will come another from Harold Shapero. Mr. Diamond's piece was a little easier to take at first hearing than Mr. Piston's, but I have a feeling that it wouldn't wear as well. It is relatively short, lasting less than 20 minutes, and, as modern symphonies go, quite obviously tuneful. However, you do not feel that a strong individuality is expressing itself, and the third and final movement is almost trivial.

Mr. Bernstein's reading of the Beethoven Second was sane, solid and substantial, though not sufficiently illuminating to bring what is probably the feeblest of the nine fully to life. While unquestionably a work of genius, "Petrouchka" is less effective in the concert hall than either "The Fire Bird," which preceded it, or the revolutionary "Rite of Spring," which followed it. The music is intimately connected with the action and, deprived of it, frequently loses point and significance. If that is true of the ballet in its customary curtailed concert form, it is even more true of a complete performance, interesting as it was to hear the music of the usually omitted third scene. Ballet music, which he himself composes, is right down Mr. Bernstein's alley, and yesterday's performance, with Lucas Foss to give a brilliant account of the piano part, was a memorable one.

Ja 31

BOSTON HERALD, SAT

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 14th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Der Freischuets" .... Weber
Symphony for Classical Orchestra Shapero
Symphony No. 1 in B flat major Op. 38 Schumann

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Mr. Bernstein designed and brilliantly executed a nicely balanced program yesterday, with the first performance of a modern symphony in the classic spirit enshrined by two of the choicest flowers of the German Romantics. The elements also contributed to Mr. Bernstein's success, for when could the 'Spring" Symphony have sounded more welcome than in the dead of a winter such as that described in "Pelleas and Melisande"?

Yesterday's premiere was that of Harold Shapero's Symphony (for classical orchestra), and the composer was on hand to acknowledge the very cordial applause, interspersed with a few bravos. That the public is given a broad hint in the designation, "Classical," towards an understanding of the music goes without saying. Inevitably, too, Mr. Shapero will have to stand hearing his work mentioned as influenced by Prokofieff.

Actually of course, few if any composers write in a vacuum; and, that being the case, surely Prokofieff is as good a model as any? Moreover, Mr. Shapero is no slavish imitator; and any symphony that harks in spirit and form back to Haydn and Mozart is bound to bring up a facile comparison with Prokofieff. So much for that.

It is another axiom that any long work by a young composer is bound to be solemn, to reflect in musical terms upon the parlous times we live in and to draw gloomy conclusions. But Mr. Shapero has first of all written music full of varying and fertile melodies. Furthermore they are prevailingly bouyant or lyrically graceful, exuberant or gay. Even the adagietto—and how right that term is—does not grow sombre. It is a particularly lovely weaving of melodic invention. Again, Mr. Shapero in asking for an orchestra such as Haydn called for has scored skillfully and has used his smaller wind group to the full and usually happy effect. Finally, he has shown an amazing rhythmical diversity, which may make the Symphony difficult to play but also keeps the interest of the listener keen. Although it is an exceedingly ingratiating work that must not be allowed to gather dust on the shelf.

Weber's popular, but at our concerts not often heard, "Freischuetz" Overture was played last Tuesday night with resounding emphasis and repeated yesterday with the same successful results. Mr. Bernstein has gone on record in his programs of being an admirer of Schumann. It is true that his Symphonies require the sympathetic conductor's hand more than most. Mr. Bernstein played the "Spring" Symphony in a spirit of ardent an dexultant romanticism, which suited it.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 25 1948

MUSIC ON THE RADIO

By B. H. HAGGIN

NEITHER the final (Dec. 28) program of C. B. S.'s Invitation to Music, a group of excerpts from "Aida" with the two soprano arias sung by Eileen Farrell, nor the originally scheduled program that it replaced, a group of operatic arias sung by Cloe Elmo, conformed to the terms of Invitation's charter, so to speak. But Beethoven's Mass in C, broadcast a week earlier, was a first-rate example of the unusual music, deserving the hearings it doesn't get, that Invitation was set up to present to radio listeners.

The great Missa Solemnis they have had some acquaintance with through Toscanini's broadcast performances with the New York Philharmonic and the N. B. C. Symphony. But my own first opportunity to hear the Mass in C was a performance at Princeton University in May, 1946. And then I discovered that it was a work with some startlingly beautiful and expressive passages and powerful dramatic strokes, all on the small scale of an early try at something which—attempted again many years later—would come out with the grandly sustained beauty, dramatic power and inner illumination of the Missa.

It was, then, a work decidedly worth broadcasting; and Invitation to Music did a handsome job: the music was beautifully sung by Shirlee Emmons, soprano; Sally Moore, contralto; William Hess, tenor, and Paul Matthen, bass, with Robert Shaw's chorus and the C. B. S. Symphony, under Mr. Shaw's direction. Also, the work asts about three-quarters of an hour and C. B. S. was induced to make this one of the rare occasions for extending Invitation's normal half-hour period to an hour. Should one exclaim: "Noble, noble C. B. S!"? I will not—thinking rather of the normal meager and inadequate half-hour period and of all the works it must have prevented Invitation from broadcasting, and thinking also of the scheduling of the program at 11:30 p. m., so that in my own case the Beethoven Mass was cut off at midnight by the Boston hotel in which I happened to be on Dec. 21, and other listeners in their own apartments were either unable to listen at that late hour or unable to operate their radios at a sufficiently high volume-level.

* * *

The Beethoven Nocturne Opus 42 for viola and piano, which was played by Emanuel Vardi and Earl Wild on WJZ's Jan. 11 Coffee Concert, turned out to be some one's arrangement of the charming Serenade Opus 8 for string trio; and the justification for playing this arrangement rather than Beethoven's original was that he hadn't objected to the arrangement—which strikes me not at all as a justification for playing the arrangement but rather as a revelation of the strange workings of the minds at WJZ. The performance was a good one; but I would have preferred a good performance of the Serenade.

On N. B. C.'s Dec. 20 Orchestras of the Nation the Louisville Philharmonic gave a lively performance of an unfamiliar symphony of Haydn, No. 55, under the direction of Robert Whitney. On Jan. 3 the Kansas City Philharmonic under Efrem Kurtz gave a wooden performance of Mozart's Symphony K. 319, and was heard also in Weaver's Fugue for strings, which introduced in fugal style an idea which it developed in an intensely expressive melodic rather than fugal style. And on Jan. 10 the Pittsburgh Symphony under Vladimir Bakaleinikoff played Gretchaninoff's Symphony No. 5, with a first movement like that of Borodin's B minor in its obsessive manipulation of a single rhythmic idea, and the rest like all the other nationalist Russian music in its use of folk song and folk dance material.

Of Kleiber's broadcasts with the N. B. C. Symphony I was able to hear a straightforward performance of Schubert's Fifth Symphony, and, on the other hand, a performance of the Johann Strauss "Kuenstlerleben" Waltz with exaggerated changes of pace that made it a caricature of the traditional Viennese waltz style.

The outstanding characteristic of Schubert's great C major Symphony is its momentum, which in the end creates its effect of grandeur. And the defect in Szell's otherwise admirable performance of the work with the Philadelphia Orchestra (C. B. S., Jan. 17) was that it did not sustain the momentum in the scherzo movement and actually broke it with occasional retardations in the other movements.

On the Boston Symphony's Jan. 13 broadcast over WJZ Koussevitzky showed how HE played the Theme and Variations and the Adagio of the Mozart Divertimento K. 287 that Toscanini broadcast last fall. And his way turned out to be a series of grotesquely inappropriate and unrelated tempos in the variations, a silky, placidly uninflected delivery of the long impassioned cantilena of the Adagio—all of which revealed as complete a lack of understanding of what the music was about as it is possible for any one to have. There are musicians in that orchestra who must have been ashamed of what they were made to do in this performance.

Here are some programs of the week:

Today—A. M.: Biggs organ recital, C. B. S., 9:15; Mozart's "Figaro," WNYC, 10. P. M.: Stravinsky's "Firebird," played by the WOR Orchestra under Levin, WOR, 1:30; quartets of Mozart, Barber and Beethoven, played by the Budapest Quartet at the Frick Collection, WNYC, 3; choral works of Bach and Hindemith, sung by Shaw's Collegiate Chorale, WABF (FM), 5:30; quartets of Hadyn and Borodin, played by the WQXR Quartet, WQXR, 6; works by Beethoven, Britten and Berlioz, WQXR, 8; concert by the National Association of American Composers and Conductors, WNYC, 8:30; harpsichord pieces by Couperin, played by Yella Pessl, WQXR, 10.

Monday—P. M.: Bach's Concerto in C minor for violin and oboe, WQXR, 8; New Jersey Symphony, Samuel Antek conducting, Mischa Mischakoff, violin soloist, WNJR, 8:30

Tuesday—P. M.: Bach Aria Group, WNYC, 8:30.

Wednesday—P. M.: Prokofieff's Symphony No. 5, WQXR, 8:15.

Friday—P M: Concert at the Juilliard School, WNYC, 8:30; recorded performances by Schnabel, WQXR, 9:45.

Saturday—P. M.: Schubert's Quartet in D minor, WNYC, 1; Schubert's Symphony in C major, WNYC, 7; Haydn's Quartet Opus 74 No. 3, WQXR, 11.

RODZINSKI IN AMENDS FOR STORM

Critic in Chicago Hears Brilliant Performance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH
(Delayed in Transmission)

CHICAGO, Jan. 2—Even if the Windy City's weatherman did see fit to greet a visiting music critic with the worst storm in several years, its orchestra, under its new conductor, Artur Rodzinski, made amends by providing a very fine concert. And while I wouldn't have wished the storm on my worst enemy, I am sorry that some of my Boston friends could not have accompanied me to Orchestra Hall Thursday evening.

HUB TOO COMPLACENT

The trouble with us is that we are too complacent, and the sort of success that Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony achieved here a short while ago merely has us saying "I told you so." When the Chicago Orchestra last visited Boston, Frederick Stock, its second conductor in more than 50 years, was still at the helm, and those with long enough memories were forcibly reminded of the Boston Symphony of an earlier day. The prevailing spirit was one of solid Teutonism. In the meantime, two French conductors and a Russian had got our orchestra thoroughly de-Germanized. It is barely possible, you know, that the pendulum has swung too far the other way. If we are excited by caviar, we are better nourished by roast beef.

The conductor between Dr. Stock and Dr. Rodzinski out here was Desire Defauw. He certainly was not stolid, yet it would appear that he was not too well liked. Rodzinski is not stolid, either, but he is a sound, as well as a brilliant man with a particular flair for the romantic music of the late 19th and early 20th centuries, well exemplified last evening in the performances of Dvorak's Cello Concerto, with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, and the entrancing "Walk to the Paradise Garden" from Delius' "A Village Romeo and Juliet," that Boston last heard from Sir Thomas Beecham. Perhaps we could do with a bit of Delius now and then. After all, the British composer has his passionate admirers.

Eloquence No Surprise

I was not surprised by the eloquence of these performances or by Dr. Rodzinski's excellent reading of Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony. But, frankly, I had not expected to sit up and take notice when conductor and orchestra, at the end of the concert, turned their attention to that specialty of Koussevitzky's, Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

In the greenroom afterward, I said to Rodzinski, "That is Koussevitzy's piece, but you showed me a thing or two. I never heard the 'Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle' one made so irrestibly funny." "Oh," said Rodzinski, "I changed it a little," and he hummed a phrase. "And, you know, the two of them should not be in the same tempo." It is evident that among Rodzinski's gifts must be included a rare graphic sense; each of these pictures was so sharply delineated. And he had a virtuoso orchestra—ours isn't the only one—to help him out.

I am just sorry that my visit to Chicago could not have included one or the other of Rodzinski's two great triumphs of the present season, the stage performance in the Opera House of Wagner's "Tristan," with Flagstad and Svanholm, and the concert version of Strauss' "Elektra," in which Marjorie Lawrence, standing for the first time since her illness, sang the title role. To my voiced regret over missing the last-named, the conductor merely replied that "'Tristan' was better." From all acounts, both were remarkable.

[69]

Dr. Koussevitzky gave an impressive reading

Announcing the sponsorship of the

Boston Symphony Orchestra

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Music Director

To be heard in Greater Boston and Vicinity each Tuesday evening 9:30 to 10:30 over Station WCOP, 1150 on your radio dial.

* *

WORTHY OF YOUR TRUST

OLD COLONY TRUST COMPANY

ONE FEDERAL STREET, BOSTON
T. JEFFERSON COOLIDGE, Chairman, Trust Committee
ROBERT CUTLER, President

Allied with THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF BOSTON

E BOSTON HERALD, SA

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 13th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 2 in D major Op. 36	Beethoven
Symphony No. 4	Diamond
"Petrouchka"	Stravinsky

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Leonard Bernstein, making his annual visit to the Boston Symphony as guest-conductor, gave us an animated and entertaining concert yesterday. He brings plenty of youthful elan to his readings, but that is not to make the charge that he gingers things up merely for the sake of the spice. Witness, for instance; his eminently just tempo in and clear articulation of the scherzo of Beethoven's 2d Symphony.

David Diamond's 4th Symphony was given its first performance yesterday, and the composer was on hand to acknowledge the applause—more polite, I should judge, than enthusiastic. This reaction was perhaps due to the finale which seemed on a first hearing by far the most confused and meandering of the three. In such a short work it was odd to receive the impression that it was over-long. The composer evidently had considerable philosophical agitation going on in his mind at the time of composing this movement. He has, at any rate, imparted the murkiness of this meditation to the music with some success.

Mr. Bernstein then proceeded to lead a most stimulating performance of Stravinsky's 37-year-old score, "Petrouchka," in its complete form, thereby including the scene at the Moor's which is usually omitted at concerts. There are those who claim to get little out of "Petrouchka" minus the action on the stage. Since I am not by way of being a balletomane, I cannot agree with them. The music is still fascinating and freakish and, with only a little help from the program, is both amusing and exciting to listen to.

The orchestra is at present decimated by illness. It is therefore a pleasure to be able to report on the excellence with which the second or third desk men accomplished the many difficult solos. Special citations should go to Mr. Pappoutsakis for his admirable flute playing and to Mr. Herforth for his trumpet solo in the Moor's scene. Mr. Foss' piano solo was, of course, fine.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Bernstein will lead Weber's Overture to "Der Freischuetz," Harold Shapero's Symphony, and Schumann's 1st Symphony in B flat major.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

[illegible] back again [illegible] the Boston [illegible] at whose [illegible] the next three [illegible] ram brings [illegible] of Beethoven, [illegible] phony by Da- [illegible] "Petrouchka" [illegible] nsky.

[illegible] Mr. Bernstein [illegible] of technic [illegible] interpretation [illegible] time his once [illegible] for the most [illegible] down. He was [illegible] ently heard [illegible] Beethoven, [illegible] d style, and [illegible] the music

[illegible] th Sym- [illegible] the new [illegible] ton Sym- commissioned Music Founda- [illegible] the memory [illegible] evitzky. It [illegible] ts, of which [illegible] lyrical, the [illegible] movement, [illegible] composer cor- [illegible] mbination of [illegible] finale. These [illegible] first. [illegible] not avoid melo- [illegible] remarkable [illegible] composers, and the first movement of this Symphony is notably songful. It is the best movement, too, for the others are as mixed in their idiom as Mr. Diamond's program notes about the work are confusing. It would be futile to attempt to grasp this music after one hearing. Let us hear it again. One thing is evident, however, and that is the clear, forceful quality of the writing for orchestra. Mr. Diamond was present and bowed in acknowledgement of applause.

Mr. Bernstein chose to play all of "Petrouchka" instead of the usual excerpts. This was fine for those who appreciated the chance to hear this tricky and wonderfully colored score done by a first-rate orchestra, but to some it must have seemed disjointed without stage action to tie it together. On the whole the performance was eloquent, but there were numerous hurried and untidy details. The performance, too, brought out some Mr. Bernstein's less attractive physical mannerisms. After all, you don't have to dance to conduct a dance score.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 22 1948

Concert Led By Bernstein At Bushnell

Boston Symphony Is Heard in Beethoven, Stravinsky, Ravel

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Leonard Bernstein, was presented in the Bushnell series at the Memorial auditorium Tuesday night. The program:

Symphony No. 2, D Major	Beethoven
Petrouchka Suite	Stravinsky
La Valse	Ravel

In making his second appearance in this city as a conductor, Leonard Bernstein gave the cash customers an even break at the Bushnell last night. After leading the Boston Symphony through a most unrewarding performance of Beethoven's Second Symphony, he squared things up after intermission by providing tingling accounts of the Stravinsky "Petrouchka" Suite and Ravel's "La Valse."

Mr. Bernstein's manner of conducting is now something like a mild conniption fit. For every score he provides a frenetic choreography on the podium. Advancing nearly a measure ahead of his players, he directs them through their musical maneuvers with batonless gestures part reminiscent of Serge Koussevitsky, whose Phaeton-son he is, and part of Nijinsky.

Last night this was generally rewarded with tense, galvanic performance and music of machine-made precision all down the line. This seemed to be what Mr. Bernstein had in mind and what he demanded with almost tyrannic insistance from his men.

Graceless Beethoven.

As it turned out, the idea was not ill-suited to the moderns on the program but it certainly made a keen disappointment out of one of Beethoven's friendliest symphonies. Under Mr. Bernstein's reading and direction it turned out to be grim and graceless. This surprised me considerably, as I somehow felt the conductor would take it with a becoming show of poetry and lyricism. Instead, he drove into it fiercely in both end movements, setting out the wonderful little larghetto and brief scherzo and trio, stiffly and with cold fancies. The speed with which he launched the final movement quickly had various sections of the orchestra playing at different tempi as the naturally slower paced instruments breathlessly tried to keep up with the natively more nimble brothers. And Mr. Bernstein himself executed something of a fandango on the conductor's stand.

But on returning to the podium after intermission, he had tempered his mannerisms considerably, and if he maintained much the same musical temper, it was of course far more apt for the vehemences and mechanistics of Stravinsky and the macabre, nightmarish "La Valse" with which the program came to a bang-up conclusion.

Bizarre 'Petrouchka.'

The "Petrouchka" remains a pretty incredible score, in the content, a handsomely bizarre work. Mr. Bernstein found no trouble with its intricacies of style, its brilliant vagaries of orchestration, its quixotic moods. He made it sound and resound. He reveled in its milling atmosphere, its burlesques, and he caught the curious tenderness, quite authentic, which underlies the whole work. It was highly sensitive reading, both technically and interpretatively.

And of course, when it came to "La Valse," Mr. Berstein just about took it in his teeth and shook it. That's the way it has to be done, of course. It brooks no orchestral restraint, nor any temperance in its delirium of mood. If it doesn't leave you feeling just a little queazy at the pit of the stomach, it hasn't been really read right. Mr. Bernstein had me reaching for a sedative.

The orchestra itself played hard and finely all across the program, all except where Mr. Bernstein's demands got it off stride. All except that trumpet in "Petrouchka." It has been trained to do magnificent things with modern writing, and it did them so last night, big, flashy playing. It has also been trained to do things with elegance and lustrous grace. It is too bad it wasn't given the opportunity in the Beethoven. Mr. Bernstein is a little over-fascinated with the sheer lust of performance. Let him drive a little less near the sun, nearer the music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WAR CRY
JAN 31 1948

New York City Campaign Launched

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Directed By Dr. Koussevitzky, Presents Concert In The Metropolitan Opera House Before Distinguished Crowd Of 3,000; Clinton P. Anderson, Edward J. Noble And Commissioner McMillan Speak

AN extraordinarily brilliant opening was given The Salvation Army's Greater New York Annual Maintenance Appeal for $1,000,000 when on Tuesday evening, January 6, in the Metropolitan Opera House, the world-renowned, 110-piece Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of its distinguished conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, offered a moving performance of great music. The Secretary of Agriculture, Clinton P. Anderson, delivered the keynote address during the concert which was aired nationally via the facilities of the American Broadcasting Company.

Three thousand persons—including the crème de la crème of the city's industrial, financial, educational and political leaders—heard Mr. Anderson pay high tribute to the work of The Salvation Army observed first-hand over a period of many years.

Personalities at the opening meeting of The Salvation Army's Greater New York Annual Maintenance Appeal. Left to right: Charles Edison, former Governor of New Jersey; Clinton P. Anderson, Secretary of Agriculture; Edward J. Noble, General Chairman of the Appeal; Commissioner Donald McMillan, Territorial Commander.

"There is a great deal of satisfaction in being permitted to help open this campaign," he declared, "for all of us have reason to be thankful for this Good Samaritan group and for the opportunity it gives us to share in its work. The Salvation Army has found a most practical way of expressing the ideal of brotherhood.

"About twenty-five years ago, I spent a little time here in New York in the study of social work. I began to appreciate the people who manage our charities, the people who are confronted daily with the events of dire want, the need of unfortunate people for guidance and for the means to keep alive in many of our fellowmen and women the spark of self-respect. That brief experience here in New York opened my eyes to the tremendous importance of the work of The Salvation Army. I shall never forget it.

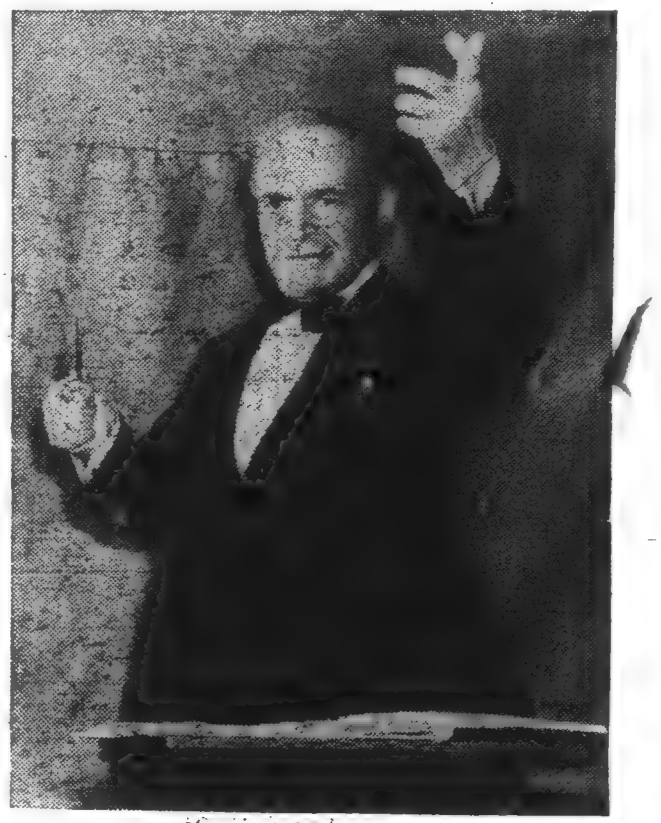
"Some years later, it chanced that I was pulled away from my business to administer the governmental relief program of my home state, New Mexico. Once again I was deeply impressed by the work of The Salvation Army. In addition to the economic sickness of those days, many of our people were spiritually ill. Many felt degraded, lacking in self-esteem; many felt forsaken by their fellowmen and their God. For them The Salvation Army, with other organizations which sought to restore both body and soul, was a tower of strength. If any of us had forgotten the Scriptural truth that man cannot live by bread alone, we rediscovered it then.

"1948 is truly a year of decision. Days of indecision are over. We see the course we must follow in order finally to achieve the ends for which we fought and for which so many of our loved ones gave their lives. The America of good will and good works will act through government and in many individual ways. One of these individual ways is the support of such organizations as The Salvation Army, which puts into practical effect our principles of religion and democracy, restoring the afflicted in body and soul and protecting the dignity of man."

Edward J. Noble, General Chairman of the 1948 Annual Maintenance Appeal and chairman of the Board of the American Broadcasting Company, who announced total advance subscriptions of $297,876, referred to The Salvation Army as "New York City's best-known trouble-shooter" and touched on current campaign organization—200 separate committees in the community with more than 2,500 workers geared to sustain an attack which will carry through to February 21.

"An undertaking of this magnitude is not a one-man job," he said. "This is something that requires the combined help of the best people we can get to work with us. The success of this rally tonight is due, for example, directly to the hard work of Mrs. Walter Hoving, Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith and members of their concert committee.

"On the firing line we also have a championship line-up. Mrs. Taylor Cochran and Walter Hoving head the Women's and Men's Divisions respectively. David Sarnoff is directing all of Commerce and Industry, Walbridge Taft is taking care of Foundations and William Beckers is acting as General Treasurer. This year the boroughs are really organized. In Brooklyn, it is Paul Landon; in the Bronx, Urbain C. Le Gost; and the Queens Chairman is that veteran of so many campaigns, Lester M. Mahoney."



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, world-famous leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a typical action shot. WIDE WORLD PHOTO

Commissioner Donald McMillan, who presented Mr. Noble, expressed The Salvation Army's sincere gratitude to Mr. Anderson and to Dr. Koussevitzky and the members of his orchestra for the special trip they had made from Washington and Boston to help the organization launch this year's Appeal and thanked the crowd for the affection in which it held the Army and the interest in its work. "To you, Mr. Noble, and to all your fellow workers," said the Commissioner in conclusion, "I extend the deep-felt thanks, not only of The Salvation Army, but of the very young and the very old and all those in between who will be comforted spiritually and materially through your efforts for them. God's blessings on you all."

(Continued from page 8)

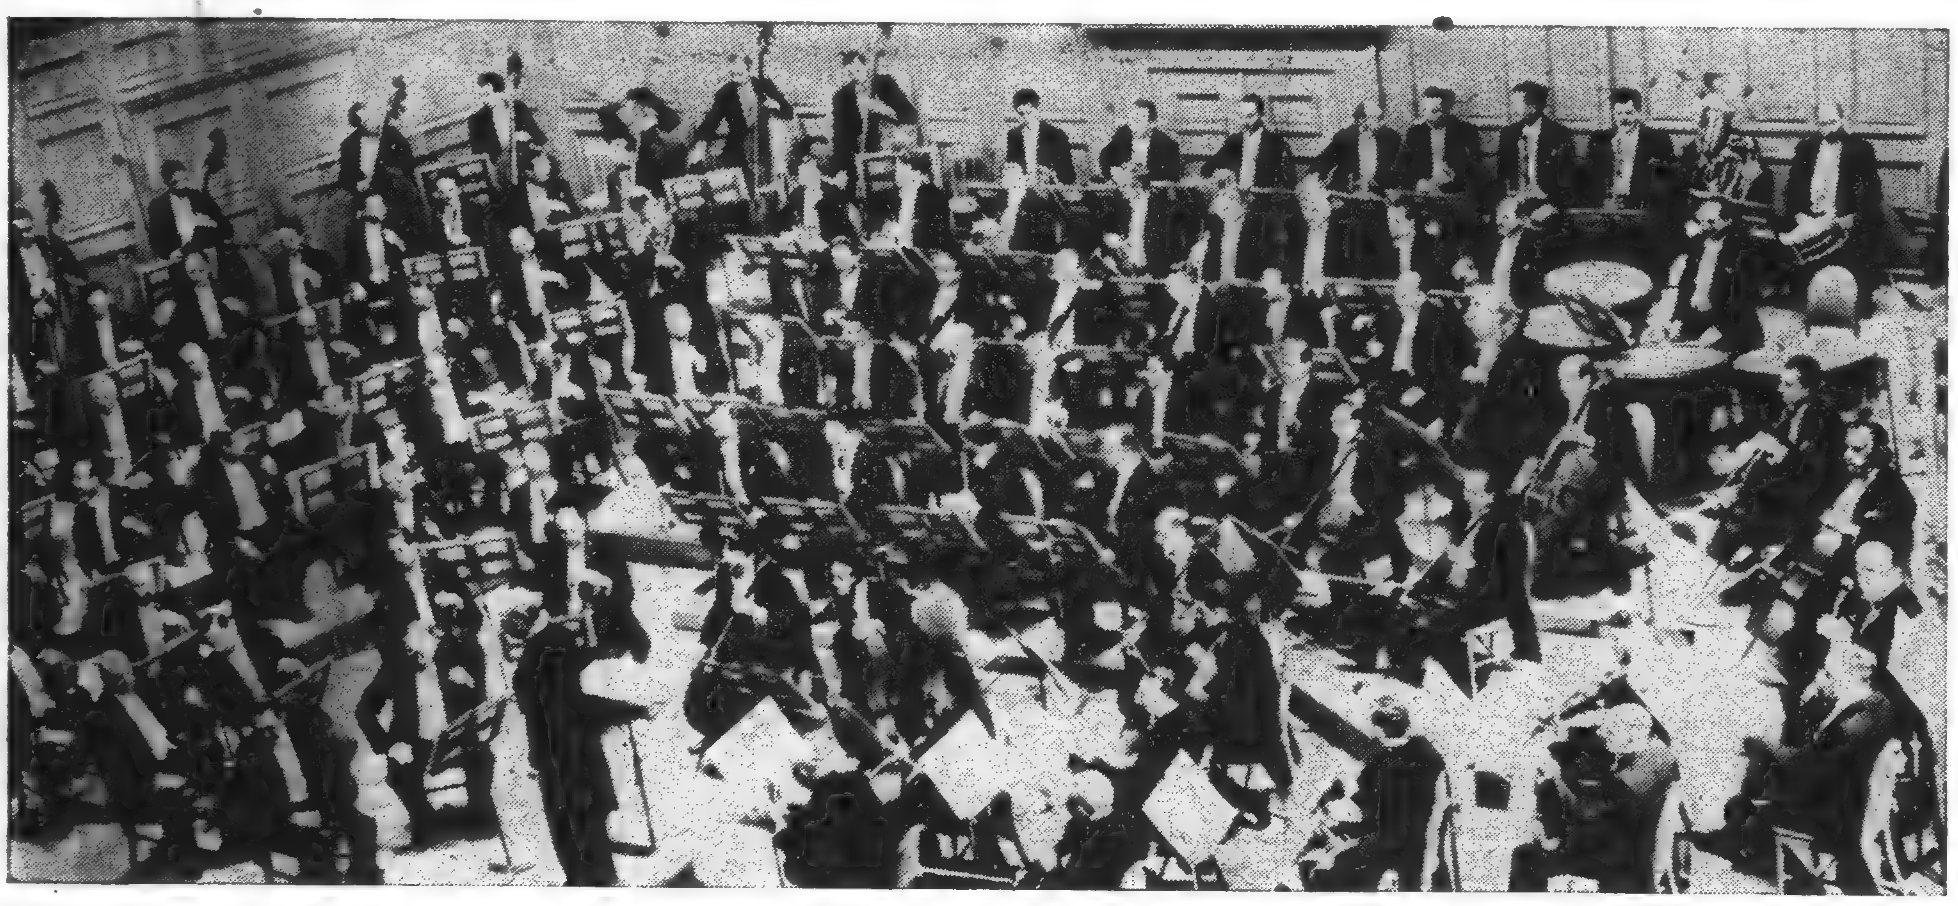
The superb and compelling performance by the orchestra was, to revert to the vernacular, "out of this world," and kept this reporter on the edge of his seat all evening—along with hundreds of others who were equally interested and impressed. It was simply indescribable. Suffice it to say that both numbers played, "Appalachian Spring" and Tchaikovsky's "Fifth Symphony," revealed superlative musicianship, the vigorous, energetic direction of Dr. Koussevitzky being reflected admirably in the response of his men. As the last notes died to inaudibility, the conductor was recalled five or six times, the members of the orchestra standing to acknowledge the prolonged applause of a genuinely appreciative audience.

All in all it was a great evening—great music for a great cause, a cause the success of which looks most promising at this writing.



Boston Symphony Orchestra which presented a concert in the inaugural meeting of the S. A. financial appeal in New York.

The Best Sort Of Bravery Is The Courage To Do Right.—Louisa

---

mar NY Trib

Berkshire Auditions

Auditions for admission to this summer's session of the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center will be held here by Boris Goldovsky, the department's director, and members of its faculty on Saturday afternoon at 4 o'clock at the Baldwin Piano Company, 20 East Fifty-fourth Street. The Center's session takes place at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., from July 5 to Aug. 15. Those who wish to be heard must notify Thomas D. Perry jr., Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass., before next Thursday.

---

gave an impressive reading

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, second afternoon concert of its series yesterday at Carnegie Hall. Assisting artists: M[illegible] Koshetz, soprano; Eunice Alberts, [illegible] and the Wellesley College Choir, [illegible] Donald Winkler, director. The program:

[illegible] Elegy in Three [illegible] Orchestra . Nabokoff
[illegible] Manhattan
[illegible] women's chorus, [illegible] and orchestra
Debussy
[illegible] Letter Scene from "Eugene Oniegin" . . . . Tchaikovsky
[illegible] . . . . Tchaikovsky

In Careless Vein

AN ELEGY in three movements for voice and orchestra, entitled "The Return of Pushkin," by Nicolas Nabokoff, was the chief news item of yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. There were also, however, as assisting artists, a whole recital (practically speaking) by Marina Koshetz, soprano; some pretty singing by the Wellesley College Choir and the New York debut (so far as this reporter's knowledge goes) of a whopping good Boston contralto, Eunice Alberts. Of no news interest whatsoever, and very little musical, was Serge Koussevitzky's rendering, at the end, of Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini." Miss Koshetz's recital had begun with the Nabokoff piece, gone on through Debussy's cantata "La Demoiselle Elue" (Rossetti's "Blessed Damosel") and the whole Letter Scene from Tchaikovsky's "Eugene Oniegin."

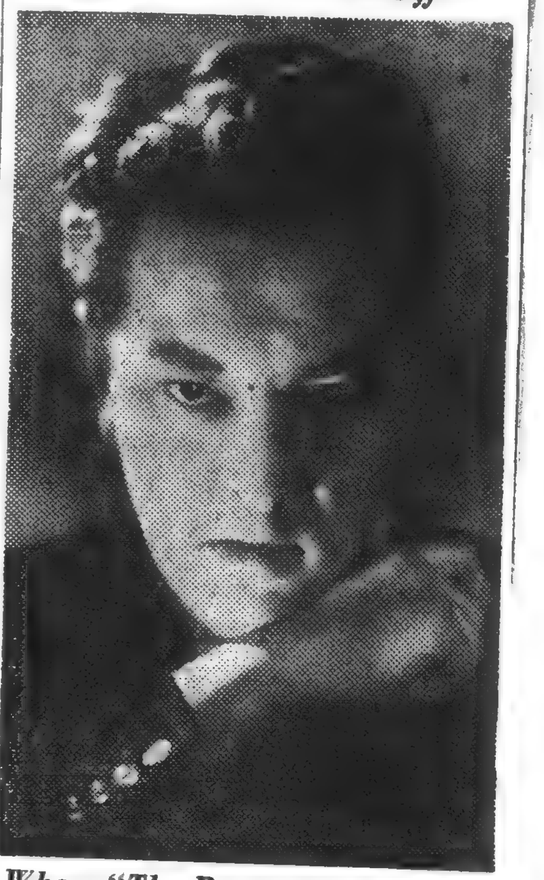
* * *

Nabokoff's work is an evocation of Pushkin's return in 1835 to the country estate where some ten years before he had suffered a two-year exile. The text, in Russian, is Pushkin's poem on the subject. The music is nostalgic and poetic, serene for the most part and psychologically, rather than geographically, atmospheric. His tone is elevated, its composition elegant. Neo-Romanticism is its school. Henri Sauguet is its most noticeable influence. It is a distinguished work and a beautiful one. Unfortunately, the fact that program-notes were available only to those who knew where the man could be found that passes them out on the steps of building rendered the poetic content of the piece incomprehensible to most of the audience. It would seem that a New York firm has a concession for all the advertising distributed in Carnegie Hall and that a Boston firm has a similar concession regarding the program-books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As a result, Boston's notes cannot be handed out inside Carnegie Hall, and most people never find out how to acquire them.

* * *

Miss Koshetz, who sang the vocal part in Nabokoff's elegy, has a pleasant lyric voice that may well develop into a dramatic soprano later. Just now it is weak at the bottom and buzzy at the top. Certainly she was beyond her range, both ends of it, in the Tchaikovsky aria. She sang the piece with dramatic style, however; and she has that instinct for brilliance of tone characteristic

Nicholas Nabokoff



Whose "The Return of Pushkin" was performed yesterday by the Boston Symphony Orchestra of old-style Russian opera singers, of whom her mother Nina Koshetz was so striking an example. Miss Koshetz has high possibilities as an artist, but she is not yet quite mature, either vocally or technically.

* * *

Eunice Alberts, who sang the contralto solo part in Debussy's "Demoiselle Elue" (Miss Kochetz did the role of the Damosel), revealed a voice of great power, warmth and beauty. Her vocal training and musical style, judged from one hearing, are without flaw. It is hoped we may hear her again soon and often. The Wellesley Choir sang charmingly, too, as prettily, indeed, as your reporter has heard any ladies' chorus do in some years.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky conducted all afternoon long, save in the "Eugene Oniegin" aria, as badly as one has heard him do in as long a time. In the Nabokoff piece he produced some strangely unconvincing balances, and at least once he lost the beat entirely. In the final "Francesca da Rimini" he gave often no beat at all, messing up thus several woodwind entrances and all the pizzicati chords. Everywhere he forced the brass in the tuttis, allowed the trumpets to scream and the trombones to bray. All the readings, excepting that of "Eugene Oniegin" air, were without buoyancy, desultory and lacking in trajectory, in forward movement, in confidence.

The orchestra did what it could to keep the music from dying in its tracks, succeeded not badly up to "Francesca da Rimini." Here there was nothing to do but let the good Doctor, in his first solo work of the afternoon, have himself a time. If one's eyes are to be believed, he experienced a deep enjoyment of the piece. From auditory evidence there was cause to wonder if he were not perhaps merely transported and not listening at all.

BOSTON GLOBE
FEB. 7, 1948

age THI

MUSIC Feb 7

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The city owes a debt of thanks to Leonard Bernstein for giving the first performances here in 30 years of one of the towering masterpieces of all music: The Second or "Resurrection" Symphony by Gustav Mahler. The work takes up most of the Boston Symphony concerts this week, with the "Little" G minor Symphony of Mozart (K. 183) as opening piece. The vocal soloists for Mahler are Ellabelle Davis, Negro soprano, and Suzanne Sten, contralto, and the small chorus is of Harvard men and Radcliffe women.

Why it has taken a generation to hear the "Resurrection" Symphony again one may only wonder, considering how many piddling items have turned up in that time. Let us give thanks that we have heard it at long last, for it is a masterpiece of splendor and noble vision and of a scope that can only be called tremendous.

This is characteristic Mahler, full of that composer's painfully sharp sense of mankind's struggle and aspiration, joy and suffering, and of his unanswerable last question: What is the meaning of Life itself? But the pessimism that overwhelmed Mahler in his later years of the Ninth Symphony and "Das Lied von der Erde" was yet to come when he penned the magnificent and profound pages of the Second Symphony.

He ended it upon a mood of shining hope and reassurance, of eternal life to come after the Last Judgment which his mighty horns, trumpets and trombones so impressively herald. The sense of mystery, so essential a part of Mahler's musical expression, permeates the first movement and most of the scherzo. The "Primal Light" section wherein, on words taken from the verses of "Youth's Magic Horn," man asks for light to guide him, is of a really poignant beauty. As for the majestic finale, that comes as close, I think, to anything one will ever hear in suggesting The Last Trump and the choir of the Heavenly Host.

Yesterday's performance was the finest work I have yet heard from Bernstein, who has caught the spirit and the style of Mahler. He showed he can handle triumphantly the huge aparatus Mahler needed to express himself. Bernstein further achieved a personal and an emotionally overwhelming performance. This was no less than masterly and deserved every cheer and round of handclapping of the noisy ovation which followed the last E-flat major chord.

Miss Davis and Miss Sten sang with absolute beauty of tone and style, and the chorus produced a marvelous pianissimo, thanks to the excellent preparation of G. Wallace Woodworth. The orchestra, especially the hard-driven brass, was magnificent. Very likely this will prove the high point of the Symphony season.

[72]

ETUDE
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
FEB - - 1948

AT THE SEVENTY-FIRST Annual Convention of the Music Teachers National Association held in Boston December 30 to January 2, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was made an Honorary Life Member in recognition of his services in promoting musical progress in America. A similar distinction was bestowed upon Dr. James Francis Cooke, Editor of THE ETUDE Music Magazine. Several other national musical organizations met together at the same time at the Statler Hotel, and the event was considered one of the most notable assemblies of prominent musical educators in recent American History.

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Hall.

BOSTON POST Feb 7, '48

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It is difficult to write calmly and impossible to write adequately about what took place at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Before an audience that largely did not know the music or possibly that such a piece existed, Leonard Bernstein restored to the repertory of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the Second or "Resurrection" Symphony of Gustav Mahler, previously heard here at two special concerts under Dr. Muck just 30 years ago. Mr. Bernstein's triumph, and incidentally Mahler's, was no less dramatic than the Symphony itself.

It was obvious all along that Mr. Bernstein had orchestra and audience in the hollow of his hand, and the music in his head and in his heart. Through the three purely instrumental movements the spell worked by piece and performance was unbroken. Then Suzanne Sten added her contralto voice to the orchestra and sang, with deep devotion, the "Urlicht" (Primal Light), that is the key and clue to the work, the explanation of that which has gone before and of the tremendous things that are to come.

The finale, which Mahler has directed should follow without pause, has been described as a vast tonal fresco of the Day of Judgment. The orchestra sounds the crack of Doom; there are calls from the horns; there is the tread of the hosts marching to the Judgment Seat. The chorale of the funereal first movement is recalled and measures about to be sung are played by the instruments. The voice of doom is heard again and again and after it those amazing bird-calls, in flute and piccolo, that "symbolize the last living sound of a mortal world about to be dissolved." Then, as from the other world, the chorus—oh, so softly—intones the words "Auferstehn'n, ja auferstehn'n wirst du, mein Staub" (You will rise again, my dust), and the Symphony begins to move toward its climax.

Yesterday this sublime setting of Klopstock's "Resurrection Ode" was entrusted to the choirs of Harvard and Radcliffe, too few in numbers, because of the restrictions of the stage, but mighty in valor. With the chorus was Ellabelle Davis, to sing the measures for soprano solo, as these particular ears have never heard them, and Miss Sten once more entered the picture, with Mahler's own words, "Believe, my heart, you have lost nothing." All too quickly came the overpowering conclusion, in which the bells peal and the very gates of Heaven are opened. When the audience recovered itself, pandemonium reigned. The emotional storm which had slowly gathered was finally released. And, you can take my word for it, no such excitement has been seen in Symphony Hall in many a year.

At some future time it shall be my pleasure and privilege to discuss in more detail Mr. Bernstein's discerning and inspired interpretation of this extraordinary work, and also the work itself, a virtual novelty in these parts. That it should be that is one of the most unaccountable things in the whole history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For the sake of the record it may be said that Mr. Bernstein offered as curtain-raiser the earlier and lesser of Mozart's two symphonies in G minor.

RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD
FEB 11 1948

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL SCHEDULE ANNOUNCED.

BOSTON, Feb. 10 (AP).—A schedule of 14 concerts from July 18 through August 15 was announced by the Boston Symphony orchestra today for the 1948 Berkshire festival. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct most of the concerts but Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar DeCarvalho and Robert Shaw have been invited as guest conductors.

BOSTON HERALD FEB. 7, 1948

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 15th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Assisting were the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, director, and Ellabelle Davis, soprano, and Suzanne Sten, contralto. The program was as follows:

Symphony in G minor K. 183 ...... Mozart
Symphony in C minor No. 2 ...... Mahler

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Mr. Bernstein achieved a major triumph yesterday with the performance of Mahler's immense Second Symphony. It was an interpretation that caught fire from the first stormy measures to the glorious finale where the composer unleashes all the musical forces at his command. This achievement was the more remarkable in that, owing to the subscription audience, the stage could not be enlarged, and the augmented orchestra, chorus and soloists had to squeeze in as best they could. It must have been very cramping for the players in the hour and a quarter the Symphony takes, but they did their duty with a will and turned in some superlative playing.

Mahler's genius was a strange one and he did not always succeed in pulling off his grandiose designs. The Second Symphony, however, is uniformly and in the end overwhelmingly successful. It is my feeling that too much is written about Mahler's music in the shape of programs for it. Does it really help us in listening to the third movement to read all about St. Anthony and the fishes and the vulgarity of the world? Something, of course, about "Des Knaben Wunderhorn" and the texts of the last two movements should be noted, but for the rest I found Paul Stefan's program mainly pretentious nonsense. Whereas I enjoyed the music thoroughly and was never bored for one instant.

Some have professed to find the third movement one of the finest things in all Mahler, but the truth is that the whole Symphony abounds in these happy touches. For others the ineffable peace of the fourth movement will have been one of the most moving things in the Symphony. And here, incidentally, the effect was enhanced by the beautiful singing of Suzanne Sten. Mr. Bernstein secured a perfect accompaniment for her, and the result was peculiarly felicitous.

A charming early Symphony in G minor by Mozart was spiritedly played as a sort of curtain-raiser to the Mahler. Mr. Bernstein secured a lively and ingratiating performance. His visit to the orchestra this year has been a resounding success, with hardly a dull moment in the three weeks.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1948

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

At last, thanks to the enterprise of Richard Burgin, some of the music by Charles Ives has turned up on a program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is an "orchestral set" entitled "Three Places in New England," and although Nicolas Slonimsky did it with small orchestra in 1931, it is for all practical purposes just about unknown here.

Charles Ives is a Connecticut Yankee, now 73, who studied music with his father and with Horatio Parker at Yale, but has divided most of his life between composing and the insurance business. A lot has been written about him, both as a salty-witted individual fond of solitude, and as a composer of extraordinary independence who was experimenting with several keys and rhythms at once long before Schoenberg or Stravinsky made any headway over here. Since Ives, at least in these parts, has had more written explanation than performance, many people must have come to think of him either as a neglected genius or a compounder of shocking dissonance.

You can't judge a man by one performance of one score, but "Three Places in New England" leads me to believe that Ives is neither a genius nor a tonal ogre. His music is individual, and when he swings into march rhythm it has motion and "bite." Some of his harmonic devices probably were ultra-ultra when he wrote them, although now they do not seem extreme. The lack of movement when he writes in slow tempo betrays to me the mark of the amateur, and so does the prevailing lack of inward character of these pieces.

The first movement, "Boston Common," is an evocation of the colored man's burden of pain and slow advance to freedom, aroused by contemplation of the Saint-Gaudens relief sculpture of Col Shaw and his Negro regiment on the Beacon st. side of the Common across from the State House. The second movement is a play of fancy about a Revolutionary War memorial at Redding Center, Conn., when a small boy on a long-ago July 4 dreams of seeing the Goddess of Liberty pleading with some of Gen Putnam's disaffected soldiers not to desert their cause. Both those movements contain fragments of tunes like "Yankee Doodle," "British Grenadier" and "Battle Cry of Freedom" in peculiar, disjointed harmonization.

Ives' third piece is a little brooding tone poem inspired by the ty of the Housatonic River at Stockbridge, probably the best music of the three if not precisely the most "American" sounding of all.

Mr. Burgin's program reminds me of a large tray of hors d'oeuvres: varied, spicy and mostly attractive, but neither filling nor hearty. The best piece is the C-minor Symphony (No. 5 of the Salomon series) by Haydn, which is both excellent and not overly familiar. The Symphony in Three Movements by Stravinsky, is harsh, dry and inane with an andante based on a footling tune from Rossini's "The Barber of Seville." As for the Second or "Little Russia" Symphony of Tchaikovsky, that is simple-minded music but full of pleasant Slavic tunes. Mr. Burgin conducted well, and the orchestra responded superbly to his demands.

Where Is Dr. Koussevitzky?

Editor:

I wonder how many regular subscribers to the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts feel as I do regarding the choice of conductors for the Providence concerts. This is in no way a criticism against Mr. Bernstein, who is a remarkable young man, or any other substitute conductor. It is, however, a question as to why Dr. Koussevitzky has been able to get almost everywhere this season except Providence, and as to why the substitute has not always been of closer experience to other substitutes and to Dr. Koussevitzky.

After all the Providence concerts are always well patronized and well supported, and I think we should receive more consideration. We treat the orchestra with courtesy and respect (not every city where I attend concerts does as well) and the people in these parts appreciate the orchestra so much that in return I believe that we should have for the five concerts either Dr. Koussevitzky or other men nearer his caliber, and not young men, able and brilliant as they may be, or any other substitute however well liked by us all.

We have had three concerts so far this season, none of which Dr. Koussevitzky conducted, and we have no assurance that he will conduct the next one; as a matter of fact we do not know who will conduct, as the usual announcement was not given in the program of the last concert.

The people here show their appreciation in every possible way, and I think we should get a better deal.

REGULAR SUBSCRIBER.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 14 1948

DAYTON, O.
NEWS

Music Festival Starts July 15 At Tanglewood

BOSTON, Feb. 14.—The Berkshire Festival of 1948 to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home in Lenox, Mass., will consist of 14 concerts from July 18 through Aug. 15.

In the first two weeks, two programs from the music of Bach and Mozart will be performed on Sunday afternoon, July 18, and Tuesday evening, July 20, and repeated on Sunday afternoon, July 25, and Tuesday evening, July 27. These concerts will be given in the intimate Theater Concert hall and conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Three series will be given in the third, fourth, and fifth weeks (July 29-Aug. 15) with a Thursday evening, Saturday evening, and Sunday afternoon concert for each series. After Series B, an extra concert will be performed on Tuesday, Aug. 10, with an all-Tchaikovsky program. These concerts will be given in the Music shed. While Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct most of the concerts, three guest conductors have been invited: Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Carvalho, and Robert Shaw. Soloists are to be announced later.

The sixth season of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the summer school of which Serge Koussevitzky is director, will begin on July 5, and continue for six weeks through the Festival. Dr. Koussevitzky will supervise the conducting classes.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
FEB 10 1948

Of Music and Musicians

Conrad H. Rawski will present the second of his series of lectures on chamber music at the Schenectady Museum Friday evening devoting the period to the discussion of the "String Quartet and the Classical Quartet Types." The lecture will lead up to and include music of Beethoven. The Sunday afternoon program at the museum will be given by the Edward A. Rice string quartet. Quartets will be by Haydn, Dittersdorf and Beethoven. Other members of the ensemble are Frederick Graziade, second violin; Leo Kliwen, viola; and Arthur Catricala, 'cello.

The winter concert of the Schenectady Symphony is slated for next Tuesday evening at the Erie with Anthony Stefan conducting.

John Charles Thomas, baritone, will be at the Plaza Feb. 20.

Although the weather here is anything but like summer plans for that time are underway. At least the Boston Symphony has released dates for the coming ninth Berkshire Festival to be held at Tanglewood from July 18 through Aug. 15. A total of 14 concerts will be presented and the Berkshire Music Center will function for the sixth time from July 5 through Aug. 15.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct most of the concerts with three guest conductors as assistants. Guest conductors invited are Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Carvalho and Robert Shaw. Soloists will be announced later.

During the first two weeks the music of Bach and Mozart will be performed on Sunday afternoon, July 18, and Tuesday evening, July 20, in the Theatre Concert hall and conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky. These will be repeated on July 25 and July 27. Three series of concerts on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons will be given in the Music Shed between July 29 and Aug. 15. After second series an all-Tchaikovsky program will be given on Aug.

Max Lanner, piano; John White, piano; Cecil Effinger, theory and composition; John Fundingsland, music education, Myrtle M. Bridges elementary piano; Carol Truax, director of fine arts departments; and Dr. Charles Norman Granville, vocal pedagogy.

Roy Harris is composer in residence of Colorado College. At present he is engaged in writing his seventh symphony, commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation, and a violin concerto commissioned for the Cleveland Symphony. Dr. Harris will supervise the festival, teach composition, lecture and conduct the Colorado College String Sinfonia.

[73]

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

FEB 15 1948

Aldo Parisot, Brazilian Cellist Remains Enthralled By Snow Here

JUST when most New Haveners had enough, Brazilian Aldo Parisot discovered snow on Yale's campus and gleefully tossed big chunks in the air.

SINCE his arrival in the United States in 1946, Aldo Parisot, cellist, has become a well known figure to New Haven music lovers. Regarded as the finest South American cellist, with over 150 concerts and recitals to his credit, Parisot came to Yale University from Brazil on a fellowship from The Brazil-United States Institute.

He was born in Natal, Brazil, 27 years ago, of French-Brazilian parentage. He studied the cello under the Italian Babini, continued at the Natal Conservatory and later with Professor Iberé Gomes Grosso. He gave his first concert at the age of 14 in the Santa Isabel Teatro in Refice, Brazil. In Rio de Janeiro, Parisot became a pupil of Pablo Casals, reputedly the greatest cellist in the world. He also attended the National School of Music of Rio de Janeiro and was awarded a Bachelor's degree in 1938.

At the age of 17, Parisot taught music and the cello at the Conservatorio Pernambucano in Brazil. At this young age, he was under contract by the Radio Clube de Pernambuco for a series of broadcasts. From the age of 14 years through his 21st year, he played throughout Brazil, Paraguay, Uruguay, Argentina, and Chile.

Parisot's first concert in Brazil was with Ricardo Odnoposoff, one of the foremost violinists in America today. At the age of 21 he became the first cellist in the Brazilian Symphony Orchestra of Rio de Janeiro. He was also a member of the Brazilian Iacovino Quartet, during which time he played with many of the greatest artists of Europe and the United States.

In Brazil, he was under the batons of Eugene Szenkar, prominent conductor of the Brazilian Symphony Orchestra; Eleazar Decarvalho of Brazil, who has recently made his debut in America as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony; Eugene Ormandy of the ~~Philadelphia Sym~~phony Orchestra; Charles Muench, guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic; William Steinberg, conductor of the Buffalo Symphony Orchestra; Francisco Mignone, Brazilian composer and conductor; Ibere' Gomes Grosso of Brazil; Leo Peracchi; Josef Schuster, one of the foremost cellists in America today; Mieczyslaw Horszowski, pianist from Poland; Arnaldo Estrella, Brazilian pianist.

SOLOIST WITH BOSMANS

Parisot was soloist with the Belo Horizante Symphony of Belo Horizante in Brazil under the direction of Arthur Bosmans. Parisot was also a member of the National Radio Symphony Orchestra of Brazil. He appeared as guest artist with a number of Brazil's Sociedades de Cultura Musical of Pernambuco, Rio de Janeiro, Bahia, Natal, Recife, Olinda, Salvador, Sao Paulo and Maceio.

In 1941, Villa Lobos presented Parisot to Arturo Toscanini and Leopold Stokowski when they visited Brazil. Later, when Josef Schuster, who was first cellist in the New York Philharmonic at the time, visited Brazil and heard Parisot, he became so impressed with the youth's exceptional talent that he suggested that he come to the United States to further his studies.

Parisot is affectionately called "The Little Casals" because of his extraordinary talent and many believe that he has the attributes which made Pablo Casals the world's greatest cellist. He has received acclaim throughout South America from some of the greatest music critics.

Since his arrival in the United States, he has played at numerous concerts at Yale and is the first cellist in the New Haven Symphony Orchestra. Last year he was guest artist under the auspices of The Pan-American Association of Philadelphia in Ethical Society Auditorium, in a program which featured music by three contemparary Brazilian composers. He has also played at Harvard, Baltimore, Tanglewood, Lenox and several weeks ago, he appeared with the Springfield Symphony under the direction of Alexander Leslie. He will be a guest artist at a benefit concert for foreign relief sponsored by The Business and Professional Woman's Club of New Haven on February 18 at the New Haven Lawn Club.

Last year he was invited by the Canadian Broadcasting Company in Montreal to make recordings.

The cello Mr. Parisot is using dates back 300 years. It is valued at $8,500 and it was lent to him by Emil Hermann of New York.

Parisot has a fine sense of humor and is high in his praises of Americans and the United States. One of his greatest thrills was the snow. He had never seen snow before coming to New Haven. He is enthralled by the beauty and architecture of Yale University. He enjoys playing music with two roommates, Kurt Glaubitz, cellist from New Jersey and Andrew Petryn, violinist. Both have shown him the sights in New Haven. They both delight in telling of "The Boston Incident" to Sr. Parisot's embarrassment.

Here is the Petryn version. "Upon entrance to Symphony Hall in Boston, where the Boston Symphony was performing Villa Lobos under Carvalo, Brazilian guest conductor, Parisot entered the hall seeking an obvious seat. After Carvalo concluded his performance, the vigorous Parisot managed to convey his full 130 lbs. in the line of fire of the performers. Whereupon, all members unanimously appeared to lose any semblance of sedate Bostonian behavior and with bravisimo della agitato, wildly and generously hailed the lone visitor without cello. Needless to add, a monetary state of complete chaos befell the audience unable to discern the sudden lack of good behavior from such noble performers. Unable to assume the normal pose, the diabello of the heavy strings was immediately whisked off by one tuba, bass drum, oboe and quartet of cellists from the symphony, into the jubilant embrace of the tense conductor."

Parisot has an unusual hobby. Besides painting, he enjoys doing "Decupage," the delicate art of filigree designs in wood. After the design is made and cut with a special and delicate saw, he adorns lamps, bookends and many other items.

ATLANTA, GA.
JOURNAL

FEB 15 1948

* * *

FLASHES HERE, THERE—The Berkshire Festival of 1948 to be given by the Boston Symphony ~~Orchestra, Serge~~ Koussevitzky, conductor, at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home in Lenox, Mass., will consist of 14 concerts, from July 18 through Aug. 15. While Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct most of the concerts, three guest coductors have been invited, Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Carvalho and Robert Shaw. Soloists are to be announced. . . . James de la Fuente, Atlanta-New York violinist, is giving a recital in Boston this Sunday. On Thursday evening he is appearing on the Community Concert Service Series at Long Branch, N. J. Andre Benoist is the accompanist. Then follows a three weeks' tour in March, through Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri, Texas, Oklahoma, Louisiana and New York. . . . Solveif Lunde, pianist, will be heard in re[illegible]:15 p. m. Monday, in Newhan at the Municipal building. . . . Roman Totenberg, violinist, will be presented in recital by the Griffin Music club, 8:30 p. m., Tuesday at the high school auditorium. . . . Chautauqua (N. Y.) celebrates its "Seventy-five Years of Creative Americanism" this summer. The diamond jubilee program opens on July 4 and extends through Aug. 29. For literature address Chautauqua Institute, Chautauqua, N. Y., Inquiry dept. . . . Alberto Denton Marshall, pianist-composer, will play her compositions at the Writers' club meeting on Thursday evening.

KOUSSEVITZKY

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

FEB 16 1948

BSO at Carnegie

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play a Carnegie Hall concert Wednesday evening under the direction of Concertmaster Richard Burgin. The program lists Haydn's Symphony No. 95 in C Minor, Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements, and Sibelius' First Symphony in E Minor.

The orchestra will play at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Friday evening.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT & LEADER

FEB 15 1948

DATES AND SOME OF . . the particulars have been announced for the Berkshire festival of 1948 to be given by the Boston symphony~~—Sergei Kous-sevitsky~~ conducting — at Tanglewood, Mass. The festival will consist of 14 concerts from July 18 thru Aug. 15. In the first two weeks two programs of music of Bach and Mozart will be performed. Three series will be given in the third, fourth and fifth weeks and after series B an extra concert with an all Tschaikowsky program will be given. While Mr. Koussevitsky will conduct most of the concerts, three guest conductors have been invited; Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Carvalho and Robert Shaw. Soloists are to be announced.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

FEB 18 1948

Last Night's Concert

By E. C. R.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The sixth concert in the current Woolsey Hall series was held last evening in Woolsey Hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Richard Burgin, made its second appearance of the season here. Mr. Burgin performed outstanding. He evidenced the same type of dynamic personality, verve and finger tip control as the popular Serge Koussevitzky, yet with an ease and fluid calm felt by both orchestra and audience.

The program opened with Symphony in C Minor, Op. 95, by Franz Haydn, under whom the symphony evolved approximately to the construction which has endured for over a century. The music of Haydn has an earthy freshness entirely uninhibited, straight from both the heart and the soil. It is unflagging in its imaginativeness and is very much alive in its optimism. Haydn's outstanding characteristic was his adaptability, for he had the happy capacity of overlooking the unpleasant side of a situation, extracting only the good.

The Orchestral Set entitled "Three Places in New England" was composed by Charles Ives, born in Danbury, Conn., in 1874. This formerly active business man topped off his training with Horatio Parker of Yale, and after retirement began to write songs descriptive of towns and places. He uses a strongly accented off-beat that resembles jazz but isn't. His music is characterized by vitality, humor, pathos and audacity.

The first one, entitled "Boston Common" was suggested by the bronze relief of Colonel Shaw and his Regiment by St. Gaudens; and the music is a retrospect of the Civil War. The second, "Putnam's Camp, Redding, Connecticut" depicts in imagination a child's vision on a Fourth of July picnic, of the Goddess of Liberty exhorting the soldiers—ghosts of an earlier century—which ended with a loud discord. The third, "From the Housatonic at Stockbridge" was suggested by a poem by Robert Underwood Johnson, which had a mythical almost eerie ending.

Much more to the liking of the listeners was the second part of the program, and, of course, particularly the performance of the guest soloist, Bruce Simonds, Dean of the Yale School of Music, making his first appearance with this famed orchestra, and also marking the first presentation by the Orchestra of the Piano Concerta No. 2 in B-Flat Major by Beethoven. The treatment of this dramatic masterpiece was not in the traditional Teutonic style of Beethoven interpretation but it was tremendously exciting and compelling in its force and conviction.

The beautiful piano solos were expertly performed by Bruce Simonds, who excelled especially in the many runs, arpeggios, and passagework demanding nimbleness and swift adapability. Clearness of touch, razor-like swiftness, tone shading and altogether perfect enunciation made memorable his performance and brought continued rounds of applause at the completion of this, the finest, part of the program.

With the Three Movements Symphony by Stravinsky, writer of novel folkmusic, the program concluded. Around Stravinsky's music has raged more controversy and conflict than any of his contemporaries Revolutionary tonalities found in his works are called modernistic and futuristic. It is not difficult to know this was written during the hectic year of 1945, for it expresses the turmoil, torments and tension, followed at last by cessation and relief.

A special announcement was enclosed in the program notifying the public of an additional concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be held in Woolsey Hall, Tuesday evening, March 16th, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

The final concert in the regular Woolsey Hall Concert Series will be held Wednesday, February 25th, when Artur Rubinstein, pianist, will be heard.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

FEB 19 1948

Music

Stravinsky Score Is Tough and Gritty

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

With Concertmaster Richard Burgin subbing for Serge Koussevitzky—who is on vacation—the Boston Symphony unleashed its own version of Stravinsky's "Symphony in Three Movements" in Carnegie Hall last night.

This is tough, gritty music, almost completely stripped of anything but blunt rhythm. Colors rarely mix and themes never develop in the old sense, but the whole thing plunges ahead in a weird kind of self-propulsion.

Stravinsky rules out any program here: There is no story, no tag, no foothold in reality. If the outside world exerted any tension on the symphony, Stravinsky wasn't aware of it. This is music boiled down to bare outlines.

It Isn't Pleasant.

It isn't pleasant music; that much is certain, and that much Stravinsky himself might admit—since any word like "pleasant" implies emotional commitments that the hard boiled scheme of this symphony would seem to combat.

But it is fascinating music just the same and terrifying, too. For, if we accept its premise, then we must all face the fact that music as we know it has completed its mission and become a dead language.

With an iron logic of its own, the symphony seems to ring down the curtain on the classic and romantic schools, where you could follow a set of themes like horses at a race track, with variations in tempo and excitement.

Stravinsky uses block formation, instead; a scheme of planes and outlines, linked together in arithmetic sequence, so that an adding machine would be handier than a standard analysis in sizing up the music.

A Series of 'Events.'

What happens within this block area is a series of what a modern physicist might call "events"; there are weird little patterns of notes and rhythms; big and little explosions; sudden shifts to sharp percussive episodes.

There is no emotional compulsion, unless the terrific show of energy comes under the head of emotion. The action is more like the functioning of some law of physics, and if the world is pictured here at all it is only as a bleak postatomic lifelessness.

This is the depressing side of Stravinsky's "Symphony in Three Movements" — it mirrors, with brutal power, an almost dehumanized world. It fiercely negates esthetic comfort and seems to announce the end of the very art it practices.

Stravinsky knew where he was going in this symphony — every inch of the way. There are other routes in music, where the scenery is brighter and the company gayer. Stravinsky merely chose a grim detour and followed it to the bitter end.

Mr. Burgin gave a tightly knit reading of the symphony, and both the Haydn C minor Symphony and Sibelius' First further attested his grasp of technical and stylistic essentials.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 18 1948

Boston Symphony Here

Burgin Will Direct Program at Carnegie Hall Tonight

On its third New York visit of the season the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be directed by its associate conductor and concert master, Richard Burgin. The program for tonight at 8:45 in Carnegie Hall includes Haydn's Symphony No. 95, in C minor; Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements and Sibelius's first symphony. The Haydn and Sibelius symphonies will also be played with Hindemith's "Symphonia Serena" on Friday night at 8:30 in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. On Saturday afternoon at 2:30 in Carnegie Hall, Mr. Burgin will present a Bach prelude arranged by Pick - Mangiagalli, Hindemith's "Symphonia Serena," Charles Ives's "Three Places in New England" and Tchaikovsky's second symphony.

The Haydn, Sibelius and Tchaikovsky works will be played by this orchestra under Mr. Burgin tomorrow night at the Westchester Count Center in White Plains in the fifth concert of Mrs. Julian Olney's subscription series.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 18 1948

Music Lovers Appeased--- Koussevitzky Coming Here

Providence music lovers who have been fretting over the rare appearances here of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, were assured today that he is scheduled to wield the baton when the orchestra gives its fourth concert at the Metropolitan Theater March 2.

If Dr. Koussevitzky keeps the date—he will be 74 in July and has to watch his health—it will be his first and only appearance in Providence this season and the fifth in three seasons. The Boston Symphony gives five concerts a season in Providence.

The orchestra's headquarters in Boston was asked to comment on a letter to the editor published in last Sunday's Journal which inquired why "Dr. Koussevitzky has been able to get almost everywhere this season except Providence." The letter writer also wanted to know "why the substitute has not always been of closer experience to other substitutes and to Dr. Koussevitzky" and said he felt the Providence subscribers to the Boston Symphony concert series "should get a better deal."

A spokesman for the orchestra management said he was sorry to hear of the complaint but wanted it made clear that no slight to Providence concertgoers was intended.

"Our season," he said, "is laid out in such a way that in certain weeks we have guest conductors. It just happens that the Providence dates fall mostly within the weeks when the orchestra is led by guest conductors.

"As you know, Dr. Koussevitzky is not as young as he used to be and he can't conduct the full season. I think we are fortunate to have him for as much of the time as we can."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

FEB 19 1948

Burgin Leads Boston Group

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Richard Burgin conducted the Boston Symphony in his own right in Carnegie Hall last night. He did a good, solid, musicianly job. If there was more routine playing and less interpretation of the music, it was simply that he has not yet crossed the subtle bridge between them.

Without that extra touch that brings music alive, even an orchestra like the Boston Symphony remains earthbound. There was no inner tension to the performances of Haydn's Symphony, No. 95 or Sibelius first symphony.

The best part of the evening came in the Stravinsky. Here the style of the music fitted more closely the honest, earnest work of the conductor.

The intricacies of this pulsating work do not make pleasant listening. There is, however, an undeniable fascination attached to the recurrent throbs whch agitate the music. If it has nothing else, it has drive. That is what Mr. Burgin gave it last night.

* * *

Continuing its evening "Ring" cycle, the Metropolitan presented "Siegfried" last night with Lauritz Malchior in the title role. The performance was not the equal of the first, but the work never fails to carry itself.

Mr. Melchoir and Mrs. Stiedry differed on tempo with the tenor being more arbitrary than was desirable.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 19 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY TO APPEAR

A spokesman for the Boston Symphony Orchestra promised yesterday that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the fourth concert of the Providence season at the Metropolitan Theater on Mar. 2. The noted conductor, absent for the first three concerts this year, will be making his fifth appearance here in three seasons.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 19 1948

Absence of Dr. Koussevitzky

Editor:

I read with particular interest "Regular Subscriber's" letter in the Sunday Journal of Feb. 15 bemoaning the infrequent appearance of Dr. Koussevitzky at the Boston Symphony Concerts in Providence.

"R. S." does not explicitly blame the good doctor, but his inference is clear. Yet is there not some remote possibility that Dr. Kousevitsky is not overly eager to conduct in a theater where the music from his orchestra, considered by many the world's finest, rattles about like the proverbial skeleton in a closet? Surely he cannot be blamed if Providence, a fairly good musical town, does not have a single theater of acceptable acoustics which is large enough to make the orchestra's Providence visits financially successful.

Meanwhile, of course, talk of a "living memorial" for the city's veterans remains just talk.

ARTHUR B. DUNBAR JR.

Pawtucket.

FEB 20 1948

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Richard Burgin ~~conducting; concert~~ Wednesday night at Carnegie Hall. The program:
Symphony in C minor, No. 95............Haydn
Symphony in Three Movements......Stravinsky
Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Op. 39....Sibelius

With Gusto

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra always sounds grand no matter who conducts it. Richard Burgin always gives you a piece clearly no matter what the piece is. Wednesday night at Carnegie Hall he gave us, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, three symphonies—a Haydn, a Sibelius and a Stravinsky. And if all were a little rough and broad, they were at the same time about as frankly and straightforwardly read as any one could wish. Finish is not Mr. Burgin's forte, but he makes jolly music.

* * *

The Haydn Symphony in C minor, No. 95, profited least from the conductor's lusty approach. It came out mostly just loud and soft, though the rhythm was there. The Sibelius No. 1 benefitted hugely from the breadth and gusto, sounded like honest outdoor stuff for once, or rather like a sound-track for a real outdoor film. It is a silly piece if you take it too seriously. Played for sentiment and melodrama, it is good clean fun and not without ideas.

* * *

Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements (No. 3) is good clean fun too, but of another intellectual order. It is fun because it dances all the time and because you never know what it is going to do next. It is a complex dance routine that only Balanchine could set (and probably will). It is intricately put together out of the best materials, many of them quoted (or paraphrased) from his own works. One composer called it Stravinsky's "Heldenleben" for that reason. And yet the references are not, I think, specific quotes but rather pieces in a game. Recognition is not essential, because the context and meanings have all been changed; it is merely a pleasure. Following the orchestral ingenuities is a pleasure too. The work is a delight from every intrinsically musical point of view. It has humor, fancy, wonderful workmanship and constant surprise.

* * *

Igor Stravinsky

Whose Symphony in Three Movements was performed Wednesday night in Carnegie Hall

Expressively it remains obscure to this listener. When the composer directed it here himself a year or two back, I took it for an evocation of Romantic Russia. Wednesday night it seemed to me to be a ballet, in the sense that Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony is really a ballet evoked rather than a personal statement. Perhaps the Stravinsky work is both a ballet evoked and a symphonic epoch evoked. I do not know. Wednesday night all I could hear in it was dancing. Dancing and the most intricate musical games. Either way it is a pleasure. I suppose one of the conductors will be making a sex piece out of it next. That is what they are likely to do with any work whose expressive content is the least little bit obscure.

Blind Violinist To Be Soloist

Ruben Varga, nineteen-year-old blind violinist from Palestine, will be the soloist with the City Amateur Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Judge Leopold Prince, in its next free concert at the American Museum of Natural History on Sunday afternoon, Feb. 29, when he will play the Mendelssohn concerto. He was born of Hungarian parents in Palestine, where he lost his sight when eleven years old through picking up a bomb that exploded. He studied in Budapest and came to the United States a year ago.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 19 1948

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Richard Burgin, conducting, concert last night at Carnegie Hall. The program:

Symphony in C minor, No. 95............Haydn
Symphony in Three Movements......Stravinsky
Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Op. 39....Sibelius

With Gusto

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra always sounds grand no matter who conducts it. Richard Burgin always gives you a piece clearly no matter what the piece is. Last night at Carnegie Hall he gave us, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, three symphonies—a Haydn, a Sibelius and a Stravinsky. And if all were a little rough and broad, they were at the same time about as frankly and straightforwardly read as any one could wish. Finish is not Mr. Burgin's forte, but he makes jolly music.

* * *

The Haydn Symphony in C minor, No. 95, profited least from the conductor's lusty approach. It came out mostly just loud and soft, though the rhythm was there. The Sibelius No. 1 benefitted hugely from the breadth and gusto, sounded like honest outdoor stuff for once, or rather like a sound-track for a real outdoor film. It is a silly piece if you take it too seriously. Played for sentiment and melodrama, it is good clean fun and not without ideas.

* * *

Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements (No. 3) is good clean fun too, but of another intellectual order. It is fun because it dances all the time and because you never know what it is going to do next. It is a complex dance routine that only Balanchine could set (and probably will). It is intricately put together out of the best materials, many of them quoted (or paraphrased) from his own works. One composer called it Stravinsky's "Heldenleben" for that reason. And yet the references are not, I think, specific quotes but rather pieces in a game. Recognition is not essential, because the context and meanings have all been changed; it is merely a pleasure. Following the orchestral ingenuities is a pleasure too. The work is a delight from every intrinsically musical point of view. It has humor, fancy, wonderful workmanship and constant surprise.

Igor Stravinsky

Whose Symphony in Three Movements was performed last night in Carnegie Hall

* * *

Expressively it remains obscure to this listener. When the composer directed it here himself a year or two back, I took it for an evocation of Romantic Russia. Last night it seemed to me to be a ballet, in the sense that Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony is really a ballet evoked rather than a personal statement. Perhaps the Stravinsky work is both a ballet evoked and a symphonic epoch evoked. I do not know. Last night all I could hear in it was dancing. Dancing and the most intricate musical games. Either way it is a pleasure. I suppose one of the conductors will be making a sex piece out of it next. That is what they are likely to do with any work whose expressive content is the least little bit obscure.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 19 1948

The Music Makers

By IRVING KOLODIN

An Evening of Burgin at the Boston Symphony.

The classic idea of a concertmaster as a man who could, if necessary, replace the conductor is having a revival, and a good thing it is. Richard Burgin had his opportunity to direct the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall last night, as Alexander Hilsberg did the Philadelphia Orchestra a few weeks ago. It underscores, for one thing, that conducting is not wholly the black art it is sometimes made to seem; and it highlights the capacities required of a man who is the chef d'orchestre's equivalent of liaison officer, top sergeant and right bower all in one.

IRVING KOLODIN

Burgin's qualities have been evident on too many occasions to require extolling now. But it was a subtle suggestion of his attributes as a musician that he dared to confront his listeners with an austerity program of three symphonies, including ones so various as the Haydn in C minor (No. 95) and the Stravinsky of 1945, which bears as its simple subtitle "In Three Movements."

Especially gratifying to this listener was the success of Burgin with the Haydn, one of the master's most masterful, full of musical substance and artistic purpose. There was a reasonable quantity of subtle effects in his direction, but never to the detriment of reason and logic. The artful variations of the slow movement were beautifully played; and one even wondered if the work were not deliberately chosen to permit Burgin's associate at the first desk of violins a chance as soloist in the trio of the minuet. Greater love hath no man than to permit a second concertmaster such an opportunity; and Alfred Krips embraced it with ardent heart and fine competence. Little wonder that the orchestra applauded Burgin's entrance, and played for him like so many archangels in tail coats.

Stravinsky's quirky, challenging work of 1945 asks something more than pace, for the cumulative effect depends on a kind of sharp distinction among dynamics and tonal masses that Burgin doesn't command. So far as rhythmic detail and pure pattern were concerned, he had the score well in hand; but one recalls from Stravinsky's own direction something dryer, more percussive. He had his best success with the andante, which is beautifully written to "sound," and did. The orchestral work throughout was tonally rich, and somewhat more relaxed than it often has been in the recent past, especially in the Sibelius No. 1, which brought the evening to an end. It was good to see, also, the regard of the audience for Burgin, their warm greeting when he first appeared.

Woodwind Ensemble Plays in Times Hall

Much new music for woodwind quartet was featured at last night's concert of the Wollf Chamber Players at Times Hall, the first of a series. John Verrall's "Humoresque" and quartets by Everett Helm, Harold Holden and Arthur V. Berger were listed, all except the last named being first public hearings. When the puffing was over and the tootling had died away, little that was novel or exciting had been added to the woodwind literature, nor had the hardy souls who heard out the program been excessively diverted, despite carefully prepared, persuasive playing by Charles Ehrenburg, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe; Wallace Shapiro, clarinet, and Bernard Garfield, bassoon.

There was too little variety to the fare. A certain amount of relief was provided by the interjection of two Hindemith sonatas—one for flute, one for bassoon, both with piano (played by Lillian Freundlich) — at critical points in the evening's schedule, yet there were several general deficiencies. The composers' devotion to traditional contrapuntal bustlings and excursions (which seem to be de rigueur in the development of woodwind themes), the adherence to well-worn methods of voicing, a bland indifference to formal structural outline, together with the utter triviality of thematic material employed, resulted in an ever-increasing monotony

Aside from the Hindemith sonatas, which are gratefully contrived and create a valid mood, the Berger quartet was notable for its sophisticated economy of means and well-tooled craftsmanship. It recalled the painstakingly etched phrases of Ravel—in this case, reshaped to conform with the requirements of present-day materialism. In the Helm work, especially in the first movement, there were moments of gratifying sonority; on the whole, however, it was not representative of any distinct or clearly formed musical personality.

ANSON W. PECKHAM.

GLENS FALLS, N. Y.
POST STAR
FEB 20 1948

An outline of the 1948 Berkshire Festival has been received. Under the supervision of Serge Koussevitzky the Music Festival and the Berkshire Music Center will hold, altogether, a six-week session, July 5 to August 15.

As usual there will be three series of week-end concerts in the Shed. Complete programs have not, as yet, been announced. But there will be two programs each of the works of Bach and Mozart, to be held in the Theatre-Concert Hall. An extra concert, the program to be an all-Tschaikowski one, is booked for Tuesday evening, Aug. 10.

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct most of the programs, but he has engaged Leonard Bernstein and the young South American, Eleazer Carvalho as guest conductors.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1948

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Richard Burgin conducting, concert Wednesday night at Carnegie Hall. The program:
Symphony in C minor, No. 95............Haydn
Symphony in Three Movements......Stravinsky
Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Op. 39....Sibelius

With Gusto

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra always sounds grand no matter who conducts it. Richard Burgin always gives you a piece clearly no matter what the piece is. Wednesday night at Carnegie Hall he gave us, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, three symphonies—a Haydn, a Sibelius and a Stravinsky. And if all were a little rough and broad, they were at the same time about as frankly and straightforwardly read as any one could wish. Finish is not Mr. Burgin's forte, but he makes jolly music.

* * *

The Haydn Symphony in C minor, No. 95, profited least from the conductor's lusty approach. It came out mostly just loud and soft, though the rhythm was there. The Sibelius No. 1 benefitted hugely from the breadth and gusto, sounded like honest outdoor stuff for once, or rather like a sound-track for a real outdoor film. It is a silly piece if you take it too seriously. Played for sentiment and melodrama, it is good clean fun and not without ideas.

* * *

Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements (No. 3) is good clean fun too, but of another intellectual order. It is fun because it dances all the time and because you never know what it is going to do next. It is a complex dance routine that only Balanchine could set (and probably will). It is intricately put together out of the best materials, many of them quoted (or paraphrased) from his own works. One composer called it Stravinsky's "Heldenleben" for that reason. And yet the references are not, I think, specific quotes but rather pieces in a game. Recognition is not essential, because the context and meanings have all been changed; it is merely a pleasure. Following the orchestral ingenuities is a pleasure too. The work is a delight from every intrinsically musical point of view. It has humor, fancy, wonderful workmanship and constant surprise.

* * *

Igor Stravinsky

Whose Symphony in Three Movements was performed Wednesday night in Carnegie Hall

Expressively it remains obscure to this listener. When the composer directed it here himself a year or two back, I took it for an evocation of Romantic Russia. Wednesday night it seemed to me to be a ballet, in the sense that Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony is really a ballet evoked rather than a personal statement. Perhaps the Stravinsky work is both a ballet evoked and a symphonic epoch evoked. I do not know. Wednesday night all I could hear in it was dancing. Dancing and the most intricate musical games. Either way it is a pleasure. I suppose one of the conductors will be making a sex piece out of it next. That is what they are likely to do with any work whose expressive content is the least little bit obscure.

PEEKSKILL, N. Y.
EVENING STAR
FEB 20 1948

Symphony Plays To Large Audience

WHITE PLAINS — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of its associate conductor, Richard Burgin, presented the fifth concert in the Mrs. Julian Olney subscription series at the County Center last night before an audience of 3,000. The program, which was both varied and interesting, included the Haydn "Symphony in C Minor, No. 95"; the Sibelius "Symphony No. 1 in E Minor, Opus 39"; and the Tschaikowsky "Symphony No. 2 in C Minor, Opus 17."

It was an excellent program from start to finish. Each of these contasting symphonies demanded expert handling and individual treatment, and they were all beautifully presented. The utter lucidity and delicacy of construction of the Haydn work was emphasized by an animated and at the same time sensitive interpretation. It was played with a full understanding of its inate grace and charm, while its underlying fundamental design and richness of development were never lost sight of. This symphony is full of delightful musical ideas, with a complete avoidance of meaningless phrases and Mr. Burgin delineated this pattern clearly last night.

To this reviewer, the brightlight of the evening was the performance of the Sibelius work, both because of its monumental style, and because of the striking manner in which its particular type of heroic romantcism was portrayed. Here is a symphony which abounds in contrasts. It is highly dramatic in every movement, and Mr. Burgin emphasized just these aspects.

He presented a broad and vibrant interpretation of the great melodies which sing with exultant joy and rise and fall with increasing intensity from one movement to another.

—R.K.N.

TARRYTOWN, N.Y.
NEWS
FEB 20 1948

Boston Symphony In 5th Concert

By RUTH K. NOLAN

White Plains. — The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of its associate conductor, Richard Burgin, presented the fifth concert in the Mrs. Julian Olney subscription series at the County Center last night before an audience of 3,000. The program, which was both varied and interesting, included the Haydn "Symphony in C Minor, No. 95"; the Sibelius "Symphony No. 1 in E Minor, Opus 39"; and the Tschaikowsky "Symphony No. 2 in C Minor, Opus 17."

It was an excellent program from start to finish. Each of these contrasting symphonies demanded expert handling and individual treatment, and they were all beautifully presented. The utter lucid and delicacy of construction of the Haydn work was emphasized by an animated and at the same time sensitive interpretation. It was played with a full understanding of its inate grace and charm, while its underlying fundamental design and richness of development were never lost sight of. This symphony is full of delightful musical ideas, with a complete avoidance Burgin delineated this pattern of meaningless phrases and Mr. clearly last night.

To this reviewer, the highlight of the evening was the performance of the Sibelius work, both because of its monumental style, and because of the striking manner in which its particular type of heroic romanticism was portrayed. Here is a symphony which abounds in contrasts. It is highly dramatic in every movement, and Mr. Burgin emphasized just these aspects.

He presented a broad and vibrant interpretation of the great melodies which sing with exultant joy and rise and fall with increasing intensity from one movement to another.

76

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
FEB 20 1948

ASK RODZINSKI TO STAY, SAYS KOUSSEVITZKY

Apology for His Dismissa Also Is Urged

BY CLAUDIA CASSIDY

"If you ask me what is to be done, I can see one outcome only. Let those who brought about this issue have the courage to apologize to Rodzinski and ask him to continue his wonderful work and musical directorship of the Chicago Symphony orchestra."

Koussevitzky

It was Serge Koussevitzky speaking, a bronzed Koussevitzky in a rakish white beret, captured for an interview as the Constellation carrying him from an Arizona vacation to New York paused for refueling at Chicago airport. Koussevitzky is a great man of music and has been for 24 years the musical director of the famed Boston orchestra. He had expressed his interest in Chicago's musical life before and had rejoiced when Artur Rodzinski was engaged as the Chicago Symphony's director.

Points To Responsibilities

Speaking slowly and choosing his words with care, he had this to say:

"In all large institutions, the position and functions of every member or group are distinctly understood and outlined. Thus, in the realm of musical art, the responsibilities for a symphony orchestra are shared by the board of trustees, the conductor, and the manager.

"The trustees of the orchestra are 'entrusted' by their city and community to maintain and financially support the organization. The conductor is invited to build up an orchestra, to carry on its high standards, and to create musical culture. The manager is to take care of the necessary managerial plans and details and to meet the requirements of the organization and the conductor.

Calls Action Unethical

"Yet, what happened in Chicago? One has the impression that the trustees of the Chicago Symphony orchestra exercise a dictatorial power and act as tho the orchestra belonged to them rather than to their city and community at large. Their action with regard to Artur Rodzinski is shocking and unethical. It is of course within the power and rights of the trustees not to renew a contract with the conductor. But to announce in the newspapers in midseason that the conductor had been dismissed—that is, that his engagement would 'terminate at the end of the current season'—is brutal and a great injustice because it is detrimental to the conductor and may affect his future life and career.

"Rodzinski is a conductor of the first rank and his success in Chicago is a proof that the public as well as the orchestra not only accepted him but also admired him."

cellulose, and so might get nourishment from the Sole U. S. Agents: Schieffelin

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y.
REPORTER-DISPATCH

FEB 20 1948

3,000 Hear Boston Symphony In 5th Olney Concert at Center

By RUTH K. NOLAN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by its associate conductor, Richard Burgin presented the fifth concert in the Mrs. Julian Olney subscription series at the County Center last night before an audience of 3,000. The program included the Haydn "Symphony in C Minor, No. 95", the Sibelius "Symphony No. 1 in E Minor, Opus 39" and the Tschaikowsky "Symphony No. 2 in C Minor, Opus 17."

It was an excellent program from start to finish. Each of the contrasting symphonies demanded expert handling and individual treatment, and all were beautifully presented. The lucidity and delicacy of construction of the Haydn work was emphasized by an animated and at the same time sensitive interpretation. It was played with a full understanding of its inate grace and charm, with its underlying fundamental design and richness of development always in mind. This symphony is full of delightful musical ideas, with a complete avoidance of meaningless phrases and Mr. Burgin delineated this pattern clearly.

The highlight was the Sibelius work, because of its monumental style and because of the striking manner in which its particular type of heroic romanticism was portrayed. Here is a symphony which abounds in contrasts. It is highly dramatic in every movement, and Mr. Burgin emphasized just these aspects.

He presented a broad and vibrant interpretation of the great melodies which sing with exultant joy and rise and fall with increasing intensity from one movement to another. At the same time he brought forth the tender and nostalgic moments in the score.

Graceful and delicate passages were sharply contrasted by outbursts of tremendous passion at times almost barbaric in character. Of particular note was the wonderful presentation of the deeply moving theme of the final movement which climaxed all the dramatic intensity of the previous score.

This symphony was also in sharp contrast to the one which followed it. The Tschaikowsky is, if nothing else, drenched in the feeling and color of Russia. The themes of its first and last movements are based upon Russian folk melodies, and those which do not have this origin, are typically Slavic in feeling.

Throughout the work, the composer shows his great skill in orchestration, and his fondness for the chromatic scale, which he uses in artful contrapuntal passages. No matter how furious or technically brilliant the passage, it was always presented with great clarity and feeling for the underlying emotional message.

Mr. Burgin offered an especially delightful performance of the lovely little march theme in the second movement, which Tschaikowsky took from his own unpublished opera, "Undine," when the St. Petersburg opera turned it down. Also in the third movement, which is filled with charming rhythmic contrasts and sudden changes of mood, he presented not only the technical aspects of the score but the heart and soul of the music as well.

The final movement of the symphony, which is based upon a little theme which undergoes ever varied treatment, was given a tremendous development until it climaxed in a brilliant Presto. It was an effective climax not only of this symphony but of the entire concert. Mr. Burgin amply proved his capabilities as conductor.

The final concert in the series will be presented by Arthur Rubinstein, master pianist, on April 2. On April 23, Mrs. Onley will present Jose and Amparo Iturbi in a two piano recital.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

FEB 21 1948

Musician's Auto In Lenox Crash

Koussevitsky's Car Damaged, Two Persons Hurt

Lenox, Feb. 21—Two persons were injured and an automobile owned by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky damaged in a collision at West St. and Court House Hill intersection yesterday.

The automobile owned by the conductor was driven by his chauffeur, Lawrence H. Monroe, 42, of Lenox. The other car involved was operated by Leopold Hase of Williamstown.

Hase suffered cuts on the face and injuries to his chest and left arm. Thomas O'Neil of Williamstown, who was riding with Hase, suffered head injuries. Miss Sally Monroe, 13, a passenger in the car driven by her father, was unhurt.

Police charged the accident occurred when Hase ignored a highway stop sign. His car plowed into the Koussevitsky limousine, causing considerable damage.

TROY, N. Y.
OBSERVER & BUDGET

FEB 22 1948

Serge Koussevitsky has announced three guest conductors for the Berkshire Festival of 1948, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass., from July 18 to Aug. 15 next.

While Koussevizky will lead most of the concerts, others will be conducted by Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Carvalho and Robert Shaw. Music of Bach, Mozart and Tchaikovsky will be stressed.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

FEB 23 1948

Richard Burgin Directs Music of Charles Ives

It was illuminating at the Saturday matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, to observe the qualities of Charles Ives's "Three Places in New England" at its first performance by a major symphony orchestra in this town, while considering the amount of musical mediocrity that has been perpetrated in performance since it was published in 1931. True, Nicolas Slonimsky gave the work a hearing in that year, in Town Hall, but the orchestra was small, the scope of the playing inadequate for the detail of such a score.

As is well known, Ives is an American composer (now 74), who was writing the Stravinsky-kind of music before Stravinsky's name was known here; but one did not realize until this demonstration by Richard Burgin that Ives was also a musical imagist of the first order. Ives's method is somewhat like the painting technic of cubism, in which impressions and emotions are not portrayed literally, but in fragments and through overlapping of design. Thus, "Boston Commons" is an evocation of the St. Gaudens statue of Col. Shaw and his Colored Regiment through snatches of folk song, Stephen Foster, etc., in a most sophisticated kind of orchestral statement; "Putnam's Camp, at Redding, Conn." is an amazing piece of primitivism, in which the Boston Symphony became not merely one but two brass bands; and "The Housatonic at Stockbridge," a powerful piece of impressionism. The last of these suggested something more Amazonian than the "contented river" of Robert Underwood Johnson's poem, but it is a remarkable noise in any case.

I. K.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

FEB 22 1948

Boston Symphony

Program Includes Orchestral Set by Charles Ives

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Richard Burgin conducting; third concert of its afternoon series at Carnegie Hall yesterday. The program:
Prelude from Violin Partita in E major (arr. for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiaga) . Bach
Symphonia Serena . . . . Hindemith
"Three Places in New England" (An Orchestral Set) . . . . Ives
Boston Common; Putnam's Camp, Redding, Connecticut; From "The Housatonic at Stockbridge."
Symphony No. 2, in C minor, Op. 17 . Tchaikovsky

The belated discovery of Charles Ives's music has been going on for several years, but, if the record has been read correctly, none of his orchestral works had been played in Carnegie Hall's main auditorium before yesterday afternoon, when his "Three Places in New England" was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its highly able concertmaster and associate conductor, Richard Burgin.

Members of the Boston Symphony, in a group known as the Chamber Orchestra of Boston, had given the first and probably the only previous New York performance of this remarkable "orchestral set" in a program of modern music under Nicolas Slonimsky's direction at Town Hall on Jan. 10, 1931. It was a long concert, and the Herald Tribune reviewer, pressed for time, wrote that detailed comment must await some other occasion—which has arrived seventeen years later.

The work, like many others by Mr. Ives which have been brought to light recently, was composed early in this century, between 1903 and 1914; it was orchestrated in 1929. Without this factual information, a listener might easily be induced to assign much of this music to a later date. It is American music in its spirit as well as in the nationality of its composer; American tunes are woven into the background of the first movement and into the foreground of the second, but its musical expression of the atmospheres suggested by the topical subjects is innate in the work itself.

Snatches of Civil War Songs

The subject of the first section is the St. Gaudens monument of Colonel Robert Gould Shaw and his Negro regiment (the 54th Massachusetts) which faces Beacon Street. A poem printed in the score gives an anticipation of the atmosphere of the music, with its long, brooding melodic lines over a distantly pervasive rhythmic bass; fragments of Civil War songs emerge at times from the background of this expressive, if slightly drawn-out musical meditation. The second section moves from an oldtime Glorious Fourth celebration in Redding to thoughts of an event of Revolutionary times, and then back to the festivities. Here the "snatches of songs and marches in polymetric simultaneity," to quote Mr. Slonimsky's description, "are so used that the listener receives a vivid, unified impression of the color of the time and place; the vitality and gusto of the music suggesting that the village celebration could well arouse nostalgic thoughts in many hearers over a certain age."

The third section, however, which is based on lines from Robert Underwood Johnson's "The Housatonic at Stockbridge," is the most impressive; it provides four minutes of poetic imaginativeness with a broad, ingratiating melody accompanied by high, luminous and rippling figures. The appeal is partly descriptive, but this movement gives a sense of contemplative emotion rather than of one limited to effective depiction in musical terms.

Skill in Treatment of Ideas

The performance under Mr. Burgin's direction seemed to realize fully the composer's expressive ends; it also revealed the skill in his treatment of his musical ideas, and in his scoring.

Paul Hindemith's "Symphonia Serena" was played here earlier this month by the Philharmonic, and needs no additional comment; it has considerable geniality of mood, along with the masterly craftsmanship which one expects from this composer. The performance was lucid, spirited and well proportioned, and Mr. Hindemith was called upon for bows.

The Bostonians' strings played Pick-Mangiagalli's arrangement of the familiar Bach prelude with sweep and brilliance, and the orchestra also played admirably in Tchaikovsky's not often performed "Little Russian" second symphony. While Tchaikovsky's craftsmanship has not yet reached its full development in this work, it has vitality and melodic appeal, and should serve, from time to time, as a very acceptable substitute for the perennially played fourth, fifth and sixth symphonies.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

FEB 23 1948

COMPOSER IVES
Inspiration at lunch.

Double Indemnity

Charles Edward Ives is a composer U.S. musicians like to talk about—but seldom get to hear. Much of his diffuse, polytonal music is as difficult as trying to play a Bach fugue on a musical saw, and often as strange to listen to. But last week in Boston, 73-year-old Composer Ives had his innings.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had its troubles. Some Ives compositions are marked "play as you will." In rehearsal, single measures in Ives's symphonic suite Three Places in New England had to be hashed over as many as ten times. One section has a trumpet blaring the melody of The British Grenadiers in march tempo, while the strings saw away on a waltz. Groaned Assistant Conductor Richard Burgin: "I give the time, but the musicians are not supposed to follow me."

Bristling Rhythms. But in concert even Boston's dowager matinee audience found Ives's music frequently lyrical, bristlingly individual and [illegible] humorous.

To many, bristle-bearded Charles Ives is the most original—even if not the most skillful—of all U.S. composers. One New York critic once called his second piano sonata, Concord Mass., 1840-60, "the greatest music composed by an American." He was writing music with strange, exciting rhythms and polytonal harmonies before Stravinsky and Schoenberg.

At 13, Charles Ives had written a Holiday Quickstep and been pronounced a genius by the Danbury [illegible] Evening News. But after Yale, he decided that he couldn't make a living writing the kind of music he wanted to; he went into insurance and became highly successful (he is a retired partner in the Manhattan firm of Ives & Myrick). In lunch hours and evenings, he composed.

Concert Boycott. Even then, he was a cantankerous recluse. He has never gone to concerts, never reads newspapers, won't have a radio in his house. Now ill, Ives lives simply in a hilltop home in Connecticut with his wife, Harmony.

He has been admitted to the National Institute of Arts & Letters, but thinks little of some of his colleagues ("Tin ear slobwogs!"). Last year, he won a Pulitzer Prize for his Third Symphony, [illegible] for 36 years while the manuscript gathered dust in his barn. After receiving the prize, he granted a rare newspaper interview. When a reporter congratulated him, he refused to shake hands, roared: "Prizes, bah! What do I care for prizes! They are the badge of mediocrity."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Commissioning works right and left through the Koussevitsky Foundation, established in memory of his late wife, the illustrious conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who yesterday returned to the regular concerts after his mid-winter vacation, is bound to turn up a notable composition once in a while. The law of averages will not have it otherwise. It is my guess that the Fourth Symphony ("In Memoriam") of Malipiero, which had its first performance on this occasion, will be with us for some time to come.

Not all the pieces dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky are elegiac in character, but this one is. Into it the Italian composer has poured the suffering and anguish of the war years. The expression, however, is restrained and is the more forceful because of that. Compared with much modern music, this Symphony is clear, readily assimilated at a first hearing. There are two slow movements; the second, marked "funebre," and the last, which takes the form of variations on a simple and haunting melody that came to the composer 36 years ago, as he watched a funeral procession wending its way along an Alpine path, while the bells of a nearby church tolled.

When this affecting finale came to its close there was much applause, which was fully deserved, though at the moment it seemed impertinent. There was even disrelish, in the case of this particular listener, for the next number, Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini, in which Arthur Rubenstein was the pianist. The mood passed, once the Russian's piece, last heard at the Symphony Concerts when he himself was the soloist, got under way. The variation form may become tiresome, and Brahms, not to mention Paganini himself, had apparently exhausted the possibilities of this particular tune. Nevertheless, Rachmaninoff found plenty to do with it, much of it engrossing and some of it exciting. Also, after the somber coloring of the Malipiero Symphony, his lush and brilliant orchestration seemed all the richer.

Dr. Koussevitzky was in fine fettle yesterday, and so was Mr. Rubenstein. Before the intermission they accomplished a beautiful performance of Mozart's A major Piano Concerto (K. 488), which in its turn had followed a splendid disclosure of that composer's "Jupiter" Symphony. Some of the choicest things in all Mozart are to be found in the piano concertos, the poignant slow movement of this one is a good example, and it is a pity that pianists are not often tempted to play them. No doubt, Mr. Rubenstein would have hesitated to give us Mozart and nothing else. As it was, he revealed to us both the finer side of his art and his great virtuosity in one and the same concert. And a noteworthy concert it was, any way you look at it.

[77]

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y.
REPORTER-DISPATCH
FEB 20 1948

3,000 Hear Boston Symphony In 5th Olney Concert at Center

By RUTH K. NOLAN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by its associate conductor, Richard Burgin presented the fifth concert in the Mrs. Julian Olney subscription series at the County Center last night before an audience of 3,000. The program included the Haydn "Symphony in C Minor, No. 95", the Sibelius "Symphony No. 1 in E Minor, Opus 39" and the Tschaikowsky "Symphony No. 2 in C Minor, Opus 17."

It was an excellent program from start to finish. Each of the contrasting symphonies demanded expert handling and individual treatment, and all were beautifully presented. The lucidity and delicacy of construction of the Haydn work was emphasized by an animated and at the same time sensitive interpretation. It was played with a full understanding of its inate grace and charm, with its underlying fundamental design and richness of development always in mind. This symphony is full of delightful musical ideas, with a complete avoidance of meaningless phrases and Mr. Burgin delineated this pattern clearly.

The highlight was the Sibelius work, because of its monumental style and because of the striking manner in which its particular type of heroic romanticism was portrayed. Here is a symphony which abounds in contrasts. It is highly dramatic in every movement, and Mr. Burgin emphasized just these aspects.

He presented a broad and vibrant interpretation of the great melodies which sing with exultant joy and rise and fall with increasing intensity from one movement to another. At the same time he brought forth the tender and nostalgic moments in the score.

Graceful and delicate passages were sharply contrasted by outbursts of tremendous passion at times almost barbaric in character. Of particular note was the wonderful presentation of the deeply moving theme of the final movement which climaxed all the dramatic intensity of the previous score.

This symphony was also in sharp contrast to the one which followed it. The Tschaikowsky is, if nothing else, drenched in the feeling and color of Russia. The themes of its first and last movements are based upon Russian folk melodies, and those which do not have this origin, are typically Slavic in feeling.

Throughout the work, the composer shows his great skill in orchestration, and his fondness for the chromatic scale, which he uses in artful contrapuntal passages. No matter how furious or technically brilliant the passage, it was always presented with great clarity and feeling for the underlying emotional message.

Mr. Burgin offered an especially delightful performance of the lovely little march theme in the second movement, which Tschaikowsky took from his own unpublished opera, "Undine," when the St. Petersburg opera turned it down. Also in the third movement, which is filled with charming rhythmic contrasts and sudden changes of mood, he presented not only the technical aspects of the score but the heart and soul of the music as well.

The final movement of the symphony, which is based upon a little theme which undergoes ever varied treatment, was given a tremendous development until it climaxed in a brilliant Presto. It was an effective climax not only of this symphony but of the entire concert. Mr. Burgin amply proved his capabilities as conductor.

The final concert in the series will be presented by Arthur Rubinstein, master pianist, on April 2. On April 23, Mrs. Onley will present Jose and Amparo Iturbi in a two piano recital.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
FEB 21 1948

Musician's Auto In Lenox Crash

Koussevitsky's Car Damaged, Two Persons Hurt

Lenox, Feb. 21—Two persons were injured and an automobile owned by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky damaged in a collision at West St. and Court House Hill intersection yesterday.

The automobile owned by the conductor was driven by his chauffeur, Lawrence H. Monroe, 42, of Lenox. The other car involved was operated by Leopold Hase of Williamstown.

Hase suffered cuts on the face and injuries to his chest and left arm. Thomas O'Neil of Williamstown, who was riding with Hase, suffered head injuries. Miss Sally Monroe, 13, a passenger in the car driven by her father, was unhurt.

Police charged the accident occurred when Hase ignored a highway stop sign. His car plowed into the Koussevitsky limousine, causing considerable damage.

TROY, N. Y.
OBSERVER & BUDGET
FEB 22 1948

Serge Koussevitsky has announced three guest conductors for the Berkshire Festival of 1948, to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass., from July 18 to Aug. 15 next.

While Koussevizky will lead most of the concerts, others will be conducted by Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Carvalho and Robert Shaw. Music of Bach Mozart and Tchaikovsky will be stressed.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 23 1948

Richard Burgin Directs Music of Charles Ives

It was illuminating at the Saturday matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, to observe the qualities of Charles Ives's "Three Places in New England" at its first performance by a major symphony orchestra in this town, while considering the amount of musical mediocrity that has been perpetrated in performance since it was published in 1931. True, Nicolas Slonimsky gave the work a hearing in that year, in Town Hall, but the orchestra was small, the scope of the playing inadequate for the detail of such a score.

As is well known, Ives is an American composer (now 74), who was writing the Stravinsky kind of music before Stravinsky's name was known here; but one did not realize until this demonstration by Richard Burgin that Ives was also a musical imagist of the first order. Ives's method is somewhat like the painting technic of cubism, in which impressions and emotions are not portrayed literally, but in fragments and through overlapping of design. Thus, "Boston Commons" is an evocation of the St. Gaudens statue of Col. Shaw and his Colored Regiment through snatches of folk song, Stephen Foster, etc., in a most sophisticated kind of orchestral statement; "Putnam's Camp, at Redding, Conn." is an amazing piece of primitivism, in which the Boston Symphony became not merely one but two brass bands; and "The Housatonic at Stockbridge," a powerful piece of impressionism. The last of these suggested something more Amazonian than the "contented river" of Robert Underwood Johnson's poem, but it is a remarkable noise in any case.

I. K.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 22 1948

Boston Symphony

Program Includes Orchestral Set by Charles Ives

By Francis D. Perkins

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Richard Burgin conducting; third concert of its afternoon series at Carnegie Hall yesterday. The program:

Prelude from Violin Partita in E major (arr. for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiaga).Bach
Symphonia Serena ....Hindemith
"Three Places in New England" (An Orchestral Set) ....Ives
Boston Common; Putnam's Camp, Redding, Connecticut; From "The Housatonic at Stockbridge."
Symphony No. 2, in C minor, Op. 17.Tchaikovsky

The belated discovery of Charles Ives's music has been going on for several years, but, if the record has been read correctly, none of his orchestral works had been played in Carnegie Hall's main auditorium before yesterday afternoon, when his "Three Places in New England" was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under its highly able concertmaster and associate conductor, Richard Burgin.

Members of the Boston Symphony, in a group known as the Chamber Orchestra of Boston, had given the first and probably the only previous New York performance of this remarkable "orchestral set" in a program of modern music under Nicolas Slonimsky's direction at Town Hall on Jan. 10, 1931. It was a long concert, and the Herald Tribune reviewer, pressed for time, wrote that detailed comment must await some other occasion—which has arrived seventeen years later.

The work, like many others by Mr. Ives which have been brought to light recently, was composed early in this century, between 1903 and 1914; it was orchestrated in 1929. Without this factual information, a listener might easily be induced to assign much of this music to a later date. It is American music in its spirit as well as in the nationality of its composer; American tunes are woven into the background of the first movement and into the foreground of the second, but its musical expression of the atmospheres suggested by the topical subjects is innate in the work itself.

Snatches of Civil War Songs

The subject of the first section is the St. Gaudens monument of Colonel Robert Gould Shaw and his Negro regiment (the 54th Massachusetts) which faces Beacon Street. A poem printed in the score gives an anticipation of the atmosphere of the music, with its long, brooding melodic lines over a distantly pervasive rhythmic bass; fragments of Civil War songs emerge at times from the background of this expressive, if slightly drawn-out musical meditation. The second section moves from an oldtime Glorious Fourth celebration in Redding to thoughts of an event of Revolutionary times, and then back to the festivities. Here the "snatches of songs and marches in polymetric simultaneity," to quote Mr. Slonimsky's description, "are so used that the listener receives a vivid, unified impression of the color of the time and place; the vitality and gusto of the music suggesting that the village celebration could well arouse nostalgic thoughts in many hearers over a certain age."

The third section, however, which is based on lines from Robert Underwood Johnson's "The Housatonic at Stockbridge," is the most impressive; it provides four minutes of poetic imaginativeness with a broad, ingratiating melody accompanied by high, luminous and rippling figures. The appeal is partly descriptive, but this movement gives a sense of contemplative emotion rather than of one limited to effective depiction in musical terms.

Skill in Treatment of Ideas

The performance under Mr. Burgin's direction seemed to realize fully the composer's expressive ends; it also revealed the skill in his treatment of his musical ideas, and in his scoring.

Paul Hindemith's "Symphonia Serena" was played here earlier this month by the Philharmonic, and needs no additional comment; it has considerable geniality of mood, along with the masterly craftsmanship which one expects from this composer. The performance was lucid, spirited and well proportioned, and Mr. Hindemith was called upon for bows.

The Bostonians' strings played Pick-Mangiagalli's arrangement of the familiar Bach prelude with sweep and brilliance, and the orchestra also played admirably in Tchaikovsky's not often performed "Little Russian" second symphony. While Tchaikovsky's craftsmanship has not yet reached its full development in this work, it has vitality and melodic appeal, and should serve, from time to time, as a very acceptable substitute for the perennially played fourth, fifth and sixth symphonies.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
FEB 23 1948

COMPOSER IVES
Inspiration at lunch.

Double Indemnity

Charles Edward Ives is a composer U.S. musicians like to talk about—but seldom get to hear. Much of his diffuse, polytonal music is as difficult as trying to play a Bach fugue on a musical saw—and often as strange to listen to. But last week, in Boston, 73-year-old Composer Ives had his innings.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra had its troubles. Some Ives compositions are marked "play as you will." In rehearsal, single measures in Ives's symphonic suite Three Places in New England had to be hashed over as many as ten times. One section has a trumpet blaring the melody of The British Grenadiers in march tempo, while the strings saw away on a waltz. Groaned Assistant Conductor Richard Burgin: "I give the time, but the musicians are not supposed to follow me."

Bristling Rhythms. But in concert, even Boston's dowager matinee audience found Ives's music frequently lyrical, bristlingly individual and tartly humorous.

To many, bristle-bearded Charles Ives is the most original—even if not the most skillful—of all U.S. composers. One New York critic once called his second piano sonata, Concord Mass. 1840-60, "the greatest music composed by an American." He was writing music with strange, exciting rhythms and polytonal harmonies before Stravinsky and Schönberg.

At 13, Charles Ives had written a Holiday Quickstep and been pronounced a genius by the Danbury (Conn.) Evening News. But after Yale, he decided that he couldn't make a living writing the kind of music he wanted to; he went into insurance and became highly successful (he is a retired partner in the Manhattan firm of Ives & Myrick). In his lunch hours and evenings, he composed.

Concert Boycott. Even then, he was a cantankerous recluse. He has never gone to concerts, never reads newspapers, won't have a radio in his house. Now ill, Ives lives simply in a hilltop home in Connecticut with his wife, Harmony.

He has been admitted to the National Institute of Arts & Letters but thinks little of some of his colleagues ("Those sloths"). Last year, he won a Pulitzer Prize for his Third Symphony, [illegible] for 36 years while the manuscript [illegible] dust in his barn. After receiving the prize, he granted a rare newspaper interview. When a reporter congratulated him, he refused to shake hands, roared: "Prizes, bah! What do I care for prizes! They are the badges of mediocrity."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Commissioning works right and left through the Koussevitsky Foundation, established in memory of his late wife, the illustrious conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who yesterday returned to the regular concerts after his mid-winter vacation, is bound to turn up a notable composition once in a while. The law of averages will not have it otherwise. It is my guess that the Fourth Symphony ("In Memoriam") of Malipiero, which had its first performance on this occasion, will be with us for some time to come.

Not all the pieces dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky are elegiac in character, but this one is. Into it the Italian composer has poured the suffering and anguish of the war years. The expression, however, is restrained and is the more forceful because of that. Compared with much modern music, this Symphony is clear, readily assimilated at a first hearing. There are two slow movements; the second, marked "funebre," and the last, which takes the form of variations on a simple and haunting melody that came to the composer 36 years ago, as he watched a funeral procession wending its way along an Alpine path, while the bells of a nearby church tolled.

When this affecting finale came to its close there was much applause, which was fully deserved, though at the moment it seemed impertinent. There was even disrelish, in the case of this particular listener, for the next number, Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini, in which Arthur Rubenstein was the pianist. The mood passed, once the Russian's piece, last heard at the Symphony Concerts when he himself was the soloist, got under way. The variation form may become tiresome, and Brahms, not to mention Paganini himself, had apparently exhausted the possibilities of this particular tune. Nevertheless, Rachmaninoff found plenty to do with it, much of it engrossing and some of it exciting. Also, after the somber coloring of the Malipiero Symphony, his lush and brilliant orchestration seemed all the richer.

Dr. Koussevitzky was in fine fettle yesterday, and so was Mr. Rubenstein. Before the intermission they accomplished a beautiful performance of Mozart's A major Piano Concerto (K. 488), which in its turn had followed a splendid disclosure of that composer's "Jupiter" Symphony. Some of the choicest things in all Mozart are to be found in the piano concertos, the poignant slow movement of this one is a good example, and it is a pity that pianists are not often tempted to play them. No doubt, Mr. Rubenstein would have hesitated to give us Mozart and nothing else. As it was, he revealed to us both the finer side of his art and his great virtuosity in one and the same concert. And a noteworthy concert it was, any way you look at it.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

Boston Symphony

Program Includes Orchestral Set by Charles Ives

By [illegible] D. Perkins

[illegible] Tchaikovsky

The [illegible] discovery of Charles Ives [illegible] going on for several [illegible] the record has been [illegible] none of his orchestral works had been played in Carnegie Hall's main auditorium [illegible] afternoon, when [illegible] Places in New England [illegible] performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under [illegible] concertmaster and [illegible] conductor, Richard Burgin.

Members of the Boston Symphony, [illegible] known as the Chamber Orchestra of Boston, had given the [illegible] probably the only previous New York performance of this remarkable "orchestral set" in a program of modern music under Nicolas Slonimsky's direction at Town Hall on Jan. 10, 1931. It was a long concert, and the Herald Tribune reviewer, pressed for time, wrote that detailed comment must await some other occasion—which has arrived seventeen years later.

The work, like many others by Mr. Ives which have been brought to light recently, was composed early in this century, between 1903 and 1914; it was orchestrated in 1929. Without this factual information, a listener might easily be induced to assign much of this music to a later date. It is American music in its spirit as well as in the nationality of its composer; American tunes are woven into the background of the first movement and into the foreground of the second, but its musical expression of the atmospheres suggested by the topical subjects is innate in the work itself.

Snatches of Civil War Songs

The subject of the first section is the St. Gaudens monument of Colonel Robert Gould Shaw and his Negro regiment (the 54th Massachusetts) which faces Beacon Street. A poem printed in the score gives an anticipation of the atmosphere of the music, with its long, brooding melodic lines over a distantly pervasive rhythmic bass; fragments of Civil War songs emerge at times from the background of this expressive, if slightly drawn-out musical meditation. The second section moves from an old-time Glorious Fourth celebration in Redding to thoughts of an event of Revolutionary times, and then back to the festivities. Here the "snatches of songs and marches in polymetric simultaneity," to quote Mr. Slonimsky's description, "are so used that the listener receives a vivid, unified impression of the color of the time and place; the vitality and gusto of the music suggesting that the village celebration could well arouse nostalgic thoughts in many hearers over a certain age."

The third section, however, which is based on lines from Robert Underwood Johnson's "The Housatonic at Stockbridge," is the most impressive; it provides four minutes of poetic imaginativeness with a broad, ingratiating melody accompanied by high, luminous and rippling figures. The appeal is partly descriptive, but this movement gives a sense of contemplative emotion rather than of one limited to effective depiction in musical terms.

Skill in Treatment of Ideas

The performance under Mr. Burgin's direction seemed to realize fully the composer's expressive ends; it also revealed the skill in his treatment of his musical ideas, and in his scoring.

Paul Hindemith's "Symphonia Serena" was played here earlier this month by the Philharmonic, and needs no additional comment; it has considerable geniality of mood, along with the masterly craftsmanship which one expects from this composer. The performance was lucid, spirited and well proportioned, and Mr. Hindemith was called upon for bows.

The Bostonians' strings played Pick-Mangiagalli's arrangement of the familiar Bach prelude with sweep and brilliance, and the orchestra also played admirably in Tchaikovsky's not often performed "Little Russian" second symphony. While Tchaikovsky's craftsmanship has not yet reached its full development in this work, it has vitality and melodic appeal, and should serve, from time to time, as a very acceptable substitute for the perennially played fourth, fifth and sixth symphonies.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
FEB 23 1948

Burgin Vividly Conducts Ives' Work in Symphony

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Thanks to Richard Burgin, a work by the American composer, Charles Ives, has been heard again. "Three Places In New England" was included on the Boston Symphony's Saturday matinee program. As usual with Ives, the music scored a definite impression. The performance was one of the vivid moments of the weekend.

Ives has been called the most original of our native composers. He is certainly one of the most American. Nevertheless, a performance of one of his works is quite rare. Perhaps this event will spur others to give more of his music a hearing. The time has come, especially after his Third Symphony was singled out for the Pulitzer Prize a year ago.

The "Three Places In New England" are: "The St. Gaudens' (statue) in Boston Common;" Putnam's camp at Redding, Conn., and "The Housatonic at Stockbridge." Each subject lends itself to an originality of treatment quite engrossing. Of the three, the last is a notable piece of music.

Less of a technician and more of a creator, Ives writes music difficult to play. It was no mean accomplishment for the Boston Symphony and its conductor, Burgin, to play these works so successfully.

Their polyrhymic and polytonal character presents more obstacles in performing than to listening.

As descriptive music this verges on the realistic. Ives made no attempt to disguise the popular aspect of band music in sketching his Revolutionary scene at Putnam's camp.

His effort to translate the movement of the Housatonic into sound is an extraordinary feat like nothing else in music. The results are arresting.

Also on this program was Hindemith's Symphonia Serena, introduced to New York a week ago. The work is undoubtedly more expressive than much of Hindemith, but still has a dryness not easily overlooked.

The program opened with an inept transcription of a Bach Prelude. It ended with Tchaikowsky's delightful Second Symphony. Mr. Burgin's solid musicianship was a distinct contribution to the afternoon.

* * *

Juilliard Plays

Another American composer got a hearing last night. David Diamond's Fourth Symphony had its first New York performance in Carnegie Hall with the Juilliard Orchestra. Again it became obvious that Diamond has come to the fore this year.

Edgar Schenkman included one more contemporary work on this program: Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony completed the list. The orchestra was at its best in the modern music.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES UNION
FEB 22 194

Music -:- By Edgar S. Van Olinda

THE Delmar Progress club will present Dr. Charles F. Stokes, violinist and violist and Margaret Anderson Stokes, pianist, in a joint recital with Park N. Darrow, cellist, and Marjorie Nichols Jones, soprano, in the Bethlehem Central High school, Delmar, tomorrow night at 8 o'clock. Dr. Stokes is director of music at State College for Teachers. Mrs. Phurnia Whitecraft Irish is chairman of the publicity committee.

* * *

THE ALBANY Symphony orchestra, Ole Windingstad musical director, will inaugurate a new idea with its presentation of the string section of the orchestra in Chancellors hall, Wednesday night. Incidental solos will be played by Edward A. Rice, concertmaster of the orchestra; Fred Graziade, violinist; John Trombini, cellist, and Dr. Charles F. Stokes, violist. The program will include Concerto Grosse, No. 8 by Corelli; the Bach concerto for two violins and orchestra; Grieg's Holbert suite and Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis. This is one of the four scheduled concerts by the orchestra. Individual seats for this event may be obtained at the Van Curler Music company.

* * *

THE ORIGINAL Don Cossack chorus and Dancers will make their only Albany Area appearance in Troy's Music hall, Thursday evening, March 4 under the sponsorship of the Cohoes "R" club, associated with the Greek orthodox church of that city.

By the time this group completes its American itinerary in March it will have sung in 119 cities during its present tour. Following its American tour, the male group, conducted by Serge Jaroff, will sail for Europe for the first appearance on the continent since 1939. Tickets may be obtained at William M. Whitney and company's music department in Albany; Miller's Music store in Troy or the Cohoes Music center.

* * *

Dates and particulars are announced for the Berkshire Festival of 1948 to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor—at Tanglewood, the orchestra's summer home in Lenox, Mass. The Festival will consist of 14 concerts from July 18 through August 15. In the first two weeks, two programs from the music of Bach and Mozart will be performed on Sunday afternoon, July 18, and Tuesday evening, July 20, and repeated on Sunday afternoon, July 25, and Tuesday evening, July 27. These concerts will be given in the intimate Theatre Concert hall and will be by Dr. Koussevitzky. Three series will be given in the third, fourth, and fifth weeks (July 29-August 15) with a Thursday evening, Saturday evening, and Sunday afternoon concert for each series. After Series B, an extra concert will be performed on Tuesday, August 10, with an all-Tchaikovsky program. These concerts will be given in the Music shed. While Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct most of the concerts, three guest conductors have been invited: Leonard Bernstein, Elaezar de Carvalho, and Robert Shaw. Soloists are to be announced.

MOUNT VERNON, N. Y.
ARGUS
FEB 20 1948

Concert By Boston Symphony Draws 4,000 To County Center

By JOHN D. CHEQUER

Before an enthusiastic audience of 4,000, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night presented its second performance at Westchester County Center, White Plains, under auspices of the Mrs. Julian Olney Concert Series.

Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra for the past 27 years, and associate conductor, presided on the podium.

Since the days of Gericke and Nikisch, the Boston Symphony has been accepted as one of the finest symphonic ensembles in this country, if not in the world. Therefore, one may expect impeccable playing, but last night's performance was on an exceptionally high level even for an orchestra of such excellence. One doubts, in fact, if the Boston would have been more responsive or would have sounded better under the direction of its superb conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

At least part of this excellence, the writer feels, was due to a happily chosen program of three symphonies by master craftsmen whose approach to creation was so diverse.

There was the "Symphony in C-minor, No. 95" by "Papa" Haydn, who lived 77 long and fruitful years and could no more stop the spontaneous melody that flowed from his heart than fail to love life as he did.

Then there was the "Symphony No. 1 in E-minor, Opus 39" by Sibelius, the great Finnish intellectual, who never used an extra note and whose effects are shrewdly calculated by a craftsman who knows all the potentials of orchestra color, but whose music is all the more powerful for its restrained passion.

And finally the Tschaikowsky "Symphony No. 2" (Little Russia) in C-minor, Opus 17, by the romantic and melancholy genius who never could hide his heart.

Whether it was architectural grandeur or ethereal whisper, the orchestra "gave" for the conductor—and why not, he is one of them; they know that he knows how well they can play, and well they did.

The Boston's performance of last night was quite beyond praise in its concise performance, its imaginative interpretations, and its marvelous cohesiveness as a sounding instrument. It is a thrill to the ear and a joy to the heart to hear such playing.

[78]

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 16th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in C minor No. 95.....Haydn
Symphony in Three Movements
Stravinsky
"Three Places in New England." An Orchestral set ....Ives
Symphony No. 2 in C minor Op. 17
Tchaikovsky

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

With the exception of the Haydn Symphony and the novelty of the Charles Ives pieces yesterday's concert had little to recommend it. Mr. Burgin lavished considerable interpretative effort over each number, but the results were not inspiring for the listener. Goodness knows we get enough Tchaikovsky every season without having to put up with his second-rate stuff as well. And so far this season we have two such, "Francesca da Rimini" and now the Second Symphony. It only remains to produce the "Manfred" Symphony for our cup of grief to overlow.

Ives is one of those curious phenomena in the history of music, a composer who is universally discussed and hardly ever played. In this he is like Schoenberg. But he is quite unlike Schoenberg in the paths his invention takes, for they are many, varied and uninhibited. He might, I suppose, be compared to a contemporary primitive in painting, but the comparison would not be fair to Ives' care for the medium of his expression. At any rate the "Israel Putnam's Camp" sketch is very good fun and completely effective. I got nothing, however, out of "Boston Common," save that I wished he would get "Marching Through Georgia" out into the open and done with. The last piece is a fairly obvious, descriptive tone poem. "Three Places in New England" was worth doing for the good things in it and as a means to hear something of this strange composer's output.

Mr. Burgin did this stravinsky Symphony last season, and I wish instead he would revive the more imaginative Symphony in C. This work is of intellectual interest only, for it is dry and ascetic. Repeated performances do but accentuate these qualities. If there are to be revivals of Stravinsky's later music, let us by all means have the Symphony in C and "Persephone." The interpretation did not impress me as favorably as did the one Mr. Burgin gave us in the fall of 1946. It was thus Haydn's Symphony

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
FEB 28 1948

Off the Record

Red Composer's Work 'Dangerous' Because People Seem to Like It

By HARVEY TAYLOR

ARAM KHATCHATURIAN, one of a group of Soviet composers recently accused by their cultural commissar, or whatever he is, of writing "bourgeoise" music, is represented by an album of recordings issued by Columbia this week.

It's his "Masquerade" suite, performed by Leopold Stokowski and the New York Philharmonic.

The "dangerous" thing about the young Armenian's music seems to be that people like it instantly.

Khatchaturian wrote this suite as incidental music to a tragedy by a poet-dramatist named Lermontov, who is said to have conceived his play as a symbol of the pretentiousness and dissoluteness of the czarist court.

The composer just wrote a lot of music in the style of the Russian romantics—people like Borodin and Tchaikovsky. It sounds tuneful, shallow, decorative and completely harmless—and makes very pleasant listening.

There seems to be a jinx on men who try to record Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. We've never heard a good recording of it and the new version (Victor) by Koussevitzky, the Boston ~~Symphony,~~ and the Berkshire Festival Chorus is no exception.

Maybe we got a bad copy, but ours was very scratchy and not at all clear until the choral part began. It sounded like an old recording.

The record was made at the Tanglewood summer camp which Koussevitzky maintains as a music colony in the Berkshires.

It's a shame that such an ambitious project should have yielded such meager rewards. Better try again, boys.

Schumann's E-flat ("Rhenish") symphony (by Victor) gets an excellent performance at the hands of Dimitri Mitropoulos and the Minneapolis Symphony.

As the elder statesmen among conductors grow older, it's reassuring to realize that Mitropoulos is around. His reading of the Schumann is lively, virile and exciting. The horn playing is especially good, by the way.

Arthur Rodzinski, while he was still conducting the New York Philharmonic, made (for Columbia) a new recording of the Brahms Second Symphony which was released last week.

His Brahms is excellent for its clarity and effortlessness.

Gudrun Thorne-Thomsen has been making (for Victor) some quite delightful children's records.

The latest is "Freddie and His Magic Fiddle," the plot of which we refuse to describe.

Music is by Russ Case and his orchestra.

The narrator's voice is soothing but never dull.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1948 Art—Music—Theater ★ 5

s to Come—Rubinstein With Symphony

Koussevitzky Back, Plays Malipiero Symphony

By L. A. Sloper

Dr. Koussevitzky, returning yesterday to the Friday series of concerts after the longest midwinter vacation he has ever taken, was received with particular warmth by the audience. He shared honors in the seventeenth program of the season with Artur Rubinstein, who appeared as soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in A major and in Rachmaninov's Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini. Dr. Koussevitzky opened the concert with Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony and directed the orchestra also in Malipiero's Symphony No. 4 (first performance).

Mr. Rubinstein received an ovation—two ovations, to be exact. He deserved them both. He is a superb artist, capable of interpreting two works of such widely disparate styles as those on this program. His Mozart was unexceptionable, with beauty of tone, polished phrasing, subtle shading and rhythmic pliancy. It was an aristocratic performance, of a musical penetration seldom encountered today.

Yet he could jump from this to the Rachmaninov Rhapsody, surmount easily the technical hurdles, and also bring out unsuspected or forgotten musical values here too. It had been heard here only once previously, with the composer as soloist. The theme is amusing and amusingly contrasted with the "Dies Irae." There is also a rather dreadful neo-Tchaikovskyan theme. The performance was brilliant on the part of the orchestra as well as the soloist.

The novelty of the occasion was Malipiero's Symphony No. 4, which was commissioned, like so many we have heard of late, by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and dedicated to the memory of Mme Natalie Koussevitzy.

This is a symphony with practically no development—that is to say, no symphony. But perhaps the form does not matter. The composer was clearly, by his own account, deeply stirred emotionally when he wrote it. Unfortunately, his emotion is not expressed in the music. There is an energetic theme and a funereal theme, and, in the last movement, a theme derived from the tolling of an Alpine church bell.

The trouble is that none of these themes is salient. They lend themselves neither to development nor to contrapuntal treatment. The writing is "linear," a style very well adapted to the material. Oddly enough, the last work of Mr. Malipiero's to be heard from this orchestra was his Second Symphony, also "Elegiac," played 10 years ago. The present work shows no growth.

The Mozart symphony was played with the utmost virtuosity on the part of the orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky was in fine fettle, but his slow movement was again too slow, and his Finale too fast.

Symphony Programs

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give the fifth program of the Sunday afternoon series tomorrow in Symphony Hall at 3:30; the program of the 18th pair of concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 5 and 6, and the fifth concert of the Cambridge series in Sanders Theater a week from Tuesday, March 9. The Sunday program will consist of Prokofiev's "Classical" Symphony, Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, and the Second Symphony of Brahms.

For the Friday and Saturday concerts Dr. Koussevitzky announces Prokofiev's "Scythian" Suite, a new Violoncello Concerto by Aram Khatchatourian, and the Fifth Symphony by Shostakovitch. The Khatchatourian Concerto will be heard for the first time in this country. The soloist will be Edmund Kurtz.

In Cambridge Dr. Koussevitzky will present Walter Piston's Third Symphony, Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik;" Prokofiev's Scythian Suite, and Ravel's Second Suite from "Daphnis et Chloé."

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1948

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Artur Rubinstein, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in C major K. 551....Mozart
Piano Concerto in A major K. 488 Mozart
Symphony No. 4..............Malipiero
Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini Op. 43 ....Rachmaninoff

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

There was so much to applaud in yesterday's concert that it is hard to know where to begin or what and whom most to praise. Let us start with Mozart. Even way out in Arizona Dr. Koussevitzky must have had his ear to the ground for musical happenings in Boston. Thus he must have known that a rival orchestra, the Minneapolis, and conductor Mitropoulos had not cut much of a figure here with Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony. And so he comes back to Boston and produces a triumphant performance of that work! We can be grateful to him for showing us Mozart's greatness, which our visitors somehow muffed.

Another aspect of Mozart's greatness is to be found in his piano concertos, which are not played often enough in public. This one in A major is an utter charmer, and Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Rubinstein produced between them an interpretation of surpassing beauty. I must hand it to Mr. Rubinstein, who has sometimes been criticized in these columns for introducting his own personality between the music and the listener. Yesterday he was nothing if not calm objectivity and he let the music sing with simplicity and grace. The adagio was taken very slowly, but successfully so and with a wonderful clarity. So too did Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra show us clearly the marvelous complexity of the "Jupiter" finale.

Dr. Koussevitzky then gave the first performance of an impressive new Symphony, the 4th by Malipiero. The work is singularly well knit. The effects, such as the use of drone bass, passages for trombones and tuba and solos for English horn, are superbly wrought. The Symphony is a memorial for many things, but the melancholy is not breast-beating or doleful dumps. The Scherzo, for instance, has a wild excitement. There is plenty of contrast, but also a unit of thought that makes this perhaps Malipiero's finest work an a real find this season.

Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on theme of Paganini is to my min his best work. It is certainly hi cleverest. It is a juicy piece, absolutely bursting with virtuos tricks for the soloist and gorgeou effects for the orchestra. Mr Rubinstein must have studied Rachmaninoff's own interpretation, for his does not differ materially from it. That is, too, the highest compliment that could be paid him. Altogether it was a splendid concert, brilliantly topped off in the grand manner.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 28 1948

CLASSES ANNOUNCED BY BERKSHIRE CENTER

Plans for the Berkshire Music Center, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., which is sponsored by the Boston ~~Symphony~~ Orchestra, have been announced by Serge Koussevitzky, director of the school. The six-week session will run from July 5 to August 15, through the period of the Berkshire Festival Concerts.

Classes will be held in the following subjects: conducting, under Dr. Koussevitzky, Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin and Eleazar de Carvalho; choral conducting under Hugh Ross and Robert Shaw; composition under Aaron Copland, assistant director of the school, and Darius Milhaud; opera under Boris Goldovsky and costume design under Leo Van Witsen; chamber music under Gregor Piatigorsky; orchestra under twenty-five principal players of the Boston Symphony; chamber orchestra under Mr. de Carvalho. A seminar in very old and very new music will be conducted by Aaron Copland and Julius Herford.

The school will present some forty performances, including an opera. Further information may be had by writing the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 29 1948

MUSIC ON THE RADIO

By B. H. HAGGIN

THE League of Composers, on Feb. 16, sent me a copy of a statement about WOR-Mutual's Jan. 11 broadcast of William Bergsma's "The Fortunate Islands," in which it says that "without consent of the league or Mr. Bergsma 170 measures were cut from a 464-measure work in such a way that its form was completely distorted," that the league "has consistently fought for the faithful performance of new music and the protection of the creative artist," that "as soon as a meeting could be assembled after learning of the mutilation of Mr. Bergsma's score, the various committees of the league . . . reaffirmed this policy," that they "deplore and condemn any such misrepresentation of a composer's work, and have protested directly to Mr. Levin, demanding that the work be performed again in its entirety." And in the letter accompanying the statement Miss Nina Naguid, executive secretary of the league, says it "will indicate the misstatement" in my column of Feb. 8 about the league's "willingness to let a work that it had commissioned . . . be chopped down in that way," and also points out "that the league did not award any citation to WOR-Mutual" but "simply express[ed] our thanks . . . for . . . the time and facilities for the performance of two works commissioned by the league . . ."

But my original difficulty in understanding the league's behavior is even greater now after its explanation that it thanked WOR-Mutual for a performance in ignorance of the performance's mutilation of the work (I take "without consent" to mean without knowledge, finding it impossible to believe the league would have thanked if it had known but not consented). That is, I would suppose the league would have sufficient interest in a work it was sponsoring to have a representative who knew something about the work present at the rehearsal, or at least at the performance, so that it would not learn of the mutilation—from the composer himself, presumably—only after the performance and an expression of thanks. Moreover, though the league's statement includes words of prompt and swift action, its date speaks otherwise: the statement was issued a month after the Jan. 11 broadcast, a week after my Feb. 8 column. Maybe the league did need a month to assemble its committees for action; but to me it looks as though it needed only a week.

The result, at any rate, is that WOR is broadcasting the Bergsma piece in its entirety at 1:30 today.

I began on Feb. 21 with a moment of the second act of "Aida"—only a moment because I was put to flight by the Harshaw tremolo. Turning to N. B. C.'s Orchestras of the Nation I found the Denver Symphony conducted by Saul Caston in the midst of Brahms's Alto Rhapsody, from which I retreated for the same reason as Bernard Shaw once did from a performance of Brahms's Requiem—that listening to it is one of the "sacrifices which should not be demanded twice from any man." But I returned for the Fourth Symphony, the finest of Brahms's symphonies, and one of the very few large-scale works of his I enjoy listening to. The orchestra sounded good, and Caston conducted it efficiently in a performance that was straightforward and coherent until the final passacaglia movement, where the cumulative impact of the varied reiteration of the opening eight-bar statement must be built up by maintaining the pace of the statement throughout the movement, as Brahms directs, and where Caston instead followed most conductors' practice of changing the tempo for almost every variation and slowing down enormously in variations 9 to 15.

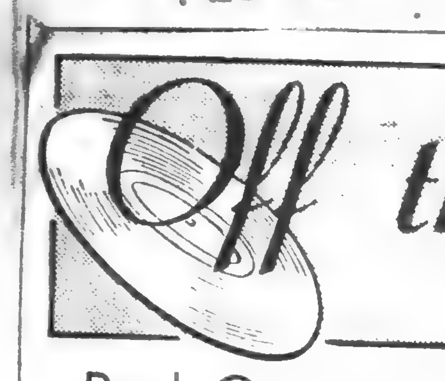
Later there was my favorite of all Brahms's works, the Variations on a Theme of Haydn, and Toscanini's beautiful performance of it, in which the N. B. C. Symphony did some exciting playing after a little initial insecurity among the winds (if my ears heard correctly). And after this the Third Symphony, of which I like the second and fourth movements, and a performance characteristic in the steadiness that gave the opening movement solidity and power, and in the momentum and brilliant execution that were breathtaking in the concluding movement. A musician directed my attention to the fact that for the first time Toscanini had the string tremolos in the last measures played exactly as written, instead of following the tradition of having some of the players play the theme in sustained notes at the same time. And in that connection he told me something Rose, the old concertmaster of the Vienna Philharmonic, had once told Toscanini. Many of the present-day traditions in the performance of Brahms go back to the performances conducted by Richter and others in Brahms's lifetime and in his very presence; and what, then, could be more authoritative? But at those performances, said Rose, one could see Brahms sometimes shaking his head in disapproval.

It's as though the mangled tempos in Koussevitzky's recorded performance ~~of Copland's~~ "Appalachian Spring"—which Copland had to endure if he wanted Koussevitzky to play the work—were to be considered authoritative fifty years from now.

Virgil Thomson's Symphony on a Hymn Tune, broadcast over C. B. S. on Feb. 21 by Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra, had me baffled by its two kinds of material: on the one hand some lovely tunes simply harmonized, on the other hand some discordant and quite horrid which I could find no own and no relation other. writing in point of its with the

[79]

DETROIT, MICH.
TIMES
FEB 28 1948



Off the Record

Red Composer's Work 'Dangerous' Because People Seem to Like It

By HARVEY TAYLOR

ARAM KHATCHATURIAN, one of a group of Soviet composers recently accused by their cultural commissar, or whatever he is, of writing "bourgeoise" music, is represented by an album of recordings issued by Columbia this week.

It's his "Masquerade" suite, performed by Leopold Stokowski and the New York Philharmonic.

The "dangerous" thing about the young Armenian's music seems to be that people like it instantly.

Khatchaturian wrote this suite as incidental music to a tragedy by a poet-dramatist named Lermontov, who is said to have conceived his play as a symbol of the pretentiousness and dissoluteness of the czarist court.

The composer just wrote a lot of music in the style of the Russian romantics—people like Borodin and Tchaikovsky. It sounds tuneful, shallow, decorative and completely harmless—and makes very pleasant listening.

There seems to be a jinx on men who try to record Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. We've never heard a good recording of it and the new version (Victor) by Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony, and the Berkshire Festival Chorus is no exception.

Maybe we got a bad copy, but ours was very scratchy and not at all clear until the choral part began. It sounded like an old recording.

The record was made at the Tanglewood summer camp which Koussevitzky maintains as a music colony in the Berkshires.

It's a shame that such an ambitious project should have yielded such meager rewards. Better try again, boys.

Schumann's E-flat ("Rhenish") symphony (by Victor) gets an excellent performance at the hands of Dimitri Mitropoulos and the Minneapolis Symphony.

As the elder statesmen among conductors grow older, it's reassuring to realize that Mitropoulos is around. His reading of the Schumann is lively, virile and exciting. The horn playing is especially good, by the way.

Arthur Rodzinski, while he was still conducting the New York Philharmonic, made (for Columbia) a new recording of the Brahms Second Symphony which was released last week.

His Brahms is excellent for its clarity and effortlessness.

Gudrun Thorne-Thomsen has been making (for Victor) some quite delightful children's records.

The latest is "Freddie and His Magic Fiddle," the plot of which we refuse to describe.

Music is by Russ Case and his orchestra.

The narrator's voice is soothing but never dull.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1948 Art—Music—Theater

s to Come—Rubinstein With Symphony

Koussevitzky Back, Plays Malipiero Symphony

By L. A. Sloper

Dr. Koussevitzky, returning yesterday to the Friday series of concerts after the longest midwinter vacation he has ever taken, was received with particular warmth by the audience. He shared honors in the seventeenth program of the season with Artur Rubinstein, who appeared as soloist in Mozart's Piano Concerto in A major and in Rachmaninov's Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini. Dr. Koussevitzky opened the concert with Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony and directed the orchestra also in Malipiero's Symphony No. 4 (first performance).

Mr. Rubinstein received an ovation—two ovations, to be exact. He deserved them both. He is a superb artist, capable of interpreting two works of such widely disparate styles as those on this program. His Mozart was unexceptionable, with beauty of tone, polished phrasing, subtle shading and rhythmic pliancy. It was an aristocratic performance, of a musical penetration seldom encountered today.

Yet he could jump from this to the Rachmaninov Rhapsody, surmount easily the technical hurdles, and also bring out unsuspected or forgotten musical values here too. It had been heard here only once previously, with the composer as soloist. The theme is amusing and amusingly contrasted with the "Dies Irae." There is also a rather dreadful neo-Tchaikovskyan theme. The performance was brilliant on the part of the orchestra as well as the soloist.

The novelty of the occasion was Malipiero's Symphony No. 4, which was commissioned, like so many we have heard of late, by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and dedicated to the memory of Mme Natalie Koussevitzy.

This is a symphony with practically no development—that is to say, no symphony. But perhaps the form does not matter. The composer was clearly, by his own account, deeply stirred emotionally when he wrote it. Unfortunately, his emotion is not expressed in the music. There is an energetic theme and a funereal theme, and, in the last movement, a theme derived from the tolling of an Alpine church bell.

The trouble is that none of these themes is salient. They lend themselves neither to development nor to contrapuntal treatment. The writing is "linear," a style very well adapted to the material. Oddly enough, the last work of Mr. Malipiero's to be heard from this orchestra was his Second Symphony, also "Elegiac," played 10 years ago. The present work shows no growth.

The Mozart symphony was played with the utmost virtuosity on the part of the orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky was in fine fettle, but his slow movement was again too slow, and his Finale too fast.

Symphony Programs

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will give the fifth program of the Sunday afternoon series tomorrow in Symphony Hall at 3:30; the program of the 18th pair of concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, March 5 and 6, and the fifth concert of the Cambridge series in Sanders Theater a week from Tuesday, March 9. The Sunday program will consist of Prokofiev's "Classical" Symphony, Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, and the Second Symphony of Brahms.

For the Friday and Saturday concerts Dr. Koussevitzky announces Prokofiev's "Scythian" Suite, a new Violoncello Concerto by Aram Khatchatourian, and the Fifth Symphony by Shostakovitch. The Khatchatourian Concerto will be heard for the first time in this country. The soloist will be Edmund Kurtz.

In Cambridge Dr. Koussevitzky will present Walter Piston's Third Symphony, Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Prokofiev's Scythian Suite, and Ravel's Second Suite from "Daphnis et Chloé."

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1948

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 17th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Artur Rubinstein, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in C major K. 551....Mozart
Piano Concerto in A major K. 488
Mozart
Symphony No. 4..............Malipiero
Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini
Op. 43 ....Rachmaninoff

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

There was so much to applaud in yesterday's concert that it is hard to know where to begin or what and whom most to praise. Let us start with Mozart. Even way out in Arizona Dr. Koussevitzky must have had his ear to the ground for musical happenings in Boston. Thus he must have known that a rival orchestra, the Minneapolis, and conductor Mitropoulos had not cut much of a figure here with Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony. And so he comes back to Boston and produces a triumphant performance of that work! We can be grateful to him for showing us Mozart's greatness, which our visitors somehow muffed.

Another aspect of Mozart's greatness is to be found in his piano concertos, which are not played often enough in public. This one in A major is an utter charmer, and Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Rubinstein produced between them an interpretation of surpassing beauty. I must hand it to Mr. Rubinstein, who has sometimes been criticized in these columns for introducting his own personality between the music and the listener. Yesterday he was nothing if not calm objectivity and he let the music sing with simplicity and grace. The adagio was taken very slowly, but successfully so and with a wonderful clarity. So too did Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra show us clearly the marvelous complexity of the "Jupiter" finale.

Dr. Koussevitzky then gave the first performance of an impressive new Symphony, the 4th by Malipiero. The work is singularly well knit. The effects, such as the use of drone bass, passages for trombones and tuba and solos for English horn, are superbly wrought. The Symphony is a memorial for many things, but the melancholy is not breast-beating or doleful dumps. The Scherzo, for instance, has a wild excitement. There is plenty of contrast, but also a unity of thought that makes this perhaps Malipiero's finest work and a real find this season.

Rachmaninoff's Rhapsody on a theme of Paganini is to my mind his best work. It is certainly his cleverest. It is a juicy piece, absolutely bursting with virtuoso tricks for the soloist and gorgeous effects for the orchestra. Mr. Rubinstein must have studied Rachmaninoff's own interpretation, for his does not differ materially from it. That is, too, the highest compliment that could be paid him. Altogether it was a splendid concert, brilliantly topped off in the grand manner.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 28 1948

CLASSES ANNOUNCED BY BERKSHIRE CENTER

Plans for the Berkshire Music Center, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., which is sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have been announced by Serge Koussevitzky, director of the school. The six-week session will run from July 5 to August 15, through the period of the Berkshire Festival Concerts.

Classes will be held in the following subjects: conducting, under Dr. Koussevitzky, Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin and Eleazar de Carvalho; choral conducting under Hugh Ross and Robert Shaw; composition under Aaron Copland, assistant director of the school, and Darius Milhaud; opera under Boris Goldovsky and costume design under Leo Van Witsen; chamber music under Gregor Piatigorsky; orchestra under twenty-five principal players of the Boston Symphony; chamber orchestra under Mr. de Carvalho. A seminar in very old and very new music will be conducted by Aaron Copland and Julius Herford.

The school will present some forty performances, including an opera. Further information may be had by writing the Berkshire Music Center, Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass.

YORK, N. Y.
D TRIBUNE
8 29 1948

USIC ON THE RADIO

By B. H. HAGGIN

League of Composers, on Feb. 16, sent me a copy of a state t about WOR-Mutual's Jan. 11 broadcast of William Bergs s "The Fortunate Islands," in which it says that "without of the league or Mr. 170 measures were cut 464-measure work in such that its form was completely ed," that the league "has tently fought for the faithful rmance of new music and the ction of the creative artist," "as soon as a meeting could ssembled after learning of the ilation of Mr. Bergsma's re, the various committees of league . . . reaffirmed this licy," that they "deplore and ndemn any such misrepresentaon of a composer's work, and ave protested directly to Mr. Levin, demanding that the work be performed again in its entirety." And in the letter accompanying the statement Miss Nina Naguid, executive secretary of the league, says it "will indicate the misstatement" in my column of Feb. 8 about the league's "willingness to let a work that it had commissioned . . . be chopped down in that way," and also points out "that the league did not award any citation to WOR-Mutual" but "simply express[ed] our thanks . . . for . . . the time and facilities for the performance of two works commissioned by the league . . ."

But my original difficulty in understanding the league's behavior is even greater now after its explanation that it thanked WOR-Mutual for a performance in ignorance of the performance's mutilation of the work (I take "without consent" to mean without knowledge, finding it impossible to believe the league would have thanked if it had known but not consented). That is, I would suppose the league would have sufficient interest in a work it was sponsoring to have a representative who knew something about the work present at the rehearsal, or at least at the performance, so that it would not learn of the mutilation—from the composer himself, presumably—only after the performance and an expression of thanks. Moreover, though the league's statement includes words of prompt and swift action, its date speaks otherwise: the statement was issued a month after the Jan. 11 broadcast, a week after my Feb. 8 column. Maybe the league did need a month to assemble its committees for action; but to me it looks as though it needed only a week.

The result, at any rate, is that WOR is broadcasting the Bergsma piece in its entirety at 1:30 today.

I began on Feb. 21 with a moment of the second act of "Aida" —only a moment because I was put to flight by the Harshaw tremolo. Turning to N. B. C.'s Orchestras of the Nation I found the Denver Symphony conducted by Saul Caston in the midst of Brahms's Alto Rhapsody, from which I retreated for the same reason as Bernard Shaw once did from a performance of Brahms's Requiem—that listening to it is one of the "sacrifices which should not be demanded twice from any man." But I returned for the Fourth Symphony, the finest of Brahms's symphonies, and one of the very few large-scale works of his I enjoy listening to. The orchestra sounded good, and Caston conducted it efficiently in a performance that was straightforward and coherent until the final passacaglia movement, where the cumulative impact of the varied reiteration of the opening eight-bar statement must be built up by maintaining the pace of the statement throughout the movement, as Brahms directs, and where Caston instead followed most conductors' practice of changing the tempo for almost every variation and slowing down enormously in variations 9 to 15.

Later there was my favorite of all Brahms's works, the Variations on a Theme of Haydn, and Toscanini's beautiful performance of it, in which the N. B. C. Symphony did some exciting playing after a little initial insecurity among the winds (if my ears heard correctly). And after this the Third Symphony, of which I like the second and fourth movements, and a performance characteristic in the steadiness that gave the opening movement solidity and power, and in the momentum and brilliant execution that were breathtaking in the concluding movement. A musician directed my attention to the fact that for the first time Toscanini had the string tremolos in the last measures played exactly as written, instead of following the tradition of having some of the players play the theme in sustained notes at the same time. And in that connection he told me something Rose, the old concertmaster of the Vienna Philharmonic, had once told Toscanini. Many of the present-day traditions in the performance of Brahms go back to the performances conducted by Richter and others in Brahms's lifetime and in his very presence; and what, then, could be more authoritative? But at those performances, said Rose, one could see Brahms sometimes shaking his head in disapproval!

It's as though the mangled tempos in Koussevitzky's recorded performance of Copland's "Appalachian Spring"—which Copland had to endure if he wanted Koussevitzky to play the work—were to be considered authoritative fifty years from now.

Virgil Thomson's Symphony on a Hymn Tune, broadcast over C. B. S. on Feb. 21 by Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra, had me baffled by its two kinds of material: on the one hand some lovely tunes simply harmonized, on the other hand some discordant and quite horrid writing in which I could find no point of its own and no relation with the other.

Com[illegible]unists Hit at Shostakovich W[illegible] Call for Musical Revolution

Party's Central Committee Upbraids Six Composers for 'Vicious Formalistic Trend Against People', Cites Influence of 'Decadent' American Music

[illegible] (AP)—The [illegible] com- [illegible] Serge [illegible] a "vicious [illegible] the people." [illegible] a little, [illegible] the Commu- [illegible] Shostakovich for [illegible] choral [illegible] com- [illegible] no [illegible] Soviet [illegible] ration [illegible] sharply [illegible] ideology nur- [illegible] of modern [illegible] Western Europe

[illegible] be a basic doc- [illegible] of the entire [illegible] Among those [illegible] critics, com- [illegible] and ra- [illegible] Zhda- [illegible] of the Pol- [illegible] Communist [illegible] Soviet art and [illegible]

[illegible] mu- [illegible] for the [illegible] ideo- [illegible] field of [illegible] theater

[illegible] was de- [illegible] an intolerable con- [illegible] praised Shosta- [illegible] and the others "for [illegible] for which they [illegible]" the resolution

[illegible] commented that of [illegible] a single Soviet opera has [illegible] which can be put on [illegible] of classical Russian opera." [illegible] Shostakovich is [illegible] an outstanding mod- [illegible] He has written sev- [illegible] played symphonies, with [illegible] probably the best known. [illegible] "Lady Macbeth of [illegible] written in 1934, was a tra- [illegible] in 1935 simi- [illegible] today.

[illegible] 56, is perhaps best [illegible] "Peter and the Wolf," [illegible] delighted thousands of [illegible] and adult audiences. He is [illegible] composer of several sym- [illegible] among them his fourth writ- [illegible] the 50th anniversary of the [illegible] Mass., Symphony Orchestra. [illegible] last June, he was awarded 100,-000 rubles in the coveted Stalin prizes for a newly composed sonata for violin and piano.

Others mentioned in the resolution were Aram Khachaturian, Vissarion Shebalin, Gabriel Popov, Irakly (Vano) Muradeli and Nicolai Miaskovsky.

Khachaturian is a prolific composer of instrumental music, particularly violin and piano concert work. Miaskovsky has written 17 symphonies, perhaps more than any man now living.

Popov, 43, and Shebalin are not well known outside Russia. Muradeli, 39, also little known abroad, is a composer of many songs, choruses and folk dances.

The implications of the resolution on both Soviet music and art were great. It was believed now that the principal reason for the dismissal last week of M. B. Krapchenko as chairman of the arts committee of the Council of Ministers was his failure in the Soviet view to furnish correct guidance in the field of music.

The resolution approves organizational measures for improvement of Soviet musical affairs. This was taken to mean that the art committee of the Union of Soviet Composers of the Moscow Conservatory and other leading organizations already had been reorganized.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 29 1948

RECORDS IN REVIEW

The best news for record buyers this week is the appearance of the Ravel Left Hand Concerto in a fine new performance. Bob Merrill of the Met. also takes over a share of the Frank Sinatra trade.

RAVEL: Concerto for the Left Hand. Robert Casadesus, piano, with the Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy, conductor. Columbia MX-298. Written for a handicapped soldier-pianist (Paul Wittgenstein), this concerto is more than a freak piece of music. It is a remarkably effective score which Mr. Casadesus plays perfectly. If by any chance you do not know this work, by all means give it a try.

Songs You Love. Robert Merrill, baritone, with Russ Case and his Orchestra. Victor M-1150. The handsome Mr. Merrill is out to take over some customers from Frankie, Perry and Bing. He does, too. Mr. Merrill has a grand opera voice and a bobby-socks grin. This set is made up of lightweight material, done in fine style. (For more news of Bob Merrill see "Musical Notes.")

TCHAIKOVSKY: Francesca Da Rimini. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Victor DM-1179. Dr. Koussevitzky is a mighty man when it comes to Russian composers and he has at his disposal one of the world's finest orchestras. This adds up to a new set which is packed full of glowing sound. If you have the old Beecham album you can hang onto it with comfort, despite Dr. Koussevitzky's considerable success in this new recording.

KHATCHATURIAN: Masquerade Suite. Leopold Stokowski and the New York Philharmonic. Columbia MM-729. This engaging and unpretentious score has been available for several months on the enterprising Asch label, played by Jacques Rachmilovitch and the Santa Monica Orchestra. Dr. Stokowski now appears back on the Columbia label, which is something of a surprise, and makes his disc re-debut with the Philharmonic. With all respect for Dr. Stokowski's very great talent, after careful comparison, we find the Asch set equally as good. You are quite safe with either one.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN

FEB 29 1948

Music for Vets

AMONG other activities to its credit is the maintenance of scholarships at the National Music Camp at Interlochen, at Chautauqua, and at the Berkshire Music School. It was the first organization to institute ward music and music instruction in Army and Navy hospitals on a nation-wide scale.

It is endeavoring to raise standards of church music. It has undertaken the task of supplying music and musical instrument for orchestras, schools and musical groups in the European and Pacific areas.

Now it is engaged in an intensive campaign to secure the continuing performance of contemporary American works. This challenge came to it last Fall at its dinner in the Town Hall Club. It was conclusively [illegible] at that time that the most vital service such an organization could now give was the promotion of works by native composers whose compositions secured a first hearing but needed repeated hearings to be accepted by the general pub-

If the Federation succeeds in [illegible] newest project as well as in [illegible] undertakings of the last half century, it will have made a great contribution to music in the next half century. More [illegible] er to it

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

FEB 23 1948

Music

Charles Ives Is Rediscovered

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

After prolonged inattention, Carnegie Hall finally remembered the forgotten man of American music—Charles Ives—at a concert of the Boston Symphony Saturday afternoon.

The composition, "Three Places in New England," started as far back as 1904, was cloaked in silence until a Town Hall performance in 1931, and bobbed up Saturday after another extended slumber.

Compared to the fate of Ives' other symphonic scores, the record for "Three Places in New England," niggardly as it is, bulks like a landslide. Last year's Pulitzer Prize winner came by his award the hard, patient way.

Everyone hearing the "orchestral set" Saturday wondered why Ives' music has found the country's symphonic doors closed to it for so long. Maybe he isn't the American Beethoven after all, but the music certainly rates a place in the repertorial sun.

Ahead of His Time.

The astonishing thing about it was again its date of composition. Cut off from European currents, the Connecticut composer somehow managed to duplicate and even anticipate several rhythmic and harmonic innovations.

Many listening to the score for the first time, and not knowing its date of birth, assumed its recent origin. Ives had a trick of pitting rhythm against one another and playing with dissonance that was far ahead of his time.

What's more, Ives showed a tendency becoming very marked in America's symphonic music of the last decade—the blending of brave new technique with tangy material partly culled from folk sources.

For "Three Places in New England" is rooted in the soil of its label, at the same time that Ives advances some pungent claims of individuality. Civil War and Revolutionary echoes brighten the fabric, and the Housatonic River murmurs through the finale.

It's an Old Story.

One pictures this lonely American artist at work, managing an insurance company by day, toiling tirelessly, doggedly, at his scores at night, undiscouraged by the wall of apathy about him.

A strong conviction that he was on the right path must have driven Ives on. Symphonies, songs, chamber music, tone poems—reams and reams of music—poured from his pen. Then one day the music world woke up to discover another unsung hero in its midst. It's an old story.

While the first and third pieces of Ives' "orchestral set" are rich in impressionist detail, the strongly appealing number of the second—"Putnam's Camp, Redding, Conn." Here the use of brass band episodes heightens the rowdy carnival mood.

Now that the ice has broken at Carnegie Hall, how about one or two of our major orchestras giving some paternal heed to a few more of Ives' syhphonic foundlings?

Concertmaster Richard Burgin again led on Saturday, proving his podium mettle in one of the season's least hackneyed programs. Included were Pick-Mangiagalli's string arrangement of a Bach prelude, Hindemith's "Symphonia Serena" and Tschaikowsky's rarely heard Second Symphony.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Symphony Hall this week may not be the most novel of the season, but certainly they are among the most stimulating. The Fourth ("In Memoriam") Symphony of Malipiero receives its first performances, and Artur Rubinstein is soloist in two scores: the A major Piano Concerto (K. 488) of Mozart, and the Rhadpsody on a Theme of Paganini, by Rachmaninoff. The other number, which comes first, is the "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart.

Malipiero's Fourth Symphony is music of terrible intensity and profound grief, and technically of great mastery and distinction. Without question, it is one of the finest works commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky. It is music influenced throughout by the awful ravages of the war and desolation of the post-war years, and although neither brutal nor violent, it is one of the most consistently grim scores I ever have heard. Those who wish to be soothed or pleasantly excited will not take readily to it.

Malipiero remarked about his Fourth Symphony that the war ended 200 paces from his house at Asolo, outside Venice, where he composed it. That will give you an idea of his spiritual devastation and hope-against-hope for return of the peace and happiness of life as it was. The texture is dissonant, but ordered and logical, expressive but not chaotic. All four movements—the first and third suggesting hope, the second and fourth resignation—end in minor, and there is hardly any relief from the weight of crushing sorrow Given time, this Fourth Symphony may prove a unique, warning memorial of the years when mankind attempted self-destruction.

Mr. Rubinstein had a personal triumph with both Mozart and Rachmaninoff yesterday afternoon. The first he played with delicate, flowing style; the other, a showy and tricky piece, he carried off with sky-rocket brilliance. It was distressing that the orchestra had not tuned down to the piano (or for that matter, that the piano people had not tuned the instrument up) for Mozart, but in Rachmaninoff soloist and orchestra were more nearly agreed on pitch. For Mr. Rubinstein—and for Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, who played superbly the afternoon through—there was applause that amounted to an "ovation."

It was good to see that musical examples of themes from Malipiero's Symphony were printed in the program book. Let us hope this will become standard practice.

cellulose, and so might get nourishment from the label

Sole U. S. Agents: Schieffelin & Co., New

Communists Hit at Shostakovich With Call for Musical Revolution

Party's Central Committee Upbraids Six Composers for 'Vicious Formalistic Trend Against People', Cites Influence of 'Decadent' American Music

[illegible] (AP)—The [illegible] central committee [illegible] virtual revolution [illegible]

[illegible] resolution upbraided Shostakovich, Serge [illegible] other composers [illegible] with a "vicious [illegible] and against the people." [illegible] second time in a little [illegible] years that the Communists [illegible] Shostakovich for [illegible]

[illegible] and more choral [illegible] of Soviet com- [illegible] mentioned no [illegible]

[illegible] to Soviet [illegible] of inspiration [illegible]

[illegible] sharply [illegible] ideology nur- [illegible] influence of modern [illegible] of Western Europe [illegible]

[illegible] will be a basic document for guidance of the entire [illegible] world. Among those [illegible] will be critics, com- [illegible] directors and ra- [illegible]

[illegible] believed Andrei Zhdanov, [illegible] member of the Po- [illegible] one of the leading spir- [illegible] Communist [illegible] into Soviet art and [illegible]

[illegible] is an accomplished mu- [illegible] was spokesman for the [illegible] Party in previous ideo- [illegible] directions in the field of [illegible] literature, the theater and cinema.

Soviet musical criticism was declared to be in an "intolerable con- [illegible]." The critics praised Shostakovich, Prokofieff and the others "for the very things for which they should be criticized," the resolution [illegible]

The resolution commented that of late not a single Soviet opera has been created which can be put on the level of classical Russian opera."

The 41-year-old Shostakovich is recognized as an outstanding modern composer. He has written several widely played symphonies, with [illegible] seventh probably the best known. His opera, "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk," written in 1934, was a target for Soviet criticism in 1935 similar to that disclosed today.

Prokofieff, 56, is perhaps best known for his "Peter and the Wolf," which has delighted thousands of child and adult audiences. He is also the composer of several symphonies, among them his fourth written for the 50th anniversary of the Boston, Mass., Symphony Orchestra. Only last June, he was awarded 100,000 rubles in the coveted Stalin prizes for a newly composed sonata for violin and piano.

Others mentioned in the resolution were Aram Khachaturian, Vissarion Shebalin, Gabriel Popov, Irakly (Vano) Muradeli and Nicolai Miaskovsky.

Khachaturian is a prolific composer of instrumental music, particularly violin and piano concert work. Miaskovsky has written 17 symphonies, perhaps more than any man now living.

Popov, 43, and Shebalin are not well known outside Russia. Muradeli, 39, also little known abroad, is a composer of many songs, choruses and folk dances.

The implications of the resolution on both Soviet music and art were great. It was believed now that the principal reason for the dismissal last week of M. B. Krapchenko as chairman of the arts committee of the Council of Ministers was his failure in the Soviet view to furnish correct guidance in the field of music.

The resolution approves organizational measures for improvement of Soviet musical affairs. This was taken to mean that the art committee of the Union of Soviet Composers of the Moscow Conservatory and other leading organizations already had been reorganized.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 29 1948

RECORDS IN REVIEW

The best news for record buyers this week is the appearance of the Ravel Left Hand Concerto in a fine new performance. Bob Merrill of the Met. also takes over a share of the Frank Sinatra trade.

RAVEL: Concerto for the Left Hand. Robert Casadesus, piano, with the Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy, conductor. Columbia MX-288. Written for a handicapped soldier-pianist (Paul Wittgenstein), this concerto is more than a freak piece of music. It is a remarkably effective score which Mr. Casadesus plays perfectly. If by any chance you do not know this work, by all means give it a try.

Songs You Love. Robert Merrill, baritone, with Russ Case and his Orchestra. Victor M-1150. The handsome Mr. Merrill is out to take over some customers from Frankie, Perry and Bing. He does, too. Mr. Merrill has a grand opera voice and a bobby-socks grin. This set is made up of lightweight material, done in fine style. (For more news of Bob Merrill see "Musical Notes.")

TCHAIKOVSKY: Francesca Da Rimini. Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Victor DM-1179. Dr. Koussevitzky is a mighty man when it comes to Russian composers and he has at his disposal one of the world's finest orchestras. This adds up to a new set which is packed full of glowing sound. If you have the old Beecham album you can hang onto it with comfort, despite Dr. Koussevitzky's considerable success in this new recording.

KHATCHATURIAN: Masquerade Suite. Leopold Stokowski and the New York Philharmonic. Columbia MM-729. This engaging and unpretentious score has been available for several months on the enterprising Asch label, played by Jacques Rachmilovitch and the Santa Monica Orchestra. Dr. Stokowski now appears back on the Columbia label, which is something of a surprise, and makes his disc re-debut with the Philharmonic. With all respect for Dr. Stokowski's very great talent, after careful comparison, we find the Asch set equally as good.. You are quite safe with either one.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
FEB 29 1948

Music for Vets

AMONG other activities to its credit is the maintenance of scholarships at the National Music Camp at Interlochen, at Chautauqua, and at the Berkshire Music School. It was the first organization to institute ward music and music instruction in Army and Navy hospitals on a nation-wide scale.

It is endeavoring to raise standards of church music. It has undertaken the task of supplying music and musical instrument for orchestras, schools and musical groups in the European and Pacific areas.

Now it is engaged in an intensive campaign to secure the continuing performance of contemporary American works. This challenge came to it last Fall at its dinner in the Town Hall Club. It was conclusively proved at that time that the most vital service such an organization could now give was the promotion of works by native composers whose compositions secured a first hearing but needed repeated hearings to be accepted by the general public.

If the Federation succeeds in its newest project as well as in its undertakings of the last half century, it will have made a great contribution to music in the next half century. More power to it.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
FEB 23 1948

Music

Charles Ives Is Rediscovered

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

After prolonged inattention, Carnegie Hall finally remembered the forgotten man of American music—Charles Ives—at a concert of the Boston Symphony Saturday afternoon.

The composition, "Three Places in New England," started as far back as 1904, was cloaked in silence until a Town Hall performance in 1931, and bobbed up Saturday after another extended slumber.

Compared to the fate of Ives' other symphonic scores, the record for "Three Places in New England," niggardly as it is, bulks like a landslide. Last year's Pulitzer Prize winner came by his award the hard, patient way.

Everyone hearing the "orchestral set" Saturday wondered why Ives' music has found the country's symphonic doors closed to it for so long. Maybe he isn't the American Beethoven after all, but the music certainly rates a place in the repertorial sun.

Ahead of His Time.

The astonishing thing about it was again its date of composition. Cut off from European currents, the Connecticut composer somehow managed to duplicate and even anticipate several rhythmic and harmonic innovations.

Many listening to the score for the first time, and not knowing its date of birth, assumed its recent origin. Ives had a trick of pitting rhythm against one another and playing with dissonance that was far ahead of his time.

What's more, Ives showed a tendency becoming very marked in America''s symphonic music of the last decade—the blending of brave new technique with tangy material partly culled from folk sources.

For "Three Places in New England" is rooted in the soil of its label, at the same time that Ives advances some pungent claims of individuality. Civil War and Revolutionary echoes brighten the fabric, and the Housatonic River murmurs through the finale.

It's an Old Story.

One pictures this lonely American artist at work, managing an insurance company by day, toiling tirelessly, doggedly, at his scores at night, undiscouraged by the wall of apathy about him.

A strong conviction that he was on the right path must have driven Ives on. Symphonies, songs, chamber music, tone poems—reams and reams of music—poured from his pen. Then one day the music world woke up to discover another unsung hero in its midst. It's an old story.

While the first and third pieces of Ives' "orchestral set" are rich in impressionist detail, the strongly appealing number of the second—"Putnam's Camp, Redding, Conn." Here the use of brass band episodes heightens the rowdy carnival mood.

Now that the ice has broken at Carnegie Hall, how about one or two of our major orchestras giving some paternal heed to a few more of Ives' syhphonic foundlings?

Concertmaster Richard Burgin again led on Saturday, proving his podium mettle in one of the season's least hackneyed programs. Included were Pick-Mangiagalli's string arrangement of a Bach prelude, Hindemith's "Symphonia Serena" and Tschaikowsky's rarely heard Second Symphony.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Symphony Hall this week may not be the most novel of the season, but certainly they are among the most stimulating. The Fourth ("In Memoriam") Symphony of Malipiero receives its first performances, and Artur Rubinstein is soloist in two scores: the A major Piano Concerto (K. 488) of Mozart, and the Rhadpsody on a Theme of Paganini, by Rachmaninoff. The other number, which comes first, is the "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart.

Malipiero's Fourth Symphony is music of terrible intensity and profound grief, and technically of great mastery and distinction. Without question, it is one of the finest works commissioned by the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky. It is music influenced throughout by the awful ravages of the war and desolation of the post-war years, and although neither brutal nor violent, it is one of the most consistently grim scores I ever have heard. Those who wish to be soothed or pleasantly excited will not take readily to it.

Malipiero remarked about his Fourth Symphony that the war ended 200 paces from his house at Asolo, outside Venice, where he composed it. That will give you an idea of his spiritual devastation and hope-against-hope for return of the peace and happiness of life as it was. The texture is dissonant, but ordered and logical, expressive but not chaotic. All four movements—the first and third suggesting hope, the second and fourth resignation—end in minor, and there is hardly any relief from the weight of crushing sorrow Given time, this Fourth Symphony may prove a unique, warning memorial of the years when mankind attempted self-destruction.

Mr. Rubinstein had a personal triumph with both Mozart and Rachmaninoff yesterday afternoon. The first he played with delicate, flowing style; the other, a showy and tricky piece, he carried off with sky-rocket brilliance. It was distressing that the orchestra had not tuned down to the piano (or for that matter, that the piano people had not tuned the instrument up) for Mozart, but in Rachmaninoff soloist and orchestra were more nearly agreed on pitch. For Mr. Rubinstein—and for Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, who played superbly the afternoon through—there was applause that amounted to an "ovation."

It was good to see that musical examples of themes from Malipiero's Symphony were printed in the program book. Let us hope this will become standard practice.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 22 1948

BURGIN CONDUCTS UNUSUAL PROGRAM

'Three Places in New England,' by Ives, Feature of Concert by Boston Symphony

By NOEL STRAUS

Richard Burgin led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a provocative and unusual program yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. As its chief offerings it contained Hindemith's "Symphonia Serena," Ives' "Three Places in New England" and Tchaikovsky's Second Symphony. The Bach-Mangiagalli "Prelude" completed the list.

Special interest centered in the Ives work, which had had but one previous hearing in this city, in 1931, when it was presented by members of the Boston Symphony, under Nicholas Slonimsky. This "orchestral set" consists of three pieces entitled, respectively, "The 'Saint-Gaudens' in Boston Common," "Putnam's Camp, Redding, Conn." and "From the 'Housatonic at Stockbridge.'" The first number of the set was completed in 1910 and the other two in 1914.

Even today, after a lapse of more than three decades, the entire composition proved strikingly original in its texture. The score is of extreme difficulty for the performers, being unusually complex rhythmically, contrapuntally and harmonically, but out of the maze of sound emerges a music essentially simple and easily grasped.

Strings Play Principal Role

The first of the three pieces was inspired by the Saint-Gaudens statue commemorating the exploits of Col. Robert Gould Shaw and the Negro regiment he commanded during the Civil War. It is the least complicated and briefest part of the set, the strings playing the principal role in the brooding evocation of the past. Hidden away in the melodies are references to "Marching Through Georgia" and other popular tunes of the Sixties, which help to establish a sense of historical background but do little to keep this number from being the least effective of the three.

The second piece is named after a park near Redding, Conn., where Gen. Israel Putnam's soldiers had their winter quarters during the Revolution. It is music of inordinate exactions, but the sum total of its effect is that of a rather commonplace miltary march built up on "The British Grenadiers," a song widely known in those days. There are two huge climaxes of rousing impact in the course of the elaborate and heavily scored creation, but here again the means hardly justify the meager quality of the impression they make.

The final "From 'the Housatonic at Stockbridge,'" however, is a masterly example of impressionistic tone painting, and easily the crowning feature of the whole work. Over polyrhythmic murmurings in the strings the horn intones a nostalgic melody, later taken up by the whole body of strings with a new type of figuration in the woodwinds and piano simulating the purling of the stream. The music is led to a climactic close of great intensity, followed by two soft Adagio measures of unforgettable poignant tenderness. The whole of this last piece is one of Ives' most compelling and lovable inventions and deserves to be heard often apart from the rest of the set.

Première Here Last Week

Since the Hindemith "Symphonia Serena" was reviewed in these columns after its New York première last week by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, under Bruno Walter, it need not be further expatiated upon in this article. As for the Second Symphony of Tchaikovsky, which was last presented in this city by the Philharmonic in 1945, with Igor Stravinsky conducting, it again made its former impression of being a work, which, despite the revision made by its composer after he had finished his Fourth Symphony, is more to be admired for its knowing orchestration than for anything it has to say in its development of Slavic thematic material.

The Bach-Mangiagalli "Prelude," in which the Italian arranger has supplied none too effective counterpoints to the initial movement of Bach's Sixth Sonata for unaccompanied violin, gave the violinists of the orchestra an opportunity to display their virtuosity in a unison account of the Bach original "perpetual motion" show-piece Like the rest of the program, this offering was directed with keen understanding by Mr. Burgin, under whose leadership all of the works performed were above reproach in sound and sharply differentiated in style. For sheer sensuousness of tone and subtlety in the gradations of it, the Tchaikovsky symphony deserved special mention.

Some of our best friends are adults

And we know a good many children, too. You see, we're in the radio business—and in radio you know everybody. Young, old; rich, poor; mature, immature; genius, jerk. It's that sort of a business; everybody's business.

More American homes have radios than have bathtubs. Or cars. More people play the radio than go to the movies. Or go fishing. Radio, then, has all tastes to satisfy.

Thus, there is more to present-day radio than soap operas and singing commercials. There is also a sizable amount of mature, adult entertainment. And a good share of it (we're happy to say) is on the American Broadcasting Company network. Every Tuesday, for example, your local ABC station brings you the following full evening of fine listening:

8:00 pm* Youth Asks the Government

A panel of high school students ask direct, searching questions of high government officials.

8:15 pm* The Christian Science Monitor Views the News

Accurate, unbiased commentary on domestic and foreign events by Erwin Canham, the Monitor's editor.

8:30 pm* America's Town Meeting of the Air

Famous speakers present both sides of vital issues facing the nation on radio's most distinguished forum.

9:30 pm* Boston Symphony

The music of the masters brilliantly played by one of the world's greatest orchestras, under the superb direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

10:30 pm* Labor USA and the NAM Show

In one of radio's most challenging half hours, both labor and management present their views.

* * *

ABC is proud of these and many other worthwhile programs on the network . . . proud too that radio IS living up to its obligations to inform and enlighten the American people. In case you haven't noticed, radio has been doing some fast growing-up in the past few years.

All times are Eastern Standard Time.*

ABC American Broadcasting Company
A NETWORK OF 264 RADIO STATIONS SERVING AMERICA

SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1948 Art—Music—Theater 7

—Ives' Orchestral Set Heard at Symphony

Mr. Burgin Offers Works Ranging From Haydn to Stravinsky

By L. A. Sloper

Richard Burgin, conducting the Friday and Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, selected this program: Haydn, Symphony in C minor, No. 95; Stravinsky, Symphony in Three Movements; Ives, "Three Places in New England," an Orchestral Set; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 2, in C minor.

Haydn's Symphony No. 95 more or less belongs to Mr. Burgin. He unearthed it in 1943, after it had been gathering dust for 27 years, played it again in 1946, and now revives it once more. It is worth the revival, having all the skill and all the ingenuity that distinguished the master. It was performed with alertness and was received joyfully by the Friday audience, with a special bow to Mr. Bedetti and his playing of the cello in the Trio of the Minuet.

Mr. Burgin has something of a lien, too, on Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements. The composer himself introduced it to us early in 1946, but Mr. Burgin seized upon it in the fall of the same year, and now repeats it—perhaps, like Dr. Koussevitzky in the case of Shostakovitch's Fifth, in the hope that we shall like it if we hear it often enough.

I do not think the campaign will succeed. I am a little tired of hearing Stravinsky praised. Another symposium by his friends and associates has just been published. Composers, conductors, choregraphers have joined in laudation. There is not a line of adverse criticism in it. I have joined in the general praise of Stravinsky. But I cannot accept the notion that every work of his is a masterpiece, which opens up new paths. The truth is that there is a good deal of ancient history—Stravinskyan history—in this so-called symphony; and it is also, despite all denials, full of "expression."

Charles Edward Ives is now represented for the first time on a Boston Symphony program; nor has he received much recognition elsewhere. Born in Danbury, Conn., in 1874, he early experimented with polytonality. His "Concord" Sonata and a movement of a symphony have been played in New York, Mr. Burk notes, and Nicolas Slonimsky directed a performance of the present Suite with his Chamber Orchestra in 1932, in Boston, and also conducted it in New York and Paris.

Heard after the Stravinsky, the Suite seemed mild in its dissonances. There is even an air of Impressionism about it. The order of the pieces is odd. A tonal picture of the St. Gaudens statue of Colonel Shaw and his Colored Regiment opens the Suite, and another of "The Housatonic at Stockbridge" closes it. Between is the lively movement, the kind that you might expect for a Finale. It is labeled "Putnam's Camp, Redding, Connecticut."

The material seems to be fragments of folk and popular song, suggested but not repeated literally. The outside movements are nostalgic in mood. When I heard them in 1932 I said that they could be transposed without anybody's noticing. It was a foolish remark. Yesterday they appeared clearly individualized, one a moving tribute to the Negro troops, the other a lovely picture of a New England river. There is enough dissonance to spice them, but not enough to drive you from the hall.

The middle movement has the strongest popular appeal. It depicts a scene in a park preserved as a memorial to General Israel Putnam. It represents a child's dream of the past and joy in the present, with special reference to a concert by a band whose instruments are not perfectly in tune. It is full of activity and fun. In spite of this, the Suite was coolly received by the Friday audience.

Markova-Dolin Dancers

Alicia Markova and Anton Dolin head a company of dancers coming to Jordan Hall, Monday evening, Feb. 23. Others in the group include Bettina Rosay, Oleg Tupine, Roszika Sabo, and Wallace Seibert. The first part of the program will be set to Chopin, the second to Tchaikovsky, and the third will be a divertissement by Jerome Robbins to the music of Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 22 1948

BURGIN CONDUCTS UNUSUAL PROGRAM

'Three Places in New England,' by Ives, Feature of Concert by Boston Symphony

By NOEL STRAUS

Richard Burgin led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a provocative and unusual program yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. As its chief offerings it contained Hindemith's "Symphonia Serena," Ives' "Three Places in New England" and Tchaikovsky's Second Symphony. The Bach-Mangiagalli "Prelude" completed the list.

Special interest centered in the Ives work, which had had but one previous hearing in this city, in 1931, when it was presented by members of the Boston Symphony, under Nicholas Slonimsky. This "orchestral set" consists of three pieces entitled, respectively, "The 'Saint-Gaudens' in Boston Common," "Putnam's Camp, Redding, Conn." and "From the 'Housatonic at Stockbridge.'" The first number of the set was completed in 1910 and the other two in 1914.

Even today, after a lapse of more than three decades, the entire composition proved strikingly original in its texture. The score is of extreme difficulty for the performers, being unusually complex rhythmically, contrapuntally and harmonically, but out of the maze of sound emerges a music essentially simple and easily grasped.

Strings Play Principal Role

The first of the three pieces was inspired by the Saint-Gaudens statue commemorating the exploits of Col. Robert Gould Shaw and the Negro regiment he commanded during the Civil War. It is the least complicated and briefest part of the set, the strings playing the principal role in the brooding evocation of the past. Hidden away in the melodies are references to "Marching Through Georgia" and other popular tunes of the Sixties, which help to establish a sense of historical background but do little to keep this number from being the least effective of the three.

The second piece is named after a park near Redding, Conn., where Gen. Israel Putnam's soldiers had their winter quarters during the Revolution. It is music of inordinate exactions, but the sum total of its effect is that of a rather commonplace miltary march built up on "The British Grenadiers," a song widely known in those days. There are two huge climaxes of rousing impact in the course of the elaborate and heavily scored creation, but here again the means hardly justify the meager quality of the impression they make.

The final "From 'the Housatonic at Stockbridge,'" however, is a masterly example of impressionistic tone painting, and easily the crowning feature of the whole work. Over polyrhythmic murmurings in the strings the horn intones a nostalgic melody, later taken up by the whole body of strings with a new type of figuration in the woodwinds and piano simulating the purling of the stream. The music is led to a climactic close of great intensity, followed by two soft Adagio measures of unforgettable poignant tenderness. The whole of this last piece is one of Ives' most compelling and lovable inventions and deserves to be heard often apart from the rest of the set.

Première Here Last Week

Since the Hindemith "Symphonia Serena" was reviewed in these columns after its New York première last week by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, under Bruno Walter, it need not be further expatiated upon in this article. As for the Second Symphony of Tchaikovsky, which was last presented in this city by the Philharmonic in 1945, with Igor Stravinsky conducting, it again made its former impression of being a work, which, despite the revision made by its composer after he had finished his Fourth Symphony, is more to be admired for its knowing orchestration than for anything it has to say in its development of Slavic thematic material.

The Bach-Mangiagalli "Prelude," in which the Italian arranger has supplied none too effective counterpoints to the initial movement of Bach's Sixth Sonata for unaccompanied violin, gave the violinists of the orchestra an opportunity to display their virtuosity in a unison account of the Bach original "perpetual motion" show-piece Like the rest of the program, this offering was directed with keen understanding by Mr. Burgin, under whose leadership all of the works performed were above reproach in sound and sharply differentiated in style. For sheer sensuousness of tone and subtlety in the gradations of it, the Tchaikovsky symphony deserved special mention.

Some of our best friends are adults

And we know a good many children, too. You see, we're in the radio business—and in radio you know everybody. Young, old; rich, poor; mature, immature; genius, jerk. It's that sort of a business; everybody's business.

More American homes have radios than have bathtubs. Or cars. More people play the radio than go to the movies. Or go fishing. Radio, then, has all tastes to satisfy.

Thus, there is more to present-day radio than soap operas and singing commercials. There is also a sizable amount of mature, adult entertainment. And a good share of it (we're happy to say) is on the American Broadcasting Company network. Every Tuesday, for example, your local ABC station brings you the following full evening of fine listening:

8:00 pm* Youth Asks the Government

A panel of high school students ask direct, searching questions of high government officials.

8:15 pm* The Christian Science Monitor Views the News

Accurate, unbiased commentary on domestic and foreign events by Erwin Canham, the Monitor's editor.

8:30 pm* America's Town Meeting of the Air

Famous speakers present both sides of vital issues facing the nation on radio's most distinguished forum.

9:30 pm* Boston Symphony

The music of the masters brilliantly played by one of the world's greatest orchestras, under the superb direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

10:30 pm* Labor USA and the NAM Show

In one of radio's most challenging half hours, both labor and management present their views.

ABC is proud of these and many other worthwhile programs on the network . . . proud too that radio IS living up to its obligations to inform and enlighten the American people. In case you haven't noticed, radio has been doing some fast growing-up in the past few years.

All times are Eastern Standard Time.*

ABC American Broadcasting Company
A NETWORK OF 264 RADIO STATIONS SERVING AMERICA

–Ives' Orchestral Set Heard at Symphony

Mr. Burgin Offers Works Ranging From Haydn to Stravinsky

By L. A. Sloper

Richard Burgin, conducting the Friday and Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, selected this program: Haydn, Symphony in C minor, No. 95; Stravinsky, Symphony in Three Movements; Ives, "Three Places in New England," an Orchestral Set; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 2, in C minor.

Haydn's Symphony No. 95 more or less belongs to Mr. Burgin. He unearthed it in 1943, after it had been gathering dust for 27 years, played it again in 1946, and now revives it once more. It is worth the revival, having all the skill and all the ingenuity that distinguished the master. It was performed with alertness and was received joyfully by the Friday audience, with a special bow to Mr. Bedetti and his playing of the cello in the Trio of the Minuet.

Mr. Burgin has something of a lien, too, on Stravinsky's Symphony in Three Movements. The composer himself introduced it to us early in 1946, but Mr. Burgin seized upon it in the fall of the same year, and now repeats it—perhaps, like Dr. Koussevitzky in the case of Shostakovitch's Fifth, in the hope that we shall like it if we hear it often enough.

I do not think the campaign will succeed. I am a little tired of hearing Stravinsky praised. Another symposium by his friends and associates has just been published. Composers, conductors, choregraphers have joined in laudation. There is not a line of adverse criticism in it. I have joined in the general praise of Stravinsky. But I cannot accept the notion that every work of his is a masterpiece, which opens up new paths. The truth is that there is a good deal of ancient history—Stravinskyan history—in this so-called symphony; and it is also, despite all denials, full of "expression."

Charles Edward Ives is now represented for the first time on a Boston Symphony program; nor has he received much recognition elsewhere. Born in Danbury, Conn., in 1874, he early experimented with polytonality. His "Concord" Sonata and a movement of a symphony have been played in New York, Mr. Burk notes, and Nicolas Slonimsky directed a performance of the present Suite with his Chamber Orchestra in 1932, in Boston, and also conducted it in New York and Paris.

Heard after the Stravinsky, the Suite seemed mild in its dissonances. There is even an air of Impressionism about it. The order of the pieces is odd. A tonal picture of the St. Gaudens statue of Colonel Shaw and his Colored Regiment opens the Suite, and another of "The Housatonic at Stockbridge" closes it. Between is the lively movement, the kind that you might expect for a Finale. It is labeled "Putnam's Camp, Redding, Connecticut."

The material seems to be fragments of folk and popular song, suggested but not repeated literally. The outside movements are nostalgic in mood. When I heard them in 1932 I said that they could be transposed without anybody's noticing. It was a foolish remark. Yesterday they appeared clearly individualized, one a moving tribute to the Negro troops, the other a lovely picture of a New England river. There is enough dissonance to spice them, but not enough to drive you from the hall.

The middle movement has the strongest popular appeal. It depicts a scene in a park preserved as a memorial to General Israel Putnam. It represents a child's dream of the past and joy in the present, with special reference to a concert by a band whose instruments are not perfectly in tune. It is full of activity and fun. In spite of this, the Suite was coolly received by the Friday audience.

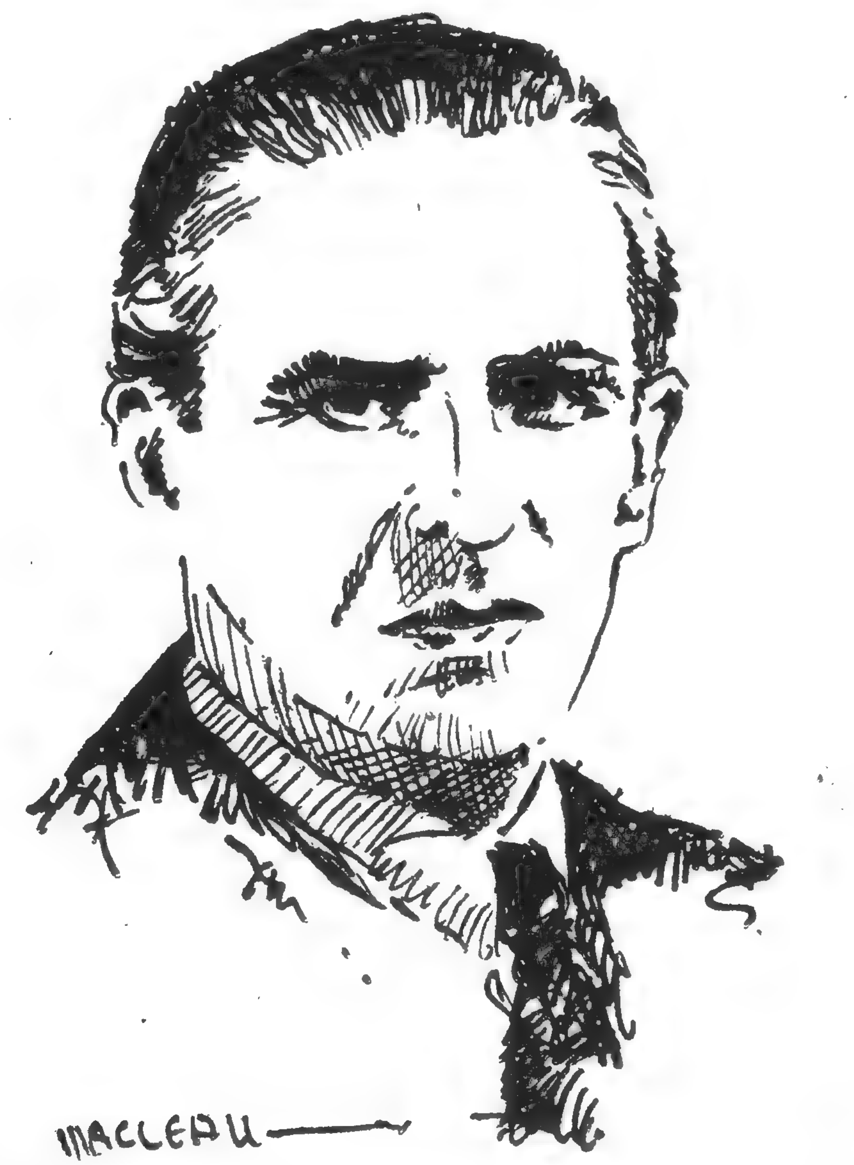
Markova-Dolin Dancers

Alicia Markova and Anton Dolin head a company of dancers coming to Jordan Hall, Monday evening, Feb. 23. Others in the group include Bettina Rosay, Oleg Tupine, Roszika Sabo, and Wallace Seibert. The first part of the program will be set to Chopin, the second to Tchaikovsky, and the third will be a divertissement by Jerome Robbins to the music of Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust."

Lotte Lehmann in Recital—Preview of the Symphony

Karsh

Artur Rubinstein, soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Friday and Saturday concerts. He will also give a recital in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, April 4.



By a Staff Artist

Francesco Malipiero, whose Fourth Symphony will have its first performance at the Boston Symphony concert of Friday afternoon, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting.

Malipiero's Fourth-Listed For First Boston Hearing

By Melvin Maddocks

Gian Francesco Malipiero's Fourth Symphony will have its first hearing tomorrow afternoon from Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dedicated to the memory of Mme Natalie Koussevitzky, the Symphony is subtitled "In Memoriam." ". . . The idea of the elegy," Mr. Malipiero has written in an explanatory letter, "rules the subconscious mind of the composer."

Mr. Malipiero wrote the Fourth Symphony in the Italian mountain village of Asolo, where he has lived for most of the last 34 years. It is an old town; ruins of a Roman bath and theater have been uncovered in it. The setting, as visitors have observed, is not altogether inappropriate for a composer who has occupied himself so much with the old masters: who has edited the works of Monteverdi, Galuppi, and Tartini, and revived the "Orfeo" of Rossi and the "La Rappresentazione di anima e di corpo" of Cavalieri; and who, in the Fourth Symphony, has linked one idea to the next without elaboration or final development in a style he himself describes as reminiscent of the sonatas of Domenico Scarlatti.

* * *

Between the wars his Asolo home provided Mr. Malipiero with a near-idyllic place to study and compose. But during World War II it was no retreat. "The war," he writes in his letter, "ended 200 paces from its door." The war must have seemed the more severe for the comparative insulation of the inter-bellum years. "Serge Koussevitzky," he opens his letter. ". . . could not have chosen a more propitious moment for entrusting a musician with the task of writing an elegy." From a common sense of destruction, "one's soul was disposed to draw unto itself and make its own, the grief of a friend."

The first and third movements of the Symphony, according to Mr. Malipiero, may be defined as Hope; the second and fourth, as Resignation. But he has been careful to take the precaution every artist must take in talking about his own products. "These confessions," he writes, "should be considered the analysis which a composer may make of his own work, but not a pre-arranged program."

* * *

The first movement is Allegro moderato, with an energetic opening theme and later a statement of the dominating elegaic theme. The second movement is Lento funebre: "truly funereal," the composer describes it, "notwithstanding the almost pastoral theme" which appears briefly. The third movement is marked Allegro in uno, ben ritmato; its rhythm is "an inebriation, a need of seeking oblivion."

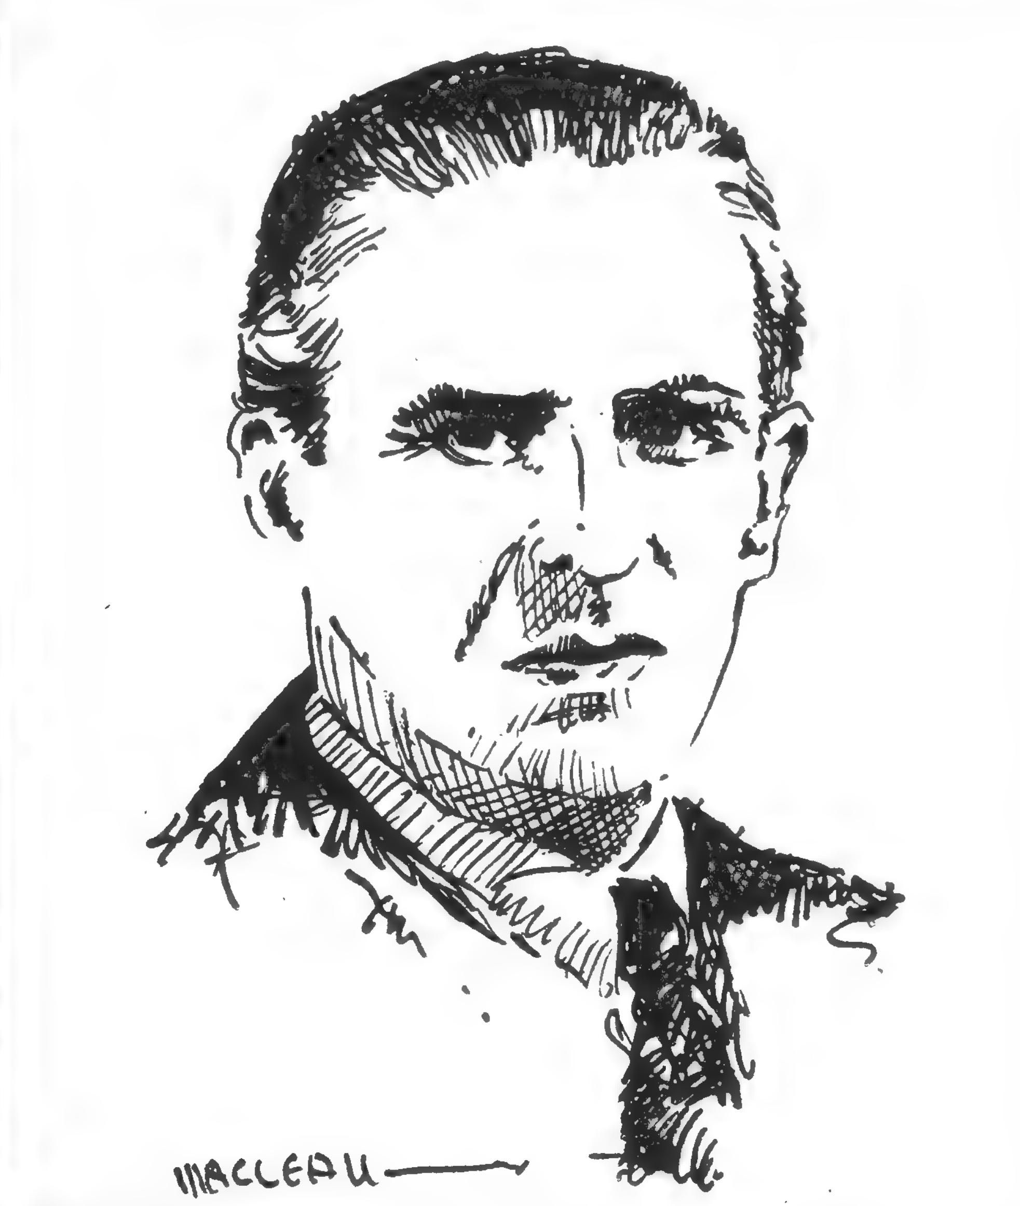
Thirty-six years ago, the composer tells in his letter, he heard the bell of an Alpine church tolling the chant of a funeral march, "the procession in Indian file so as not to stray from the path winding among the rocks." The bells inspired a simple theme that stuck in his mind, and he has used it, with six variations, for the final movement (Lento).

Perhaps Mr. Malipiero has come closest to putting the central problem of the symphony in words in the question: "Where and how to find comfort?" His answer: "By seeking to communicate with all that has been taken from us, but which belongs to us still."

Lotte Lehmann in Recital—Preview of the Symphony

Karsh

Artur Rubinstein, soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Friday and Saturday concerts. He will also give a recital in Symphony Hall Sunday afternoon, April 4.



By a Staff Artist

Francesco Malipiero, whose Fourth Symphony will have its first performance at the Boston Symphony concert of Friday afternoon, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting.

Malipiero's Fourth Listed For First Boston Hearing

By Melvin Maddocks

Gian Francesco Malipiero's Fourth Symphony will have its first hearing tomorrow afternoon from Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dedicated to the memory of Mme Natalie Koussevitzky, the Symphony is subtitled "In Memoriam." ". . . The idea of the elegy," Mr. Malipiero has written in an explanatory letter, "rules the subconscious mind of the composer."

Mr. Malipiero wrote the Fourth Symphony in the Italian mountain village of Asolo, where he has lived for most of the last 34 years. It is an old town; ruins of a Roman bath and theater have been uncovered in it. The setting, as visitors have observed, is not altogether inappropriate for a composer who has occupied himself so much with the old masters; who has edited the works of Monteverdi, Galuppi, and Tartini, and revived the "Orfeo" of Rossi and the "La Rappresentazione di anima e di corpo" of Cavalieri; and who, in the Fourth Symphony, has linked one idea to the next without elaboration or final development in a style he himself describes as reminiscent of the sonatas of Domenico Scarlatti.

* * *

Between the wars his Asolo home provided Mr. Malipiero with a near-idyllic place to study and compose. But during World War II it was no retreat. "The war," he writes in his letter, "ended 200 paces from its door." The war must have seemed the more severe for the comparative insulation of the inter-bellum years. "Serge Koussevitzky," he opens his letter, ". . . could not have chosen a more propitious moment for entrusting a musician with the task of writing an elegy." From a common sense of destruction, "one's soul was disposed to draw unto itself and make its own, the grief of a friend."

The first and third movements of the Symphony, according to Mr. Malipiero, may be defined as Hope; the second and fourth, as Resignation. But he has been careful to take the precaution every artist must take in talking about his own products. "These confessions," he writes, "should be considered the analysis which a composer may make of his own work, but not a pre-arranged program."

* * *

The first movement is Allegro moderato, with an energetic opening theme and later a statement of the dominating elegaic theme. The second movement is Lento funebre: "truly funereal," the composer describes it, "notwithstanding the almost pastoral theme" which appears briefly. The third movement is marked Allegro in uno, ben ritmato; its rhythm is "an inebriation, a need of seeking oblivion."

Thirty-six years ago, the composer tells in his letter, he heard the bell of an Alpine church tolling the chant of a funeral march, "the procession in Indian file so as not to stray from the path winding among the rocks." The bells inspired a simple theme that stuck in his mind, and he has used it, with six variations, for the final movement (Lento).

Perhaps Mr. Malipiero has come closest to putting the central problem of the symphony in words in the question: "Where and how to find comfort?" His answer: "By seeking to communicate with all that has been taken from us, but which belongs to us still."

Is It Your Idea That Symphony Cymb

By ROBERT L. TAGEN

If you have ever watched the cymbal player of a symphony orchestra you undoubtedly came away with the idea that he was somewhat of a loafer. He'll go for hours, it seems, without playing a single note. But, contrary to general belief, he must be an accomplished musician with an unusually accurate ear and sense of timing, says Max G. Polster, first cymbalist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"A person who aspires to become a cymbal virtuoso should first master the violin and piano," Mr. Polster, himself an accomplished violinist and pianist, believes. "In this way he will develop an ear for music which he must have in any form of symphony work."

Although a cymbalist may rest upwards of 100 measures during the performance of a Beethoven symphony, he is still a busy man. He must count measures with unfailing accuracy so as to come in at the precise instant.

The "Harold en Italie" Symphony of Berlioz and "Romeo and Juliet" by Tchaikovsky, for instance, keep a cymbal player on his toes, Mr. Polster points out. The trend is toward an increase in the use of percussion instruments, so it looks as if you'll see more activity in the "rear row" as time goes on.

Old Cymbals Best

Although most music lovers are unaware of the fact, cymbals have been used for thousands of years. They have been found in coffins of mummies of musicians of the ancient Egyptians. But modern cymbal manufacturers emphasize the fact that they are not made of brass. Rather they are made by secret formulae of zinc, silver, many types of copper, and other metals. After manufacture they are stored in special vaults for years, for cymbals, like fine wines, improve with age.

A symphony orchestra will stock varying sizes of cymbals, depending on the tonal qualities desired. They usually will have three or four pairs, ranging in size from ten to 17 inches in diameter, and one suspended cymbal for special effects. The smaller sizes produce bell-like tones while the larger ones are used to express frenzy or fury as in Wagner's "Lohengrin" or Grieg's "Peer Gynt Suite."

Although symphony cymbals cost between $25 and $90, they will last fro years if handled properly. The only care required is an occasional polishing. But since no two cymbals have exactly the same tone, a matched pair is lovingly protected by its owner.

Strangely enough, Max Polster began his career in a rather odd way. He started playing kettle-drums in 1901, but for the next five years found it difficult to obtain a

"A PERSON who aspires to become a cymbal virtuoso should first master the violin and piano," says Max G. Polster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

cided to change to cymbals and bass drum, a position more easily obtained in the larger organizations. In this capacity he toured Germany, Austria, Switzerland and Russia. Thereafter he was nine years with the Hamburg Philharmonic.

In 1923 he joined the Boston Symphony, then under the baton of Pierre Monteux and now conductor of the San Francisco Symphony. A year later the orchestra's present conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, mounted the podium. Mr. Polster, who resides in Jamaica Plain, is now rounding out 25 years as a member of the orchestra.

Anyone who thinks that being a cymbalist might be a monotonous occupation is in for a rude awakening. There are countless ways of playing cymbals, a few of which include the conventional method of clashing, striking with soft malle wood or metal, and rubbing so a to produce a mellow effect.

The cymbalist must be able to fill in on other percussion instruments when called upon to do so. Mr Polster does just that during the Esplanade concerts when he takes over the kettle-drums, or "tympani," as they are called in musical circles. His schedule also includes playing the regular symphony season, Pops and the Berkshire festival.

But the road to musical success cellulose, and so might get nourishment from the Sole U. S. Agents: Schieffelin & Co., New

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
FEB 16 1948

BRITAIN'S BRITTEN
For the Met's new opera, sea chanties and discords.
(Music)

Permission, The Royal Opera House, Stockholm

VILLAGE SCENE IN STOCKHOLM VERSION OF "GRIMES"
In Brooklyn, Gypsy Rose Lee was helpful.

voyage with his boy apprentice dead. The inquest absolves him, but with sinister warnings that it had better not happen again, and the townspeople gossip about him. Peter rages: "Charges that no court has made will be shouted at my head . . . let me stand trial. Bring the accusers to the hall. . . ."

Only Ellen Orford, the widowed village schoolteacher, gives him comfort. His ambition is to live down his unpopularity, make money (to buy respectability), and marry Ellen. Sings Captain Balstrode, a retired merchant seaman: "Man—go and ask her. Without your booty, she'll have you now." Sings Peter: "No—not for pity!" Balstrode replies: "Then the old tragedy is in store: new start with new 'prentice, just as before."

The new apprentice, a weak young boy from the workhouse, is brought to the pub through a magnificent storm (Britten lets his furious storm music in each time the pub door is opened). The second act finds Ellen sitting beside the boy in the Sunday sunshine; she discovers that Peter Grimes has already cuffed and bruised him. This is Britten at his musical trickiest: as she sings to the boy, a church choir nearby is chanting words from the Book of Common Prayer; first the soprano's voice, then the choir, fades in & out like music in a radio play. The chorus angrily follows Peter and the boy to his hut atop a cliff.

There the boy cowers in fear, while Peter rages. As they head out the cliffside door to go fishing, the boy slips and falls, and Peter rushes after him. The [illegible] find the hut empty.

A few days later, the apprentice's sweater is found washed up on the beach. The townspeople, sure that Grimes has committed another murder, head offstage on a new hunt, chanting now near, now far: "Peter Gri-imes . . . Peter Gri-imes." As Peter appears on stage, clearly out of his mind, the orchestra is silent; the only sound to be heard is an eerie foghorn. His friend Balstrode warns him to "sail out . . . then sink the boat," before the mob finds him, and Peter Grimes obeys.

The Vicious Society. Composer Britten regards this opera as "a subject very close to my heart—the struggle of the individual against the masses. The more vicious the society, the more vicious the individual." Actually, Grimes does not defy the masses, only their fury: he would like to be one of them.

George Rodger—LIFE

BRITTEN'S SUFFOLK WINDMILL (BRITTEN AT GATE)
In bed, self-sorting themes.

Those who have seen Benjamin Britten find it hard to believe that he could conceive so violent a play as Peter Grimes: it is almost like Baby Snooks reading lines from Medea. He is the kind of person no one remembers meeting at a party. Usually to be seen in a loose tweed coat, slacks and sweater, his hands habitually stuffed into his pockets, he has a rather tight, lean, nosy face which wrinkles easily into a vinegarish smile under a widow's peak of crinkly hair. He has a very English embarrassment about expressing emotion about anything. He is rarely a talker, usually a listener—a lanky, youthful but somehow worn-looking young man who is painfully awkward with strangers. Around his Suffolk coast home at Aldeburgh—the setting of Peter Grimes—the local folk are used to seeing him walking on the beach, or driving at a conservative speed in his huge old cream-colored Rolls-Royce.

Racing Distance. What on earth leads a young man to write an opera these days? To Ernest Newman, who knows his composers well (his four-volume biography of Richard Wagner is a classic), Britten is a "thoroughbred"—the musical "combination of good pedigree, good build, and clean running and jumping." And Thoroughbred Benjamin Britten ("Benjy" to his friends) had simply found that opera is his best racing distance.

Britten's musical pedigree comes from his mother's side (his father was a dentist). At two, Benjy was calling himself

---

Soprano Commissions Work By Samuel Barber

BY BETTY A. DIETZ
Daily News Music Editor

COMMISSIONS for new works are always good to hear about. On top of last week's announcement that Juilliard has asked 10 leading composers to create works of varying nature, comes the information that Eleanor Steber, Metropolitan Opera soprano, has commissioned Samuel Barber to write "an extended work for soprano and orchestra." Such commissions are not unusual for instrumentalists but they are where singers are concerned.

Of 18 minutes duration, the new composition, "Knoxville, Summer, 1915," is based on boyhood reminiscences of James Magee. The soprano will introduce the piece in April with the Boston Symphony, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

* * *

THE Boston orchestra, incidentally, will be in Cincinnati, Wednesday, Dec. 3, for a concert at Music hall. The appearance will be the first by the Bostonians in 10 years and, what's more, their only performance in Ohio this season.

The concert will open with Mendelssohn's "Italian" symphony—commemmorating the 100th anniversary of the composer's death; three orchestral excerpts from Ravel's second Daphnis and Chloe suite, and the Tschaikowsky "Pathetique" smphony.

J. H. Thuman, 142 W. Fourth st., Cincinnati, is handling details for the engagement.

* * *

IT'S unfortunate that the performance this week by the Stuyvesant string quartet at the Miami hotel ballroom should have been heard by so few. Although the Dayton Music club members were there in full force, chamber music of this quality deserves a larger audience.

The quartet, playing with the total rapport that comes from years of working together, gave a provocative reading of the Villa Lobos Quartet No. 6, his second "in the Brazilian manner..' Their work in the Bocherini A Major quartet with which they opened the morning program was liquid smooth, the rapid passages deft and clean cut. They chose the Schubert A minor quartet to complete the concert.

* * *

THE little Italian boy, Ferruccio Burco, who has been astonishing Europeans by his prowess as a conductor, stood before the Colonne orchestra recently and "unchained a defening orchestral tutti" to the obvious pleasure of his hearers.

The boy, whom Edmund Pendleton, writing for the New York Herald Tribune, describes as obviously talented, played a program that included the Beethoven First symphony, Cimarosa's overture to The Secret Marriage and the overture to Verdi's La Forza del Destino.

Pendleton's final paragraph, however, sums up the whole situation:

"The spectacle of this child on the podium is both adorable and sickening. The performance can do no one any good. The young maestro is bluffing part of the time and his serious study and sincere approach to music may suffer. The orchestra men learn nothing and the public may be led further astray from what constitutes the real business of conducting an orchestra. The realization of the presence of an exceptional talent, however, and the charming physical vision are not without an e[illegible]tional appeal. The audience responded by demanding the repetition of the last number."

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
FEB 16 1948

BRITAIN'S BRITTEN
For the Met's new opera, sea chanties and discords.
(Music)

Permission, The Royal Opera House, Stockholm

VILLAGE SCENE IN STOCKHOLM VERSION OF "GRIMES"
In Brooklyn, Gypsy Rose Lee was helpful.

voyage with his boy apprentice dead. The inquest absolves him, but with sinister warnings that it had better not happen again, and the townspeople gossip about him. Peter rages: "Charges that no court has made will be shouted at my head . . . let me stand trial. Bring the accusers to the hall. . . ."

Only Ellen Orford, the widowed village schoolteacher, gives him comfort. His ambition is to live down his unpopularity, make money (to buy respectability), and marry Ellen. Sings Captain Balstrode, a retired merchant seaman: "Man—go and ask her. Without your booty, she'll have you now." Sings Peter: "No—not for pity!" Balstrode replies: "Then the old tragedy is in store: new start with new 'prentice, just as before."

The new apprentice, a weak young boy from the workhouse, is brought to the pub through a magnificent storm (Britten lets his furious storm music in each time the pub door is opened). The second act finds Ellen sitting beside the boy in the Sunday sunshine; she discovers that Peter Grimes has already cuffed and bruised him. This is Britten at his musical trickiest: as she sings to the boy, a church choir nearby is chanting words from the Book of Common Prayer; first the soprano's voice, then the choir, fades in & out like music in a radio play. The chorus angrily follows Peter and the boy to his hut atop a cliff.

There the boy cowers in fear, while Peter rages. As they head out the cliffside door to go fishing, the boy slips and falls, and [illegible] rushes after him. The [illegible] find the hut empty.

A few days later, the apprentice's sweater is found washed up on the beach. The townspeople, sure that Grimes has committed another murder, head offstage on a new hunt, chanting now near, now far: "Peter Gri-imes . . . Peter Gri-imes." As Peter appears on stage, clearly out of his mind, the orchestra is silent; the only sound to be heard is an eerie foghorn. His friend Balstrode warns him to "sail out . . . then sink the boat," before the mob finds him, and Peter Grimes obeys.

The Vicious Society. Composer Britten regards this opera as "a subject very close to my heart—the struggle of the individual against the masses. The more vicious the society, the more vicious the individual." Actually, Grimes does not defy the masses, only their fury: he would like to be one of them.

Those who have seen Benjamin Britten find it hard to believe that he could conceive so violent a play as Peter Grimes: it is almost like Baby Snooks reading lines from Medea. He is the kind of person no one remembers meeting at a party. Usually to be seen in a loose tweed coat, slacks and sweater, his hands habitually stuffed into his pockets, he has a rather tight, lean, nosy face which wrinkles easily into a vinegarish smile under a widow's peak of crinkly hair. He has a very English embarrassment about expressing emotion about anything. He is rarely a talker, usually a listener—a lanky, youthful but somehow worn-looking young man who is painfully awkward with strangers. Around his Suffolk coast home at Aldeburgh—the setting of Peter Grimes—the local folk are used to seeing him walking on the beach, or driving at a conservative speed in his huge old cream-colored Rolls-Royce.

Racing Distance. What on earth leads a young man to write an opera these days? To Ernest Newman, who knows his composers well (his four-volume biography of Richard Wagner is a classic), Britten is a "thoroughbred"—the musical "combination of good pedigree, good build, and clean running and jumping." And Thoroughbred Benjamin Britten ("Benjy" to his friends) had simply found that opera is his best racing distance.

Britten's musical pedigree comes from his mother's side (his father was a dentist). At two, Benjy was calling himself

George Rodger—LIFE

BRITTEN'S SUFFOLK WINDMILL (BRITTEN AT GATE)
In bed, self-sorting themes.

---

oprano Commissions Work By Samuel Barber

BY BETTY A. DIETZ
Daily News Music Editor

COMMISSIONS for new works are always good to hear about. On top of last week's announcement that uilliard has asked 10 leading composers to create works of varying nature, comes the information that Eleanor Steber, Metropolitan Opera soprano, has commissioned Samuel Barber to write "an extended work for soprano and orchestra." Such commissions are not unusual for instrumentalists but they are where singers are concerned.

Of 18 minutes duration, the new composition, "Knoxville, Summer, 1915," is based on boyhood reminiscences of James Magee. The soprano will introduce the piece in April with the Boston Symphony, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

* * *

THE Boston orchestra, incidentally, will be in Cincinnati, Wednesday, Dec. 3, for a concert at Music hall. The appearance will be the first by the Bostonians n 10 years and, what's more, their nly performance in Ohio this season.

The concert will open with endelssohn's "Italian" symphony —commemmorating the 100th aniversary of the composer's death; hree orchestral excerpts from avel's second Daphnis and Chloe uite, and the Tschaikowsky "Pathetique" smphony.

J. H. Thuman, 142 W. Fourth st., Cincinnati, is handling details for the engagement.

* * *

IT'S unfortunate that the performance this week by the Stuyvesant string quartet at the Miami hotel ballroom should have been heard by so few. Although the Dayton Music club members were there in full force, chamber music of this quality deserves a larger audience.

The quartet, playing with the total rapport that comes from years of working together, gave a provocative reading of the Villa Lobos Quartet No. 6, his second "in the Brazilian manner..' Their work in the Bocherini A Major quartet with which they opened the morning program was liquid smooth, the rapid passages deft and clean cut. They chose the Schubert A minor quartet to complete the concert.

* * *

THE little Italian boy, Ferruccio Burco, who has been astonishing Europeans by his prowess as a conductor, stood before the Colonne orchestra recently and "unchained a defening orchestral tutti" to the obvious pleasure of his hearers.

The boy, whom Edmund Pendleton, writing for the New York Herald Tribune, describes as obviously talented, played a program that included the Beethoven First symphony, Cimarosa's overture to The Secret Marriage and the overture to Verdi's La Forza del Destino.

Pendleton's final paragraph, however, sums up the whole situation:

"The spectacle of this child on the podium is both adorable and sickening. The performance can do no one any good. The young maestro is bluffing part of the time and his serious study and sincere approach to music may suffer. The orchestra men learn nothing and the public may be led further astray from what constitutes the real business of conducting an orchestra. The realization of the presence of an exceptional talent, however, and the charming physical vision are not without an tional appeal. The audience re ded by demanding the repetition of the last number."

MUSIC

Opera's New Face

(See Cover)

On stage, the beefy Wagnerian gods of Götterdämmerung snorted and bellowed in their Valhalla. In the wings, a huge Siegfried, mounted on a ladder, sagged his 230 lbs. down onto waiting shoulders to be borne on-stage. "I'm getting too fat for this," grumbled hefty Heldentenor Lauritz Melchior. A warrior-god charged into musty corners, looking for his sword; bored spear carriers fumbled through a prop basket full of hunting horns. Behind the backdrop a ragged army of stagehands lounged on the rocks of the Rhine (out of use for the moment), gulping coffee from paper cartons and jeering at a stableboy who was trying to direct a sorrel horse on stage.

Though no one in the red plush seats out front knew it, there was also hammering, hurrying and rehearsing going on all over the block-square Metropolitan Opera House. High above Valhalla, craning for an occasional amused glance at the tiny gods on stage below, painters swashed away at new scenery of an English fishing village. In rehearsal rooms, catacombed through the six-story building, singers agonized over the strange notes of a new score. On a rooftop stage, conductors and stage directors exhorted another cast fully as large and glamorous as the one before the audience.

All this work in progress would culminate this week in the Met's first new opera of the year. The new work is Benjamin Britten's Peter Grimes, and no opera written since the days of Puccini [illegible] had so

In Purcell's Steps. In an age when even opera's best friends are calling it decadent, bright young Benjamin Britten's admirers acclaim him as the wonder boy who will restore the glitter to opera's tarnished tiara. In England, which has never produced a composer to match its poets and playwrights, critics call him the likeliest English opera discovery since Henry Purcell composed Dido and Aeneas for a girls' boarding school 250 years ago.

The composer himself, who at 34 looks like an overworked undergraduate, will not be in the audience when the Met's gold curtains part this week. He will be off on a concert tour of Italy and Holland. A shy fellow, but sure of himself, Britten wasn't worried about how Peter Grimes would fare in Manhattan. Since London first heard Peter Grimes at Sadler's Wells in June 1945, it has been cheered 115 times, in Stockholm, Copenhagen, Milan, Berlin, Budapest, translated into eight languages, and praised in all of them.

Punch & Power. Peter Grimes is more than a new opera; for the Met it is a new kind of opera. Dissonance has been heard in the Met's hallowed halls before—in Strauss's Elektra and Salome. Bernard Rogers' The Warrior, which was flashed on & off last year, was nonsensically dissonant. Britten's music runs from perky jigs in the woodwinds to forceful, discordant barkings in the brass. The Met's soggy chorus would need a shot in the arm to handle some of the rounds, which sound like sea chanties and are as complex as a Bach fugue. Singers found themselves singing one duet written in different keys. There were none of the arias that most Italian operas hand out like a free lunch—but the audience would find at least a few things to hum.

To the Met's foreign-born conductors, Britten's English idiom was new, at first forbidding and finally fascinating. Said white-haired, Russian-born Conductor Emil Cooper, who will conduct the first performance of Grimes: "For 40 years I am a conductor, but I do not know English opera before. There is no difficulty in doing Italian opera; when you start you know what you are doing. French and German the same. This is somehow different . . . the rhythms and inflections of English speech which Britten gets into his music. . . . But I am excited!"

Once in rehearsal, when the orchestra stumbled on some of Britten's rocky rhythms, Conductor Cooper slapped his score with his baton, cried out: "No, no, it is not wrong. I am like you, gentlemen. At first I thought it was wrong . . . you will change your minds." Most already had. Muttered one violinist, tapping his temple: "It's good, it's very good."

But the real challenge for the Met, with its stable of posturing actors who sometimes make opera more gross than grand, would be to project the power and punch Composer Britten has packed into his Peter Grimes. One top Met official admitted: "If it flops, it'll be our fault." The Met, like most conservative opera houses, still stages its operas like any smalltime Italian company, with every singer's steps and gestures stylized, so that a substitute can step into any role on a moment's notice. The stylizing makes for convenience, but not for conviction.

In rehearsal for the London première of Peter Grimes, Composer Britten was all over the stage, his enthusiasm overcoming his shyness, begging his singers to act their parts instead of grimacing and posturing. There were few in the Met's cast who didn't realize what they were up against. Soprano Regina Resnik is a Britten veteran: she had sung in his Rape of Lucretia in Chicago last year (TIME, June 9). But Tenor Frederick Jagel, who sings the leading role, was worried: "This is so tough dramatically that it becomes tough musically. If I don't watch my step, I end up with my tongue on my chest."

Crude but Sympathetic. Peter Grimes is no conventional operatic hero. Britten found him in a poem written by Parson-Poet George Crabbe (1754-1832) and added a few hints of Freud. Crabbe's Grimes was an uncouth and unsympathetic ruffian; to Britten and Librettist Montagu Slater he is still crude but somehow sympathetic—a character who, by his uncontrollable rages, continually puts himself at swords'-points with society, which Britten represents with the massive chorus. Sings Peter Grimes: "They listen to money, these Borough gossips. I listen to courage and fiery visions. . . ."

As soon as the curtain is up (there is no overture), it is clear that Peter Grimes, although he has committed no crime, is as doomed as a character in a Kafka novel. The opera opens with Peter facing an inquest—indeed a trial—in the village hall. He has just returned from a fishing

Louis Melancon

THE METROPOLITAN'S CHORUS REHEARSING "PETER GRIMES"
For a new idiom, duets in different keys.

On the Record

By Claudia Cassidy

Bach: Suite No. 2, in B minor, and Suite No. 3, in D major, played by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky [Victor M-1123; five 12-inch records]. Recorded at Tanglewood last summer, these two favorites of the standard repertory have the splendors of the Boston orchestra to give them tonal beauty, tho again you will want to check them against the Busch recordings for authoritative bite. Of the two, the Suite in D with the famous air is the more persuasive. George D.Laurent plays a virtuoso flute with the strings of the B minor, but I miss the felicity o which Ernest Liegl accustomed us at Orchestra hall.

• • •

Shostakovich: Symphony No. 9, played by Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra of New York under the direction of Efrem Kurtz [Columbia M-688; four 12-inch records]. If I had not heard Koussevitzky introduce this symphony at Tanglewood ast summer I would be inclined to write it off as a fairly trivial repeition of what Shostakovich long ince had to say. For tho Efrem Kurtz makes the music clear, he lso permits it to be dull. The Boson performance had qualities of ghtness, buoyancy, delicate tension nd sheer, unadulterated charm to ve quite a different impression. n any case, it is the third and hortest [one record side has a bare ch of music] of the Russian's trilgy of war time symphonies, which as a new economy of style tho it ings to old qualities of sardonic itter and a long slow movement namored of the plantive woodwind.

Handel: "Water Music," arranged by Eugene Ormandy and played by the Philadelphia orchestra under his direction [Columbia X-279; two 12-inch records]. Handel's "Water Music" contained 20 movements and Mr. Ormandy, like the late Sir Hamilton Harty, has chosen seven, tho not invariably the same seven, for his transcription. In either case it is beautiful music, and certainly in this case it is admirably played, but there are times when the Ormandy version seems mannered. It can not approach, much less rival, the wonderful affinity the late Sir Hamilton of Ireland's County Down had for Handel's radiant music.

ns

Barber

ys good to hear ouncement that to create works n that Eleanor s commissioned ork for soprano not unusual for s are concerned,

not without an gno-
The audience responnding the repetition mber."

MUSIC

Opera's New Face

(See Cover)

On stage, the beefy Wagnerian gods of Götterdämmerung snorted and bellowed in their Valhalla. In the wings, a huge Siegfried, mounted on a ladder, sagged his 230 lbs. down onto waiting shoulders to be borne on stage. "I'm getting too fat for this," grumbled hefty Heldentenor Lauritz Melchior. A warrior-god charged into musty corners, looking for his sword; bored spear carriers fumbled through a prop basket full of hunting horns. Behind the backdrop a ragged army of stagehands lounged on the rocks of the Rhine (out of use for the moment), gulping coffee from paper cartons and jeering at a stableboy who was trying to direct a sorrel horse on stage.

Though no one in the red plush seats out front knew it, there was also hammering, hurrying and rehearsing going on all over the block-square Metropolitan Opera House. High above Valhalla, craning for an occasional amused glance at the tiny gods on stage below, painters swashed away at new scenery of an English fishing village. In rehearsal rooms, catacombed through the six-story building, singers agonized over the strange notes of a new score. On a rooftop stage, conductors and stage directors exhorted another cast fully as large and glamorous as the one before the audience.

All this work in progress would culminate this week in the Met's first new opera of the year. The new work is Benjamin Britten's Peter Grimes, and no opera written since the days of Puccini has had so

Louis Melancon

THE METROPOLITAN'S CHORUS REHEARSING "PETER GRIMES"
For a new idiom, duets in different keys.

In Purcell's Steps. In an age when even opera's best friends are calling it decadent, bright young Benjamin Britten's admirers acclaim him as the wonder boy who will restore the glitter to opera's tarnished tiara. In England, which has never produced a composer to match its poets and playwrights, critics call him the likeliest English opera discovery since Henry Purcell composed Dido and Aeneas for a girls' boarding school 250 years ago.

The composer himself, who at 34 looks like an overworked undergraduate, will not be in the audience when the Met's gold curtains part this week. He will be off on a concert tour of Italy and Holland. A shy fellow, but sure of himself, Britten wasn't worried about how Peter Grimes would fare in Manhattan. Since London first heard Peter Grimes at Sadler's Wells in June 1945, it has been cheered 115 times, in Stockholm, Copenhagen, Milan, Berlin, Budapest, translated into eight languages, and praised in all of them.

Punch & Power. Peter Grimes is more than a new opera; for the Met it is a new kind of opera. Dissonance has been heard in the Met's hallowed halls before—in Strauss's Elektra and Salome. Bernard Rogers' The Warrior, which was flashed on & off last year, was nonsensically dissonant. Britten's music runs from perky jigs in the woodwinds to forceful, discordant barkings in the brass. The Met's soggy chorus would need a shot in the arm to handle some of the rounds, which sound like sea chanties and are as complex as a Bach fugue. Singers found themselves singing one duet written in different keys. There were none of the arias that most Italian operas hand out like a free lunch—but the audience would find at least a few things to hum.

To the Met's foreign-born conductors, Britten's English idiom was new, at first forbidding and finally fascinating. Said white-haired, Russian-born Conductor Emil Cooper, who will conduct the first performance of Grimes: "For 40 years I am a conductor, but I do not know English opera before. There is no difficulty in doing Italian opera; when you start you know what you are doing. French and German the same. This is somehow different . . . the rhythms and inflections of English speech which Britten gets into his music. . . . But I am excited!"

Once in rehearsal, when the orchestra stumbled on some of Britten's rocky rhythms, Conductor Cooper slapped his score with his baton, cried out: "No, no, it is not wrong. I am like you, gentlemen. At first I thought it was wrong . . . you will change your minds." Most already had. Muttered one violinist, tapping his temple: "It's good, it's very good."

But the real challenge for the Met, with its stable of posturing actors who sometimes make opera more gross than grand, would be to project the power and punch Composer Britten has packed into his Peter Grimes. One top Met official admitted: "If it flops, it'll be our fault." The Met, like most conservative opera houses, still stages its operas like any smalltime Italian company, with every singer's steps and gestures stylized, so that a substitute can step into any role on a moment's notice. The stylizing makes for convenience, but not for conviction.

In rehearsal for the London première of Peter Grimes, Composer Britten was all over the stage, his enthusiasm overcoming his shyness, begging his singers to act their parts instead of grimacing and posturing. There were few in the Met's cast who didn't realize what they were up against. Soprano Regina Resnik is a Britten veteran: she had sung in his Rape of Lucretia in Chicago last year (TIME, June 9). But Tenor Frederick Jagel, who sings the leading role, was worried: "This is so tough dramatically that it becomes tough musically. If I don't watch my step, I end up with my tongue on my chest."

Crude but Sympathetic. Peter Grimes is no conventional operatic hero. Britten found him in a poem written by Parson-Poet George Crabbe (1754-1832) and added a few hints of Freud. Crabbe's Grimes was an uncouth and unsympathetic ruffian; to Britten and Librettist Montagu Slater he is still crude but somehow sympathetic—a character who, by his uncontrollable rages, continually puts himself at swords'-points with society, which Britten represents with the massive chorus. Sings Peter Grimes: "They listen to money, these Borough gossips. I listen to courage and fiery visions. . . ."

As soon as the curtain is up (there is no overture), it is clear that Peter Grimes, although he has committed no crime, is as doomed as a character in a Kafka novel. The opera opens with Peter facing an inquest—indeed a trial—in the village hall. He has just returned from a fishing

---

On the Record

By Claudia Cassidy

Bach: Suite No. 2, in B minor, and Suite No. 3, in D major, played by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky [Victor M-1123; five 12-inch records]. Recorded at Tanglewood last summer, these two favorites of the standard repertory have the splendors of the Boston orchestra to give them tonal beauty, tho again you will want to check them against the Busch recordings for authoritative bite. Of the two, the Suite in D with the famous air is the more persuasive. George D.Laurent plays a virtuoso flute with the strings of the B minor, but I miss the felicity to which Ernest Liegl accustomed us at Orchestra hall.

• • •

Shostakovich: Symphony No. 9, played by Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra of New York under the direction of Efrem Kurtz [Columbia M-688; four 12-inch records]. If I had not heard Koussevitzky introduce this symphony at Tanglewood last summer I would be inclined to write it off as a fairly trivial repetition of what Shostakovich long since had to say. For tho Efrem Kurtz makes the music clear, he also permits it to be dull. The Boston performance had qualities of lightness, buoyancy, delicate tension and sheer, unadulterated charm to give quite a different impression. In any case, it is the third and shortest [one record side has a bare inch of music] of the Russian's trilogy of war time symphonies, which has a new economy of style tho it clings to old qualities of sardonic glitter and a long slow movement enamored of the plaintive woodwind.

Handel: "Water Music," arranged by Eugene Ormandy and played by the Philadelphia orchestra under his direction [Columbia X-279; two 12-inch records]. Handel's "Water Music" contained 20 movements and Mr. Ormandy, like the late Sir Hamilton Harty, has chosen seven, tho not invariably the same seven, for his transcription. In either case it is beautiful music, and certainly in this case it is admirably played, but there are times when the Ormandy version seems mannered. It can not approach, much less rival, the wonderful affinity the late Sir Hamilton of Ireland's County Down had for Handel's radiant music.

6

OH! my aching leg!
AH! my Absorbine Jr.
Absorbine Jr.

For FAST RELIEF, help feed famished muscles with fresh blood!

● When muscles get sore and stiff and lame after unusual exercise . . . get busy! Rub on Absorbine Jr. and feel the pain float away!

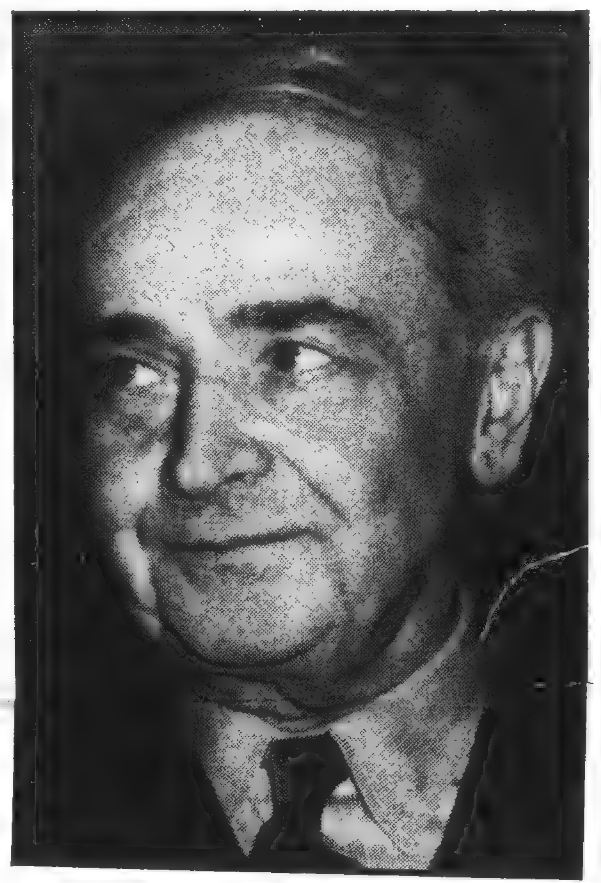
Aching muscles are often famished muscles. Your extra exertion has burned up their nourishment. Fast-acting Absorbine Jr. helps speed the local circulation. Then fresh blood supplies fresh nourishment . . . pain eases, it's like a new lease on life!

Always keep Absorbine Jr. handy, there's nothing like it. At all druggists, $1.25 a long-lasting bottle.

W. F. Young, Inc.
Springfield, Mass.

was how to apply movie technique to opera—how to employ the quick dramatic climaxes and rapid impacts that make Peter Grimes a thriller.

At the movie studios, he met the friends who started him on the road to writing opera: Librettist Montagu Slater, and Poet Wystan Hugh Auden, who has taught Britten most of what he knows about fitting words & music. Some of Britten's best music is written to Auden texts: the Ballad of Heroes, the Hymn to St. Cecilia. Also some of the worst: Paul Bunyan, the first try at opera for both, flopped dismally when it was performed in 1941 at Columbia University. Auden introduced Britten into his circle of friends; until then, Britten says, he was "a rather dull, middle-class boy."



Acme

PATRON KOUSSEVITZKY
For $1,000, cheers.

Benjy and Peter Pears (for whom he wrote the leading tenor role of Grimes) arrived in the U.S. in 1939, moved in with Auden, in an arty household at 7 Middagh Street in Brooklyn. It was a ramshackle, remodeled four-story brownstone whose architecture had fascinated Auden and his friends: from the street it looked something like a Swiss chalet. It was there that Negro Author Richard Wright later wrote Black Boy, and Novelist Carson McCullers wrote Reflections in a Golden Eye. Composer Paul Bowles worked at his Mexican ballet on the parlor piano (until Benjy quietly asked that Bowles move his piano to the basement).

Gypsy Rose Lee came in blue jeans, to paint Benjy's fourth-floor rooms. Author Christopher Isherwood, Poet Louis MacNeice, Composers Aaron Copland and Virgil Thomson drifted in & out. At meals, Auden presided at one end of the table. He also did the bookkeeping, and was irritated if any of the tenants questioned their bills. Benjy always paid up (about $25 a week) without a murmur.

Britten lived about six months in Brook-

---

opera—or by the time it is done with you—you have decided that Peter Grimes is the whole of bombing, machine-gunning, mining, torpedoing, ambushing humanity which talks about a guaranteed standard of living, yet does nothing but wreck its own works, degrade or pervert its own moral life and reduce itself to starvation."

Almost overnight, an all but unknown 31-year-old was the talk of London.

It took 2½ years for London's enthusiasm to spread to Manhattan's Metropolitan Opera House. Why? For one thing, no one ever accused the Met of being progressive. General Manager Edward Johnson works on the theory that his customers like what they have been given, because they come back for more. Season-ticket holders buy out 85% of the house in advance, and take potluck. More than half of them have held seats for ten years; 10% of them for 40 years. Says Johnson: "Why should we force a new venture when we can sell out the house with Rigoletto?" And, unlike Broadway theaters which can play a hit nightly until it pays off, the Met plays each opera only four or five times a season. Even if Peter Grimes is a hit (as none of the ten most recent new operas has been at the Met), it would need a run of five years to break even.

At Covent Garden, Peter Grimes is still the favorite opera in the repertory, but it doesn't make money because of its huge chorus and 80-piece orchestra. Britten has since shrewdly trimmed his sails, produced two chamber operas, The Rape of Lucretia and Albert Herring, which use only a dozen musicians and even fewer singers. Some critics and musicians (like Aaron Copland) think The Rape, which is slated for a Broadway production this fall, is even better than Peter Grimes. Even so, says Britten, "I have to work hard between operas to make a living."

Beggar's Opera. English critics, having adopted Benjy Britten as a national hero, now insist on talking like Dutch uncles to him. Some complain that he is too intellectual, too facile, too fast (though Mozart wrote 22 operas, close to 50 symphonies, and more than 500 other works in his 35 years). Others say that Britten is not original enough, that his music runs the gamut from Schubert to Stravinsky. Says Britten: "I don't see why I should lock myself inside a purely personal idiom." He thinks music went wrong in the early 19th Century, and excepts only Tchaikovsky and Chopin. Though a childhood admirer of Beethoven, he now thinks Beethoven's music was too personal. "Let's face it," Britten says, "It was very sloppy music."

Britten has now moved from Snape closer to the beach at Aldeburgh in Suffolk, where the windows look out over a tangle of masts and rigging reminiscent of Peter Grimes. There he refuses to see visitors, doesn't answer letters, and works long hours. His next projects are a choral symphony for Koussevitzky and new accompaniments to The Beggar's Opera. Where will he go from there? Says he, with an off-center grin, "There's probably nothing I won't have the cheek to try."

Mother, Sister Beth & Benjy (age 5)
"Dear" used to have thoughts.

lyn, and another three years in Amityville, Long Island. For a time Britten conducted an amateur orchestra in another Long Island town, just for the fun of it. The amateurs got so they could play a Mozart symphony creditably, then began thinking about a professional concert. Britten thought that amateurs should be content to stay amateurs.

Rosy Prospects. Britten regarded his visit to the U.S. as a vacation trip "rather from the general European atmosphere than from overwork." Though his knowledge of the U.S. is pretty well limited to New York City and suburbs, he found the U.S. "a very rosy prospect" for composers: "The American composer has little to grumble at; compared with English composers, nothing." In fact, he saw a danger of "excessive nationalism" in the way conductors indiscriminately played U.S music, and in American composers' search for a style of their own. Says Britten: "No accident of nationality has ever excused a composer for writing bad music." Besides, in the U.S. there was too much seeking out, too much pushing of composers "before they are ready."

He had another reason for wanting to leave the U.S. England was at war, and although he is a pacifist (his personal faith is something akin to the Quakers', though he is not much of a churchgoer), he thought he belonged there. But first he went to see Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, who had played some of Britten's music. Koussevitzky gave him $200 a month for five months to write an opera.* Says Koussevitzky: "If he had asked more we would have paid it."

Back in England, a Conscientious Objectors Tribunal exempted Britten from war service, but he gave concerts in bomb-shattered towns.

For a while, he lived with his married sister Beth, but found it difficult to compose while Beth's children played trains under his feet, or left sticky traces of jam on the piano. Then he and Librettist Slater moved to Snape in Suffolk, to a windmill which Britten had remodeled as a house. There they plunged into Peter Grimes. Slater would work up in a bedroom, and shout down to Benjy, lolling on the grass, "How do you like this line?" They took long walks over the bleak Suffolk downs, saying nothing to each other, each busy with his own ideas. Britten gets his themes in bed, on a bus or train, anywhere, believes strongly in letting them sort themselves out while he sleeps. "Usually I have the music complete in my head before I put pen to paper."

In the evenings, Slater and Britten cycled to the local pub to drink beer and play darts. Says Mrs. Slater: "I had to make a rule they should speak to me at mealtimes."

Harsh & Helpless. When Britten finally got the surging dissonances and powerful choruses of Peter Grimes on paper, England had its biggest homegrown musical event since the Edwardian era triumphs of Sir Edward Elgar. The London Times pronounced Peter Grimes "a great opera . . . its success is deserved and inevitable."

U.S. Literary Critic Edmund Wilson, dragged unwillingly to Peter Grimes, came away as enthusiastic as everyone else. Wrote he (in his Europe Without Baedeker): "The opera seizes on you, possesses you, keeps you riveted to your seat during the action and keyed up during the intermissions, and drops you, purged and exhausted, at the end. . . . This opera could have been written in no other age, and it is one of the very few works of art that have seemed to me, so far, to have spoken for the blind anguish, the hateful rancors and the will to destruction of these horrible years. . . .

"By the time you are done with the opera—or by the time it is done with you—you have decided that Peter Grimes is the whole of bombing, machine-gunning, mining, torpedoing, ambushing humanity which talks about a guaranteed standard of living, yet does nothing but wreck its own works, degrade or pervert its own moral life and reduce itself to starvation."

Almost overnight, an all but unknown 31-year-old was the talk of London.

It took 2½ years for London's enthusiasm to spread to Manhattan's Metropolitan Opera House. Why? For one thing, no one ever accused the Met of being progressive. General Manager Edward Johnson works on the theory that his customers like what they have been given, because they come back for more. Season-ticket holders buy out 85% of the house in advance, and take potluck. More than half of them have held seats for ten years; 10% of them for 40 years. Says Johnson: "Why should we force a new venture when we can sell out the house with Rigoletto?" And, unlike Broadway theaters which can play a hit nightly until it pays off, the Met plays each opera only four or five times a season. Even if Peter Grimes is a hit (as none of the ten most recent new operas has been at the Met), it would need a run of five years to break even.

At Covent Garden, Peter Grimes is still the favorite opera in the repertory, but it doesn't make money because of its huge chorus and 80-piece orchestra. Britten has since shrewdly trimmed his sails, produced two chamber operas, The Rape of Lucretia and Albert Herring, which use only a dozen musicians and even fewer singers. Some critics and musicians (like Aaron Copland) think The Rape, which is slated for a Broadway production this fall, is even better than Peter Grimes. Even so, says Britten, "I have to work hard between operas to make a living."

Beggar's Opera. English critics, having adopted Benjy Britten as a national hero, now insist on talking like Dutch uncles to him. Some complain that he is too intellectual, too facile, too fast (though Mozart wrote 22 operas, close to 50 symphonies, and more than 500 other works in his 35 years). Others say that Britten is not original enough, that his music runs the gamut from Schubert to Stravinsky. Says Britten: "I don't see why I should lock myself inside a purely personal idiom." He thinks music went wrong in the early 19th Century, and excepts only Tchaikovsky and Chopin. Though a childhood admirer of Beethoven, he now thinks Beethoven's music was too personal. "Let's face it," Britten says, "It was very sloppy music."

Britten has now moved from Snape closer to the beach at Aldeburgh in Suffolk, where the windows look out over a tangle of masts and rigging reminiscent of Peter Grimes. There he refuses to see visitors, doesn't answer letters, and works long hours. His next projects are a choral symphony for Koussevitzky and new accompaniments to The Beggar's Opera. Where will he go from there? Says he, with an off-center grin, "There's probably nothing I won't have the cheek to try."

---

* Peter Grimes, which is dedicated to Koussevitzky's late first wife, Natalie, was first performed in the U.S. at Koussevitzky's summer festival at Tanglewood, Mass. (Time, Aug. 19, 1946).

BURGIN PRESENTS STRAVINSKY WORK

Conducts Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall in Opus in Three Movements

By OLIN DOWNES

The tonal splendor of the orchestra and the fine musicianship of Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, who conducted in Dr. Koussevitzky's place at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, were warmly recognized by the audience.

The most novel feature of the program was the performance of Igor Stravinsky's "Symphony in Three Movements," composed in 1945 and given its first performance here by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, to whom the work is dedicated, on Jan. 24, 1946, under the direction of the composer. It is no reproach of Mr. Stravinsky that the performance last night was certainly clearer and more effective than the one he directed. The symphony had been admirably prepared. Mr. Burgin put all his knowledge and good-will at the composer's service and an enthusiastic Stravinsky contingent in the audience recalled the conductor repeatedly, while other persons kept silent.

But it is not easy to see what the warmest upholder of the Stravinsky of today can find interesting in this music. No idea in it—we mean no thematic idea—has either distinction or originality. A very recent composition, the symphony is already old and wan. That the themes are either trite, or both trite and ugly, does not remove the fact that they are wearisomely commonplace.

Does Not Develop Themes

Well, says you, commonplace themes have been treated by Bach, Beethoven, Wagner, Mozart in such a way that in development they became significant. But this does not seem to save Mr. Stravinsky. For he develops his themes very little, and goes nowhere in particular with them. According to his champions, he does not have to. For this is a different kind of a symphony, not the ordinary kind that follows classic tradition, or even some romantic kind which develops the themes in an unclassical way.

"Here," we are told in the program book, "we have another example of that additive construction, for the invention of which Stravinsky is justly famous." This "additive" construction, it appears, is "a formal principle which conceives of music as the succession of clearly outlined blocks, or planes, which are unified and related through the continuity of a steadily and logically evolving organic force * * * just as the comparable additive principle of romanesque architecture is differentiated from the interlacing connectivity of the gothic or baroque."

The words are long ones, and ornate. But we doubt if they are any conclusive test of a "symphony." At least they do not do so if we conceive the symphonic ideal to consist in the germination, juxtaposition and final synthesis of thematic ideas in orchestral dress.

But what's in a name? In Bach's time they called all sorts of works "symphonies," "overtures," or what have you? Has Mr. Stravinsky, or has he not, in the score heard last night, given us some living, significant music? We submit that he has failed in this. "Additive" his methods may be. In plain English they usually boil down to repeating at very u eventful length a theme, rhythm, or turn of phrase till such effectiveness as it may originally have contained has been completely boiled out; and trying the same thing with another and equally emaciated idea. In fact, this is empty and tired music, by a first-class workman, whose workmanship cannot substitute for his incapacity not merely to do but also to think musically in a genuinely fruitful and constructive way.

Satisfied His Followers

For those with whom Stravinsky in any shape or form can do no wrong the symphony no doubt sufficed. For persons of perhaps commoner taste and more limited artistic perception his score was put at a great disadvantage by the Haydn symphony, which preceded, and by the First Symphony of Jean Sibelius, which followed it.

This First symphony is early Sibelius, with solecisms of immaturity and with some "derivations," notably of Grieg, in it. Its themes are in most cases of a long arch and of a splendid directness that sometimes descend, where idiom is concerned, to the obvious. And yet—this First symphony of the Finnish master, which is practically 50 years old, sounds incredibly fresh today: fresh in the sweep, power and savor of the wide open spaces which are in every measure of it; fresh because of its evident inspiration, sincerity and originality, not only of expression, but of the "northern orchestration" which also is the contribution of Sibelius, and which, among other qualities of his, sets him apart from every other symphonist of the last half century.

It is also to be remarked that the audience had the naïveté and the bad taste to applaud this symphony, when it was over, very heartily—far more than it applauded Stravinsky. That, of course, is merely another example of mass psychology and of the love of the masses for the superficial or merely picturesque. This is certainly too bad—indeed insufferable to really perceptive, progressive and sensitive persons. We ourselves have to admit, shamefacedly, that so far as we are concerned whoever wants this last symphony of Stravinsky can have it, while we stick in the mud with poor old Sibelius.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

MAR 1 - 1948

Koussevitzky Reveals Music Festival Plans

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, returning from a midseason vacation, today announced plans for the 1948 Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

There will be a six-week season from July 5, to Aug. 15, through the period of the Berkshire Festival concerts. Dr. Koussevitzky will direct the school, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. Among the faculty, in addition to 25 principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin, and Eleazar de Carvalho, assisting Dr. Koussevitzky in conducting; Hugh Ross and Robert Shaw in charge of choral conducting, and Gregor Piatigorsky, head of Chamber Music.

Darius Milhaur will return from France to join Aaron Copland as teacher of composition. Boris Goldovsky will be head of the opera department.

TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES

[illegible]

A recording that has been long waited is now in stock, THE BEETHOVEN SYMPHONY NO. 9, "THE CHORAL SYMPHONY" in D Minor, Op. 125, played by The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge [illegible], conductor, and The Berkshire Festival Chorus, under the direction of Robert Shaw. This recording was made at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. RCA Victor DM-1190.

Abresch

Edmund Kurtz, who will introduce the Khatchatourian Cello Concerto to Boston at this week's concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

Khatchaturian Cello Concerto

By Edmund Kurtz

(Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra)

The Khatchaturian Cello Concerto is in the usual three movements, which take about 30 minutes to perform. It starts with an introduction played by the orchestra. The solo instrument introduces the first theme, after which the second theme is introduced by the orchestra and repeated in a more elaborate form by the cello. This is followed by a long passage with the cello having a figuration in an even, rhythmic pattern. The orchestra and the cello join in an enlarged form of the second theme which brings the cello to the cadenza. Orchestra and cello then return to the first subject, followed by a reminder of the second subject and the movement ends on a boisterous note.

The second movement begins with the orchestra and two prolonged flute passages. The theme is introduced by the cello, a warm, one might say Oriental, melody, which is repeated an octave lower and then taken up by the orchestra, with the cello having passages in a higher register, fortissimo. A short orchestral interlude brings back the first theme with slight variations, but maintains the same mood. A flute solo, similar to that heard at the beginning of the movement, ends it, and leads directly into the third movement.

The cello states the first theme in the third bar. The second is introduced by the orchestra and then taken up by the cello. It is a long, mournful, expressive melody, utterly in cellistic vein and exploiting all the best-sounding ranges of the instrument. The finale of the concerto is full of technical passages played by the cello with a minimum of orchestral support.

HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE

What'll you have? The mighty sweeps of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony capped with its choral fourth movement, or a strictly pastoral stroll with Herr Brahms. Both are on tap as recorded high lights of the week.

* * *

Beethoven, Symphony No. 9 in D Minor, Victor.

The Ninth Symphony is resplendent Beethoven. Characteristic, are its slowly gathering chordal masses which move ominously and unerringly into crashing musical thunderstorms, balanced always in fury by the greatest calms which will roll again into pealing claps. The fourth movement experiences a sudden breaking into song after three long and purely orchestral movements. Carrying out the work's philosophy of "victory-through-struggle," the choral movement is a glorious paean to victory and happiness and the libretto is based on Schiller's beloved "Ode to Joy." Performing for this recording made at Tanglewood, Mass., during the Berkshire Festival in 1947, is the FAVORITE RECORDS IN HOUSTON LAST WEEK.

POPULAR.

"Now Is the Hour."
"Manana."
"I Love You, Yes I Do."
"Four Leaf Clover."
"Beg Your Pardon."

SEMI-CLASSICAL.

Music of Lecuona, First Piano Quartet.
Second Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt.
Sabre Dance.

CLASSICAL.

Beethoven's Third (Eroica) Symphony.
Graduation Ball, Dallas Symphony.
Bruch's Scottish Fantasy.

Boston Symphony conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. Robert Shaw directs the Berkshire Festival Chorus and a group of soloists who creditably sing the arias.

* * *

TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES

A fit companion piece to the Boston orchestra's magnificent version of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony released last fall is the new recording of Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 in D Minor ("Choral") by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston ~~Symphony Orchestra (RCA Victor~~ Set DM-1190, sixteen 12-inch sides).

A work of such grandeur and greatness of spirit finds Mr. Koussevitzky at his best. And in his treatment of Beethoven's music his taste is impeccable and his insight profound. So the music comes off the records in its full glory and meaning.

This music finds his orchestra, too, at its best. Its sound is rich and resonant, its execution flawless, its playing crisp and clean.

The choral part in the last movement is sung by the Berkshire Music Festival Chorus, directed by Robert Shaw, and the soloists are James Pease, bass, Frances Yeend, soprano, David Lloyd, tenor, and Eunice Alberts, contralto. As in Mr. Shaw's recent Bach recordings the work of the chorus is all that could be desired and the singing of the soloists a little on the weak side.

This set was recorded in Tanglewood shed at Lenox, Mass., scene of the Berkshire festival. Technically speaking it is first rate.

TURDAY, MARCH 6, 19

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 18th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Edmund Kurtz, cellist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Scythian Suite, "Ala and Lolli," Op. 20 .... Prokofieff
Concerto for cello and orchestra .... Khatchatourian Symphony No. 5 Op. 47 .... Shostakovitch

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

It was a timely gesture of defiance to put the three most prominent Russian composers, who recently landed in the official Soviet dog-house, on the same program. But it was not such a good idea artistically, and the result was just what a good many of us expected. Since Prokofieff is a considerably greater composer than Khatchatourian and an infinitely better one than Shostakovitch, the concert began to run down after the glorious finish of the Scythian Suite until it ended in the tedium of the Largo and vulgar bombast of the Finale of the Shostakovitch 5th Symphony. It was a badly planned, if superbly executed, concert; and its great compensation was the Scythian Suite.

That is not to say that the Khatchatourian Cello Concerto, which was played for the first time in the U. S., is a bad piece. There are many clever and ear-tickling things in it. It is a fine canter for a virtuoso cellist. It is better than many modern, or old, for that matter, cello concertos. Hindemith's is the only exception that comes to mind among the moderns. But here's the rub

It is very difficult to bring off the cello as solo instrument for an entire work. Inevitably there comes the time when the instrument sounds, as someone once said, like a bumble-bee in a wood-shed. There's a lot of this in the Khatchatourian piece. Nevertheless, the slow movement is good and there are many effective passages throughout. Mr. Kurtz played this difficult music with extraordinary verve and aplomb, and I suspect that the applause was as much for him as for the new music.

Mr. Koussekitzky is determined that we shall like Shostakovitch's 5th Symphony. Because of the war I had not heard it since 1941 and I sincerely hoped that I would see the light on this occasion. But, except for the fine concluding pages of the first movement and the scherzo, the Symphony seemed to me if anything worse than before. I cannot, for the life of me, understand how anyone who appreciates the superb art of Prokofieff can place Shostakovitch on the same plane.

Like the 'Sacre,' the Scythian Suite stands up well through the years. But the performance must be carefully wrought. When it is played as the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky's guidance played it yesterday the effect is sháttering.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL
MAR 7 - 1948

With The New Recordings

By THE REVIEWER

THE tremendous Beethoven Ninth Symphony with its overwhelming melodic passages has been given a new reading by the superlatively fine Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. The climax to the crescendo of the composer's creative works not only is given a fine instrumental interpretation but is embellished by a choral group of artists. Included are Frances Yeend, soprano; James Pease, bass; David Lloyd, tenor; Eunice Alberts, contralto, and the massed voices of the Berkshire Music Festival Chorus.

The singers are directed by Robert Shaw and Schiller's Ode to Joy was perhaps never given a more inspired rendition.

Koussevitzky's deft phrasing is felt through all the varied movements of this recording and the Ninth here takes on a celestial coloring—at least to the Reviewer's ears. The majesty of the Ninth, as it is played by the Boston Symphony, leaves one spellbound. By Victor.

Brahms' Second Symphony

Artur Rodzinski directs the New York Philharmonic Symphony's playing of the Brahms Second Symphony in D Major. The composer felt that this composition had an elegiac character. The warm artlessness of the passages dissipate any such construction. The adagio movement is pure poetry. The four Brahms symphonies are an essential part of any music library and the Second is perhaps tonally the most important.

The Philharmonic Symphony gives this colorful, classical composition a deft interpretation, losing none of its gay and pretty shadings in its efforts at musical eloquence.

The Reviewer calls this an essential to anyone not possessing a copy of the Brahms Second. By Columbia.

Casadesus—And Ravel

As its name indicates, the Piano Concerto for the Left Hand was written for just five fingers. However, Ravel made very sure those five fingers get a workout. Besides being a technical virtuoso showpiece, the Concerto is also a solidly worthwhile composition of fiery beauty and magnetism.

It deeply shows the influence of America's jazz idioms on Maurice Ravel during his visit to this country.

A Columbia album features Robert Casadesus, French pianist who was a friend of the composer and is noted for his reading of this work, and the Philadelphia Orchestra under the baton of Eugene Ormandy. There's only one word for this recording—brilliant.

Heifetz Plays Bruch

A lesser-known opus by Max Bruch, the Scottish Fantasy, is given a superb reading in a new Victor album.

Jascha Heifetz is the violinist, accompanied by the RCA Victor Orchestra, William Steinberg conducting. The Fantasy is a gentle, highly melodious treatment of old Scottish folk songs.

The music is unashamedly romantic, and Heifetz subordinates

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
MAR 9 - 1948

Tanglewood Programs Detailed

BOSTON — First announcement was made recently by Serge Koussevitzky of the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under his direction at the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood next summer. The guest conductors will be Eleazar de Carvalho Leonard Bernstein, and Robert Shaw.

For the first week of concerts in the Music Shed on Thursday evening, July 29, Saturday evening, July 21, and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 1, the programs will include Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, in C minor; Brahms' Second Symphony, in D major; Mahler's Second ("Resurrection") Symphony with chorus and soloists; Piston's Third Symphony; a Symphony of Haydn; Bach's Third Orchestral Suite, in D major; and Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler."

The concerts of Series B will take place on Thursday evening, Aug. 5, Saturday evening, Aug. 7, and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 8. At these concerts the Sixth ("Pastoral") Symphony by Beethoven will be played; the Fifth Symphony by Shostakovitch; the Fantastic Symphony by Berlioz; Strauss' "Don Quixote" (Cello Soloist — Gregor Piatigorsky); Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex;" "Madona," by Villa-Lobos, and Falla's "El Amor Brujo."

An extra concert on Tuesday evening, Aug. 10, will be devoted to the music of Tchaikovsky.

The concerts of Series C will take place on Thursday evening, Aug. 12, Saturday evening, Aug. 14, and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 15, and will include Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3; Schumann's First Symphony ("Spring"); Weber's "Freischuetz" Overture; Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" (complete); the Second Symphony by Sibelius, and a major choral work to be announced.

The Festival will open with two concerts devoted to the music of Bach and Mozart, to be played on Sunday afternoon and Tuesday evening, July 18 and 20, in the Theatre-Concert Hall, each program to be repeated on Sunday afternoon and Tuesday evening in the following week. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct these concerts.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
MAR 14 1948

Music

French Offers Program

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

EDWARD French, Albany piano teacher and recitalist, will present a program of music this afternoon in the auditorium of the College of Saint Rose at 2:15 o'clock. The proceeds will be devoted to the Albany Diocesan Unit of the National Catholic Music Educators' association. The program is as follows:

I
Organ Prelude in G Minor	Bach Siloti
Rondo in D Major	Schubert
Allegro in B Minor, Op. 8	Schumann
II
Sonata in E Minor (The Keltic)	MacDowell
III
Etude in C Minor	Scriabine
Prelude in C	Prokofieff
Rhapsodie in C	Dohnanyi
IV
Forest Murmurs	Liszt
Rhapsodie No. 15	Liszt

* * *

THE GLEE club of the Albany Academy for Girls will assist the choir of St. Peter's Episcopal church during the service of Evensong this afternoon, beginning at 4 o'clock, for the benefit of the choir boys' summer camp fund.

The service which will be under the direction of Clarence A. Hollister, organist and choirmaster, and director of the Academy Glee club, is held annually during Lent to help finance vacations for young choristers at Trinity camp on Lawson's lake. Miss Martha Hutchinson is president of the glee club. No tickets of admission are required and the public is invited to attend.

* * *

AUDITIONS for admission to the Berkshire Music Center student orchestra will be held this week in New York by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who are also on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood. the Music Center, which is operated by the Boston Symphony orchestra, is directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. The Music Center will be held at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts from July 5 to August 15, 1948. The auditions will be held in the Chapter room of Carneige Hall, 154 West 57 street, New York on the following schedule:

String: Wednesday, March 17 at 10 a. m.

Wood winds: Thursday, March 18 at 10 a. m.

Brass: Friday, March 19 at 10 a. m.

Piano: Friday, March 19 at 11:30 a. m.

Auditions for tympani, percussion, and harp will be held backstage at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday, March 17 at 7 p. m.

Applicants must notify Thomas D. Perry, Jr., at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts, before the auditions they wish to attend.

Oklahoma City
Oklahoma

Great Album Of Beethoven

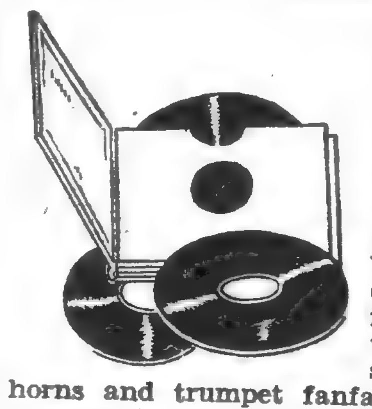
By MIKE GORMAN

New records of classical music, recently issued and about which you should know:

Beethoven: Symphoy No. 9 in D Minor. Serge Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony orchestra. The Berkshire music Festival chorus, conducted by Robert Shaw, and James Pease, bass; Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto, and David Lloyd, tenor. Victor album M/DM-1190. 16 sides.

THE answer to a record collector's prayer, an acceptable rendering of Beethoven's last, great symphony. It is technically far superior to the old Weingartner-Vienna Philharmonic job, and much sounder than recent post-Weingartner releases.

Star billing in credits for this album should go to the engineers who handled it, the first ever recorded at the Tanglewood Shed at the Berkshire Music Festival.



Precise orchestral detail comes through practically perfect. The woodwinds in the coda of the first movement, the timpani in the scherzo, the horns and trumpet fanfares in the slow movement—this is recorded fidelity at its peak.

In the chorale finale, the way the sopranos come through, clean and clear above the massed chorus, is something you have to hear several times to believe. Shaw musters some beautiful choral attacks, and the quartet of soloists is more than competent.

Dr. Koussevitzky is much less mannered than in some of his Beethoven readings, of which his December recording of the "Eroica" is the most recent example. He gets a thrilling sweep into the scherzo, and his orchestral building in the finale could be studied profitably by all conductors. The Boston Symphony reaffirms its ranking as one of the great orchestras of the present day.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 14 1948

STUDYING A NEW CELLO CONCERTO

Serge Koussevitzky (at piano) and Edmund Kurtz, who will be soloist with Boston Symphony in Khatchaturian work at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL
MAR 7 - 1948

With The New Recordings

By THE REVIEWER

THE tremendous Beethoven Ninth Symphony with its overwhelming melodic passages has been given a new reading by the superlatively fine Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. The climax to the crescendo of the composer's creative works not only is given a fine instrumental interpretation but is embellished by a choral group of artists. Included are Frances Yeend, soprano; James Pease, bass; David Lloyd, tenor; Eunice Alberts, contralto, and the massed voices of the Berkshire Music Festival Chorus.

The singers are directed by Robert Shaw and Schiller's Ode to Joy was perhaps never given a more inspired rendition.

Koussevitzky's deft phrasing is felt through all the varied movements of this recording and the Ninth here takes on a celestial coloring—at least to the Reviewer's ears. The majesty of the Ninth, as it is played by the Boston Symphony, leaves one spellbound. By Victor.

Brahms' Second Symphony

Artur Rodzinski directs the New York Philharmonic Symphony's playing of the Brahms Second Symphony in D Major. The composer felt that this composition had an elegiac character. The warm artlessness of the passages dissipate any such construction. The adagio movement is pure poetry. The four Brahms symphonies are an essential part of any music library and the Second is perhaps tonally the most important.

The Philharmonic Symphony gives this colorful, classical composition a deft interpretation, losing none of its gay and pretty shadings in its efforts at musical eloquence.

The Reviewer calls this an essential to anyone not possessing a copy of the Brahms Second. By Columbia.

Casadesus—And Ravel

As its name indicates, the Piano Concerto for the Left Hand was written for just five fingers. However, Ravel made very sure those five fingers get a workout. Besides being a technical virtuoso showpiece, the Concerto is also a solidly worthwhile composition of fiery beauty and magnetism.

It deeply shows the influence of America's jazz idioms on Maurice Ravel during his visit to this country.

A Columbia album features Robert Casadesus, French pianist who was a friend of the composer and is noted for his reading of this work, and the Philadelphia Orchestra under the baton of Eugene Ormandy. There's only one word for this recording—brilliant.

Heifetz Plays Bruch

A lesser-known opus by Max Bruch, the Scottish Fantasy, is given a superb reading in a new Victor album.

Jascha Heifetz is the violinist, accompanied by the RCA Victor Orchestra, William Steinberg conducting. The Fantasy is a gentle, highly melodious treatment of old Scottish folk songs.

The music is unashamedly romantic, and Heifetz subordinates

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
MAR 9 - 1948

Tanglewood Programs Detailed

BOSTON—First announcement was made recently by Serge Koussevitzky of the program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under his direction at the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood next summer. The guest conductors will be Eleazar de Carvalho Leonard Bernstein, and Robert Shaw.

For the first week of concerts in the Music Shed on Thursday evening, July 29, Saturday evening, July 21, and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 1, the programs will include Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, in C minor; Brahms' Second Symphony, in D major; Mahler's Second ("Resurrection") Symphony with chorus and soloists; Piston's Third Symphony; a Symphony of Haydn; Bach's Third Orchestral Suite, in D major; and Hindemith's "Mathis der Maler."

The concerts of Series B will take place on Thursday evening, Aug. 5, Saturday evening, Aug. 7, and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 8. At these concerts the Sixth ("Pastoral") Symphony by Beethoven will be played; the Fifth Symphony by Shostakovitch; the Fantastic Symphony by Berlioz; Strauss' "Don Quixote" (Cello Soloist — Gregor Piatigorsky); Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex;" "Madona," by Villa-Lobos, and Falla's "El Amor Brujo."

An extra concert on Tuesday evening, Aug. 10, will be devoted to the music of Tchaikovsky.

The concerts of Series C will take place on Thursday evening, Aug. 12, Saturday evening, Aug. 14, and Sunday afternoon, Aug. 15, and will include Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony No. 3; Schumann's First Symphony ("Spring"); Weber's "Freischuetz" Overture; Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" (complete); the Second Symphony by Sibelius, and a major choral work to be announced.

The Festival will open with two concerts devoted to the music of Bach and Mozart, to be played on Sunday afternoon and Tuesday evening, July 18 and 20, in the Theatre-Concert Hall, each program to be repeated on Sunday afternoon and Tuesday evening in the following week. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct these concerts.

ALBANY, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
MAR 14 1948

Music

French Offers Program

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

EDWARD French, Albany piano teacher and recitalist, will present a program of music this afternoon in the auditorium of the College of Saint Rose at 2:15 o'clock. The proceeds will be devoted to the Albany Diocesan Unit of the National Catholic Music Educators' association. The program is as follows:

I
Organ Prelude in G Minor	Bach Siloti
Rondo in D Major	Schubert
Allegro in B Minor, Op. 8	Schumann
II
Sonata in E Minor (The Keltic)	MacDowell
III
Etude in C Minor	Scriabine
Prelude in C	Prokofieff
Rhapsodie in C	Dohnanyi
IV
Forest Murmurs	Liszt
Rhapsodie No. 15	Liszt

* * *

THE GLEE club of the Albany Academy for Girls will assist the choir of St. Peter's Episcopal church during the service of Evensong this afternoon, beginning at 4 o'clock, for the benefit of the choir boys' summer camp fund.

The service which will be under the direction of Clarence A. Hollister, organist and choirmaster, and director of the Academy Glee club, is held annually during Lent to help finance vacations for young choristers at Trinity camp on Lawson's lake. Miss Martha Hutchinson is president of the glee club. No tickets of admission are required and the public is invited to attend.

* * *

AUDITIONS for admission to the Berkshire Music Center student orchestra will be held this week in New York by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who are also on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood. the Music Center, which is operated by the Boston Symphony orchestra, is directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, music director of the orchestra, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. The Music Center will be held at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts from July 5 to August 15, 1948. The auditions will be held in the Chapter room of Carneige Hall, 154 West 57 street, New York on the following schedule:

String: Wednesday, March 17 at 10 a. m.

Wood winds: Thursday, March 18 at 10 a. m.

Brass: Friday, March 19 at 10 a. m.

Piano: Friday, March 19 at 11:30 a. m.

Auditions for tympani, percussion, and harp will be held backstage at Carnegie Hall on Wednesday, March 17 at 7 p. m.

Applicants must notify Thomas D. Perry, Jr., at Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Massachusetts before the auditions they wish to attend.

Oklahoma City
Oklahoma [illegible]

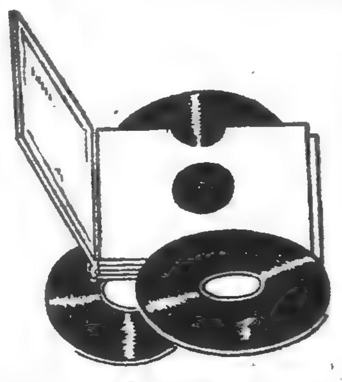
Great Album Of Beethoven

By MIKE GORMAN

New records of classical music, recently issued and about which you should know:

Beethoven: Symphoy No. 9 in D Minor. Serge Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony orchestra. The Berkshire music Festival chorus, conducted by Robert Shaw, and James Pease, bass; Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto, and David Lloyd, tenor. Victor album M/DM-1190. 16 sides.

THE answer to a record collector's prayer, an acceptable rendering of Beethoven's last, great symphony. It is technically far superior to the old Weingartner-Vienna Philharmonic job, and much sounder than recent post-Weingartner releases.



Star billing in credits for this album should go to the engineers who handled it, the first ever recorded at the Tanglewood Shed at the Berkshire Music Festival.

Precise orchestral detail comes through practically perfect. The woodwinds in the coda of the first movement, the timpani in the scherzo, the horns and trumpet fanfares in the slow movement—this is recorded fidelity at its peak.

In the chorale finale, the way the sopranos come through, clean and clear above the massed chorus, is something you have to hear several times to believe. Shaw musters some beautiful choral attacks, and the quartet of soloists is more than competent.

Dr. Koussevitzky is much less mannered than in some of his Beethoven readings, of which his December recording of the "Eroica" is the most recent example. He gets a thrilling sweep into the scherzo, and his orchestral building in the finale could be studied profitably by all conductors. The Boston Symphony reaffirms its ranking as one of the great orchestras of the present day.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH
MAR 10 1948

New Concert Records

By Thomas B. Sherman

THE newest recording of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony results from the joint efforts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Berkshire Festival Chorus, four young American soloists, Robert Shaw, the choral director, and Serge Koussevitzky, director in chief.

ROBERT SHAW . . . FURNISHES FRESHNESS.

Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of the score is generally faithful to all directions except in the scherzo where he slows down perceptibly at the trio. In less measurable matters, however, he loses the point more noticeably. There is no drive in the first two movements. Incisiveness and muscularity are sacrificed to texture. The purely orchestral part of the symphony is inferior, therefore, to the performance by the Vienna Philharmonic under Weingartner, made before the war. The choral part, however, has a fine energetic spring, great solidity, freshness and precision. Sound production is good throughout the whole recording. (RCA-Victor eight records.)

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 14 1948

STUDYING A NEW CELLO CONCERTO

Serge Koussevitzky (at piano) and Edmund Kurtz, who will be soloist with Boston Symphony in Khatchaturian work at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon.

[87]

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

RECORDS IN REVIEW

Beethoven's Ninth
A la Koussevitzky

[illegible] (1770-1827): [illegible] Opus 125. [illegible] orchestra con[illegible] Berkshire [illegible] Robert Shaw. [illegible] Pease basso; [illegible] Alberts. [illegible] eight 12-

[illegible] four new recordings of [illegible] Beethoven's Ninth [illegible] many years, [illegible] Toscanini's [illegible] recorded last [illegible] in the Berk[illegible] Misses Yeend [illegible] Lloyd and [illegible] to au[illegible] Symphony. [illegible] Chorus, [illegible] is an as[illegible] expected.

[illegible] is not ideal [illegible] Boston Sym[illegible] not have the [illegible] in the [illegible] But the [illegible] duller than [illegible] good an [illegible] hear. For [illegible] the choral movement [illegible] through at a higher level, [illegible] orchestra somewhat [illegible] than on the other sides.

[illegible] Koussevitzky gives, on the whole, [illegible] eloquent and noncontroversial reading except in the third or slow movement. Here the tempos and shadings are more Koussevitzky than Beethoven but not especially in bad taste or in disfiguring distortion.

The choral sides are remarkable for voice separations and range. The beauty of Frances Yeend's high, steady soprano is conspicuously in evidence.

Still awaited is one of the several Toscanini recordings of the Ninth, none of which is approved by the Italian maestro. In the meantime the Koussevitzky Ninth can be enjoyed. It may even survive the Toscanini if and when released.

◆

STRAVINSKY, Igor (1882): Pastorale for Violin and Wind Quartet; Russian Maiden's Song. Joseph Szigeti, Igor Stravinsky and others. Columbia Disk 72495-D 12-inch.

The Stravinsky "Pastorale," originally a wordless song, is on disks in the composer's own transcription for violin and wind quartet and also in a full orchestra arrangement by Stokowski. Here it is again for the five instruments with Joseph Szigeti taking the violin lead. Stravinsky directs and the other players are Mitchell Miller, oboe; Robert McGinnis, clarinet; Bert Gassman, English horn; Sol Schoenbach, bassoon. The contrapuntal novelty of the work, the Attic flavor of the reeds, the thin, sweet caroling of Szigeti's fiddle are nearer Stravinsky's conception than the thick Stokowski arrangement. This is a pagan evocation and it took some sophistication to turn it out.

The other side of the record is "Russian's Maiden Song," about which we have heard little. Obviously it is another wordless song, played as a violin solo by Szigeti with Stravinsky at a mushy piano. This seems to be a minor Stravinsky creation, or is it just a byproduct. He goes in for those today.

—JOHN ROSENFIELD

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 14 1948

RECORDS IN REVIEW

A new recording of the Beethoven Ninth Symphony headlines this week's new records. The first appearance on record of "The Medium" is also a phonographic event.

Beethoven Symphony No. 9. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with soloists and chorus. Victor DM-1190. For many months record buyers have been waiting for a new Victor "Ninth" with the expectation that Toscanini would at last present his conception on records. Instead, it is Dr. Koussevitzky whose version has been selected for publication. This new set is now the best edition of this great symphony to be had. The orchestral playing is first rate, the reading is firm and competent and the choral parts of the records, under the direction of Robert Shaw, are for the first time [illegible] to good advantage on disks [illegible] reproduction [illegible] without compare [illegible] By all means, if you lack [illegible] "Ninth" in your library [illegible] set down as one to [illegible] however, [illegible] mean that we are [illegible] version by Felix [illegible] let us state [illegible] set, too, [illegible]

Menotti: The Medium. Marie [illegible] cast. [illegible] This set [illegible] (available [illegible] second of [illegible] curtain raiser "The [illegible]" also by Mr. Menotti [illegible] these operas are [illegible] competent casts and [illegible] high quality, [illegible] music they [illegible] They are mod[illegible] have proven successful on the Broadway stage. This in itself is a remarkable achievement. Separated from the dramatic action, the music sounds very unoperalike; these works are continuity opera, rather than vocal display opera. Public taste towards new works of this sort is now in the formative period. With a note to the effect that the recorded performances are excellently done, we suggest that the verdict in so far as these works are concerned, must rest with each individual's personal taste.

Smetana: Piano Trio in G Minor. Louis Kaufman, violin; William van den Burg, cello; Rudolf Firkusny, piano. VOX 628. In so far as we can determine, this is a first recording of one of Smenata's very few chamber music compositions. While not quite as good as the Brahms quartet reviewed here last week, this new set is definitely better than previous Vox products and should give chamber music collectors cause for gratification. The music is well worth a run-through if you have not previously heard it played.

Khatchaturian Gayne—Sabre Dance. Oscar Levant, piano, with orchestra. Columbia 17521. Despite strong competition from many quarters, this is positively the worst new record of classical music that we have heard since the war.

Hebrew Liturgy—Cantor Berele Chagy. Stinson 614. This set is a distinct surprise. Previous issues on this label have been mechanically poor, with very loud surfaces. This set is of superior quality, plus which the surfaces are almost ghost quiet.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 14 1948

Serge Koussevitzky and Edmund Kurtz

Preparing for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance of Khatchaturian's cello concerto Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall

THE ORCHESTRAS

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

WITH the Boston Symphony and the Philadelphia Orchestra both in town, there will be nine concerts here by major orchestras this week. Today's Philharmonic-Symphony program under Leopold Stokowski at Carnegie Hall closes with the first New York performance for a ticket-buying audience of Norman Dello Joio's "Concert Music for Orchestra." This was composed at Silvermine, Norwalk, Conn., in 1944, and played at the Juilliard School in 1945. Its first performance by a major orchestra was given by the Pittsburgh Symphony under Fritz Reiner in 1946. Another unfamiliar work in today's program is Stravinsky's Pastorale for violin with oboe, English horn, clarinet and bassoon, which will be played by John Corigliano, Harold Gomberg, Michel Nazzi, Simeon Bellison and William Polisi.

Virgil Thomson's "The Seine at Night" will have its first New York performance in Mr. Stokowski's program for Thursday night and Friday afternoon. It was first played by the Kansas City Philharmonic under Efrem Kurtz on Feb. 24 and 25. It is described as "a landscape piece, a memory of Paris and its river, as viewed nocturnally from one of the bridges to the Louvre. . . . The melody that represents the river is heard in three different orchestra colorations."

In the benefit concert for the orchestra's pension fund next Saturday night under Mr. Stokowski, all the participants are contributing their services. Bidu Sayao, Jane Hobson and women members of the Westminster Choir will sing in Debussy's "La Damoiselle Elue"; Menahem Pressler will play Grieg's piano concerto. "The Seine at Night" will be repeated next Saturday afternoon. Mr. Stokowski's program for Thursday, Friday and Saturday, March 25, 26 and 27, includes Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Vaughan Williams's Tallis Fantasy, music from Act III of "Parsifal" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Russian Easter" overture.

In addition to the subscription concerts of Wednesday night and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Hunter College Auditorium on Thursday night in a Mozart-Tchaikovsky program. Wednesday night's novelty is G. Francesco Malipiero's fourth symphony, "In Memoriam," which was commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation and first played in Boston on Feb. 27 and 28. New Yorkers had an opportunity to hear it over the air on March 2. According to the composer, the four movement may be defined as: the first and third, Hope; the second and fourth, Resignation. The symphony was composed at Malipiero's house in Asolo where, he writes, "the war ended two hundred paces from its door."

On Saturday afternoon Edmund Kurtz will be the soloist in the first New York performance of Aram Khatchaturian's cello concerto, which he introduced to the United States with Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra in Boston on March 5 and 6. Mr. Kurtz writes that the concerto was composed in 1946 and first played in Moscow; it has three movements and takes about thirty minutes to play. Richard Burgin, the Boston Symphony's associate conductor, will direct Friday night's concert in Brooklyn.

For the ninth concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra's Carnegie Hall series next Tuesday night, Eugene Ormandy will conduct a Brahms program with Rudolf Serkin as the soloist. In the tenth and last concert of this series, Tuesday night, March 30, Mr. Ormandy will introduce Serge Rachmaninoff's first symphony to New York. This will have its first performance in America next Friday afternoon and Satuday night in Philadelphia in this orchestra's annual Rachmaninoff memorial program, and will be broadcast on Saturday afternoon at 5 o'clock over the CBS network. Rachmaninoff withdrew the symphony after its first performance in St. Petersburg (Leningrad) in 1897. The instrumental parts were discovered a few years ago in the Leningrad Conservatory, and the symphony had its second production in Moscow in 1945.

The Rachmaninoff Fund is sponsoring this week's concerts in Philadelphia, in which Jeanne Therrien, winner for the Boston region in the Fund's 1947-'48 competition, will be the soloist in Rachmaninoff's first piano concerto.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

MAR 15 1948

The New Recordings

By W. HARLEY RUDKIN

Both from the viewpoint of music and nostalgia, the new RCA recording of Beethoven's "Choral" Symphony (No. 9 in D Minor) by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Festival Chorus, will have more than ordinary appeal. The album (DM-1190) was the first to be made at the Tanglewood music shed in Lenox. Those who attended the 1947 Festival will not soon forget this presentation of the Ninth as one of the high spots of the Beethoven cycle. For those who want to live over the occasion, here is a prime opportunity.

* * *

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky gave the Choral Symphony a majestic reading, and the soloists and chorus under youthful Robert Shaw produced music that should have been placed at the disposal of posterity. As in the Tanglewood concert, the soloists are James Pease, Frances Yeend, David Lloyd and Eunice Alberts, with the piece de resistance the reading of Schiller's "Ode to Joy," which makes up the concluding movement.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

MAR 15 1948

Berkshire Music Auditions

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will hold auditions here this week for admission to the Berkshire Music Center's student orchestras. The auditions for strings, wood winds and brass will be held next Wednesday, Thursday and Friday mornings at 10 o'clock in the Chapter Room of Carnegie Hall; those for pianists on Friday morning at 11:30. Auditions for tympany, percussion and harp will be held Wednesday evening at 7 o'clock backstage at Carnegie Hall. Applicants must notify Thomas D. Perry jr., Symphony Hall, Boston 15, Mass., before the auditions they wish to attend. The center's session at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., runs from July 5 to Aug. 15.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
MAR 15 1948

Agreement in Boston

The U.S., at least, seemed to like what it had heard of Soviet Composer Aram Khachaturian's music: both his folktunish Gayane Ballet Suite and his flashy Masquerade Suite were among the top classical record sellers of the year. And his Sabre Dance (from Gayane) was becoming a jukebox nuisance. Last week, Bostonian symphony-goers heard his latest: the U.S. première of his new cello concerto.

Cellist Edmund Kurtz, who played it with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was full of admiration for it—and also a bit worried. Said he: "There are so many rapid passages . . . that your hand gets numb. The musician faces a number of difficult problems—and they all come at times when he is most exhausted."

When it was over last week, most listeners found its problems too difficult, and too unrewarding, for them. It was the kind of meaningless music—like his vapid violin concerto—that had sent Composer Khachaturian to the doghouse in Russia (TIME, Feb. 23). Muttered one Bostonian: "If that is a sample, maybe Stalin was right."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 18 1948

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, ~~conducting~~. Concert last night at Carnegie Hall. The program:

Symphony No. 4 ("In Memoriam")...Malipiero
Scythian Suite, "Ala and Lolli," Op. 20 Prokofieff
Symphony No. 5, Op. 47..........Shostakovich

Malipiero's "Fourth"

GIAN-FRANCESCO MALIPIERO, whose Fourth Symphony was played last night in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has long been admired, and deeply, by your scribe. It is therefore a matter of regret to report that if his acquaintance with the work of the contemporary Venetian master were limited to this peice he would wonder why Serge Koussevitzky, also a long-time musical acquaintance of Malipiero, should have bothered to commission him. The same composer's Third Symphony, written during the war, is a lively and interesting work full of fine bell sonorities. The Fourth, sub-titled "In Memoriam," essays the accents of sadness without achieving, in this writer's opinion, the plangent note or any other clearly passionate expression.

* * *

The symphony is perfectly lucid in construction, and its harmonic language (simple pan-diatonicism) presents no difficulty to the ear. The furnished program analysis, moreover, contained quotations of all the chief themes, so that I do not think much of the work's physical content escaped me. Its expressive content did, however, seem lifeless and its discourse uncommunicative. The themes did not speak, nor did the work's progress take flight. Visitors from Boston who had heard the work there tell me my view of it is shared by many. I hope further acquaintance will reveal beauties missed last night. Malipiero has not previously, to my experience, written music of so little character.

* * *

Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite," which followed it, was all color and shine. Long beloved of Koussevitzky, this work has for twenty years been a dependable show-piece of the Boston Symphony. Nobody conducts it better and no other orchestra habitually plays it half so well. And though your reviewer has always found it longer on picturesque sonorities than on tunes, the final picturesqueness, an evocation of blinding sun-rise, remains for him one of the great landscape effects of music. Mendelssohn's sea cave, Debussy's navy gardens, Wagner's inside-the-Rhine and anybody's storm are child's play compared to it. It is as powerful and as specific in suggestion as it is dazzling in sound.

* * *

The evening closed with Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony, a work that your reviewer finds tedious. Many persons in the hall seemed to be of the same mind, though there was applause, of course. This was certainly as much a tribute to the conductor and his orchestra, both being in form, as to the work. Even that, however, has its qualities. It has, for all its musical thinness, its facile and scarcely disguised quotations and its rackety climaxes, a personal gesture. Shostakovitch is no musical master, but his raucous little voice does carry.

Serge Koussevitzky

Who conducted the Boston Symphony last night in Carnegie Hall

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 18 1948

MALAPIERO WORK CONCERT FEATURE

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Orchestra in Composer's 4th Symphony Here

By OLIN DOWNES

The introduction of a new work, gripping in its sincerity and distinction of utterance, and a series of especially brilliant performances signalized the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky last night in Carnegie Hall.

The novelty, for New York, was G. F. Malapiero's Fourth symphony ("In Memoriam") composed by commission of the Koussevitzky Musical Foundation and performed for the first time by this orchestra in Boston on Feb. 4. "In Memoriam" might well be supposed to refer to Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, to whom his score is dedicated, and in whose memory the Koussevitzky Musical Foundation was instituted. But there is implicit in the music a broader interpretation of the Latin phrase.

On receiving the score, Dr. Koussevitzky wrote the composer, "Your symphony . . . infused with human anguish and great sorrow . . . will remain not only a link with the memory of my wife, but also as a recollection of the tragic years that we have lived and continue to live." With these words the essential character of this symphony is indicated.

Music a Lament

For the music is a lament, not only for a person, but a past. One could say that a younger man than Malapiero, who is 66 and one of the few important survivors of the promising but eventually disappointing group of the young "neo-Italian" composers of the turn of the century—such a younger man, with youthful strength and genius, might look ahead to the period now a-borning in the world with such agony, confusion and distress, and see in that future vistas of inspiration. But Malapiero is not such a character, or an artist of the future. Or rather, let us say, his future as an artist rests upon the integrity of his allegiance to the past. Intellectually speaking, he is an aristocrat, the modern product of an ancient culture, a man of subtle discernments and uncompromising ideals, and a supersensitive seeker after beauty.

For him the retrospect, the nostalgia and fundamental pessimism of his generation and his world order are fittingly the subject of his inspiration and his profoundly sincere and impressive lament.

The musical language in which this message is couched is highly significant. It is wholly aristocratic but the subject is in terms which have the unmistakable stamp of a modern mind and a brilliant culture. The style is so fascinating in its distinction and selectiveness that one is not entirely sure that repeated hearings of the work would confirm very high estimates, or whether its principal attraction would prove to be its stylistic appeal to the esthetic sense. Enough that after a first hearing one is eager for a second, and that this tonal language, though unexpected in certain of its characteristics sounds so distinguished and so natural.

The modernity of it is neither forced nor doctrinaire. Relations of keys and chords are not what the grammars have prepared us for; nevertheless, when they strike the ear, they are instinctively accepted. Music has gone that far since Malapiero astonished the modern music world with his orchestral work, "Pauses of Silence," produced about thirty years ago—a work which has virtually disappeared from the repertory, yet a work, one would say, which alone had prepared us for certain of the pages of the symphony heard last night. It is very personal, and wholly Latin in essence. The form is in many respects new. It seems as near to an escape from the Domination of the classic sonata form as any modern symphonist has achieved. It is the music of an explorer, yet also the music that springs from a subconscious depth of a man's nature which no conscious exploration may reveal. It is to be added that the audience was deeply impressed with this carefully wrought, but unconventional work. Its unconventianility is the fruit not of naivete, but of the highly conscious and wholly sincere art with which it is written.

Performance Is Very Good

The performance was sheer virtuosity. So much can be said, lacking preliminary perspective of the score. Two great Russian composers, who, at least in America, are not excluded by government from performance, completed the program: Prokofieff of the "Scythian Suite," and Shostakovich exemplified by his remarkable Fifth symphony. The magnificent playing would have made lesser music arresting. Prokofieff's music may be suspect, here and there, of artifice and impudences consciously planned to set the bourgeois by the ears and possibly to outdo the Stravinsky of "Sacre du printemps," which had appeared a year previous. But one of the most audacious and breath-taking pages of modern music remains the final passage of this suite—the portrayal of the pagan sunrise. The conservatives must have turned purple when first it was heard. But it could not have been much use arguing. There is genius.

With Shostakovich's Fifth symphony approached by Dr. Koussevitzky in a different style and a different emotional orientation, he has ere this worked wonders. Each of his performances last night was a peak of achievement. Shostakovich, no less than Prokofieff, was furiously applauded.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
MAR 18 1948

Music...

Boston Symphony Plays Carnegie Hall Concert

By JOHN BRIGGS

A concert like last night's by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall awakens the dreadful suspicion that to the perplexing factors which the reviewer must take into account in evaluating new music must always be added the possibility that what he takes for second-rate music may be merely an inferior performance of a first-rate work.

One is reminded of the story of Wagner's wondering why the Ninth Symphony flopped in concert, then hearing in Paris the results of three years' dogged work under Habenek and understanding that what he had been hearing was not incomprehensible music, but merely incomprehensible performances.

Similarly, though the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch is now pretty much a concert standby, last night's performance was a fresh revelation. That this was not a unique reaction may be inferred from the fact that when the final notes of the Largo died away, Carnegie Hall sounded like feeding time at the Aquarium, the sudden outburst of coughing, barking and wheezing indicating that the customers had hardly dared to breathe for fear of shattering the spell of the magicians from Boston.

It is true that the Largo of the Fifth Symphony is Shostakovitch at his best as a mature, thoughtful artist, just as the "Golden Age" polka is Shostakovitch at his worst, the musical enfant terrible engaged in the infantile sport of shocking his elders. Still one cannot avoid the suspicion that Mr. Koussevitzky has arrived at something like a definitive reading of the score as a whole, and has probably done so by systematically violating the composer's instructions, in the process directing attention toward his solid excellence and away from his occasional vulgarity and banality.

The evening's novelty was the Fourth Symphony of Gian Francesco Malipiero, which for one listener went to the opposite extreme of being genteel and dull. It was like a well-bred speaker with nothing very much to say. The theme of the final movement, according to the program-note, is derived from an Alpine church bell and in some curious way managed to paraphrase the slow movement of the Brahms Fourth. Not that that is in its disfavor; Brahms and other composers stole ideas as cheerfully as Shakespeare and Moliere. It seems to me originality is a much-overrated quality in music. The point is not where one gets his ideas, but what he does with them afterward.

The concert ended with barbaric splendors of the Prokofieff "Scythian" suite.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
MAR 18 1948

Koussevitzky In Specialties

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Koussevitzky went all out for contemporary music last night. The Boston Symphony program in Carnegie Hall included the first New York performance of Malipiero's Fourth Symphony, Prokofieff's Scythian Suite, and Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony. The audience took it all more than amicably.

The Malipiero Symphony is arrestingly simple. In reflective, introspective mood, the composer gives utterance to the hope and the sadness of the times through which he has lived. The "humiliation of the spirit" leads him to express resignation more than anything else. In stating the case simply, he writes with strength and individuality of style.

The work is in four movements. If the second and fourth are outright funereal, the first has a sinister aspect. The third is one of escape.

At no time is it easy to throw off the brooding melancholy which is expressed both harmonically and instrumentally. The music is skilfully scored and moves along with deceptive ease. Whether it probes the depths remains speculative after a first hearing.

* * *

Holds Brilliance

Prokofieff's indulgence in pagan rites holds its brilliance well over a span of 30 years. The music is still strikingly modern, definitely theatrical, and unerringly effective in its scoring. The final pages still challenge any other attempt to translate the brilliance of the rising sun into sound.

The Shostakovitch could be designated the only standard work of the evening. It held the audience engrossed last night with the beauty of its melodies and the fascination of its orchestration. The work has lasting qualities and is quite worthy to be placed among other famous "fifths."

The Bostonians were in excellent shape. They gave stunning performances of the Prokofieff and Shostakovitch works. Both of these are Koussevitzky's "specialties" and he made the most of them in his characteristic way.

[84]

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
MAR 15 1948

Agreement in Boston

The U.S., at least, seemed to like what it had heard of Soviet Composer Aram Khachaturian's music: both his folktunish Gayane Ballet Suite and his flashy Masquerade Suite were among the top classical record sellers of the year. And his Sabre Dance (from Gayane) was becoming a jukebox nuisance. Last week, Bostonian symphony-goers heard his latest: the U.S. première of his new cello concerto.

Cellist Edmund Kurtz, who played it with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was full of admiration for it—and also a bit worried. Said he: "There are so many rapid passages . . . that your hand gets numb. The musician faces a number of difficult problems—and they all come at times when he is most exhausted."

When it was over last week, most listeners found its problems too difficult, and too unrewarding, for them. It was the kind of meaningless music—like his vapid violin concerto—that had sent Composer Khachaturian to the doghouse in Russia (TIME, Feb. 23). Muttered one Bostonian: "If that is a sample, maybe Stalin was right."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 18 1948

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, [illegible] concert last night at Carnegie Hall. The program:

Symphony No. 4 ("In Memoriam")...Malipiero
Scythian Suite, "Ala and Lolli," Op. 20 Prokofieff
Symphony No. 5, Op. 47..........Shostakovich

Malipiero's "Fourth"

GIAN-FRANCESCO MALIPIERO, whose Fourth Symphony was played last night in Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has long been admired, and deeply, by your scribe. It is therefore a matter of regret to report that if his acquaintance with the work of the contemporary Venetian master were limited to this peice he would wonder why Serge Koussevitzky, also a longtime musical acquaintance of Malipiero, should have bothered to commission him. The same composer's Third Symphony, written during the war, is a lively and interesting, work full of fine bell sonorities. The Fourth, sub-titled "In Memoriam," essays the accents of sadness without achieving, in this writer's opinion, the plangent note or any other clearly passionate expression.

* * *

The symphony is perfectly lucid in construction, and its harmonic language (simple pan-diatonicism) presents no difficulty to the ear. The furnished program analysis, moreover, contained quotations of all the chief themes, so that I do not think much of the work's physical content escaped me. Its expressive content did, however, seem lifeless and its discourse uncommunicative. The themes did not speak, nor did the work's progress take flight. Visitors from Boston who had heard the work there tell me my view of it is shared by many. I hope further acquaintance will reveal beauties missed last night. Malipiero has not previously, to my experience, written music of so little character.

* * *

Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite," which followed it, was all color and shine. Long beloved of Koussevitzky, this work has for twenty years been a dependable showpiece of the Boston Symphony. Nobody conducts it better and no other orchestra habitually plays it half so well. And though your reviewer has always found it longer on picturesque sonorities than on tunes, the final picturesqueness, an evocation of blinding sun-rise, remains for him one of the great landscape effects of music. Mendelssohn's sea cave, Debussy's navy gardens, Wagner's inside-the-Rhine and anybody's storm are child's play compared to it. It is as powerful and as specific in suggestion as it is dazzling in sound.

Serge Koussevitzky

Who conducted the Boston Symphony last night in Carnegie Hall

* * *

The evening closed with Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony, a work that your reviewer finds tedious. Many persons in the hall seemed to be of the same mind, though there was applause, of course. This was certainly as much a tribute to the conductor and his orchestra, both being in form, as to the work. Even that, however, has its qualities. It has, for all its musical thinness, its facile and scarcely disguised quotations and its rackety climaxes, a personal gesture. Shostakovitch is no musical master, but his raucous little voice does carry.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 18 1948

MALAPIERO WORK CONCERT FEATURE

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Orchestra in Composer's 4th Symphony Here

By OLIN DOWNES

The introduction of a new work, gripping in its sincerity and distinction of utterance, and a series of especially brilliant performances signalized the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky last night in Carnegie Hall.

The novelty, for New York, was G. F. Malapiero's Fourth symphony ("In Memoriam") composed by commission of the Koussevitzky Musical Foundation and performed for the first time by this orchestra in Boston on Feb. 4. "In Memoriam" might well be supposed to refer to Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, to whom his score is dedicated, and in whose memory the Koussevitzky Musical Foundation was instituted. But there is implicit in the music a broader interpretation of the Latin phrase.

On receiving the score, Dr. Koussevitzky wrote the composer, "Your symphony . . . infused with human anguish and great sorrow . . . will remain not only a link with the memory of my wife, but also as a recollection of the tragic years that we have lived and continue to live." With these words the essential character of this symphony is indicated.

Music a Lament

For the music is a lament, not only for a person, but a past. One could say that a younger man than Malapiero, who is 66 and one of the few important survivors of the promising but eventually disappointing group of the young "neo-Italian" composers of the turn of the century—such a younger man, with youthful strength and genius, might look ahead to the period now a-borning in the world with such agony, confusion and distress, and see in that future vistas of inspiration. But Malapiero is not such a character, or an artist of the future. Or rather, let us say, his future as an artist rests upon the integrity of his allegiance to the past. Intellectually speaking, he is an aristocrat, the modern product of an ancient culture, a man of subtle discernments and uncompromising ideals, and a supersensitive seeker after beauty.

For him the retrospect, the nostalgia and fundamental pessimism of his generation and his world order are fittingly the subject of his inspiration and his profoundly sincere and impressive lament.

The musical language in which this message is couched is highly significant. It is wholly aristocratic but the subject is in terms which have the unmistakable stamp of a modern mind and a brilliant culture. The style is so fascinating in its distinction and selectiveness that one is not entirely sure that repeated hearings of the work would confirm very high estimates, or whether its principal attraction would prove to be its stylistic appeal to the esthetic sense. Enough that after a first hearing one is eager for a second, and that this tonal language, though unexpected in certain of its characteristics sounds so distinguished and so natural.

The modernity of it is neither forced nor doctrinaire. Relations of keys and chords are not what the grammars have prepared us for; nevertheless, when they strike the ear, they are instinctively accepted. [illegible] since Malapiero astonished the modern music world with his orchestral work, 'Pauses of Silence,' produced about thirty years ago—a work which has virtually disappeared from the repertory, yet a work, one would say, which alone had prepared us for certain of the pages of the symphony heard last night. It is very personal, and wholly Latin in essence. The form is in many respects new. It seems as near to an escape from the Domination of the classic sonata form as any modern symphonist has achieved. It is the music of an explorer, yet also the music that springs from a subconscious depth of a man's nature which no conscious exploration may reveal. It is to be added that the audience was deeply impressed with this carefully wrought, but unconventional work. Its unconventianility is the fruit not of naivete, but of the highly conscious and wholly sincere art with which it is written.

Performance Is Very Good

The performance was sheer virtuosity. So much can be said, lacking preliminary perspective of the score. Two great Russian composers, who, at least in America, are not excluded by government from performance, completed the program: Prokofieff of the "Scythian Suite," and Shostakovich exemplified by his remarkable Fifth symphony. The magnificent playing would have made lesser music arresting. Prokofieff's music may be suspect, here and there, of artifice and impudences consciously planned to set the bourgeois by the ears and possibly to outdo the Stravinsky of "Sacre du printemps," which had appeared a year previous. But one of the most audacious and breath-taking pages of modern music remains the final passage of this suite—the portrayal of the pagan sunrise. The conservatives must have turned purple when first it was heard. But it could not have been much use arguing. There is genius.

With Shostakovich's Fifth symphony approached by Dr. Koussevitzky in a different style and a different emotional orientation, he has ere this worked wonders. Each of his performances last night was a peak of achievement. Shostakovich, no less than Prokofieff, was furiously applauded.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
MAR 18 1948

Music . . .

Boston Symphony Plays Carnegie Hall Concert

By JOHN BRIGGS

A concert like last night's by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall awakens the dreadful suspicion that to the perplexing factors which the reviewer must take into account in evaluating new music must always be added the possibility that what he takes for second-rate music may be merely an inferior performance of a first-rate work.

One is reminded of the story of Wagner's wondering why the Ninth Symphony flopped in concert, then hearing in Paris the results of three years' dogged work under Habenek and understanding that what he had been hearing was not incomprehensible music, but merely incomprehensible performances.

Similarly, though the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch is now pretty much a concert standby, last night's performance was a fresh revelation. That this was not a unique reaction may be inferred from the fact that when the final notes of the Largo died away, Carnegie Hall sounded like feeding time at the Aquarium, the sudden outburst of coughing, barking and wheezing indicating that the customers had hardly dared to breathe for fear of shattering the spell of the magicians from Boston.

It is true that the Largo of the Fifth Symphony is Shostakovitch at his best as a mature, thoughtful artist, just as the "Golden Age" polka is Shostakovitch at his worst, the musical enfant terrible engaged in the infantile sport of shocking his elders. Still one cannot avoid the suspicion that Mr. Koussevitzky has arrived at something like a definitive reading of the score as a whole, and has probably done so by systematically violating the composer's instructions, in the process directing attention toward his solid excellence and away from his occasional vulgarity and banality.

The evening's novelty was the Fourth Symphony of Gian Francesco Malipiero, which for one listener went to the opposite extreme of being genteel and dull. It was like a well-bred speaker with nothing very much to say. The theme of the final movement, according to the program-note, is derived from an Alpine church bell and in some curious way managed to paraphrase the slow movement of the Brahms Fourth. Not that that is in its disfavor; Brahms and other composers stole ideas as cheerfully as Shakespeare and Moliere. It seems to me originality is a much-overrated quality in music. The point is not where one gets his ideas, but what he does with them afterward.

The concert ended with barbaric splendors of the Prokofieff "Scythian" suite.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
MAR 18 1948

Koussevitzky In Specialties

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Koussevitzky went all out for contemporary music last night. The Boston Symphony program in Carnegie Hall included the first New York performance of Malipiero's Fourth Symphony, Prokofieff's Scythian Suite, and Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony. The audience took it all more than amicably.

The Malipiero Symphony is arrestingly simple. In reflective, introspective mood, the composer gives utterance to the hope and the sadness of the times through which he has lived. The "humiliation of the spirit" leads him to express resignation more than anything else. In stating the case simply, he writes with strength and individuality of style.

The work is in four movements. If the second and fourth are outright funereal, the first has a sinister aspect. The third is one of escape.

At no time is it easy to throw off the brooding melancholy which is expressed both harmonically and instrumentally. The music is skilfully scored and moves along with deceptive ease. Whether it probes the depths remains speculative after a first hearing.

* * *

Holds Brilliance

Prokofieff's indulgence in pagan rites holds its brilliance well over a span of 30 years. The music is still strikingly modern, definitely theatrical, and unerringly effective in its scoring. The final pages still challenge any other attempt to translate the brilliance of the rising sun into sound.

The Shostakovitch could be designated the only standard work of the evening. It held the audience engrossed last night with the beauty of its melodies and the fascination of its orchestration. The work has lasting qualities and is quite worthy to be placed among other famous "fifths."

The Bostonians were in excellent shape. They gave stunning performances of the Prokofieff and Shostakovitch works. Both of these are Koussevitzky's "specialties" and he made the most of them in his characteristic way.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 19 1948

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor [illegible] Symphony No. 4 [illegible] Malipiero [illegible] No. [illegible] 47

[illegible]iero's "Fourth"

[illegible] MALIPIERO'S Fourth Symphony [illegible] in [illegible] the Boston Symphony [illegible] long been ad- [illegible] scribe. It [illegible] of regret to [illegible] contemporary [illegible] to [illegible] wonder why [illegible] a long- [illegible] of Mal- [illegible] to [illegible] The same composer's Third Symphony, written [illegible] the war, is a lively and interesting work full of fine bell sonorities. The Fourth, sub-titled "In Memoriam," essays the accents of sadness without achieving, in this writer's opinion, the plangent note or any other clearly passionate expression.

The symphony is perfectly lucid in construction, and its harmonic language (simple pan-diatonicism) presents no dificulty to the ear. The furnished program analysis, moreover, contained quotations of all the chief themes, so that I do not think much of the work's physical content escaped me. Its expressive content did, however, seem lifeless and its discourse uncommunicative. The themes did not speak, nor did the work's progress take flight. Visitors from Boston who had heard the work there tell me my view of it is shared by many. I hope further acquaintance will reveal beauties missed Wednesday night. Malipiero has not previously, to my experience, written music of so little character.

* * *

Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite," which followed it, was all color and shine. Long beloved of Koussevitzky, this work has for twenty years been a dependable show-piece of the Boston Symphony. Nobody conducts it better and no other orchestra habitually plays it half so well. And though your reviewer has always found it longer on picturesque sonorities than on tunes, the final picturesqueness, an evocation of blinding sun-rise, remains for him one of the great landscape effects of music. Mendelssohn's sea cave, Debussy's rainy gardens, Wagner's inside-the-Rhine and anybody's storm are child's play compared to it. It is as powerful and as specific in suggestion as it is dazzling in sound.

* * *

The evening closed with Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony, a work that your reviewer finds tedious. Many persons in the hall seemed to be of the same mind, though there was applause, of course.

Serge Koussevitzky

Who conducted the Boston Symphony Wednesday night in Carnegie Hall

This was certainly as much a tribute to the conductor and his orchestra, both being in form, as to the work. Even that, however, has its qualities. It has, for all its musical thinness, its facile and scarcely disguised quotations and its rackety climaxes, a personal gesture. Shostakovitch is no musical master, but his raucous little voice does carry.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM
MAR 19 1948

Music in America:

Kurtz, Koussevitzky –And Khachaturian

The KKK is about to invade New York. Tomorrow afternoon they are coming down from Boston to Carnegie Hall. But instead of flaming crosses and bed sheets they are bringing a cello, a baton and a new concerto.

For this KKK is a musical one. The initials stand for cellist Edmund Kurtz, conductor Serge Koussevitzky and Soviet composer Aram Khachaturian. The occasion is the local premiere of Khachaturian's Cello Concerto, by Dr. Koussevitzky and the visiting Boston Symphony, with Kurtz as soloist. Due to the fact that this is the first new work of Khachaturian to be heard in this country since his compositions were banned in Russia, an added interest is attached to the performance here.

Cellist Kurtz felt from the first time he saw the music that it would make an immediate appeal to the pubic because, as has been said before, "Khachaturian is the Gershwin of Russia."

"Whereas the Milhaud Concerto, which I introduced last year in New York, needs more than one hearing before being completely understood, the Khachaturian, because it is basically organic music, evokes an instantaneous response," Kurtz said, adding that the music drives all the time and never relaxes.

"The third movement," he continued, "has a certain resemblance to the famous Saber Dance of the Gaynne Suite, and the finale is very effective because of the terrific rhythm, dynamics and a greatly accelerated tempo. The entire three-movement work is exceptionally well written for the cello, as Khachaturian himself is a cellist and consequently writes easily for the instrument."

That Kurtz's enthusiasm was justified was shown on March 5, when he played the Concerto for the first time in Boston. The success was so considerable that a special performance of the work was arranged for Smith College, prior to its New York premiere. Kurtz, who acquired the American rights to the Concerto after its Moscow premiere, also edited the work for publication here by the Leeds Music Co.

Kurtz, who plays a very valuable and much-publicized Stradivarius cello, told of an amusing experience he had when he was driving from his home in Greenwich to Boston for the first performance of the Khachaturian Concerto. He stopped for gas at his local dealer, who looked in the car and exclaimed: "Gosh, Mr. Kurtz, is that THE cello?" When Kurtz assured him that it was, he saw to his horror that he had interested not only the attendant but also about a dozen bystanders, who gathered around and wanted to know if they could touch the fabulous instrument.

This brought up the question as to whether Kurtz thought it was essential for a cellist to play either a Strad or an instrument made by another of the old masters. "Not at all," was the reply. "If a person plays an old fiddle it doesn't mean a thing unless it is a good one. I also have a modern American cello which I enjoy very much and consider vastly superior to a lot of old cellos I have heard."

Edmund Kurtz, cellist, who will appear with the Boston Symphony tomorrow afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Charles Muench as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra devotes most of his program of yesterday afternoon and tomorrow night to Debussy's "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian." This is an austere and spiritual work which is an evocation of Christian martyrdom, death and ressurrection, and hence appropriate to this season. As always in Holy Week, the afternoon concert is shifted back to Thursday.

To him who knows best the sensuous side of Debussy, "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," must remain peculiar, even baffling, until one grows into the music and comprehends its essentially religious purpose. In 1936 and 1939, I thought this was music arid and bleak. Yesterday the impression was totally different—but not because the music itself was changed, apart from another conductor's interpretive approach.

Written as an incidental score for a mystery play by the Italian poet D'Annunzio, "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian" is a symbolic parallel in tone of the story of Sebastian, the favorite archer of the Roman Emperor Diocletian. For professing Christian faith. Sebastian was riddled with the arrows of his own men, only to enter Heaven whole of body and received as a saint.

Play and music are of 1911, a time of decadence. Yet the Pagan and Christian elements find their true counterpart in Debussy's complex musical style: his orchestral colors, his subtle rhythms, his alternately flowing and ejaculatory choral writing, and his quasi-ecclesiastical turns of melody. Thus understood, the score is fascinating if not gripping, powerful if not dramatic, and illuminating if not of the main body of living art. It is then seen as a pseudo-archaic and graceful, if synthesized, example of what Debussy (and others) have so aptly termed "decorative" art.

Yet as Mr. Muench presents it, there are differences which make for increased tension. The main one is the interpolation of a Narrator's part, prepared by Mr. Muench, in which Raymond Gerome, speaking delightfully musical French, takes what is virtually the role of Sebastian. This brings a striking personal quality to what is otherwise an impersonal work.

Another difference is that there are two soprano soloists instead of one. They are taken by Adele Addison and Nancy Trickey, whose contrasting and yet beautifully balanced young voices, and superb singing, lend a remarkably emotional effect. This time the two condemned brothers are personified by two soloists instead of two voices from the chorus: contraltos Dorothy Cornish and Eunice Alberts, also excellent. The chorus, which does very well, is the Cecilia Society, prepared by Victor Manusevitch.

Mr. Muench reads the score with intense passion and vigor, which has its own transforming and very individual effect. The program begins with Schubert's Fifth Symphony, done with a deliciously light touch.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 19 1948

The New Records

Mozart's G Minor Symphony by Reiner and Koussevitzky's 'Parsifal' Album.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

Those who thought they had a fair estimate of the conducting abilities of Fritz Reiner will have to revise their opinion somewhat in consequence of his new recording of Mozart's G minor symphony. Made for Columbia with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, it is a remarkable testimonial to the efficiency of the work Reiner has done with that orchestra.

That much might have been anticipated, but it is somewhat more surprising to hear from his sometimes impatient hand a reading of a simple work which respects its character so completely as this does. The treatment is sophisticated in a desirable usage of that word: every detail of the score is audible, not as virtuoso display, but as a part of a unified conception. Even the slow movement, which can be distorted by a tempo a bit fast or slow flows at a natural pace, graced by meticulous treatment of the clipped rhythmic pattern. There are some sections of the first movement which bear a little heavily on the low strings, but the menuetto, and especially the finale, are all one might ask.

Columbia has been remarkably successful with its reproduction, too, for there is air space around the sound, without suggestion of echo. Apparently this is considered a triumph of sorts, for its makers have utilized it for their first release of a classic work on Vinylite. The stock is black and slightly flexible; my copy is quite good so far as quietness is concerner, with the reservation that seems to be standard for Vinylite—the occasional clicks are that much more prominent than they would be on noisier shellac. (Columbia album 727.)

Koussevitzky's 'Parsifal.'

There are two possible viewpoints about the Koussevitzky treatment of the "Prelude" and "Good Friday" music from "Parsifal" which Victor has just released—to be impressed because it is better than one anticipated, or to be disappointed because it is not as good as it could be. The judgment, thus, turns on whether one evaluates the results in terms of Koussevitzky or Wagner; and choosing the latter as more important, one can only regret that Toscanini was not nominated for this task.

What is lacking in Koussevitzky's direction of the Boston Symphony is certainly nothing that has to do with the playing of the orchestra, which is superb, or even with musicianly integrity, for the score is respected. It is more to be described as atmosphere, the management of small gradations of tone and emphasis which make the difference between competence and poetry. The prelude, for example, is remarkably controlled, but it adds, finally, little to one's knowledge or feeling about this music. Similarly, the "Good Friday" music, which comes off somewhat better because there is more dynamic pattern and contrast in the music itself. However, one never has the feeling as one does in the Furtwaengler recording, or Toscanini's concert hall performances, that the conductor is conscious of the text to which the music is a background. It is a mere collection of sensuous sounds, without any particular mood or meaning. The recording is standard Symphony Hall quality, the surfaces noisier than necessary.

The Lighter Side.

No matter how many new dance bands the recording companies unearth, the old ones still seem to do the best work. As for example, Jimmy Dorsey, who has turned out a couple of sides in his old style for M.-G.-M.: "My Guitar" and "You Turned the Tables on Me." This may not be "progressive jazz" in the Kenton manner, but it is thoroughly listenable, well arranged and brilliantly played. Bill Lawrence is the vocalist on the first, Carol Scott on the second ("revival") side. The recording is excellent. (M.-G.-M. 10162).

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Eleazar De Carvalho, continuing his visit as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave first performance to scores by two of his Brazilian countrymen at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. They were a Prologue and Fugue by Camargo Guarnieri, and the Symphonic Poem "Madona" by Heitor Villa-Lobos. The other numbers were the Suite from "Love, the Sorcerer" by Manuel de Falla, and the "New World" Symphony of Dvorak.

Guarnieri's work no doubt had good intentions, but his fugal writing for orchestra is broken up into bits and snatches to the extent that I couldn't even count all the entrances of the theme. The Prologue is a loud, brassy affair, no more distinctive of material or treatment than the Fugue, and certainly no more sensuous or appealing. The composer was present and bowed from his seat.

Villa-Lobos dedicated his Symphonic Poem to the late Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, in whose memory the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, which commissioned the piece, was established. "Madona" may not prove to be a great masterpiece, but at least it sounds like music, with alluring turns and a rich, colorful use of the orchestra.

The lovely interludes from "Love, the Sorcerer," by turn amorous and frenetic, rhythmically subtle and aggressive, and of a grace which characterized Spanish music of a happier day, were welcome indeed. They furnished high color and warmth on a day of dreary, gray and foul New England weather.

What is more they were admirably played, for once again the Boston Symphony put its best foot forward for the talented young guest conductor. Ten years from now Mr. De Carvalho will probably conduct with more personal distinction and more delicate nuances than he did yesterday. All the same, his readings did credit to him for they were musicianly and in good style, with none of the strainings after effect or the tonal whoop-'er-up that are apt to creep into the work of a young but not completely mature conducting talent.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THE COMMONWEAL
NEW YORK, N.Y
3/19/48

New York, N. Y.

TO the Editors: It was with curiosity and pleasure that I read C. G. Paulding's editorial on the condemnation by the Central Committee of the Communist Party, of the seven Soviet composers, for, despite the fact that several journalists published various commentaries on this subject, Mr. Paulding's seems to me the most unusal and the most courageous. I would like, however, to bring up a few points which he did not mention.

To start with, I must admit that I am always struck by a form of modern hypocrisy—the fact that people are far more disturbed by questions concerning esthetics, in this case an act against the artist's freedom, than they are by the enslavement of an entire people under a political doctrine, and the atrocious consequences of that enslavement.

As to the problem of the relationship of art to the Communist Party, the absurdity here is that, really for the first time in history, the State has taken upon itself to interfere with the integrity of free creation, by claiming that it can solve the greatest problem in art—the very essence of artistic creation. Up till now the artist has always been a prey to uncertainty as to the truth of the path he follows—remaining sole arbiter of this truth and sole judge. But now the "submission" of the creative will, required of the artist by the Communist Party, frees him of all inner tragedy and struggle, as it does of all possible doubt. One asks oneself, however, how it can be possible for the State to be certain of a path—and through what secret process—which the creator himself seeks in trial and error, sometimes finds, but along which he travels always with uncertain step? This aspect of the matter naturally is broad "farce" since the secret of this knowledge exists nowhere in the world.

The real conflict is between Marxism and the essential spirit of music. Parenthetically we may remark that neither Marx nor Lenin ever imagined that art could be arrived at through dogmatic process. For both these men, the art of the future was a perspective—one of many—in a society freed of classes, but it would be created freely by free men. Until the coming of that future society, they admitted the heritage of the past as a necessity and, for them, such terms as "bourgeois" music, etc., did not exist at all.

To return to the present Soviet attitude: nowhere so much as in music is the incompatibility between Marxism and art so visible. To demonstrate this fact it is sufficient to establish two concepts of time: existence in times of Marxism, which is essentially rational; and existence in musical time, which is irrational and, precisely because irrational, a liberation from the material world. Actually the Marxist conception of music consists in emptying music of the irrational, that is to say emptying it of its essential spirit.

Marxism by its very essence is a-musical. The concept of music does not come into contact with Marxism in any of its dimensions. Thus it will always be stupidity, and nothing else, to speak of Marxist rhythm, or Marxist melody, or Marxist harmony; such terms can only be used, on the one hand, for purposes of demagogy, or, on the other, to express complete servility.

To the extent that Marxism now is attempting to penetrate to the heart of the process by which music is created, Marxism threatens the very existence of music.

All judgments concerning music which are made from the Marxist point of view will always remain at the outer edge of music, at the periphery. They are incapable of breaking out of the category of banal superficialities, since they are bound to deal with such matters as taste or sensation, giving preference to such and such a type of melody, or to simplified rhythmical formulas—proposed as coming from the people. These matters will always remain foreign to true musical creation, which always consists in free research of form and sound. Thus it is that the Communists will always be able to bring easy charges of "formalistic heresy" against any one they choose of Bach's fugues, or against a Beethoven quattuor, or against any authentic work of the music that is to come.

ARTHUR LOURIÉ.

Arthur Lourié's latest composition, "De Ordinatione Angelorum," was performed by the Schola Cantorum of New York early this year. Last year the Berkshire Festival produced his cantata, "The Birth of Beauty." His last symphonic work, "A Feast During the Plague," was performed by the ~~Boston Symphony O~~rchestra under Koussevitzky. Of Russian origin, Arthur Lourié is an American citizen and resides in New York.

The Editors.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 20 1948

Mr. Burgin Does Good Job At Helm of Boston Symphony

By JOHN BALL JR.

It must be a source of great personal gratification for a musician to mount the podium in front of an instrument as potent as the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For many years Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony, has also been listed as the associate conductor. For the last two important engagements of the orchestra here in Brooklyn, Mr. Burgin has been in command. Insofar as this listener is concerned, he is welcome to continue conducting here whenever he chooses to do so.

At the Academy of Music last night the Boston Orchestra, under Mr. Burgin's baton, played the fourth concert in its current Winter series presented by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The program featured the Beethoven second symphony, Maurice Ravel's familiar "Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2" and the not so often performed second symphony of Tchaikovsky, "Little Russian."

Not His Best

The Beethoven second is not the most exciting score to come from this master's pen. It stands midway between the youthful exhuberance of the first and the heaven-storming impact of the third, "the Eroica." The thus uncomfortably placed second symphony partakes of little of the youthful ardor of the first and none of the mighty power of the third. At times, in contrast to these companions, it seems to plod. Last night's performance did not achieve what Beethoven himself failed to accomplish. It is, of course, a great work and a good one, but not as great or as good as the third, fifth, sixth and ninth. Mr. Burgin's reading was a competent one and the one or two orchestral slips, notably the beat early entrance of one of the second violins a few bars before the end of the second movement, were in no wis his responsibility.

Charity and Understanding

With the Ravel work, things picked up immediately. This iridescent score makes good listening at any time. Mr. Burgin projected it with exceptional clarity and understanding.

The Tchaikovsky score also received a highly listenable reading. Like the Beethoven symphony, this is not Tchaikovsky's best by a long margin. Since no one appears to have informed Mr. Burgin of that fact ~~he went~~ right ahead and played it as if it were—with the result that the music sounded deceptively good. For this achievement he can take a long low bow.

He Gets Results

It is surprising how a public estimate of a conductor can depend on how colorful a personality he is on the podium. Mr. Stokowski's "beautiful hands" are mentioned more often than his musicianship, certainly to his discomfort. Mr. Burgin is so circumspect before the orchestra as to be almost self-effacing. This, however, is a false calm. Although he does not gyrate, jump up and down, or flail the air with his gestures, he get results and that is what counts. Let there be no mistake about it, this gentleman is an excellent conductor and one who, we felt, had the full respect of the orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky, the musical director of the orchestra, is of course a celebrated virtuoso of the baton. It is always a pleasure to hear him for as long as he cares to remain in command of the orchestra. When the time comes that he feels he wishes to relinquish this responsibility for other activities, then certainly Mr. Burgin deserves long and careful consideration for the exacting assignment of replacing so distinguished and brilliant a predecessor.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Once again the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are back on a high level of interest and merit. This week at Symphony Hall Serge Koussevitzky pairs two remarkable scores: one the Fourth Symphony of Beethoven, the other Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex." The assisting artists for the latter are Carol Brice Negro mezzo-soprano; David Lloyd tenor; James Pease, baritone; Wesley Addy, Speaker, and the Harvard Glee Club, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth.

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony like its fellows of even number, is one of the "valleys" in Bethoven's symphonic achievement, compared to the towering peaks of the Third, Fifth, Seventh and Ninth Symphonies. Yet it has its own virtues of superb construction, thematic salience and over-all distinction. It had not been played at these concerts in a little more than five years Yesterday's performance was a model of style, clarity and orchestral prowess. The audience and Mr. Koussevitzky were pleased, and he signalled the orchestra to rise. Yet this was of but secondary interest compared to "Oedipus Rex."

If it were not for the fact that, here and there, Stravinsky's passion for the musical pattern gets the upper hand of his expressive sense, "Oedipus Rex" would be a modern masterpiece. As it stands, it is music of exceptional color and power; on the neurotic side, to be sure, but a unique evocation of a Greek classic tragedy.

Since this setting of "Oedipus Rex" is music by a neo-classic Slav, on a text written by the French Cocteau, translated into Latin, the work can hardly be called "pure" in the sense that it evokes truly and unmistakably any one culture.

No matter. What counts is that Stravinsky, after some 2000 years, has written music which does express the magnitude, the fatefulness and the horror of the Oedipus drama. Its best pages are some of the finest written in the first third of the 20th Century and their expressive dissonance, their formal logic and sheer dramatic force are unforgettable.

Of course there are lesser pages, like the facile syncopations wherein is told the death of Jocasta, and ome of the vocal tenor and bar places are few, a

"Oedipus Rex"
sky's greatest w
These performa
[illegible]
[illegible] Mr. Kou orchestra out singers Mr. Pease
[illegible]
Addy [illegible]
the Harvard
[illegible]

DULUTH, MINN
NEWS TRIBUNE

MAR 21 1948

IN TANGLEWOOD: BERKshire music center ~~opens July~~ 5 . . . ~~In Edinburgh~~: Second International Festival of Music and Drama starts Aug. 22. . . In Washington: Librarian of Congress Luther H. Evans announces the Bollingen annual prize for the best book of poetry. . . . In New Haven: Yale university library opens show of manuscripts, books, letters and photos honoring Stephen Vincent Benet. . . In Olean, N. Y.: Indianapolis symphony conducted this week by Fabien Sevitzky, celebrating the 25th anniversary of his arrival in America.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES

MAR [illegible] 948

Beethoven: Symphony No. 9, D Minor, Opus 125; ~~Boston Symphony Orchestra~~, Serge Koussevitzky, ~~conduct~~ing; Berkshire Music Festival Chorus, Robert Shaw, director; Frances Yeend, Eunice Alberts, David Lloyd, James Pease, soloists (Victor DM 1190, eight 12-inch records.) There may be no such thing as a final and definitive interpretation of the Ninth, but this one is a beauty. Though Koussevitzky's tempi are deliberate, they result in wonderful orchestral clarity and glowing tone. Robert Shaw's chorus gives as precise and assured account of the choral parts as one ever hears and the soloists are well above average.

Rarely
The 'St.

Debussy's music to dom of "St. Sebas drama by Gabriele possibly his most d understand. For t for several other emanating from strange and often sic is seldom perfo time Koussevitzky Christmastime, 193
only one soloist a
Even so he got a g work into the conc singularly unfortun
when the hall was young people home
A long work of su dramatic obscurity choice for an aud whom were atten
concert.
The Holy Week c
Charles Muench w complete score, are propriate, even tho
Catholic Church
Paris made some o
first stage producti
There was an ind from the compose but many Catholi
diently stayed away
fal" is considered so able for Holy Week be logical objection tian?"
In addition to ment of vocal solo will employ a nar will be taken by R a talented Frenc recent performan
"Jeanne d'Arc a admirable. In spit nature and rather of D'Annunzio's rator's role shou assistance to the li be recalled that writing an opera, b sic, and he set on of the complete d

TWO PREMIERE

Debussy was not stage premieres o
Besides the squ
Church, the deat
Minister of Wa dress rehearsal fr
liant affair pla
first performance
The stage direct chorus in groupi with the painte eye to effect. T
basses, tenors an all mixed up, so not even see the Caplet, and few support on thei
Ida Rubinstein,
Saint. did not e
vere critical stri
A stage produ
Boston Opera H
1912, was appare astrous. The wo considerably cut, of all unlikely p
sel and Gretel."
quoting Philip some length: " word of explanat book and not e scenes. There w gestion of an al
there was the si tos, scantily dre to a cross. Ther of angels provi
"Later a wom
ing about a dim finally endeavou personation of
'Y.' Female cho encourage her titude by singi larged the mar formed by a
that this martyr sic—according son's biography was Theresa C
Hale's not bein sonator of the scene unfortun
and to the gre prehensible. T arrows has insp

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THE COMMONWEAL
NEW YORK, N.Y
3/19/48

New York, N. Y.

TO the Editors: It was with curiosity and pleasure that I read C. G. Paulding's editorial on the condemnation by the Central Committee of the Communist Party, of the seven Soviet composers, for, despite the fact that several journalists published various commentaries on this subject, Mr. Paulding's seems to me the most unusal and the most courageous. I would like, however, to bring up a few points which he did not mention.

To start with, I must admit that I am always struck by a form of modern hypocrisy—the fact that people are far more disturbed by questions concerning esthetics, in this case an act against the artist's freedom, than they are by the enslavement of an entire people under a political doctrine, and the atrocious consequences of that enslavement.

As to the problem of the relationship of art to the Communist Party, the absurdity here is that, really for the first time in history, the State has taken upon itself to interfere with the integrity of free creation, by claiming that it can solve the greatest problem in art—the very essence of artistic creation. Up till now the artist has always been a prey to uncertainty as to the truth of the path he follows—remaining sole arbiter of this truth and sole judge. But now the "submission" of the creative will, required of the artist by the Communist Party, frees him of all inner tragedy and struggle, as it does of all possible doubt. One asks oneself, however, how it can be possible for the State to be certain of a path—and through what secret process—which the creator himself seeks in trial and error, sometimes finds, but along which he travels always with uncertain step? This aspect of the matter naturally is broad "farce" since the secret of this knowledge exists nowhere in the world.

The real conflict is between Marxism and the essential spirit of music. Parenthetically we may remark that neither Marx nor Lenin ever imagined that art could be arrived at through dogmatic process. For both these men, the art of the future was a perspective—one of many—in a society freed of classes, but it would be created freely by free men. Until the coming of that future society, they admitted the heritage of the past as a necessity and, for them, such terms as "bourgeois" music, etc., did not exist at all.

To return to the present Soviet attitude: nowhere so much as in music is the incompatibility between Marxism and art so visible. To demonstrate this fact it is sufficient to establish two concepts of time: existence in times of Marxism, which is essentially rational; and existence in musical time, which is irrational and, precisely because irrational, a liberation from the material world. Actually the Marxist conception of music consists in emptying music of the irrational, that is to say emptying it of its essential spirit.

Marxism by its very essence is a-musical. The concept of music does not come into contact with Marxism in any of its dimensions. Thus it will always be stupidity, and nothing else, to speak of Marxist rhythm, or Marxist melody, or Marxist harmony; such terms can only be used, on the one hand, for purposes of demagogy, or, on the other, to express complete servility.

To the extent that Marxism now is attempting to penetrate to the heart of the process by which music is created, Marxism threatens the very existence of music.

All judgments concerning music which are made from the Marxist point of view will always remain at the outer edge of music, at the periphery. They are incapable of breaking out of the category of banal superficialities, since they are bound to deal with such matters as taste or sensation, giving preference to such and such a type of melody, or to simplified rhythmical formulas—proposed as coming from the people. These matters will always remain foreign to true musical creation, which always consists in free research of form and sound. Thus it is that the Communists will always be able to bring easy charges of "formalistic heresy" against any one they choose of Bach's fugues, or against a Beethoven quattuor, or against any authentic work of the music that is to come.

ARTHUR LOURIÉ.

Arthur Lourié's latest composition, "De Ordinatione Angelorum," was performed by the Schola Cantorum of New York early this year. Last year the Berkshire Festival produced his cantata, "The Birth of Beauty." His last symphonic work, "A Feast During the Plague," was performed by the ~~Boston Symphony O~~rchestra under Koussevitsky. Of Russian origin, Arthur Lourié is an American citizen and resides in New York.

The Editors.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

MAR 20 1948

Mr. Burgin Does Good Job At Helm of Boston Symphony

By JOHN BALL JR.

It must be a source of great personal gratification for a musician to mount the podium in front of an instrument as potent as the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For many years Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony, has also been listed as the associate conductor. For the last two important engagements of the orchestra here in Brooklyn, Mr. Burgin has been in command. Insofar as this listener is concerned, he is welcome to continue conducting here whenever he chooses to do so.

At the Academy of Music last night the Boston Orchestra, under Mr. Burgin's baton, played the fourth concert in its current Winter series presented by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The program featured the Beethoven second symphony, Maurice Ravel's familiar "Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2" and the not so often performed second symphony of Tchaikovsky, "Little Russian."

Not His Best

The Beethoven second is not the most exciting score to come from this master's pen. It stands midway between the youthful exhuberance of the first and the heaven-storming impact of the third, "the Eroica." The thus uncomfortably placed second symphony partakes of little of the youthful ardor of the first and none of the mighty power of the third. At times, in contrast to these companions, it seems to plod. Last night's performance did not achieve what Beethoven himself failed to accomplish. It is, of course, a great work and a good one, but not as great or as good as the third, fifth, sixth and ninth. Mr. Burgin's reading was a competent one and the one or two orchestral slips, notably the beat early entrance of one of the second violins a few bars before the end of the second movement, were in no wis his responsibility.

Charity and Understanding

With the Ravel work, things picked up immediately. This iridescent score makes good listening at any time. Mr. Burgin projected it with exceptional clarity and understanding.

The Tchaikovsky score also received a highly listenable reading. Like the Beethoven symphony, this is not Tchaikovsky's best by a long margin. Since no one appears to have informed Mr. Burgin of that ~~fact he went r~~ight ahead and played it as if it were—with the result that the music sounded deceptively good. For this achievement he can take a long low bow.

He Gets Results

It is surprising how a public estimate of a conductor can depend on how colorful a personality he is on the podium. Mr. Stokowski's "beautiful hands" are mentioned more often than his musicianship, certainly to his discomfort. Mr. Burgin is so circumspect before the orchestra as to be almost self-effacing. This, however, is a false calm. Although he does not gyrate, jump up and down, or flail the air with his gestures, he get results and that is what counts. Let there be no mistake about it, this gentleman is an excellent conductor and one who, we felt, had the full respect of the orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky, the musical director of the orchestra, is of course a celebrated virtuoso of the baton. It is always a pleasure to hear him for as long as he cares to remain in command of the orchestra. When the time comes that he feels he wishes to relinquish this responsibility for other activities, then certainly Mr. Burgin deserves long and careful consideration for the exacting assignment of replacing so distinguished and brilliant a predecessor.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Once again the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are back on a high level of interest and merit. This week at Symphony Hall Serge Koussevitzky pairs two remarkable scores: one the Fourth Symphony of Beethoven, the other Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex." The assisting artists for the latter are Carol Brice, Negro mezzo-soprano; David Lloyd, tenor; James Pease, baritone; Wesley Addy, Speaker, and the Harvard Glee Club, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth.

Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, like its fellows of even number, is one of the "valleys" in Bethoven's symphonic achievement, compared to the towering peaks of the Third, Fifth, Seventh and Ninth Symphonies. Yet it has its own virtues of superb construction, thematic salience and over-all distinction. It had not been played at these concerts in a little more than five years. Yesterday's performance was a model of style, clarity and orchestral prowess. The audience and Mr. Koussevitzky were pleased, and he signalled the orchestra to rise. Yet this was of but secondary interest compared to "Oedipus Rex."

If it were not for the fact that, here and there, Stravinsky's passion for the musical pattern gets the upper hand of his expressive sense, "Oedipus Rex" would be a modern masterpiece. As it stands, it is music of exceptional color and power; on the neurotic side, to be sure, but a unique evocation of a Greek classic tragedy.

Since this setting of "Oedipus Rex" is music by a neo-classic Slav, on a text written by the French Cocteau, translated into Latin, the work can hardly be called "pure" in the sense that it evokes truly and unmistakably any one culture.

No matter. What counts is that Stravinsky, after some 2000 years, has written music which does express the magnitude, the fatefulness and the horror of the Oedipus drama. Its best pages are some of the finest written in the first third of the 20th Century and their expressive dissonance, their formal logic and sheer dramatic force are unforgettable.

Of course there are lesser pages, like the facile syncopations wherein is told the death of Jocasta, and some of the vocal tenor and baritone places are few,
"Oedipus Rex" is sky's greatest wo

These performan third set in Boston
terday Mr. Kous orchestra outdid t singers Mr. Pease
most resonant an Addy spoke his the Harvard ch best.

DULUTH, MINN
NEWS TRIBUNE

MAR 21 1948

IN TANGLEWOOD: BERKshire music center ~~opens July~~ 5 . . . ~~In Edinburgh~~: Second International Festival of Music and Drama starts Aug. 22. . . In Washington: Librarian of Congress Luther H. Evans announces the Bollingen annual prize for the best book of poetry. . . . In New Haven: Yale university library opens show of manuscripts, books, letters and photos honoring Stephen Vincent Benet. . . In Olean, N. Y.: Indianapolis symphony conducted this week by Fabien Sevitzky, celebrating the 25th anniversary of his arrival in America.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES

MAR 21 1948

Beethoven: Symphony No. 9, D Minor, Opus 125; ~~Boston Sym~~phony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, ~~conduct~~ing; Berkshire Music Festival Chorus, Robert Shaw, director; Frances Yeend, Eunice Alberts, David Lloyd, James Pease, soloists (Victor DM 1190, eight 12-inch records.) There may be no such thing as a final and definitive interpretation of the Ninth, but this one is a beauty. Though Koussevitzky's tempi are deliberate, they result in wonderful orchestral clarity and glowing tone. Robert Shaw's chorus gives as precise and assured account of the choral parts as one ever hears and the soloists are well above average.

Rarely Heard Debussy; The 'St. Sebastian' Music

Her Mar 21

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The Martyr-[illegible] poetic [illegible] d'Annunzio, is [illegible]

[illegible] Mr. Muench [illegible]. This role will [illegible] whose recent performance [illegible] Honegger's [illegible] was admirable. [illegible] mysticism of D'Annunzio's [illegible]. It should be [illegible] that Debussy was not writing [illegible] incidental music, and he set only a small portion of the complete drama.

TWO PREMIERES

D[illegible] unfortunate in the stage premiere of "St. Sebastian." Besides [illegible] with the Church, the death of the French Minister of War prevented the dress rehearsal from being the brilliant affair planned. The actual first performance did not go well. The stage direction dispersed the cherubs in groupings in accordance with the painter's, Leon Bakst's, eye to effect. The sopranos and basses, tenors and contraltos, were all mixed up, so that some could not even see the conductor, Andre Caplet, and few could depend for support on their neighbors. Mme. Ida Rubinstein who mimed the Saint, did not emerge without severe critical strictures.

A stage production here at the Boston Opera House on March 30, 1912, was apparently even more disastrous. The work must have been considerably cut, and it was paired, of all unlikely partners, with "Hansel and Gretel." It is well worth quoting Philip Hale's review at some length: "There was not one word of explanation in the program book and not even a list of the scenes. There was the vague suggestion of an altar on stage. Then there was the sight of two contraltos, scantily dressed, each fastened to a cross. There were apparitions of angels provided with halos.

"Later a woman was seen crawling about a dimly lighted stage and finally endeavoring to give an impersonation of a life-size letter 'Y.' Female choristers, thinking to encourage her in this painful attitude by singing, must have enlarged the martyrdom. I was informed by a trustworthy person that the martyr was Mme. Cevruti (sic; according to Oscar Thompson's biography of Debussy the lady was Theresa Cerutti. Imagine Mr. Hale's not being told the impersonator of the title role!). The scene unfortunately was grotesque and to the great majority incomprehensible. The saint pierced by arrows has inspired many painters. This saint flopping around the stage as if in search of a dropped coin excited laughter or amazement." This ghastly occasion was further disturbed by late comers. It was conducted by Andre Caplet, who one would have thought, would have profited by the premiere in Paris, especially as he was entrusted by the composer with most of the orchestration.

AUTHOR & COMPOSER

I do not wish to discourage the public by the account of these two early flops to stay away this week from the performances of the music. But it is only fair to warn the uninitiated that all is not plain sailing. Debussy's music, which he wrote in a matter of weeks unlike his usual habits, falls within his later style. There is still the combination of the austere and the voluptuous, but with much less of the latter and a frequent use of Gregorian modes. It is worth hearing for the many extraordinary things in the music, and for that reason it is probably best heard in a concert version.

The drama consists in five acts or mansions, as d'Annunzio preferred to call them, with a musical prelude or interlude before each.

When d'Annunzio undertook to write his drama about St. Sebastian he took a house in France and furnished it with objects about the martyr and works of art which put him in the right frame of mind. Even the air was subtly perfumed with incense. He studied the "Fabliaux" and the "Chansons de geste" and other examples of early French literature. Some averred, more prosiacally, that it was his infatuation with Mme. Ida Rubinstein which impelled him to this labor. The Boston Symphony audiences are not urged to tamper with their domestic arrangements to this extent, but some slight mental adjustment is advisable.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM
MAR 21 1948

Hague

MUSICAL ROUNDUP

Bostonians Play Three Contemporary Works

At their Wednesday evening concert in Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony introduced a new symphony by the 66-year-old Italian modernist composer, Malipiero, and then paid homage to two of the three Russian composers whose music recently was condemned by the Soviet Central Committee, by giving new hearings to a major work by each. These were the Scythian Suite, Ala and Lolli, Op. 20 of Prokofiev, and the Symphony No. 5, Op. 47 of Shostakovich. Since the third of the censured Soviet composers, Khachaturian, is represented by his new Cello Concerto on Dr. Koussevitzky's weekend Carnegie program, it would seem the good doctor is only too happy to be able to show his full disagreement with the Committee's dictum.

Hague

• • •

To return to Wednesday's concert, both conductor and orchestra were in excellent form, which meant that all three contemporary works were sympathetically interpreted and brilliantly performed. The two Russian offerings have appeared many times on Dr. Koussevitzky's programs in recent seasons, and I know of no one who does a better job with them.

Of the two, Prokofiev's Scythian Suite, composed in 1914 when he was only 23, wears the better, and continues to impress with each hearing. Though it clearly shows the influence of Stravinsky's Sacre du Printemps, which burst upon the world the year before, it is also in many ways its equal in originality and impact as a highly colorful and powerful evocation of the mystery and violence attending the rites and ceremonies of a primitive and barbaric people. And the stunning splendor of its crowning pages—the dazzling orchestral sunrise—has rarely been surpassed.

The Shostokovich Fifth, through it is patently the product of a great talent and has considerable permanent appeal, does not improve with repetition. With its admixture of sweetness and vulgarity, of native lyricism and brassy exhibitionism, it each time seems longer and a trifle more wearisome.

• • •

There were many admirable things about Malipiero's new Fourth Symphony, subtitled In Memoriam, yet a first hearing left me only mildly impressed. It consistently interests the mind, but seldom touches the heart. Composed by commission of the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and dedicated to the memory of Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, it is conceived by Malipiero not only as an elegy for Mme. Koussevitzky, but also as a lament for the terrible war years and the present—the post-war period to which the composer refers in a program note as "a huge cemetery in which is brought together all that is no more."

The Symphony is simple and logical in its design and skilfully scored; it is arresting in its harmonic idiom, individualistic and homogeneous in style; yet its musical ideas are often commonplace and not developed with any marked originality; and its expressions of grief, hope and resignation, since they do not seem to spring from any deep compulsion, do not end in being deeply moving. The last two of its four movements are the most affecting—a brief Allegro of a strikingly macabre character, a sort of dance of death, and an extended Lento which envisions a long winding funeral procession in a desolate mountain landscape.

Stokowski Directs Philharmonic Concert

The novelty of Thursday evening's Carnegie concert by the Philharmonic-Symphony under the baton of Leopold Stokowski was the first local performance of Virgil Thomson's The Seine at Night. Since it turned out to be music that is eminently successful in accomplishing what it sets out to do, I can think of no better way of describing it than by quoting what the distinguished composer-critic himself says about it in a program note:

"The Seine at Night is a landscape piece, a memory of Paris and its river, as viewed nocturnally from one of the bridges to the Louvre. . . . The stream is so deep and its face so quiet that it scarcely seems to flow. Unexpectedly, inexplicably a ripple will lap the masonry of its banks. In the distance, over Notre Dame or from the top of faraway Montmartre, fireworks, casual rockets flare and expire. Later in the night, between a furry sky and the Siene's watery surface, fine rain hangs in the air."

Mr. Thomson's melodious Seine theme, with its overtones of medieval plainsong, flows along with considerable archaic grandeur; his distant fireworks have a winningly Gallic sparkle; his shower of raindrops in the harps at the end is quite charming. The whole piece is aptly and adroitly evocative, and brings back pleasant memories to a one-time Seine-watcher like myself.

• • •

For the rest, Mr. Stokowski led the orchestra in a beguilingly virtuosic performance of Falla's Suite from his masterpiece of Andalusian song and dance, El Amor Brujo, with Nan Merriman as the attractively husky-voiced soloist; and gave expert attention to William Schuman's lively American Festival Overture and Dvorak's Fifth (From the New World) Symphony. The volume of the applause would indicate that this last is still a very popular audience work.

The closing number, Mr. Stokowski's own "symphonic transcription" of Debussy's familiar piano piece, Clair de Lune, should also prove popular. However, his moonlight—achieved, as you would expect, mostly with flute, oboe, tremulous high strings and an occasional wail from the vibraharp—is strictly of the stage variety and all too palpable. I think I'll stick with the piano version.

—ROBERT A. HAGUE

[10]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
NEWS
MAR 21 1948

Looking & Listening

with BEN GROSS

RADIO-ENEMY OF JAZZ; SPONSORS ARE HOSTILE; "DR. GINO" SPEAKS UP.

He Toots for Jazz . . . But, you say, you don't like it. It's too noisy, too distracting, too blaring. "Well, what you dislike is not jazz at all. Actually, you hear very little of the real article on the air today." The man who makes this statement is Gene Hamilton, an authority on jive and swing who, strangely enough, is also announcer-commentator on the ultra-high brow Boston Symphony broadcasts over WJZ-ABC (Tuesdays, 9:30 P. M.). An Ohio lad, Gene, after a career as guitar player, singer and welterweight fighter, later won fame as "Dr. Gino" on one of the best of the jazz shows, the memorable "Basin Street" series. "This type of native American music is great art. It refuses to be commercialized. And for that reason, radio today is the enemy of true jazz."

Gene Hamilton
He fights for jazz.

Your Reporter—"Why is there so little real jazz being aired?"

Hamilton—"Because the sponsors and radio execs play up the big lush commercial name bands. They think the listeners prefer these."

Y. R.—"But isn't jazz too complicated—too loud?"

Hamilton—"Definitely no. Jazz doesn't have to be too loud. And complicated arrangements of top tunes are not jazz. Ever hear Bobby Hackett's talented cornet? It gives some of the sweetest, simplest music this side of Guy Lombardo."

Y. R.—"How about Duke Ellington and Stan Kenton?"

Hamilton—"Today these great artists have deserted jazz in favor of more advanced, highly technical musical forms. The Duke, for example, was a great force in jazz, but now in his elaborate arrangements he is much closer to Stravinsky."

Y. R.—"Just what do you mean by jazz?"

Hamilton—"It's a native American music form that has developed from pure improvising into swing. It features ad-libbing by various instruments. It's ensemble music in which the group is more important than the soloist. Also it requires a small outfit to interpret properly—such as Henry (Hot Lips) Levine's, Eddie Condon's or Muggsy Spanier's."

Y. R.—"Can one hear such music on the air?"

Hamilton—"Yes, but far too infrequently. ABC's "Museum of Modern Music" (Saturdays, 7 P. M.) contains some good jazz. And some of the disk jockeys are doing their bit."

Y. R.—"What do serious musicians think of jazz?"

Hamilton—"Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, for one, believes it's a very definite art form."

Y. R.—"As a jazz expert, don't you feel out of place on a symphony series?"

Hamilton—"No. Jazz has influenced serious music greatly. There's Darius Milhaud's 'Creation of the World', for example. Also, I help to keep myself in the mood for the aloof, intellectual Boston atmosphere by employing a Harvard graduate—Jack Perlis—as my press agent."

Y. R.—"You were on the 'Basin Street' show, which featured jazz. But didn't it flop?"

Hamilton—"While it played the real thing it was a sensational success. It launched Dinah Shore and Lena Horne. But as soon as it went commercial, it went to pieces. Why? Because most sponsors like a lot of instruments, fancy arrangements, musical marshmallows. Instead of two small combos they gave us a big, unwieldy band, and we had to do popular songs. And you can't mix pop tunes with true jazz."

Y. R.—"What can be done about it?"

Hamilton—"Have the networks establish pools of good musicians and give them a chance to be heard regularly as jazz players and not as sidemen in plush orchestras. Robert Goffin, a Belgian writer, commenting on our lack of serious study of our native music wrote: 'Isn't it a paradox that the United States has spent millions promoting the French impressionistic school of painting, but has shown not even a remotely comparable concern for its own art form—jazz?'"

Y. R.—"Have you any ideas about what would be an ideal all-American jazz combination?"

Hamilton—"Sure. I'd love to hear a combo that had Tony Sbarbo on the drums; Miff Mole, trombone; Sidney Bechet, clarinet and soprano sax; Henry (Hot Lips) Levine, trumpet; Joe Sullivan, piano; Django Reinhardt, guitar; Bob Haggart, bass, and Coleman Hawkins, sax. Listen to these boys and you'll forget all about inflation and the income tax!"

CHICAGO, ILL.
JOURNAL OF COMMERCE
[illegible]

WAGNER: Prelude and Good Friday spell from "Parsifal"; Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky (RCA-Victor album DM-1198, three 12-inch records) This is the music most associated with Holy Week in the symphonic world, so Mr. Koussevitzky's recording is an appropriate one, although it is not by any means among the most persuasive performances of the many he has put on wax in the last few seasons. There is, strangely, a splendor of tone that is at variance with the mood of the music.

•••

Herald Jan. 26

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 4th concert in the Sunday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:
Symphony No. 2 in D major Op. 36 . . . Beethoven
"La Valse," Choreographic Poem . . Ravel
"Petrouchka," Burlesque in 4 Scenes . . . Stravinsky

Beethoven's 2nd Symphony and the complete orchestration of the Stravinski "Petrouchka" score included in the regular Friday and Saturday series were repeated in yesterday's program, and have already been commented upon. With the third composition, Ravel's choreographic poem, "La Valse," the guest conductor, Leonard Bernstein, and the orchestra, were greeted with the type of cordial applause that included a good deal of uninhibited whistling from the near capacity audience. For while magnificent interpretations of Ravel are hardly novelties to Boston Symphony audiences, seldom have they been treated to a more exhilarating interpretation of the composer than was Mr. Bernstein's. From the vaguishly gray early movements of the competition, illustrating Ravel's love for piquant detail, to the rich glowing sounds of the seeping orchestral masses, the performance was entirely electrifying. With meticulous care and discipline, in the former, and considerable skill in reading the frenzied successive waltzes of the latter, Mr. Bernstein's reading was imaginative, rich, and in fine taste.

The fifth concert of the Sunday series will take place on Feb. 29.

H. C. W.

DONORA, PA.
HERALD-AMERICAN

MAR 26 1948

The Esco Foundation for Palestine composition scholarship for study this summer at the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, Mass., has been awarded to 29-year-old Herbert Bruen of Tel Aviv by the American judges, Leonard Bernstein, Henry Cowell, Ethel S. Cohen, Frederick Jacobi, Wallingford Riegger, and Stefan Wolpe.

The scholarship includes transportation to and from Palestine and the Berkshire Music Center, room and board during the six-weeks' session, tuition cost for the post-graduate course in compet

---

FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

MAR 28 1948

Masters, Moderns Included on Program

New York —UP— Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has announced the music to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood, Mass., this Summer.

The programs show an interesting balance between the older masters and contemporary composers. In the first category are Beethoven, Brahms, Bach, Mahler, Haydn, Berlioz, Tchaikovsky, Schumann, Weber and Mozart.

MARCH 26, 19

GIVE MUSIC BY DEBUSSY

Symphony Orchestra and Chorus Perform

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concerts have gone vocal with a vengeance. Last time the major part of the program was given over to Stravinsky's opera oratorio, "Oedipus Rex." This week it is Debussy's music for D'Annunzio's mystery play, "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," with Schubert's little Fifth Symphony as a curtain raiser.

Last Tuesday night Charles Muench came back to Symphony Hall, and he will remain there through next week. Was it his idea or Dr. Koussevitzky's to give us our fourth hearing of this curious work of Debussy's since 1930, when the entire suite was presented here for the first time? Previously Mr. Monteux had performed three instrumental excerpts. Surely it is a better record than any other American city can show. And, as surely, such emphasis upon this artfully contrived but seldom inspired music is not equally pleasing to everyone.

There can be no doubt that many enjoyed the performance of yesterday afternoon. At its conclusion there was prolonged applause. In addition to composer, conductor and orchestra, the objects of this enthusiasm were the Cecilia Society Chorus, which wrestled with difficult problems; these solo singers, Nancy Trickey, Adele Addison, Dorothy Cornish and Eunice Alberts; and the speaker, Raymond Gerome.

The speaker was an innovation of Mr. Muench's, so far as the Symphony Concerts are concerned—there is a narrator in the original play. Mr. Gerome was not content with mere narration, but put into his voice all the mystical fervor and the anguish of the text. In the dim light of the hall it was difficult to read the words and translation of his part, and of the choral and solo portions of the music. Yet without a knowledge of what was being said or sung, this long, too little varied work, would prove insufferably boresome. Debussy's music has been compared to that of Wagner's "Parsifal," but a dozen bars of that opera would scatter these tonal wraiths in all directions. Of real drama, of real eloquence there is little. Of decadence there is much, in both text and score.

The chorus yesterday was hardly up to its job. The solo singing was excellent, but not always strong enough, and the orchestra superb. The Schubert Symphony, unheard here for 20 years, was beautifully played, and afforded great joy. If in it the young Schubert leans heavily on his predecessors, there is still much that is prophetic of the composer to come. And all of it is delightful. The concert, given a day earlier because of Good Friday, will be repeated tomorrow night.

COLUMBIA, S. C.
STATE

MAR 28 1948

MUSIC ON RECORDS

Easter Music by Wagner Presented in New Album

WAGNER-PARSIVAL: PRELUDE AND GOOD FRIDAY SPELL; Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra (RCA Victor DM-1198, 6 sides.)

Victor has given a last minute release of an important piece of Easter music recorded by an important orchestra and conductor. Unfortunately it probably will not reach the market in time for the people most interested in hearing it during the Easter season.

Being just the kind of mood music at which the Philadelphia orchestra is at its best, the scoring is splendly portrayed. The string and woodwinds project themselves in rich colors that command listening. The usual Wagner fireworks and brasses are missing, all to the advantage of Koussevitzky's superb string section. The sheer beauty of the music is marvelous as well as the superb recording.

Occurring in Act III, The Good Friday Spell follows Parsifal's baptizing of Kundry. The melody tenderly sung by the oboe against a background of muted strings, horns and woodwinds is one which deeply moves the listener by its atmosphere of beauty and painting in luminous sound.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

MAR 26 1948

The New Records

Two Stravinsky Works by Bernstein—Singles From Columbia.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

Neither Stravinsky's "Tale of a Soldier" nor his "Octet for Wind Instruments" is music of wide appeal; but as performed by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Leonard Bernstein and recorded by Victor at Tanglewood last summer, this is an album that should be in every collection representative of the best in reproduced music.

To the credit of RCA, the album liner contains the notation that the recording was made last August at Tanglewood (the small Concert Theater), with Fred Lynch as recording engineer and Richard Gilbert as recording director. It is to them, then, that congratulations must go for the most life-like recording to reach us from a domestic source. Since the "Histoire du Soldat" only uses seven men, and the "Octet" one more, the accomplishment does not equal in scope the reproduction of a full orchestra with as much success, but both works have tricky details of instrumentation that pose their own dilemmas.

Bernstein has been successful in setting them up in a way that they are almost all audible, the team of Gilbert and Lynch fully capable of realizing them in the transcription. To me, this is Bernstein's top accomplishment to date in records, for he has managed a Mozartian clarity with Stravinsky's involved scoring, yet achieved a large part of the pictorial and musicianly purpose intended by Stravinsky.

In this respect I find the "Octet" even more successful than the "Tale of a Soldier," for it is pure music, leaving none of the gaps one feels in the latter, which lacks the spoken narrative that accompanies the miming of an actual performance. However, the brilliance of its musical invention, the consistent tone of its storytelling are of their own excellence, rendered with accuracy in this superb reproduction of the solo instruments. Note, for a detail, the audibility of the plucked string bass, or, in the "Octet," the purity of Laurent's flute. (Victor album 1197.)

Columbia Turns to Singles.

Columbia's determination to issue new versions of such phonograph stand-bys as Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" and Glinka's "Russlan and Ludmilla" overture, which can be contained on a single record, would be more applaudable if the organization had a more resilient hand working at them than Eugene Ormandy's. Needless to say the Philadelphia Orchestra can turn off brilliant performances of these pieces at the drop of a baton, but both pieces suffer from odd tempo and phrasing imparted by the maestro.

There is something of a mystery about the Weber piece; the arrangement is not credited to any one, and there seem to be some gaudy touches in it of the sort Stokowski added. These are minor annoyances, in any case; the major one is Ormandy's lack of flexibility. The Glinka overture is done on two sides of a ten-inch disk, though it can be done on one 12-inch face. The disadvantage is more musical than financial, for it breaks the piece unnecessarily to use two sides. It is, however, a more suitable job than the Weber. Both are above the Columbia average in recording, a little heavy on the bass (Weber: Columbia 12750. Glinka: Columbia 19010).

The Lighter Side.

A singer new to me is Martha Davis, whose vocalization is more impressive than the material she has to work with on Decca 24335. "Cincinnati" is something of a conventional "novelty," which Miss Davis manages to make interesting by her racy spirit; and "Honey Honey Honey," though better, does not give her the opportunity for the talent she seems to possess. Nellie Lutcher and Ethel Waters are some of the names suggested by the methods. There should be credit for the excellent pianist of "Honey," who probably is somebody else's property as a "name" artist.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 9. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony, with Berkshire Music Festival Chorus, Frances Yeend, Eunice Alberts, David Lloyd and James Pease. Victor 1190. $9.

Record companies, conductors, and choruses continue to try for a definitive performance of this giant of music. This is to our mind the most successful modern attempt. We prefer it to the most recent issue, last year's Columbia with Ormandy, the Philadelphia, and the Westminster choir. Soloists here are good, young, rising American singers, who, thank heaven, sing in German. James Pease is the bass and does his role with vigor and fine style. The chorus (Shaw-trained) is far and away the finest in scaling the endless heights of the last movement. But the music is more important than the performance in this instance and here the conductor is not uniformly successful.

Best movement is the slow, lyrical adagio. The opening section is well handled, but the scherzo seems to us to get a little out of hand, in the rushing and slowing down of tempos where we prefer a steady beat. The finale is brilliant, but hard—it lacks a feeling of expensiveness without which the repetitious quality of the vocal writing is cruelly exposed.

If you like the ninth symphony, and do not have the old Furtwangler recording, this, we think, is your best bet. Toscanini is doing the work next month, but he has already recorded it and it is one of the unreleased mysteries of the Victor-Toscanini situation. P. H

[93]

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

Beethoven's 'Choral' Symphony No. 9, in D Minor, Op. [illegible]

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

Record Player

Some Music Put on Disks For Easter

WAGNER: Parsifal: Prelude an Good Friday Spell, Serg Koussevitsky and the Boston Syr phony. Victor 1198. $4.75.

Koussevitsky

Koussevits and the B playing Wagr is a rare eve We are gratef for this samp For many pe ple, this pa of Parsifal ex cerpts is boun up with Easte For those wh love the musi this set shoul rove spellbinding. The luminous one of the Bostonians is perfec for Wagner, for it avoids that con stant fusion of gorgeous sound s often sought after by the more fre quent Wagnerian conductors.

The tapestry of sound emerges lear, on quiet surfaces, in an undistorted performance of serene readth. Koussevitsky undoubted- has his own good reasons for laying as little Wagner as he does, nd yet there is nothing in the whole realm of music drama more moving than this.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAR 31 1948

Music

Boston Symphony Gives Last Concert Of Season Here

By RUTH TRIPP

Charles Munch conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the Metropolitan Theater and he and the musicians closed the season for us in brilliant style. The capacity audience was quick to sense the extraordinary unity between orchestra and conductor and both at intermission and at the close of the concert they recalled the guest conductor several times.

The program offered no chance for complaint about discords. It included a suite from the opera "Dardanus" by Rameau, Symphony No. 5 in B-flat major by Schubert, Symphony in D major "Prague" No. 38 (K. 504) by Mozart and Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120 by Schumann.

Mr. Munch appeared with the orchestra in Providence last November and we had an idea of what was in store for us but the general excellence of the interpretations last evening exceeded our highest expectations.

The Rameau Suite exhibited the beauty of tone color in the strings which the Boston Symphony possesses to a greater degree than any other orchestra now playing. The sturdy, simple phrases of the "Entree" were arresting. The "Rondeau du sommeil" took on the faded color of old tapestry. Faint responses to the phrases played by full orchestra were given by quartet and trio combinations and the effect was delightful. The "Rigaudon" and the "Rondeau gai" provided a vigorous contrast, not only in rhythm but in the orchestral color.

The pleasant music of Schubert was completely beguiling as tune after tune came to us from the various choirs it was hard to choose the best. We finally decided that the most appealing of all were found in the Andante.

As fine a reading of the Mozart "Prague" Symphony as one could wish for was next presented for our pleasure. As this music was interpreted last evening, in its timeless appeal, the Andante came pretty close to expressing "the "peace which passeth understanding." Yet the joy of its Finale was as vital and earthly as possible. It brought out forcibly the great lesson of Mozart's career, that in the midst of great hardship, he found it impossible to write a gloomy note.

The Schumann Symphony was the climax of the fine program. Somehow, pianists are most likely to become enthusiastic about Schumann's music but last evening, its melodic charm and rhythmic diversities reached everyone. The clarity of the reading and the imaginative insight which were given by the musicians left nothing to be desired. Mr. Munch asked for a great deal from the players and they responded magnificently, thereby enriching our musical experience by one more superb concert from this orchestra which has meant so much to the cultural life of this state.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Serge Koussevitzky was reported yesterday unwilling to say whether he had chosen this week's all-Russian program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, as a gesture of protest against the recent official Soviet disapproval of five leading composers.

Nevertheless, his program assembles the "Scythian" Suite of Prokofieff; the Cello Concerto by Aram Khatchatourian, and Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony. All these composers are now under the Soviet ban. Furthermore, Mr. John N. Burk had written for the program book an entr'acte, "Composers and State Paternalism." You may draw your own conclusions.

At any rate, these concerts are perhaps the least interesting of the season. The best piece of the lot is Prokofieff's noisy but aging "Scythian" Suite, of whose complex din Mr. Koussevitzky made the most.

Remembering the ballet suites and the Khatchatourian Piano Concerto, one had expected the Cello Concerto to be rich, spicy and a strong stimulant. It turned out to be powerfully soporific, dry, dull, dreary and long as all eternity. To be sure, there is a pleasant cantabile tune in the slow movement, but all the rest is jigging figurations and nervous orchestration.

Edmund Kurtz, who was making his Boston debut as soloist, lavished his technical abilities and musicianship without stint upon this piece, which didn't deserve them. It would be nice to hear him again in a really solid item from the cello-with-orchestra repertory.

As for Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony, that is a mixed grill. The largo contains beautiful writing and colorful solo effects. The allegretto which serves as scherzo is alive and buoyant. But those march tunes of the first movement and finale are downright cheap. Why was it necessary to rig up an entire program with so little contrast as this one has?

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It seemed to be the feeling at Symphony Hall that Dr. Koussevitzky intended the current Symphony program, devoted to music by Prokofieff, Khatchatourian and Shostakovitch, as a protest against the official decree that lately put those three composers, and four others, in the doghouse. My objections are not necessarily the same as those of the central committee of the Communist party, but at 4:30 yesterday afternoon I was convinced that the doghouse is where they belong.

Of course, Prokofieff wrote his "Scythian" Suite back in 1914. He was then the bad boy of music. Stravinsky had just produced "The Rite of Spring," and his young compatriot evidently wished to show that when it came to barbarism he could go him one better. For me the evocative power this music once possessed has largely disappeared, leaving in the main only flatness and a filthy din. Or the din Dr. Koussevitzky made the most. These ears are still ringing from the assault committed by the battery in the first movement.

Khatchatourian's Concerto for 'cello was played yesterday for the first time in the United States, with Edmund Kurtz, brother of Efrem Kurtz, the conductor, making his local debut as the soloist. In the first two movements Khatchatourian respectively maunders and meanders. The third division is better. But here, as elsewhere, Khatchatourian is little more than a weak imitator of Balakirev, Borodin, Rimsky-Korsakov and, yes, Ippolitov-Ivanov. It would be a pleasure to hear Mr. Kurtz in a more rewarding piece.

From Shatokovitch we got once more the Fifth Symphony, a curious mixture of beauty—or, at least, charm—tawdriness, triviality and sheer bombast. There was trumpet trouble in the second movement and harp trouble in the third. Otherwise, the performance was as eloquent as might be. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted this music, as he did everything else on the program, as though he believed in it thoroughly. No doubt he does.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
STAR-TIMES

MAR 25 1948

. . .

Glowing Bits Of "Parsifal"

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the finest performances that I have heard on records of the Prelude and "Good Friday Spell" from Wagner's "Parsifal." The orchestral tone is opulent, even for the Boston players, and Wagner's mysticism glows with an inner fire. All of the climaxes are managed with a gathering cumulative intensity and the contours of the works are clean and sure. In short, a superlative recording. (RCA-Victor 1198; three 12-inch.)

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 20th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Muench conducting, was give nyesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Assisting were the Cecilia Society Chorus, Victor Manusevitch, conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Adele Addison, soprano; Dorothy Cornish and Eunice Alberts, contraltos, and Raymond Gerome, narrator. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 5 in B flat major ... Schubert
Music for "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien" .... Debussy

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Charles Muench allowed us to hear yesterday the complete score of Debussy's "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian" music, with all the soloists required and a narrator. Previously we have had most of the music, but with only one soprano soloist. At that, according to the vocal and piano score, Mr. Muench made a few cuts, possibly to relieve the monotony of mood which Debussy's frequently fascinating music does not always avoid.

I had hoped that the presence of the narrator would bring some sort of dramatic unity to a long and obscure work. But that was reckoning without d'Annunzio. Years ago, when I had more scholastic zeal, I took the trouble to read the complete play of "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," but I would not urge you to rush to the library and secure a copy. It is a dreadfully tedious piece of literature, and its voluptuous mysticism is very much dated. Debussy is said to have been bothered by de'Annunzio's peculiar French, and I have a feeling that M. Raymond Gerome was struggling manfully with it yesterday. He is an extraordinarily fine speaker, but neither he nor the text was of much help to us in understanding the music.

The best way to appreciate this score is to forget as much of d'Annunzio as you can and concentrate on the sound as sound. Then the conscious archaism, the use of Church modes, the asceticism and the harmonic beauties will be heard for their own sake. The only poor part of the music is the choral and smash-bang finale. For the rest there is much to enjoy. It is our misfortune that Debussy elected in two instances to write major musical works to literature which we no longer hold in high esteem. In order to get the best out of his music we have to make some mental effort to redress this balance.

The performance yesterday was exceptionally fine. The chorus had been well rehearsed. Miss Addison and Miss Trickey sang their brief solo roles with great feeling and, in Miss Addison's case, with rarely beautiful quality of voice. Mr. Muench was the brilliant guiding spirit of it all.

The concert opened with Schubert's infrequently heard 5th Symphony in B flat major. It is an ingenuous and charming work in the manner of Mozart. Mr. Muench did it up to the queen's taste, with a spirited precision and the buoyancy which the French conductor manages to inject into virtually all of his interpretations.

The concert will be repeated tomorrow night. Next week Mr. Muench will lead the orchestra in Mozart's "Prague" Symphony, Beethoven's No. 8 and Schumann's No. 4.

Münch at the Symphony

Debussy 'Sébastien' Music Done With Cecilia Chorus

By L. A. Sloper

The first of the twentieth pair of Boston Symphony concerts was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Charles Münch, conducting as guest, had chosen this program: Schubert, Symphony No. 5 in B-flat major; Debussy, Music for "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien." The orchestra was assisted in the Debussy by the Cecilia Society chorus, Victor Manusevitch, conductor; by Nancy Trickey and Adele Addison, sopranos; by Dorothy Cornish and Eunice Alberts, contraltos, and by Raymond Gerome, speaker. The speaker's part, as arranged by Mr. Münch, seems to contain the words of a narrator and also those of Sebastien.

* * *

It cannot be said that Boston is unfamiliar with this late work of Debussy's. A stage presentation was given at the Boston Opera House in 1912. Mr. Monteux introduced a part of this suite in 1924. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the whole of it in 1930, 1936 and 1939.

The play was written by D'Annunzio, and it is therefore melodramatic. The music matches the play. It is more theatrical than Debussy's other works. Inspired no doubt by the frenetic playwright, he lets himself go. The line is clearer, there is less cloudiness in the orchestra, fewer colors on the composer's palette. There are even some real climaxes, noisy ones, with trumpets. But the score is nevertheless in the tradition of mysticism and sensuousness. The atmosphere is close, the odors of incense and flowers are overwhelming, the windows, like Proust's, are never opened. One longs for fresh air.

* * *

Would the work seem better in the theater? It is hard to say. It might profit by the stage action, which, however, could hardly be pleasant to watch. The speaker of yesterday did his best to give the picture. How could he be other than melodramatic, given his lines? But this kind of exaggerated acting does not go well in the concert hall. An actor is handicapped more than a singer by the surroundings. Mr. Gerome's French was pronounced clearly, possibly too clearly.

Soloists and chorus did themselves proud, particularly Miss Trickey. Mr. Münch seemed in his element. But Debussy's "Parsifal," as Vuillermoz wrote in 1920, "is still waiting for its Bayreuth." It looks as if it might wait a long time.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 19th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Assisting were the following: Harvard Glee Club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor: David Lloyd, tenor; Carol Brice, mezzo-soprano; James Pease, baritone; Wesley Addy, speaker. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 4 in B flat major Op. 60 .... Beethoven
"Oedipus Rex," Opera-Oratorio .... Stravinsky

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex," acclaimed when it was first heard in 1927-28, has stood the test of time well. It is one of the composer's most impressive, varied and arrestng scores. The ending is moving nd filled with a deep pathos. Joasta's music is lyrically lovely ather in the manner of Verdi. The horuses are knowingly wrought nd placed. Oedipus' music is the nost dramatically expressive in the ratorio. Only some of the music or baritone solo falls a little flat, nd I am not at all sure that this vas not the fault of the performnce yesterday. The whole work s one of daring originality. Now f Mr. Koussevitzky will give us Persephone" next season we shal e fairly au courant with Stravinky's fine but less well known vorks.

There may be some who object o Stravinsky's rather high-handed ay of dealing with Sophocles drama, first adapting it in a French version and then translating Cocteau's text into Latin. But the Oedipus story is not greatly sympathetic to the modern mind. In our briskly efficient way we cannot be sorry for a man who, knowing perfectly well what the oracle has just told him, returns to his own country, marries a lady of middle age and kills the first old man he encounters. The music, however, unlocks the pathos and tragic inevitability in the drama for us. It is a novel method of telling a story, but one that is extraordinarily effective.

The performance yesterday was fine as to orchestra and chorus. The tenor soloist, moreover, Mr. Lloyd, was remarkable. He sang this difficult music of Oedipus with amazing ease and a great deal of feeling. He was a real "find" for this role. Mr. Pease sang along stolidly through the bass-baritone roles, but seldom as though he really felt the music. Miss Brice's

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

Beethoven's "Choral" Symphony No. 9, in D Minor, Op. 125, has been [illegible]

[illegible] "Magnificat" [illegible]

[illegible] of the Prelude [illegible] Good Friday Spell from Wagner's "Parsifal" [illegible] Koussevitzky. The album contains [illegible] records.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAR 31 1948

Music

Boston Symphony Gives Last Concert Of Season Here

By RUTH TRIPP

Charles Munch conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the Metropolitan Theater and he and the musicians closed the season for us in brilliant style. The capacity audience was quick to sense the extraordinary unity between orchestra and conductor and both at intermission and at the close of the concert they recalled the guest conductor several times.

The program offered no chance for complaint about discords. It included a suite from the opera "Dardanus" by Rameau, Symphony No. 5 in B-flat major by Schubert, Symphony in D major "Prague" No. 38 (K. 504) by Mozart and Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120 by Schumann.

Mr. Munch appeared with the orchestra in Providence last November and we had an idea of what was in store for us but the general excellence of the interpretations last evening exceeded our highest expectations.

The Rameau Suite exhibited the beauty of tone color in the strings which the Boston Symphony posseses to a greater degree than any other orchestra now playing. The sturdy, simple phrases of the "Entree" were arresting. The "Rondeau du sommeil" took on the faded color of old tapestry. Faint responses to the phrases played by full orchestra were given by quartet and trio combinations and the effect was delightful. The "Rigaudon" and the "Rondeau gai" provided a vigorous contrast, not only in rhythm but in the orchestral color.

The pleasant music of Schubert was completely beguiling as tune after tune came to us from the various choirs it was hard to choose the best. We finally decided that the most appealing of all were found in the Andante.

As fine a reading of the Mozart "Prague" Symphony as one could wish for was next presented for our pleasure. As this music was interpreted last evening, in its timeless appeal, the Andante came pretty close to expressing the "peace which passeth understanding." Yet the joy of its Finale was as vital and earthly as possible. It brought out forcibly the great lesson of Mozart's career, that in the midst of great hardship, he found it impossible to write a gloomy note.

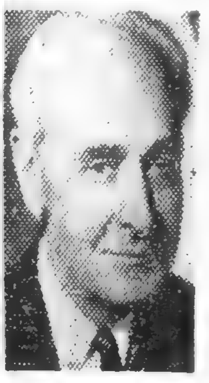
The Schumann Symphony was the climax of the fine program. Somehow, pianists are most likely to become enthusiastic about Schumann's music but last evening, its melodic charm and rhythmic diversities reached everyone. The clarity of the reading and the imaginative insight which were given by the musicians left nothing to be desired. Mr. Munch asked for a great deal from the players and they responded magnificently, thereby enriching our musical experience by one more superb concert from this orchestra which has meant so much to the cultural life of this state.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

Record Player

Some Music Put on Disks For Easter

WAGNER: Parsifal: Prelude and Good Friday Spell. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony. Victor 1198. $4.75.



Koussevitsky

Koussevitsky and the Boston playing Wagner is a rare event. We are grateful for this sample. For many people, this pair of Parsifal excerpts is bound up with Easter. For those who love the music this set should prove spellbinding. The luminous tone of the Bostonians is perfect for Wagner, for it avoids that constant fusion of gorgeous sound so often sought after by the more frequent Wagnerian conductors.

The tapestry of sound emerges clear, on quiet surfaces, in an undistorted performance of serene breadth. Koussevitsky undoubtedly has his own good reasons for playing as little Wagner as he does, and yet there is nothing in the whole realm of music drama more moving than this.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

Serge Koussevitzky was reported yesterday unwilling to say whether he had chosen this week's all-Russian program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, as a gesture of protest against the recent official Soviet disapproval of five leading composers.

Nevertheless, his program assembles the "Scythian" Suite of Prokofieff; the Cello Concerto by Aram Khatchatourian, and Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony. All these composers are now under the Soviet ban. Furthermore, Mr. John N. Burk had written for the program book an entr'acte, "Composers and State Paternalism." You may draw your own conclusions.

At any rate, these concerts are perhaps the least interesting of the season. The best piece of the lot is Prokofieff's noisy but aging "Scythian" Suite, of whose complex din Mr. Koussevitzky made the most.

Remembering the ballet suites and the Khatchatourian Piano Concerto, one had expected the Cello Concerto to be rich, spicy and a strong stimulant. It turned out to be powerfully soporific, dry, dull, dreary and long as all eternity. To be sure, there is a pleasant cantabile tune in the slow movement, but all the rest is jigging figurations and nervous orchestration.

Edmund Kurtz, who was making his Boston debut as soloist, lavished his technical abilities and musicianship without stint upon this piece, which didn't deserve them. It would be nice to hear him again in a really solid item from the cello-with-orchestra repertory.

As for Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony, that is a mixed grill. The largo contains beautiful writing and colorful solo effects. The allegretto which serves as scherzo is alive and buoyant. But those march tunes of the first movement and finale are downright cheap. Why was it necessary to rig up an entire program with so little contrast as this one has?

ST. LOUIS, MO.
STAR-TIMES

MAR 25 1948

Glowing Bits Of "Parsifal"

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the finest performances that I have heard on records of the Prelude and "Good Friday Spell" from Wagner's "Parsifal." The orchestral tone is opulent, even for the Boston players, and Wagner's mysticism glows with an inner fire. All of the climaxes are managed with a gathering cumulative intensity and the contours of the works are clean and sure. In short, a superlative recording. (RCA-Victor 1198; three 12-inch.)

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It seemed to be the feeling at Symphony Hall that Dr. Koussevitzky intended the current Symphony program, devoted to music by Prokofieff, Khatchatourian and Shostakovitch, as a protest against the official decree that lately put those three composers, and four others, in the doghouse. My objections are not necessarily the same as those of the central committee of the Communist party, but at 4:30 yesterday afternoon I was convinced that the doghouse is where they belong.

Of course, Prokofieff wrote his "Scythian" Suite back in 1914. He was then the bad boy of music. Stravinsky had just produced "The Rite of Spring," and his young compatriot evidently wished to show that when it came to barbarism he could go him one better. For me the evocative power this music once possessed has largely disappeared, leaving in the main only flatness and a filthy din. Or the din Dr. Koussevitzky made the most. These ears are still ringing from the assault committed by the battery in the first movement.

Khatchatourian's Concerto for 'cello was played yesterday for the first time in the United States, with Edmund Kurtz, brother of Efrem Kurtz, the conductor, making his local debut as the soloist. In the first two movements Khatchatourian respectively maunders and meanders. The third division is better, But here, as elsewhere, Khatchatourian is little more than a weak imitator of Balakirev, Borodin, Rimsky-Korsakov and, yes, Ippolitov-Ivanov. It would be a pleasure to hear Mr. Kurtz in a more rewarding piece.

From Shatokovitch we got once more the Fifth Symphony, a curious mixture of beauty—or, at least, charm—tawdriness, triviality and sheer bombast. There was trumpet trouble in the second movement and harp trouble in the third. Otherwise, the performance was as eloquent as might be. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted this music, as he did everything else on the program, as though he believed in it thoroughly. No doubt he does.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 20th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Muench conducting, was give nyesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Assisting were the Cecilia Society Chorus, Victor Manusevitch, conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Adele Addison, soprano; Dorothy Cornish and Eunice Alberts, contraltos, and Raymond Gerome, narrator. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 5 in B flat major....Schubert
Music for "Le Martyre de Saint Sebastien" ....Debussy

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Charles Muench allowed us to hear yesterday the complete score of Debussy's "Martyrdom of St. Sebastian" music, with all the soloists required and a narrator. Previously we have had most of the music, but with only one soprano soloist. At that, according to the vocal and piano score, Mr. Muench made a few cuts, possibly to relieve the monotony of mood which Debussy's frequently fascinating music does not always avoid.

I had hoped that the presence of the narrator would bring some sort of dramatic unity to a long and obscure work. But that was reckoning without d'Annunzio. Years ago, when I had more scholastic zeal, I took the trouble to read the complete play of "The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian," but I would not urge you to rush to the library and secure a copy. It is a dreadfully tedious piece of literature, and its voluptuous mysticism is very much dated. Debussy is said to have been bothered by de'Annunzio's peculiar French, and I have a feeling that M. Raymond Gerome was struggling manfully with it yesterday. He is an extraordinarily fine speaker, but neither he nor the text was of much help to us in understanding the music.

The best way to appreciate this score is to forget as much of d'Annunzio as you can and concentrate on the sound as sound. Then the conscious archaism, the use of Church modes, the asceticism and the harmonic beauties will be heard for their own sake. The only poor part of the music is the choral and smash-bang finale. For the rest there is much to enjoy. It is our misfortune that Debussy elected in two instances to write major musical works to literature which we no longer hold in high esteem. In order to get the best out of his music we have to make some mental effort to redress the balance.

The performance yesterday was exceptionally fine. The chorus had been well rehearsed. Miss Addison and Miss Trickey sang their brief solo roles with great feeling and, in Miss Addison's case, with rarely beautiful quality of voice. Mr. Muench was the brilliant guiding spirit of it all.

The concert opened with Schubert's infrequently heard 5th Symphony in B flat major. It is an ingenuous and charming work in the manner of Mozart. Mr. Muench did it up to the queen's taste, with a spirited precision and the buoyancy which the French conductor manages to inject into virtually all of his interpretations.

The concert will be repeated tomorrow night. Next week Mr. Muench will lead the orchestra in Mozart's "Prague" Symphony, Beethoven's No. 8 and Schumann's No. 4.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 19th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Assisting were the following: Harvard Glee Club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor; David Lloyd, tenor; Carol Brice, mezzo-soprano; James Pease, baritone; Wesley Addy, speaker. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 4 in B flat major Op. 60 ....Beethoven
"Oedipus Rex," Opera-Oratorio ....Stravinsky

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex," acclaimed when it was first heard in 1927-28, has stood the test of time well. It is one of the composer's most impressive, varied and arresting scores. The ending is moving and filled with a deep pathos. Jocasta's music is lyrically lovely rather in the manner of Verdi. The choruses are knowingly wrought and placed. Oedipus' music is the most dramatically expressive in the oratorio. Only some of the music for baritone solo falls a little flat, and I am not at all sure that this was not the fault of the performance yesterday. The whole work is one of daring originality. Now if Mr. Koussevitzky will give us "Persephone" next season we shall be fairly au courant with Stravinsky's fine but less well known works.

There may be some who object to Stravinsky's rather high-handed way of dealing with Sophocles drama, first adapting it in a French version and then translating Cocteau's text into Latin. But the Oedipus story is not greatly sympathetic to the modern mind. In our briskly efficient way we cannot be sorry for a man who, knowing perfectly well what the oracle has just told him, returns to his own country, marries a lady of middle age and kills the first old man he encounters. The music, however, unlocks the pathos and tragic inevitability in the drama for us. It is a novel method of telling a story, but one that is extraordinarily effective.

The performance yesterday was fine as to orchestra and chorus. The tenor soloist, moreover, Mr. Lloyd, was remarkable. He sang this difficult music of Oedipus with amazing ease and a great deal of feeling. He was a real "find" for this role. Mr. Pease sang along stolidly through the bass-baritone roles, but seldom as though he really felt the music. Miss Brice's

---

nch at the Symphony

Debussy 'Sébastien' Music Done With Cecilia Chorus

By L. A. Sloper

The first of the twentieth pair of Boston Symphony concerts was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Charles Münch, conducting as guest, had chosen this program: Schubert, Symphony No. 5 in B-flat major; Debussy, Music for "Le Martyre de Saint Sébastien." The orchestra was assisted in the Debussy by the Cecilia Society chorus, Victor Manusevitch, conductor; by Nancy Trickey and Adele Addison, sopranos; by Dorothy Cornish and Eunice Alberts, contraltos, and by Raymond Gerome, speaker. The speaker's part, as arranged by Mr. Münch, seems to contain the words of a narrator and also those of Sébastien.

* * *

It cannot be said that Boston is unfamiliar with this late work of Debussy's. A stage presentation was given at the Boston Opera House in 1912. Mr. Monteux introduced a part of this suite in 1924. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the whole of it in 1930, 1936 and 1939.

The play was written by D'Annunzio, and it is therefore melodramatic. The music matches the play. It is more theatrical than Debussy's other works. Inspired no doubt by the frenetic playwright, he lets himself go. The line is clearer, there is less cloudiness in the orchestra, fewer colors on the composer's palette. There are even some real climaxes, noisy ones, with trumpets. But the score is nevertheless in the tradition of mysticism and sensuousness. The atmosphere is close, the odors of incense and flowers are overwhelming, the windows, like Proust's, are never opened. One longs for fresh air.

* * *

Would the work seem better in the theater? It is hard to say. It might profit by the stage action, which, however, could hardly be pleasant to watch. The speaker of yesterday did his best to give the picture. How could he be other than melodramatic, given his lines? But this kind of exaggerated acting does not go well in the concert hall. An actor is handicapped more than a singer by the surroundings. Mr. Gerome's French was pronounced clearly, possibly too clearly.

Soloists and chorus did themselves proud, particularly Miss Trickey. Mr. Münch seemed in his element. But Debussy's "Parsifal," as Vuillermoz wrote in 1920, "is still waiting for its Bayreuth." It looks as if it might wait a long time.

[94]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 14 1948

LEONARD BERNSTEIN—"At its best, his is music of vibrant rhythmic invention, irresistible elan, terrific punch."

HAROLD SHAPERO—"Gifted and baffling; his adroitness is placed at the service of a wonderful musical gift."

ALEXEI HAIEFF—"Sensitive and refined; his pieces have personality, sensibility and wit; they divert and delight."

ROBERT PALMER—"Always his music has urgency; it seems to come from some inner need for expression."

JOHN CAGE—"One of the curiosities of the younger generation; his music stems from Balinese and Hindu styles."

LUKAS FOSS—"The Wunderkind of this group; his music has spontaneity and naturalness, absolute clarity of texture."

The New 'School' of American Composers

Young men now maturing, says Aaron Copland, are making striking contributions to our music.

By AARON COPLAND

WHEN I was in my twenties I had a consuming interest in what the other composers of my generation were producing. Even before I was acquainted with the names of Roy Harris, Roger Sessions, Walter Piston, the two Thom(p)sons, I instinctively thought of myself as part of a "school" of composers. Without the combined effort of a group of men it seemed hardly possible to give the United States a music of its own.

Now—and how soon, alas—my contemporaries and I must count ourselves among the spiritual papas of a new generation of composers. But personally I find that my interest in what the young composers are up to is just as keen as it ever was. For it is obvious that you cannot set up a continuing tradition of creative music in any country without a constant freshening of source material as each decade brings forth a new batch of composers.

It seems to me one of the most important functions of those who consider themselves guardians of musical tradition, particularly in our Western Hemisphere, where the creative musical movement is still so young, is to watch carefully and nurture well the delicate roots of the youngest generation; to see to it that they get a sound musical training, that their first successful efforts are heard, and that they feel themselves part of the musical movement of their country.

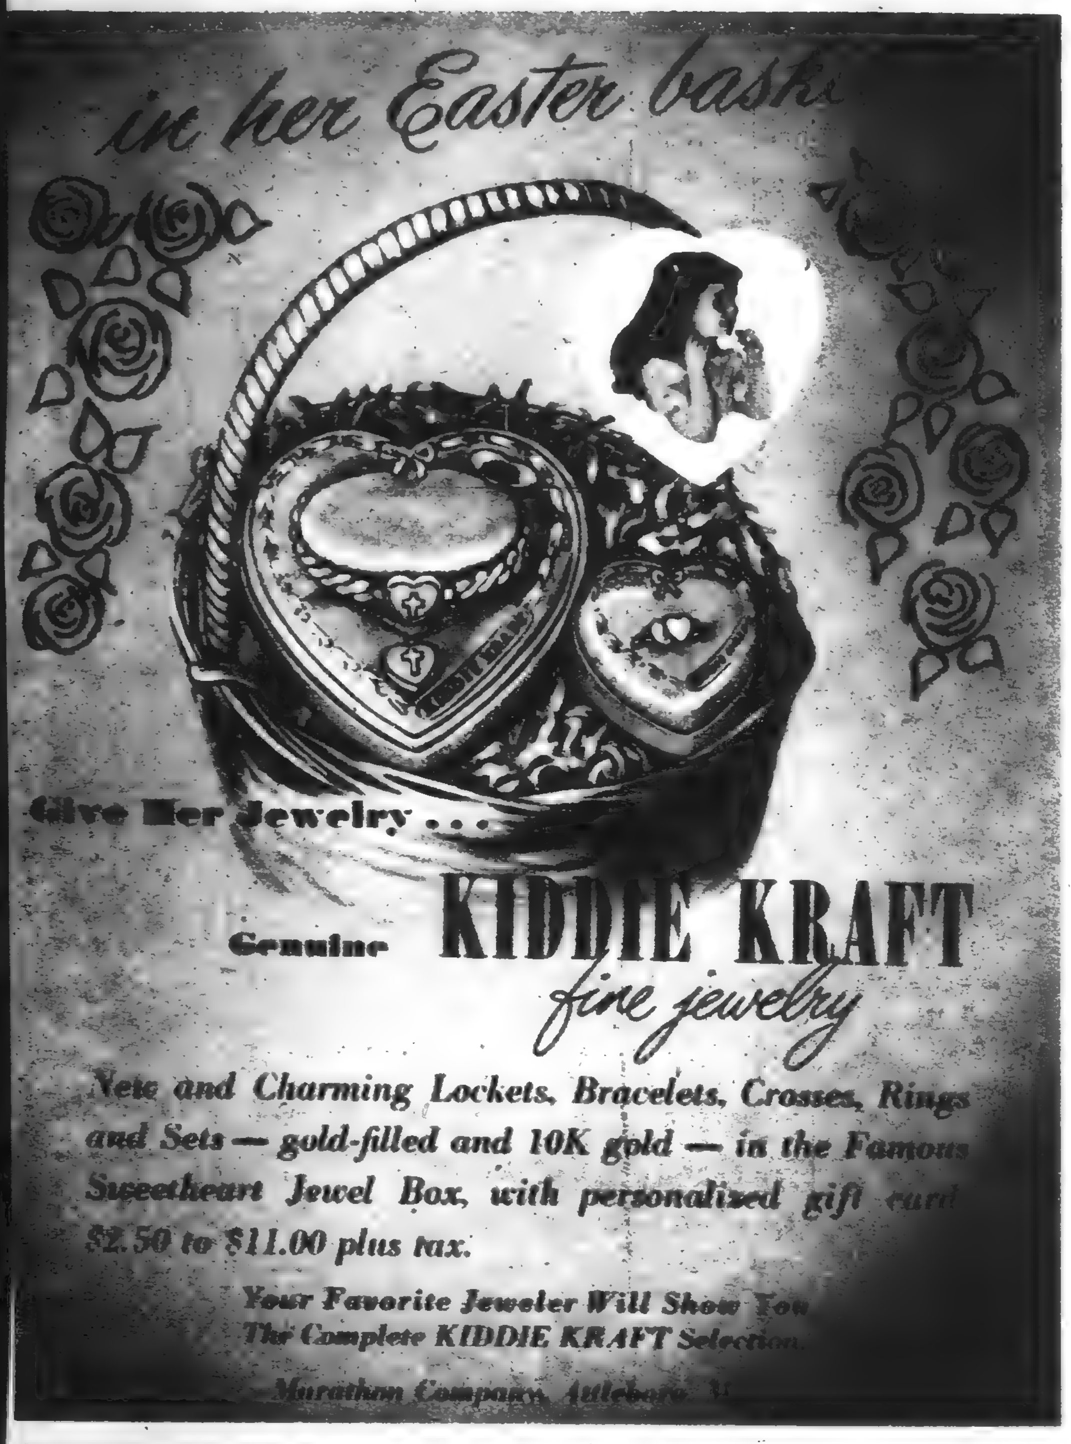
In the United States young composers appear to be sprouting everywhere. My impression is that we are just beginning to tap our creative potentialities. The generation of the Nineteen Thirties—Marc Blitzstein, William Schuman, Samuel Barber, David Diamond and Paul Bowles—are now well established. The generation of the Forties—with which this article is concerned—is being encouraged with prizes, commissions, fellowships, money grants, and more often than not, performances of their works. Nowadays, in this country at any rate, a young composer with exceptional talent would have a hard time escaping detection.

UNLIKE the composers of my own generation, most of these younger men have not (as yet) been to Europe. In a very real sense, Europe has come to them, for many of them have had personal contact with Stravinsky, Hindemith, Schoenberg, Milhaud and Martinu, all of whom are living and composing in the United States. It would be strange indeed if the presence of these contemporary masters had no effect whatever on our younger generation.

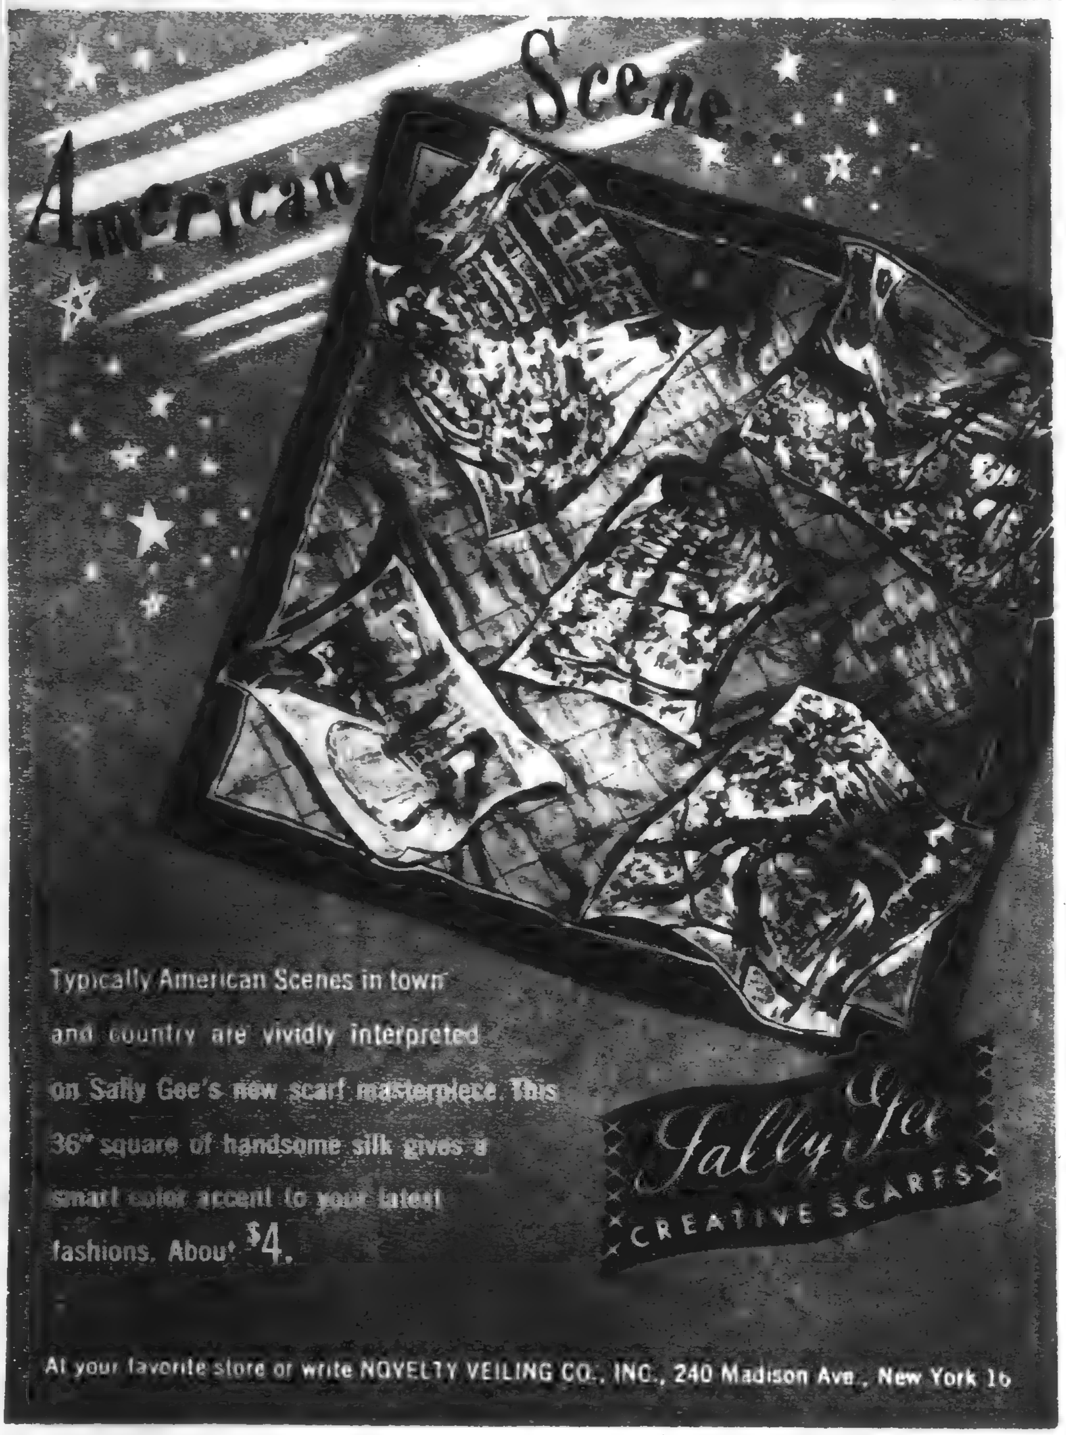
But added to this influence by way of Europe there is a new note: our young composers follow closely the work of their older American colleagues. My own generation found very little of interest in the work of their elders: MacDowell, Chadwick or Loeffler; and their influence on our music was nil. (We had only an inkling of the existence of the music of Charles Ives in the Twenties.) Nowadays a young American composer is just as likely to be influenced by Harris or Schuman as he is by Stravinsky or Hindemith. (Perhaps, to fill out the picture, I should add that numbers of them have been accused of writing like me!)

In general, the works of the youngest generation reflect a wide variety of compositional interests rather than any one unified tendency. In the United States you can pick and choose your influence. Of course, we also have our twelve-tone composers, most of them pupils of Krenek or Schoenberg, (Continued on Page 51)

AARON COPLAND, composer, conductor and lecturer on music, is head of the composition department at the Berkshire Music Center in Massachusetts. Mr. Copland's Third Symphony was voted by the New York Music Critics' Circle as one of the two outstanding works of the '46-'47 season.



Give Her Jewelry . . .
Genuine KIDDIE KRAFT fine jewelry
Nete and Charming Lockets, Bracelets, Crosses, Rings and Sets — gold-filled and 10K gold — in the Famous Sweetheart Jewel Box, with personalized gift card $2.50 to $11.00 plus tax.
Your Favorite Jeweler Will Show You The Complete KIDDIE KRAFT Selection.
Marathon Company, Attleboro, M



Typically American Scenes in town and country are vividly interpreted on Sally Gee's new scarf masterpiece. This 36" square of handsome silk gives a smart color accent to your latest fashions. About $4.
Sally Gee CREATIVE SCARFS
At your favorite store or write NOVELTY VEILING CO., INC., 240 Madison Ave., New York 16

Reja
REJA · 277 FIFTH AVE · NEW YORK 16

FAILLE Starlight BENGALINE
STARLIGHT FABRICS, INC.
1412 BROADWAY, N. Y. C.

New 'School' of U. S. Composers

(Continued from Page 18)

even though they have not yet played much of a role. All this would seem healthy and natural, given the particular environment of our musical life and the comparatively recent development of our composing potential.

But enough of generalities. I have chosen seven names as representative of some of the best we have to offer among the new generation: Robert Palmer, Alexei Haieff, Harold Shapero, Lukas Foss, Leonard Bernstein, William Bergsma, John Cage. Most of these composers are either just approaching 30 or have just passed 30. (Foss is the youngest of the group, having only recently turned 24.) They are all native-born Americans, with the exception of Haieff and Foss, both of whom came to the United States at the age of 15 and were musically formed here. All of them are composers of serious works that have been publicly performed, and, occasionally, published and recorded.

ROBERT PALMER is perhaps the least well known of this group. He is also one of the oldest—32. His music is seldom heard in ordinary concert life; most of it found its way to public performance on special modern music programs or at annual festivals of American music. Palmer happens to be one of my own particular enthusiasms. I remember being astonished ten years ago when I first saw him, and tried to make some connection in my mind between the man and his music. His outward appearance of a grocery clerk simply did not jibe with the complexities of the metaphysical music he was writing at that time.

Ives and Harris were his early admirations, to which he added his own brand of amorphous transcendentalism. Later he came under the sway of Bartók's rhythmic drive. Two string quartets represent him at his best. They are lengthy works, not easy to perform, and not easy for the listener to digest.

But both quartets contain separate movements of true originality and depth of feeling. Palmer is not always as critical as he should be, especially in the outlining of the general proportions of a movement—but always his music has urgency—it seems to come from some inner need for expression.

In two recent works, an orchestral "Elegy for Thomas Wolfe" and a sonata for two pianos, he has managed to discipline the natural ebullience of his writing, though sometimes at the expense of a too rigid polyrhythmic or melodic scheme. Palmer may never achieve the perfect work, but at least he tries for big

(Continued on Following Page)

s Thinner

*Design Protected Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

ly at the collar, at the cuffs, in the sweetest r manner. Rayon crepe in white, pink, aqua,
, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Buffalo,
ouis, Mo. JOSEPH HORNE, Pittsburgh, Pa.
Street, New York 18, N. Y.

New 'School' of U. S. Composers

(Continued from Preceding Page)

eled after Beethoven. For the present he seems to be suffering from a hero-worship complex—or perhaps it is a freakish attack of false modesty, as if he thought to hide the brilliance of his own gifts behind the cloak of the great masters. No one can say how long this strange attitude will last. But when Shapero decides to make a direct attack on the composing problem, to throw away all models, and to strike out unconcernedly on his own, I predict the whole musical world will sit up and take notice.

LUKAS FOSS is, in a way, the Wunderkind of this group of composers, and something of the aura of the Wunderkind still hangs about him. Born in Berlin, where he had his first music lessons, he continued his studies at the Conservatoire in Paris during the Hitler years, and finally arrived in New York with his parents at the age of 15. At 13 he had already composed piano pieces (subsequently published by G. Schirmer) which are almost indistinguishable from those of his later master, Hindemith.

The contact with America was crucial. In Europe he had acquired a kind of impersonal cocksureness that was not at all sympathetic. In America, as he grew up, he became more human and more anxious to reflect the atmosphere of his newly adopted country. His first large work of "American" inspiration was an oratorio, "The Prairie," for soloists, chorus and orchestra, with a text chosen from Carl Sandburg's indigenous poems. It was a striking work to come from the pen of a 19-year-old boy. Since then he has composed two long works for solo voice and orchestra—"Song of Protest" for baritone, and "Song of Songs" for soprano, both based on texts from the Bible.

I cannot honestly say that I always admire his treatment of the English language. But it is impossible not to admire the spontaneity and naturalness of his musical flow, the absolute clarity in texture, and the clean and easy handling of large formal problems. That Foss is a born composer is obvious.

WILLIAM BERGSMA is a native of California and a musical product of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, N. Y. Hardly out of school himself, he already is one of the teachers of composition at the Juilliard School. (William Schuman, head of the school, was quick to recognize Bergsma's sure craftsmanship.)

Bergsma is, by temperament, a sober and serious workman. I realize that this

(Continued on Following Page

that climbs to your curls...
end, to wear for every occasion.
18. "Style 856." $39.95
ENUE, NEW YORK 18, N.Y.

WILLIAM BERGSMA—"A sober and serious workman with a poetic and critical mind; one of the solid values of today's music."

New 'School' of U. S. Composers

(Continued from Preceding Page)

things. In recent years too much of his energy has gone into his teaching at Cornell University—but teaching is a familiar disease of the American composer. Thus far in his career Palmer has enjoyed little public acclaim; nevertheless, if he has the capacity to endure and to develop, his future seems to me assured.

ALEXEI HAIEFF was born in Russia and brought up in China, but had his musical education under Rubin Goldmark in the United States. Later he studied in Paris under Nadia Boulanger. His background and training give him a strong affinity with the music of Stravinsky, and, in fact, Haieff is a close personal friend of that master. Stravinsky's shadow was pervasive in his earlier works, but gradually Haieff has emerged with a sharply defined personality of his own. He combines a sensitive and refined musical nature with an alert musical mind that often gives off sparks of mordant humor. He delights in playful manipulation of his musical materials, and has a special fondness for sudden interruptions of the musical flow with abrupt silences or unexpected leaps or brief back-trackings.

Thus far, Haieff has composed few large and imposing works. Although he has written a "First Symphony," he seems most at home in his shorter pieces such as his "Divertimento" for chamber orchestra, "Sonata" for two pianos, "Five Pieces for Piano," and other short works for violin and piano or 'cello and piano. Almost all of these pieces are a musical pleasure—they have personality, sensibility and wit. They divert and delight the listener, not in a superficial sense but in the sense that such terms might be applied to a Couperin or a Scarlatti. Haieff is at present engaged on the composition of a long ballet based on "Beauty and the Beast," to be choreographed by George Balanchine for the Ballet Society of New York. It will be interesting to see how he handles a large canvas.

HAROLD SHAPERO, it is safe to say, is at the same time the most gifted and the most baffling composer of his generation. This young Bostonian, now 27, has a phenomenal "ear" and a brilliant (though sometimes erratic) mind. The ear and the mind were subjected to a methodical training under Krenek, Piston, Hindemith and Boulanger. These teachers left their mark; Shapero now possesses an absolutely perfected technical equipment.

To examine one of his scores closely is a fascinating experience. Few musicians of our time put their pieces together with greater security, either in the skeletal harmonic framework, in the modeling of the melodic phrases, or in the careful shaping of the whole. Shapero knows what he's doing, but that is the least of it: the exciting thing is to note how this technical adroitness is put at the service of a wonderfully spontaneous musical gift. Despite this, there is, as I say, something baffling about what he has produced thus far.

STYLISTICALLY Shapero seems to feel a compulsion to fashion his music after some great model. Thus his five-movement "Serenade" for string orchestra (a remarkable work in many ways) is founded upon neo-classic Stravinskian principles, his "Three Amateur Piano Sonatas" on Haydnesque principles, and his recent long symphony is mod-

(Continued on Following Page)

s Thinner

*Design Protected Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

ly at the collar, at the cuffs, in the sweetest
r manner. Rayon crepe in white, pink, aqua,
, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Buffalo.
Louis, Mo. JOSEPH HORNE, Pittsburgh, Pa.
Street, New York 18, N.Y.

New 'School' of U. S. Composers

(Continued from Preceding Page)

eled after Beethoven. For the present he seems to be suffering from a hero-worship complex—or perhaps it is a freakish attack of false modesty, as if he thought to hide the brilliance of his own gifts behind the cloak of the great masters. No one can say how long this strange attitude will last. But when Shapero decides to make a direct attack on the composing problem, to throw away all models, and to strike out unconcernedly on his own, I predict the whole musical world will sit up and take notice.

LUKAS FOSS is, in a way the Wunderkind of this group of composers, and something of the aura of the Wunderkind still hangs about him. Born in Berlin, where he had his first music lessons, he continued his studies at the Conservatoire in Paris during the Hitler years, and finally arrived in New York with his parents at the age of 15. At 13 he had already composed piano pieces (subsequently published by G. Schirmer) which are almost indistinguishable from those of his later master, Hindemith.

The contact with America was crucial. In Europe he had acquired a kind of impersonal cocksureness that was not at all sympathetic. In America, as he grew up, he became more human and more anxious to reflect the atmosphere of his newly adopted country. His first large work of "American" inspiration was an oratorio, "The Prairie," for soloists, chorus and orchestra, with a text chosen from Carl Sandburg's indigenous poems. It was a striking work to come from the pen of a 19-year-old boy. Since then he has composed two long works for solo voice and orchestra—"Song of Protest" for baritone, and "Song of Songs" for soprano, both based on texts from the Bible.

I cannot honestly say that I always admire his treatment of the English language. But it is impossible not to admire the spontaneity and naturalness of his musical flow, the absolute clarity in texture, and the clean and easy handling of large formal problems. That Foss is a born composer is obvious.

WILLIAM BERGSMA is a native of California and a musical product of the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, N. Y. Hardly out of school himself, he already is one of the teachers of composition at the Juilliard School. (William Schuman, head of the school, was quick to recognize Bergsma's sure craftsmanship.)

Bergsma is, by temperament, a sober and serious workman. I realize that this

(Continued on Following Page

that climbs to your curls...

end, to wear for every occasion.

18. "Style 856." $39.95

ENUE, NEW YORK 18, N.Y.

WILLIAM BERGSMA—"A sober and serious workman with a poetic and critical mind; one of the solid values of today's music."

New 'School' of U. S. Composers

(Continued from Preceding Page)

things. In recent years too much of his energy has gone into his teaching at Cornell University—but teaching is a familiar disease of the American composer. Thus far in his career Palmer has enjoyed little public acclaim; nevertheless, if he has the capacity to endure and to develop, his future seems to me assured.

ALEXEI HAIEFF was born in Russia and brought up in China, but had his musical education under Rubin Goldmark in the United States. Later he studied in Paris under Nadia Boulanger. His background and training give him a strong affinity with the music of Stravinsky, and, in fact, Haieff is a close personal friend of that master. Stravinsky's shadow was pervasive in his earlier works, but gradually Haieff has emerged with a sharply defined personality of his own. He combines a sensitive and refined musical nature with an alert musical mind that often gives off sparks of mordant humor. He delights in playful manipulation of his musical materials, and has a special fondness for sudden interruptions of the musical flow with abrupt silences or unexpected leaps or brief back-trackings.

Thus far, Haieff has composed few large and imposing works. Although he has written a "First Symphony," he seems most at home in his shorter pieces such as his "Divertimento" for chamber orchestra, "Sonata" for two pianos, "Five Pieces for Piano," and other short works for violin and piano or 'cello and piano. Almost all of these pieces are a musical pleasure—they have personality, sensibility and wit. They divert and delight the listener, not in a superficial sense but in the sense that such terms might be applied to a Couperin or a Scarlatti. Haieff is at present engaged on the composition of a long ballet based on "Beauty and the Beast," to be choreographed by George Balanchine for the Ballet Society of New York. It will be interesting to see how he handles a large canvas.

HAROLD SHAPERO, it is safe to say, is at the same time the most gifted and the most baffling composer of his generation. This young Bostonian, now 27, has a phenomenal "ear" and a brilliant (though sometimes erratic) mind. The ear and the mind were subjected to a methodical training under Krenek, Piston, Hindemith and Boulanger. These teachers left their mark; Shapero now possesses an absolutely perfected technical equipment.

To examine one of his scores closely is a fascinating experience. Few musicians of our time put their pieces together with greater security, either in the skeletal harmonic framework, in the modeling of the melodic phrases, or in the careful shaping of the whole. Shapero knows what he's doing, but that is the least of it: the exciting thing is to note how this technical adroitness is put at the service of a wonderfully spontaneous musical gift. Despite this, there is, as I say, something baffling about what he has produced thus far.

STYLISTICALLY Shapero seems to feel a compulsion to fashion his music after some great model. Thus his five-movement "Serenade" for string orchestra (a remarkable work in many ways) is founded upon neo-classic Stravinskian principles, his "Three Amateur Piano Sonatas" on Haydnesque principles, and his recent long symphony is mod-is not a very exact description of his particular talent, but it is difficult to say more at the present time, for the specific quality of his personality is not yet clear. He possesses a poetic and critical mind, and one is certain that his compositions are put together slowly, after mature reflection. Thus far he has composed orchestral and chamber music, songs, piano pieces and a ballet. At this writing he is engaged upon a first symphony. How truly original or how broad in scope his music may turn out to be is a question for the future. But already it is clear from works like his two string quartets that Bergsma represents one of the solid values of the younger generation.

(Continued on Following Page)

New 'School' of U. S. Composers

(Continued from Preceding Page)

LEONARD BERNSTEIN'S composing gift has been overshadowed by his brilliance as conductor and pianist. In a sense it would be strange if he could not compose, for his ability in that direction is only one of the various facets of an extraordinarily versatile musical personality. For us Bernstein represents a new type of musician—one who is equally at home in the world of jazz and in the world of serious music. George Gershwin made something of an attempt to fill that role, but Bernstein really fills it—and with ease.

Although his composing time is severely restricted by his activities as conductor, Bernstein has to his credit a symphony, "Jeremiah;" two ballets, "Fancy Free" and "Facsimile;" a clarinet and piano "Sonata," songs, and piano pieces.

The most striking feature of Bernstein's music is its immediacy of emotional appeal. Melodically and harmonically it has a spontaneity and warmth that speak directly to an audience. (After so much dissonant counterpoint and neo-classic severity, this was a new note for a young composer to strike.) At its worst Bernstein's music is conductor's music—eclectic in style and facile in inspiration. But at its best it is music of vibrant rhythmic invention, of irresistible élan, often carrying with it a terrific dramatic punch.

It is possible that some form of stage music will prove to be Bernstein's finest achievement. In general it is difficult to foretell the durability of music like Bernstein's which is so enormously effective on first hearing.

I HAVE saved for the last one of the curiosities of the younger generation: the music of John Cage. During the late Twenties the experimental percussion music of Edgar Varese and Henry Cowell made much noise among the musical avant-garde. Cage stems from there, much to the surprise of many of us who thought the percussion period in modern music was definitely over.

Cage began in California with a percussion music of his own, obviously derived from that of his elders. But gradually he devolved the use of the so-called "prepared" piano as a percussive medium. A piano is "prepared" by inserting various metal and non-metal materials between the strings of the instrument. This produces a muted tone of delicately clangorous variety with no resemblance whatever to piano tone. It must be heard to be appreciated—and it must be heard close by, for the tone is tiny and of little duration, somewhat like that of the harpsichord. But even music for prepared pianos must, in the end, be judged like other music.

Fascinating as it is, I fear that Cage's music has more originality of sound than of substance. Stylistically it stems from Balinese and Hindu musics, and more recently from Arnold Schoenberg.

SERIOUS music is thriving in the United States. One factor, not often noted, is the way our music schools and colleges are turning out composers in numbers unparalleled in our musical past. If we can gauge the musical future of a nation by the healthy activity of its younger generation of composers, then America is likely to do well.

The seven composers discussed in this article are near the top of the heap, but in many ways they are typical of their generation. They are all well trained musicians and, what is more, American-trained. Their works show influences, of course. But it is a sign of the times that those influences are no longer solely European, for the older generation of American composers has helped to orient them.

It is also typical that they can knock out all sorts of music: a successful ballet like Leonard Bernstein's "Fancy Free"; a big oratorio like Lukas Foss' "Prairie"; a real symphony like Harold Shapero's; expert string quartets like those of William Bergsma or Robert Palmer; unusual forms like the piano music of John Cage; delightful shorter pieces like those of Alexei Haieff.

These young men don't form a "school" in a stylistic sense. But they all write music that is rhythmically alive, richly melodic and clearly conceived. I believe that, taken altogether, these representative seven men and their throughout the country form throughout the country form an impressive group—one that need not fear comparison with the younger generation of any other country. That is something new for America.

Preview of Sympl

David Diamond's Fourth Having First Performances

By Melvin Maddocks

David Diamond's Fourth Symphony will get its first Boston hearing at tomorrow afternoon's Boston Symphony concert, which is to open with Beethoven's Second Symphony in D major and close with Stravinsky's "Petrouchka." The new work is having its first performance this evening at Cambridge, under Leonard Bernstein, who will also conduct the Friday and Saturday programs.

Mr. Diamond calls his latest composition the "smallest large symphony" he has written. "Smallest," because it plays only 18 minutes; "large," because its instrumentation is more ambitious than any he attempted in the three earlier symphonies.

The instrumentation is deliberately ambitious. When the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed Mr. Diamond's Second Symphony, some of the members complained that he had not given them enough to do. In the Fourth, everybody will work.

* * *

Mr. Diamond tried to avoid what he considers Mahler's mistake: scoring themes more grandly than their subjects justify. He has been careful, for example, not to score tutti passages unless the power of the ideas makes employment of the whole orchestra "reasonable." He has been able to give instruments more play in contrapuntal parts, pitting choir against choir in linear development.

The Fourth differs from the earlier symphonies in other respects than instrumentation, Mr. Diamond says. It has longer melodic lines. Because it is shorter, it is more economically written, and its structure is more compact. Because of its studied instrumentation, it has more tonal color: in the earlier symphonies Mr. Diamond never used two harps together, or a piano, or nearly so much percussion.

In addition, the Fourth, according to its composer, is a more subconscious product than the other symphonies. The Second, for example, written during the war, has an optimistic Finale, because he wanted to express faith in ultimate victory.

* * *

The Fourth, Mr. Diamond says, has no deliberate statements; it is almost completely emotional. Commissioned by the Koussevitzky Foundation, it is dedicated to the memory of Mme Natalie Koussevitzky. And though it is not strictly an elegy, its material has been shaped by the circumstance of its dedication.

In an extremely general way, the Fourth projects Mr. Diamond's impressions of existence, in its early, middle, and final (transitional) phases. The first movement, Allegretto, has the simplicity of a child's reactions. In sonata form, its first theme—introduced by muted strings—is pastoral, suggesting the freshness of the natural world as it appears to the very young. The second theme—stated by the solo oboe—is jolly and carefree and innocent.

The second movement, Andante, is also lyrical, but in a somber, meditative vein. It is meant to suggest, abstractly, the more subdued emotions of maturity. It has a chorale-like introduction by brass and, later, strings. Its first theme is a long cantilena melody traced by the violas. The second theme is stated first by three clarinets, and in this theme the movement reaches its climax.

The final movement, Allegro—in form, half scherzo, half rondo-finale—is rhythmic, spirited, and even exuberant: full of the hope of perpetuated life hereafter. The brass pounds away insistently with a force Mr. Diamond says may seem earth-bound, while the woodwinds soar to their highest notes, giving what he describes as a "getting-off-the-ground" effect, a sense of liberation. He did not stage these effects: the music, he emphasizes, took form from the emotional ideas.

Mr. Diamond believes the only characteristically American qualities of his music are its energy and its optimism, which the final movement perhaps best expresses. He thinks that nationalism is almost as bad for music as it is for politics. He has never used folk songs or national themes in his composition. As in this latest work, he has usually tried to produce music in terms of universal emotional experience.

Smithtown Branch,
N.Y
News
4/1/48

Records

On The Serious Sides

MAJOR MINOR

Stravinsk's "L'Histoire du Soldat," composed during the first World War, has been released by Victor in a recording made by Leonard Bernstein and members of the ~~Boston Symphony Or~~chesra at Tanglewood, Mass. last August. The music is based on an ancient fairy tale of a soldier, his violin, and the devil. The album is completed with a Stravinsky Octet for Wind Instruments. Five 12-in. records, Album M or DM-1197. M: $8.25, DM: $7.25.

On a single record the great Brazilian pianist Guiomar Novaes presents Mompou's "Jeunes Filles au Jardin," and "Feux-Follets" (Will-of-the-Wisp) by her noted teacher, Isadore Philipp. Columbia 17522-D. $1.

Following the popular success of Khachaturian's "Gayne-Ballet Suite No. 1," Efrem Kurtz and the New York ~~Philharmo~~nic Symphony have recorded for Columbia a second Suite derived from the music Khatchaturian wrote for the same ballet. "The Gayne-Ballet Suite No. 2" includes Russian Dance," "Introduction and Adagio of Gayne," "Gayne's Adagio", and Fire". Two 12-inch records, X-MX-292. $3.35.

For children Columbia has recorded "The Eager Piano", written and directed by Michael Morris, with John Larkin as narrator, Frank Glazer at the piano, and a supporting cast. "The Eager Piano" tells the story of a piano which longed to play at Carnegie Hall. MJ-43. $1.75.

With the Howard Dietz-Arthur Schwartz musical, based on John Gunther's "Inside U.S.A." scheduled to ope~~n on Broad~~way, Columbia has released ~~an a~~lbum of six songs from this eagerly awaited show. Clark sings "My Gal is Mine Once More," Rhode Island Is Famous For You", "First Prize At The Fair", and "Haunted Heart", the first two with a vocal chorus. Pearl Bailey chosen for "Blue Brass", and "Protect' Me". Mitchell Ayres provides the orchestral accompaniment. Columbia set C-162.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The centre of interest in the current Symphony program is Stravinsky's opera oratorio, "Oedipus Rex." This strange, undeniably impressive, and as undeniably uneven work received its first American performance from Dr. Koussevitzky 20 years ago last month. At the concerts of March 29 and 30, 1940, it was again heard in Symphony Hall, this time under the composer's direction. Dr. Koussevitzky has a way of making Stravinsky's music more eloquent than the composer intended it to be, if the latter's conducting of it can be accepted as the criterion. There can be two opinions as to the actual value of this score. There ean be only one where yesterday's performance is concerned. It was magnificent.

The above sweeping statement must now be qualified. Aside from the fact that, in his zeal, the conductor occasionally drowned out the solo singers, his interpretation of the music can be praised unreservedly. The orchestra was superb, as was the Harvard Glee Club, which again furnished the chorus. David Lloyd, who supplied the roles of Oedipus and the Shepherd, and James Pease, who sang those of Creon, Tiresias and the Messenger, were on the whole, quite worthy of this distinguished company, something that can hardly be said of the Jocasta of Carol Brice.

Those who heard the performances in 1928 may still recall the noble singing of Margaret Matzenauer. There was an impression, subsequently strengthened, that she was giving the composer assistance that he sorely needed. Miss Brice was ill-at-ease, both with the Latin tongue and the music itself. Nor did she convey any proper impression of the character. The difficult role of the speaker (difficult because of the stilted nature of the text to be declaimed) was adequately filled by Wesley Addy.

Stravinsky has declared himself as opposed on principal to the union of poetry and music, and in this instance he chose Latin (a Latin translation of Jean Cocteau's text, patterned after the drama of Sophocles) so that as he put it, he might ignore the word and concentrate on the syllable. He also favored Latin, in this case, since through its remoteness, its impersonality, it would better convey to a modern audience the spirit of Greek drama. Theory is one thing and practice is another. For the most part, Stravinsky has responded to the stimulus of the poetry. There are some arid pages; there is a curious mixture of styles, one of them that of the early Verdi at his jauntiest. Even in such a piece as this, Stravinsky's fondness for a propulsive rhythm must find occasional outlet.

Not the least interesting feature of the work is the extraordinary and highly personal use of the orchestra. And what an orchestra it is that served the composer yesterday. In the first part of the concert it distinguished itself in music of a very different sort, namely, Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, sympathetically interpreted, as on many another occasion, by Dr. Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
APR 9 - 1948

Koussevitsky To Retire

BOSTON, April 9 (INS).—Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will retire next year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will be succeeded by Charles Muench, director of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra.

The announcement that Koussevitsky would retire after 25 years as leader of the orchestra he made world famous was made today.

Muench, 57, is a concert violinist. He founded the Paris Philharmonic in 1932.

APRIL 3, 1948 Art—Music—Theater 9

Symphony Concert

Charles Münch Concludes His Engagement as Guest

By L. A. Sloper

Charles Münch this week concludes the second of his terms as guest conductor this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For the twenty-first program of the year he chose these pieces: Mozart, "Prague" Symphony in D major; Beethoven, Symphony No. 8, in F major; Schumann, Symphony No. 4, in D minor. Not the most interesting of all possible programs. Any one of these symphonies would be welcome on a program. But all of them at once?

By now, we have come to a pretty good idea of Mr. Münch as a conductor. He has a flair for conducting. He makes an appeal to the eye. Many of his motions are needlessly vigorous. The orchestra needs no such violence to guide it. At times he leaps into the air in his excitement. It would be better if the excitement appeared in the music.

He has played a good deal of French music, of course. So long as he sticks to Debussy's "Ibéria," Fauré's "Pelléas et Mélisande" music, or the Rameau Suite from "Dardanus," he is fairly restrained. But turn him loose on the Franck Symphony, or the Debussy "Martyre de Saint Sébastien" of last week, and he permits himself every exaggeration.

One might expect him to be authoritative, if erratic, in French music, but when it comes to Mozart and Beethoven, it is another matter. It is evident that he is no Mozartean. The "Prague" Symphony of yesterday was capricious in its tempi and absurd in its dynamics. In fact, it was dull.

And the Beethoven? I suppose it was the worst performance I have ever heard of this symphony. It was a series of whispers and explosions. The charming, lyrical measures were rushed so that you could hardly hear them, and then were smothered by chords fortissimo, with special emphasis on the trumpets. Mr. Münch appears to love the tone of the trumpet, for he lays on unmercifully with it. Finally, the symphony was without form and void. But the conductor had his reward in an ovation from the Friday audience.

Her Trib NY Apr 4

RECENT RECORDS

By JEROME D. BOHM

VICTOR has issued the performances by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Leonard Bernstein of Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du Soldat" and Octet for Wind Instruments. The performers in the former work are, Victor Polatschek, clarinetist, [illegible] Allard, bassonist, Jacob Raichman, trombonist, [illegible] trumpeter, Charles Smith, percussion player, Richard [illegible] and George Moleux, contrabassist. The latter work is [illegible] flutist, Manuel Valerio, clarinetist, Mr. [illegible] Ernst Panenkin, second bassonist, George [illegible] Marcel Lafosse, second trumpeter, Mr. Raich-[illegible] Jacob Coffey, second trombonist.

[illegible] ctive- [illegible] percep- [illegible] ment [illegible] essen- [illegible] This [illegible] the stage action [illegible] make L'Histoire du Soldat [illegible] [illegible] The record- [illegible] for its trans- [illegible] and the surfaces [illegible] satisfactory.

Other Victor Sets

It is unfortunate that similarly [illegible] things cannot be said [illegible] recording of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky's direction with the assistance of the Berkshire Festival Chorus, Robert Shaw, director, Frances Yeend, soprano, David Lloyd, tenor, Eunice Alberts, contralto, and James Pease, bass, made at Tanglewood.

I was so startled by a first playing of the set sent to me by Victor for reviewing purposes on hearing the distorted sounds which emerged, the thin, buzzing and vague reproduction of the woodwind passages, and the vocalism, much of which sounded much like that produced by singing through a tissue-paper covered comb, that I thought that my phonograph was out of order and immediately checked with other recordings to make sure that the instrument was not at fault.

Wishing to give Victor the benefit of the doubt, I requested and received another set only to find the same defects along with the distressingly raspy surfaces which prevailed in the first heard set as well. Under the circumstances it is futile to attempt a discussion of the interpretation. No matter what expenditure was involved in making this recording, it was most unwise to release it.

Far better from the purely mechanical aspect is the performance by the same orchestra and conductor of the Prelude and Good Friday Spell from Wagner's "Parsifal" although Mr. Koussevitzky is not one of those rare conductors who can bring the special interpretive abilities essential to a convincing realization of this music

---

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, APRIL 4,

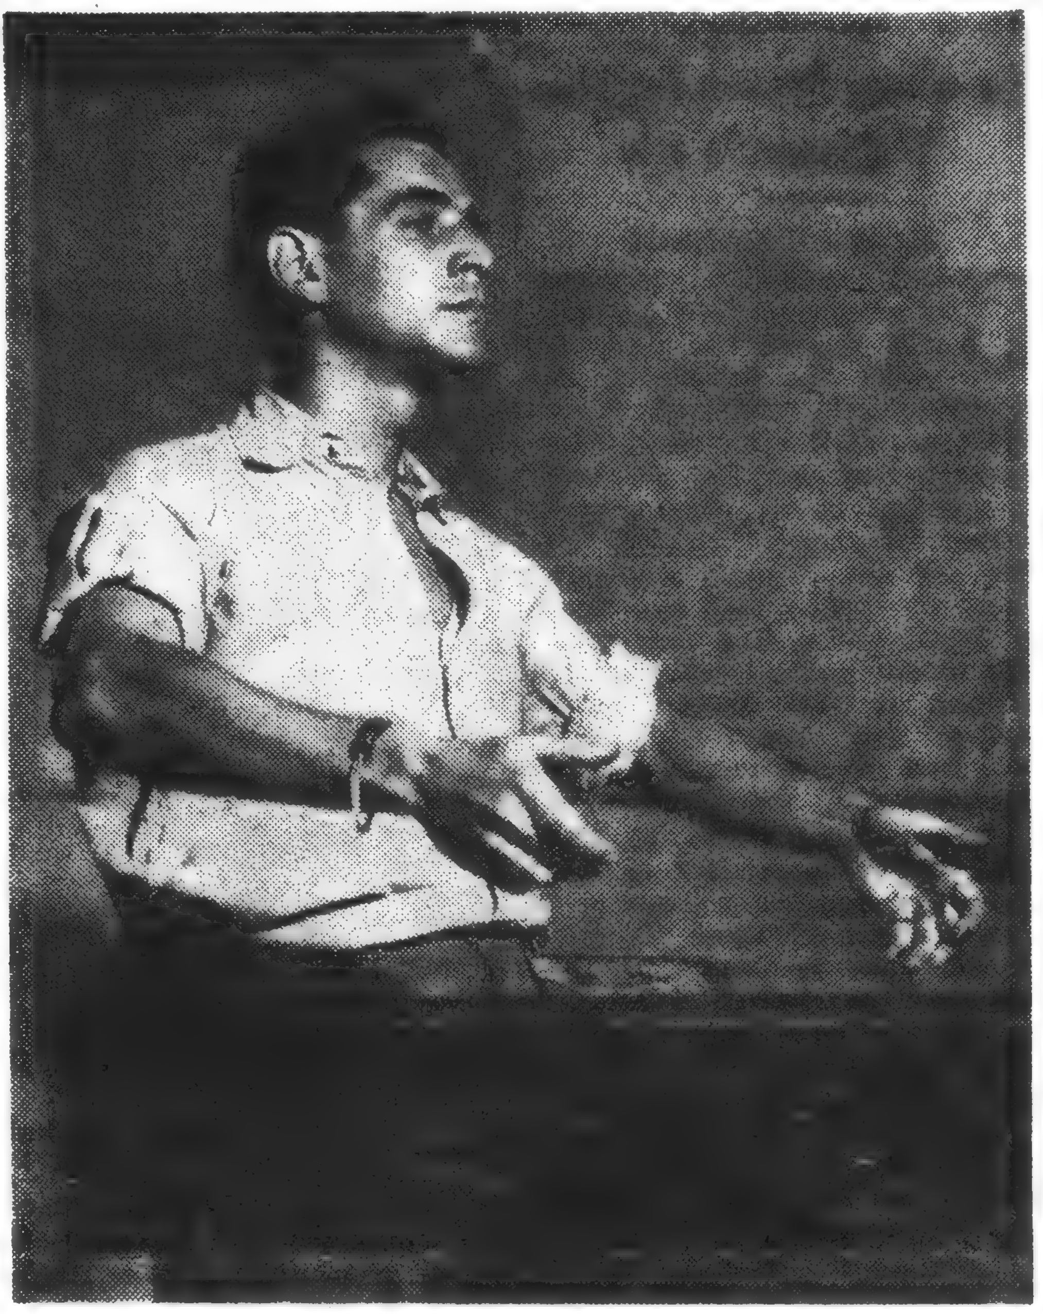
RECORDS: TWO SCORES BY STRAVINSKY

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

CONTEMPORARY composers have written a good deal of music for small ensembles. Probably the controlling reason has been that a turning away from the vast machinery employed so often at the end of the nineteenth century might encourage new freedom of expression. But another important consideration has been undoubtedly that more frequent performances might be obtainable if huge forces were not required. That is why some composers for the theatre have devoted their attention to chamber opera in recent years. They have been right; they have found that they could get performances in many places that had not the resources for a big stage work.

But here is a strange paradox. When it has come to instrumental music, the scores that require small and oddly assorted combinations of instruments have not been played so often as those that needed the full orchestral apparatus. You encounter these scores for small ensembles at special concerts, generally in the small halls. Occasionally these scores are done in the course of a series of concerts designed for a limited audience. But the fact remains that you do not hear them often.

When a conductor has a full symphony orchestra at his disposal, he is loath to use only a handful of his instrumentalists for an extended score. It may be that public and management would frown on what might be construed as wasting of talent. Certainly you can make a much bigger noise with a hundred instruments than with eight.



Fred Fehl

Leonard Bernstein, who has conducted members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in new album devoted to Stravinsky.

Special Conditions

A similar situation prevails in the recording field. When a company pays a full orchestra for a recording date, it probably thinks twice about using only a limited portion of the ensemble. It would seem that it takes special conditions to get recordings of certain works.

Such conditions exist at Tanglewood, where the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its annual Berkshire Festival and where the Berkshire Music School meets for six weeks each summer. At Tanglewood last summer two of Stravinsky's most attractive scores—L'Histoire du Soldat and Octet for Wind Instruments—were recorded. Leonard Bernstein and members of the Boston Symphony joined forces for these recordings, and they produced an outstanding album (Victor, five twelve-inch disks).

"L'Histoire du Soldat" is scored for seven players. The music is only one element in a work that needs to be mimed and recited to be apprehended completely. But even if you miss the full conception, the music is worth listening to for itself. It is full of color, contrast and rhythmic vitality. Stravinsky's combination of instruments—clarinet, bassoon, trumpet, trombone, violin, double bass and percussion—is used with brilliant resourcefulness. It is succinct when it needs to be; it can also be fullbodied and richly sonorous. Stravinsky's view of a soldier's story is hardly romantic; there is a sardonic bite in his music that the recent warrior could endorse.

The "Octet" employs flute, clarinet, two bassoons, two trumpets and two trombones. Written in 1922 about four years after "L'Histoire du Soldat," it finds Stravinsky reaching out for new territory and conquering it with consummate skill. This is a delightful score, concise and fresh. Since it is absolute music and does not depend on any staging, it is an entity as it stands and therefore the more satisfactory work in this album.

Mr. Bernstein, whose affinity for the contemporary composer has been proved in recent seasons, conducts with a crispness and momentum that are ideal for this music. The Bostonians who join him in these performances do their jobs handsomely. The recording made in the Concert Theatre at Tanglewood is one of Victor's best

---

TORRINGTON, CONN.
REGISTER
APR 9 - 1948

To Close Career As Conductor Of Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston, April 9 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his Silver Jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music festival.

PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
HERALD-TIMES
APR 9 - 1948

Koussevitzky Plans to Retire

BOSTON, April 9 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris conservatory orchestra and the Paris philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire music festival.

Oakland Cal.
Tribune
4-9-48

Koussevitzky to Quit Boston Symphony

BOSTON, April 9.—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

[illegible] WISH-ABC

TUCSON, ARIZ.
ARIZONA STAR

Boston Symphony's Director To Retire

[illegible] (AP)—Dr. Serge [illegible] close his career [illegible] the Boston symphony [illegible] at the end of his [illegible] season.

[illegible] Russian-born [illegible] be succeeded by [illegible] 57, Alsatian conductor. [illegible] the present leader of [illegible] ervatory orchestra [illegible] philharmonic.

Portland. Ore.
Journal
4-9-48

Koussevitzky to End Boston Conducting

BOSTON, April 9.-(AP)-Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

Koussevitzky to Retire From Boston Symphony

By the Associated Press

BOSTON, April 9.—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-9 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Mr. Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

McKEESPORT, PA.
NEWS
APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky Ending Career at Boston

By The Associated Press

BOSTON, April 9.—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitsky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE-TIMES
APR 9 1948

Boston Symphony Gets New Leader

BOSTON, April 9. — (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will close his career as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris conservatory orchestra and the Paris philharmonic.

Koussevitsky's decision was announced Thursday night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the society of friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire music festival.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD JOURNAL
APR 9 - 1948

MAESTRO TO END CAREER

BOSTON (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season. The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

[98]

JOHNSTOWN, PA.
TRIBUNE

APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky to Quit As Boston Director

BOSTON — (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL & REPORTER

APR 9 1948

Koussevitsky To Drop Baton After 25th Year

BOSTON—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

LEOMINSTER, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky Resigns Post

BOSTON, April 9 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

SCRANTON, PA.
TRIBUNE

[illegible] 1948

Koussevitzky to Quit Boston Symphony

BOSTON, April 8 (AP).—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, President of the Trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky Plans To Retire

Boston, April 9—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver qubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader o fthe Berkshire Music Festival.

LYNN, MASS.
ITEM

[illegible]

Leader to Quit Hub Orchestra

BOSTON, April 9—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS 1948

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY TO RESIGN NEXT YEAR

BOSTON, April 9 (U.P.).—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced Thursday night that he would resign next year after his 25th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky

He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, founder and director of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky said he would continue as director of the Berkshire Center Music School at Stockbridge, but that Mr. Munch would conduct the famous Tanglewood concerts there.

"It is not without deep concern and heartache that I come to the parting with the orchestra to which I have devoted 25 years of my life," the 73-year-old conductor said.

He announced his decision to a meeting of the Society of the Friends of the Boston Symphony.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra, said that Mr. Munch would succeed Dr. Koussevitzky after next season, with his first concert taking place in October 1949.

Mr. Munch, 56, is a native of Strassburg, Alsace, France, and studied music under his father, in Paris and Berlin. He became a professor of music at Strassburg Conservatory in 1919 and conducted the orchestra there. Later he went to Leipzig and was concert master of the Gewandhaus Orchestra and in 1932 he moved to Paris.

BIDDEFORD, ME.
JOURNAL

APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky Will Retire Next Year

Boston, April 9—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

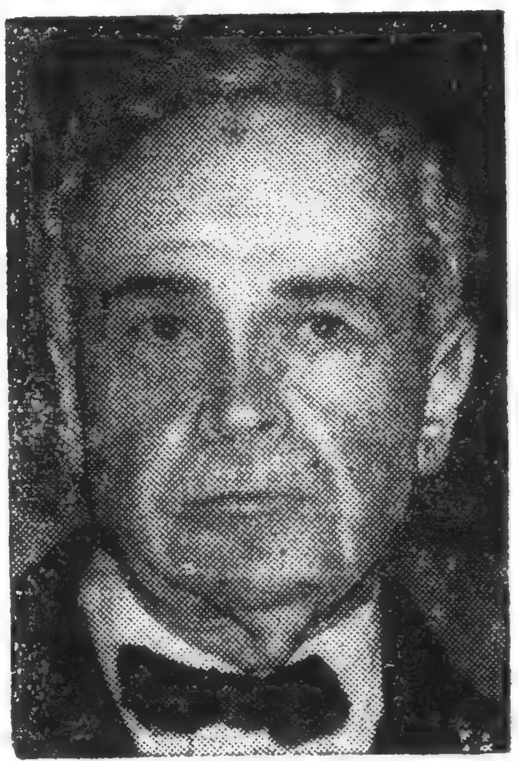
The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire music festival.

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS HERALD

APR 9 - 1948

Koussevitzky To Resign Next Year; Munch To Direct Boston Symphony

Conductor, 73, Will Complete 25th Year



Serge Koussevitzky

Boston, April 8. (UP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced tonight that he would resign next year after his 25th season as conductor of "our great and beloved" Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, founder and director of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra.

Koussevitzky said he would continue as director of the Berkshire Center Music School at Stockbridge, but that Munch would conduct the famous Tanglewood concerts there.

"It is not without deep concern and heartache that I come to the parting with the orchestra to which I have devoted 25 years of my life," the 73-year-old conductor said.

He announced his decision to a meeting of the Society of the Friends of the Boston Symphony and said he felt it would not be possible for him to continue his present strenuous obligations.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra, said that Munch would succeed Koussevitzky after next season, with his first concert taking place in October 1949.

Munch recently appeared here as guest conductor of the orchestra and in the 1946 season made his first American appearance at Symphony Hall.

Munch, 56, is a native of Strassburg, Alsace, France and studied music under his father, in Paris and Berlin. He became a professor of music at Strassburg Conservatory in 1919 and conducted the orchestra there.

Later he went to Leipzig and was concert master of the Gewandhaus Orchestra and in 1932 he moved to Paris where he conducted the Paris Symphony and founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra. He since has been regular conductor of that group.

Munch was said to have signed a contract to conduct the orchestra Wednesday and that he presently is en route to Europe for a spring tour through France and Belgium.

Koussevitzky, who has served twice as long as any previous conductor of the Boston orchestra, came here in 1924 and lifted it out of the musical doldrums with his biting criticisms and demands for perfection.

His great flair for showmanship, his gift for program building ahd his attention to detail raised the Boston Symphony to a point where it came to be described as the "most highly perfected and sensitized symphonic ensemble in the world."

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

APR 9 1948

NEW, RETIRING CONDUCTORS

CHARLES MUENCH (left), 57, Alsatian-born conductor, is shown with DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, 74, during his visit to Boston, Dec. 30, 1946. It was announced yesterday at the annual meeting of Society of Friends of Boston Symphony Orchestra Muench would succeed Koussevitzky at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees. (AP Photo.)

Koussevitzky To Yield Baton At Boston To Charles Muench

BOSTON, April 9 (UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, today prepared to hand over his baton to a younger man next year after his 25th season as conductor of his "great and beloved," Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Succeeding him at the head of one of the world's most noted musical organizations will be Charles Muench, 57, founder and director of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra.

Koussevitzky's resignation and the immediate appointment of Muench were announced last night at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"I am moved to take this decision because I feel it will not be possible to continue my present strenuous obligations," said Koussevitzky in a letter read by Pres. Henry B. Cabot of the orchestra's trustees.

To Continue Work

The Russian-born conductor promised to continue as director of the orchestra's famed Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, and said he will make occasional guest appearances at the head of the symphony both there and during Winter seasons here.

Muench, meanwhile, was en route to Europe for a Spring tour through France, Holland and Belgium. He signed a three-year contract in New York Wednesday before returning to his native Europe for the first time in two years.

During that time he has appeared as guest conductor with several orchestras, including the Boston group which he took over temporarily both this season and last when he made his American debut at Symphony Hall here. His first concert as regular conductor will be in October, 1949.

Had Extensive Career

Muench, a native of Strasbourg, Alsace, France, studied music under his father in Paris and Berlin. Originally a violinist, he became a professor of music at Strasbourg Conservatory in 1919 and conducted the orchestra there.

Later he went to Leipzig and was concert master of the Gewandhaus Orchestra until 1932 when he moved to Paris to found the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra and become conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra.

Koussevitzky, who has held his post nearly twice as long as any of his predecessors, came here in 1924 and applied his biting criticisms and demands for perfection to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which he led to world renown. His flair for showmanship, his gift for program building and his attention to detail raised the group to a point where it came to be described as the "most highly perfected and sensitized symphonic ensemble in the world."

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
STAR-JOURNAL

Boston Symphony Director to Retire

BOSTON, MASS. [illegible] Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony [illegible] silver [illegible]

Koussevitzky [illegible] of the Paris Co[illegible] chestra and the [illegible] monic.

TAUNTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

Koussevitzky To Retire From Boston Symphony

[illegible] —Dr. Serge [illegible] close his career [illegible] Boston sym-[illegible] at the end of his [illegible] 1948-49 season.

The [illegible] Russian born [illegible] succeeded by [illegible] 57, Alsatian con-[illegible] the present leader [illegible] Paris Conservatory Orches-[illegible] Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B Cabot president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society [illegible] of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire musical festival.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

Silver Jubilee Season To End Career Of Dr. Koussevitzky

Boston Symphony Conductor Will Continue With Berkshire Festival

Boston, April :. (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor Muench is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced Thursday night by Henry B Cabot. president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation said he felt it would be impossible for him to continue strenuous obligations "for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

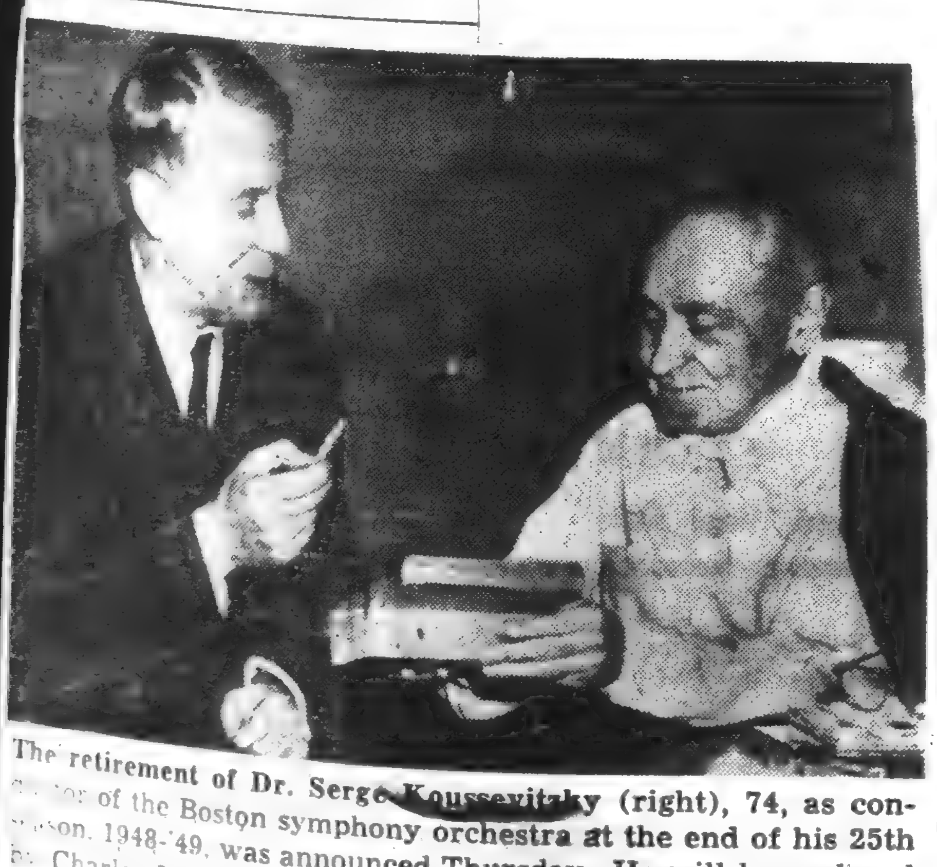
Cabot said the conductor's courageous spirit had made possible "joy and happiness to the hundreds and thousands of hungry and appreciative audiences all over the world."

He said he had "lighted a torch at Tanglewood (the Berkshire center that will shine on through troublesome or peaceful times."

The silver jubilee season will complete for Koussevitzky a period of service almost twice as long as that of any previous conductor, Cabot said.

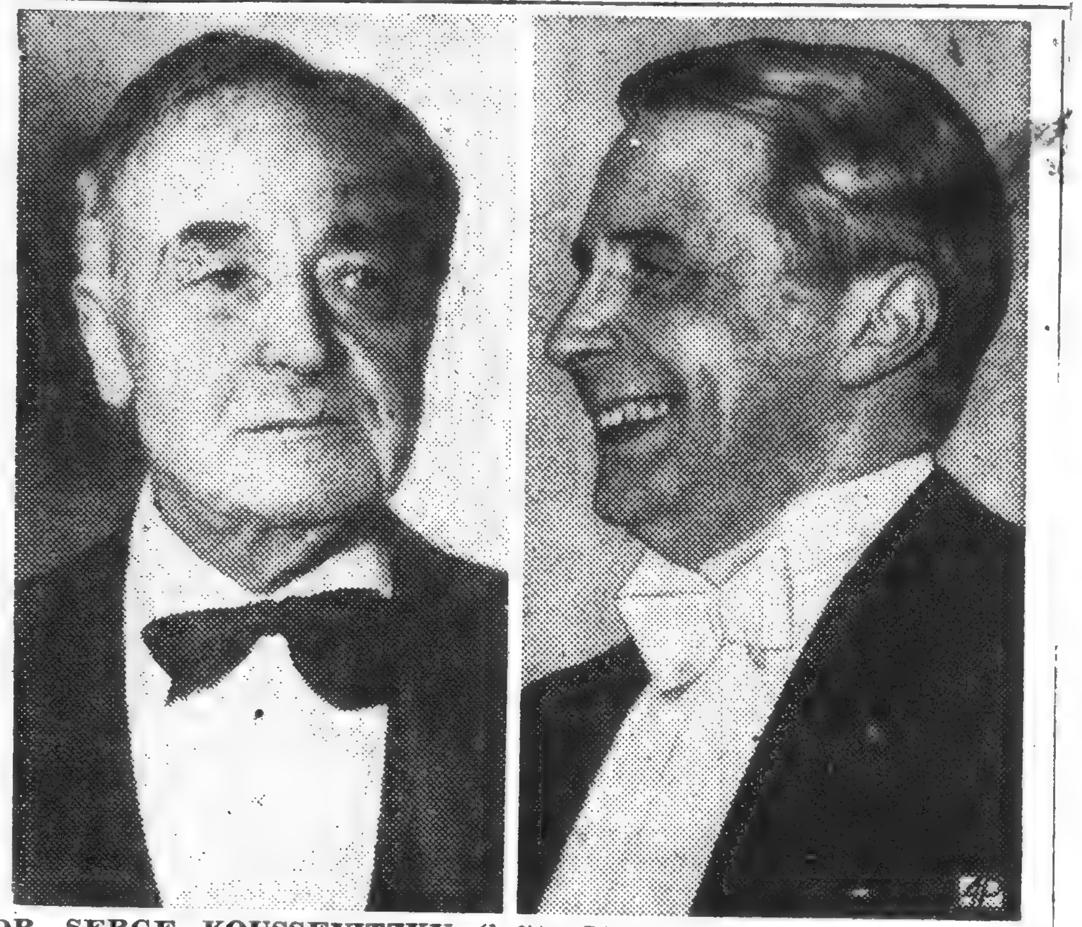
Muench, who will take over at the beginning of the Boston orchestra's 69th season, left New York for France Thursday to complete engagements in France, Holland and Belgium.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL



The retirement of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (right), 74, as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra at the end of his 25th season, 1948-'49, was announced Thursday. He will be replaced by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor, with whom he is shown in a photograph made in 1946. —Acme Telephoto

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN
APR 9 1948



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Sy[illegible]hestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, CHARLES MUENCH (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

HATTIESBURG, MISS.
AMERICAN
APR 9 1948

Famed Conductor Will Quit Boston Symphony

BOSTON, April 9.—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

HOUSTON, TEX.
POST

BOSTON.—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-1949 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

KOUSSEVITZKY

WATERTOWN, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 10 1948

DR. KOUSSEVITSKY TO END CAREER ON SILVER JUBILEE

Boston, April 10. (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot. president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
APR 9 194[illegible]

Conductor and His Successor

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, (right) will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his Silver Jubilee 1948-49 season. He will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian who is now leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic. Photo was taken Dec. 30, 1946, at Symphony Hall, Boston. (Acme Telephoto)

HACKENSACK, N. J.
RECORD
APR 10 1948

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO HOLD AUDITIONS

Final auditions for admission to the Berkshire Music School student orchestras will be held next week in New York by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who are also on the faculty of the Berkshire music center at Tanglewood.

The auditions will be held in the chapter room of Carnegie Hall, on the following schedule:

Strings, Wednesday at 10 A. M.
Woodwinds, Friday at 10 A. M.
Brass, Saturday at 9:30 A. M.
Piano, Friday at 11:30 A. M.

Auditions for tympani percussion, and harp will be held backstage at Carnegie Hall Wednesday at 7 P. M.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST

Named Successor Of Koussevitsky

Associated Press WIREPHOTO

CHARLES MUENCH,

57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, has been named to succeed Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

HANOVER, PA.
SUN
APR 10 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY AND SUCCESSOR—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (top), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench (lower), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
APR 10 1948

Retirement Tribute

Koussevitzky's Audience Moist-Eyed at Concert

Boston—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74-year-old conductor who led the Boston Symphony to worldwide recognition, yesterday thrilled his afternoon audience, most of them moist-eyed at his decision to retire.

The Russian-born musical genius, now an American citizen, Thursday announced he will quit the Boston podium, except for guest appearances, after next season. He will have completed 25 years at that time.

Many of the 2,700 concert-goers who applauded vigorously his brilliant performance yesterday probably were thinking of his first Boston concerts in 1924. White-haired listeners ill-concealed their emotion.

Splendid Conducting Job

But to the balding Koussevitzky, the occasion was marked by one of his finest conducting jobs. He told the audience he was "touched by the wonderful reception given to me today." He finally had to signal for a halt to the applause in order to begin the concert.

After the Brahms Third Symphony, which received thunderous approval, Koussevitzky continued his own tradition of presenting works of American composers as he led the orchestra in the world premiere of 38-year-old Samuel Barber's "Knoxville: Summer of 1915" for soprano and orchestra. Eleanor Steber, Metropolitan opera star, was the soloist.

The post-intermission composition was Sibelius' Second Symphony. The maestro drew cheers as well as heavy applause after this.

Emphasizes Reason

Following the concert, he chatted and emphasized the reason for his decision to relinquish his position to the 57-year-old French conductor of the Paris Philharmonic, Charles Muench.

"I have been thinking about retiring for two or three years," he said. "Some peope forget that besides the very strenuous Boston Symphony season, I have done all the conducting at the Berkshire Music Centr, except for last summer, wher we had guest conductors."

Y, APRIL 10, 1948 Art—Music—Theater 9

ssevitzky Returns to Podium

Eleanor Steber Soloist In Samuel Barber Novelty

By L. A. Sloper

It was good to have Dr. Koussevitzky back in Symphony Hall yesterday for the first of the twenty-second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony season. The audience and the orchestra thought so, too, for they rose in greeting and applauded long and warmly. This was in part an expression of affection and admiration for the man who has announced that he will retire at the end of next season. It may well have been also an expression of belief that the master's hand was again guiding the orchestra.

The program consisted of Brahms' Third Symphony in F major; Barber's "Knoxville, Summer of 1915," for soprano and orchestra, and Sibelius' Second Symphony. The Barber was having its first performance. Eleanor Steber was the soloist.

The playing of the Brahms was evidence of why we were glad to have Dr. Koussevitzky back. It was a beautiful performance, full of vigor and joy, testified to by the glorious tonal qualities of the orchestra and by the conductor's vision and eloquence. True, the Andante became an Adagio, but that is one of the things we have to get used to with Koussevitzky. Otherwise, the symphony was justly proportioned and conceived as an architectural whole.

There's one thing about Koussevitzky's Brahms: you always know where you're going. You may find yourself lingering by the way to pick a posy, but you know you're on the right road. There is no obscurity, no fog hiding familiar items in the landscape. The Russian guide knows his way through the German maze. No faltering steps here.

Mr. Barber's "Knoxville" is a setting of James Agee's prose poem dealing nostalgically with his childhood in Knoxville. Conceivably it means more to Mr. Agee than it can to anybody else. He speaks of "improvisatory writing," as opposed to "carefully composed, mutliple-draft writing"; something, perhaps, analagous to Gertrude Stein. The prose poem tells with careful simplicity about the family lying on the grass as evening comes on, and how they finally all go to bed.

It seems a particularly unpoetic poem. But this is what Mr. Barber has chosen to set. His music is impressionistic, mildly dissonant, repetitious of theme. The first part is gently atmospheric, the second is boisterous, as a streetcar goes by, the conclusion is gentle as the family goes to bed. It is uneventful and a little wearisome.

Miss Steber has a pleasant voice in the middle register. When the music carries her into the upper ranges, the voice becomes pinched and shrill, and subject to a noticeable vibrato. But she sang with style, expression, and, considering the nature of her material, with surprising dramatic power.

SHAWNEE, OKLA.
EVENING STAR
[illegible]

BEACHNUTS . . . . By NBM

Henry B. Cabot of Boston is credited by the Associated Press for the statement that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will retire as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra at the end of this season. This information is interesting in a way yet the challenging thought that it provokes is "How did the AP get it?" Harvard's Dean Briggs, you know, called Boston the town, "Where the Cabots speak only to the Lowells, and the Lowells speak only to God."

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
APR 10 1948

Retiring Maestro Cheered at Concert

BOSTON, April 9 (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74-year-old conductor who led the Boston symphony to worldwide recognition, today thrilled his Friday afternoon audience, most of them moist-eyed at his decision to retire.

The Russian-born musical genius, now an American citizen, yesterday announced he will quit the Boston podium, except for guest appearances, after next season. He will have completed 25 years at that time.

Many of the 2,700 concert-goers who applauded vigorously his brilliant performance today probably were thinking of his first Boston concerts in 1924. White-haired listeners ill-concealed their emotion.

But to the balding Koussevitzky, the occasion was marked by one of his finest conducting jobs. He told the audience he was "touched by the wonderful reception given to me today." He finally had to signal for a halt to the applause in order to begin the concert.

After the Brahms third symphony, which received thunderous approval, Koussevitzky continued his own tradition of presenting works of American composers as he led the orchestra in the world premiere of 38-year-old Samuel Barber's "Knoxville: Summer of 1915" for soprano and orchestra. Eleanor Steber, Metropolitan Opera star, was the soloist.

The post-intermission composition was Sibelius' second symphony. The maestro drew cheers as well as heavy applause after this.

Following the concert, he chatted and emphasized the reason for his decision to relinquish his position to the 57-year-old French conductor of the Paris Philharmonic, Charles Muench.

"I have been thinking about retiring for two or three years," he said. "Some people forget that besides the very strenuous Boston symphony season, I have done all the conducting at the Berkshire Music Center, except for last summer, when we had guest conductors."

Commenting on a remark that his retirement was handled in a careful manner, he said 'Well, you could call it the Koussevitzky way. I believe everything should be thoroughly prepared and in good form."

The retirement will be spent partly at his 24-room home in Lenox, near his beloved "Tanglewood." The rest will be passed at his Brookline town house and in the Paradise valley, Arizona.

The mention of Paradise valley brings a sparkle to his eyes.

"Such wonderful country. You can't imagine the beauty of the colors of the sunrise and sunset."

A man of fabulous energy, his Sibelius performance today moved a listener to tell him he had the feeling he was listening to a new conductor making his first appearance in Boston.

"To tell the truth," Koussevitzky said, "I gave a new interpretation of the Sibelius symphony. I found something new in it. A rustic spirit which I put into it which I had not found before."

His brilliance in taking standard piecese and injecting something new into them is one of the Koussevitzky hallmarks.

DAVENPORT, IOWA
DEMOCRAT & LEADER
[illegible]

. . . The work that Olivier Messalen is composing on commission from the Koussevitsky Music Foundation is being expanded. It was originally in nine parts, now has been expanded into 11 and won't be completed until the end of 1949.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
APR 11 1948

MAYBE RCA VICTOR has discovered the secret of good recording. During the past year or two, most of their discs have been unsatisfactory, technically, though the musical performances themselves usually were all right.

In one of the new Victor albums, a credit line names the recording director (Richard Gilbert) and the recording engineer (Fred Lynch). That way, the public has someone to blame if the music is distorted, the surface scratchy or the balance incorrect. Also, these gentlemen get the credit when the job is right.

The job is right—excellent, in fact—on the recordings credited to Mr. Gilbert and Mr. Lynch. They are two works by Igor Stravinsky—"L' Histoire du Soldat" (The Soldier's Tale) and Octet for Wind Instruments. Both were conducted by Leonard Bernstein and played by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (Five 12-in. Victor records, $6.15).

The first of these works is about 30 years old, the second, about 25, so they represent what might be called the middle period of Stravinsky's composing career (of course, there may be several periods yet to come, so this classification must be flexible). Both works are intelligent and sometimes quite charming. Playing is precise, and recording, as already mentioned, is representative of the best Victor has done.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
POST
[illegible] 1948

Record Player

A Stravinsky Treated Well By Bernstein

STRAVINSKY: L'Histoire du soldat; also: Octet for Wind Instruments. Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Leonard Bernstein, conductor. Victor 1197. $7.25

BERNSTEIN

Two important works of Stravinsky receive their first modern recordings, and also their original pressings under direction other than the composer's own. Bernstein is temperamentally ideal for this music; when one says that of a Bernstein interpretation, one implies that the reading is excellent.

We regret that circumstances of recording did not include a narrator, since the composer designated "L'Histoire" to be "read, played and danced." In the concert version we have neither text nor dancing. The music is a series of short classical movements in the style of the eighteenth century suite. There is a tango, waltz, ragtime, a [illegible], march and a chorale. The music is impeccably delivered by first chair men of Boston. The recording is perfect, and surfaces quiet.

The woodwind octet is similarly admirable in every respect and somehow, even though purely subjectively on the basis of not missing narration and dancing we find the music more unified and [illegible]able.

[101]

omes pinched ct to a notice-he sang with nd, consider-her material,
natic power.

INGTON, D. C.
POST

R 1 1 1948

Player

ravinsky ted Well
Bernstein

SKY: L'Histoire du also: Octet for Wind In-Members of the Bos-hony Orchestra Leonard Bernstein, con ductor. Victo 1197. $7.25.

TEIN

Two impo
tant works Stravinsky r ceive their fi modern recor ings, and al their only pre ings under rection o th
than the co poser's o w is temperamently i music; when one says t
stein interpretation, hat the reading is ret that circumstance did not include a ce the composer d

L'Histoire" to be " d danced." In the ion we have neither
ng. The music is a s classical movement of the eighteenth ce
here is a tango, a pasodoble, march
e. The music is i livered by first chai n. The recording i surfaces quiet.
woodwind octet is si able in every respec
, even though purel on the basis of not ation and dancing.
c more unified and

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN

Koussevitzky to Be Succeeded by Charles Munch

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

APR 1 1 1948

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, is newly represented in the Victor catalog by albums devoted respectively to the Beethoven Ninth Symphony and to the Prelude and Good Friday Spell from Wagner's "Parsifal." Of the two the "Parsifal" excerpts have been the more persuasively played and are admirably recorded.

Koussevitzky's reading of the Ninth lacks grandeur. The conductor has achieved a performance of the general effectiveness of a jig-saw puzzle with all the pieces in place but not assembled tightly enough to make a neat picture. Soloists are Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass. Also heard is the Berkshire Music Festival Chorus. Mechanically the set is not up to par.

Excellent, in every way, are the performances of Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du Soldat" and Octet for Wind Instruments by members of the Boston Orchestra under the baton of Leonard Bernstein. Musically everything is here as it should be and the recording of each work is first rate. Heard in "L'Histoire du Soldat" are Victor Polatschek, clarinet; Raymond Allard, bassoon; Jacob Raichman Burgin, violin, and Georges Moleux, bass. The Octet is played by Georges Laurent, flute; Manuel Valério, clarinet; Raymand Allard and soons; Ge cel Lafoss Raichman trombone

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE

VICTOR has also sought out an unusual pair of neglected items in giving record collectors an opportunity to hear Stravinsky's "L'Histoire Du Soldat" and the equally unfamiliar Octet for Strings issued this week. The first-named work is a curiously stirring and somber soldier's tale, written during the composer's World War I exile. Why it has taken 30 years in reaching the concert halls and the recording studios will long be something of a mystery, since the work now seems certain of real popularity. To this reviewer, this parable of a soldier, his violin and the devil seems a real masterpiece, and Victor, the Boston Symphony and Conductor Leonard Bernstein are to be congratulated for its resurrection.

Music-minded Salt Lakers who heard the Utah Symphony perform the Beethoven Ninth Symphony can now check their recollections of local musicianship against a Boston Symphony reading of this same work just released by Victor. Leaving the local performance aside, this reviewer will testify that the prewar Columbia album with the Vienna Philharmonic under Weingartner seems more solid in workmanship than the Victor-Boston Symphony-Koussevitzky set just issued. This same feeling holds in the case of Victor's recording of the Mendelssohn E Minor Concerto featuring the mellow bowing of Mischa Elman. Columbia's old version with Joseph Szigeti as soloist is more likely to stand as the definitive performance for a few years.

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

APR 1 2 1948

For The Day
Koussevitsky Retires

Of course, in time it had to come, Koussevitzky's retirement. But it is hard to believe that that charming and autocratic Russian refugee, Serge Koussevitzky, will no longer be giving Boston her music and the rest of the nation Boston's music. For on the vigor and enlightment of Koussevitzky's musical leadership, music lovers of the whole country have come in some part to depend.

Technically, he has trained the old Boston Symphony to stand as the yardstick for orchestral performance up and down the land. For a generation, too, Koussevitzky has led in the introduction of new music to American audiences—notably the great modern Russians and the gifted younger British school. And at Tanglewood he has established a new school and music center for the young musicians of the nation. A subtle and humorous programmer he has revived the more obscure old as well as introduced the new.

But above all, Koussevitzky is a brilliant conductor, and that, for good or ill, has come to include intense, dramatic personality, Greatly gifted as a pure musician, Koussevitzky has likewise the power to create the drama, maintain the intensity, which compels the most concentrated listening. It is a power always shown to best advantage on that October evening of each year—and luckily there will be one more—when Koussevitzky opens his Saturday programs.

Boston's Symphony Hall will be packed to the top till. The nervous rustling, the orchestral scraping subside as the precise hour of the concert comes. The audience waits; the orchestra waits. The door to the wings is ready, the lights are set. But Koussevitzky is not yet in. The tension mounts with every minute of his absence. Just as the audience has begun to relax to the delay and resume its rustling, it is suddenly caught together again as the white-haired figure of the conductor comes swiftly through the side door. He strides to the center under the umbrella of applause. There is brief quiet as the orchestra, brought together, awaits the signal. Then, in a burst, the first strains of the "Eroica" descend on the hall. The intellectual and emotional power of the man, now turned toward the orchestra, is somehow behind him communicated to the thousands in the hall. In the first crescendoes personality and music are one—the conductor in his drama unloosing the greater drama of the music beyond him.

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR

Famed Boston Symphony Co His Successor

—Associated Press Wirephoto

Charles Muench, left, 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, talks with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, aged 74, during the former's last visit to Boston. It has just been announced that Muench ~~will succeed~~ Koussevitzky as Boston Symphony conductor at the end of the famed director's golden jubilee 1948-49 season.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

APR 12 1948

Boston Symphony

Walter Piston, noted American composer, will be at the Bushnell Memorial tomorrow night to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra ~~perform his~~ Symphony No. 3, former Mayor Mortensen, managing director of the Memorial, announced today.

Serge Koussevitzy will conduct the orchestra in this. the final event of the Bushnell symphony series. Other numbrs on the program are Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusic," the "Jupiter" Symphony and two Wagner compositions: the preludes to "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger."

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS HERALD

APR 12 1948

Genuine regret that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is to retire a year hence at the conclusion of his 25th year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That must ~~constitute a~~ record for length of service with any American orchestra; but the best part of the record is that Dr. Koussevitzky has made the fame of the Boston organization such that not alone boastful Americans but international figures in music concede that it is the world's best.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

APR 12 1948

Boston Symphony Conductor Retiring

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee ~~1948-49 season.~~ Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

9 lium

becomes pinched bject to a notice-she sang with and, consider-
f her material,
ramatic power.

SHINGTON, D.C.
POST

PR 11 1948

rd Player

travinsky ated Well
Bernstein

INSKY: L'Histoire d
t; also: Octet for Wind I
s. Members of the Bo phony Orchestra Leona Bernstein, c ductor. Vic
1197. $7.25.
Two im
tant works
Stravinsky
ceive their modern re ings, and their only p ings unde rection o than the poser's

STEIN
n is temperamently
music; when one say rnstein interpretation that the reading

egret that circumsta g did not include
ince the composer
"L'Histoire" to be and danced." In t rsion we have neith cing. The music is t classical moveme
e of the eighteenth
There is a tango
a pasodoble, ma le. The music i elivered by first c
ton. The recordin
d surfaces quiet.
woodwind octet i irable in every re
w, even though p ly on the basis of ration and dancin
sic more unified a

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD-AMERICAN

APR 11 1948

Koussevitzky to Be Succeeded by Charles Munch

THE RESIGNATION [illegible] DR.

[illegible] WAS the [illegible] with Dr.

[illegible] was his father, [illegible] Munch director of the [illegible] Saint-Guillaume in Stras-[illegible]. He has two brothers who [illegible] also distinguished them-selves [illegible]ally. The chosen in-[illegible] of Charles Munch was [illegible] he studied with [illegible] later with Lucien [illegible] and Carl Flesch in [illegible] 1919 he was made [illegible] the Strasbourg Con-[illegible] concertmaster of the [illegible] Going to Leipzig [illegible] served as concert[illegible] Gewandhaus Or-[illegible] Wilhelm Furt-[illegible]

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

APR 11 1948

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, is newly represented in the Victor catalog by albums devoted respectively to the Beethoven Ninth Symphony and to the Prelude and Good Friday Spell from Wagner's "Parsifal." Of the two the "Parsifal" excerpts have been the more persuasively played and are admirably recorded.

Koussevitzky's reading of the Ninth lacks grandeur. The conductor has achieved a performance of the general effectiveness of a jig-saw puzzle with all the pieces in place but not assembled tightly enough to make a neat picture. Soloists are Frances Yeend, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass. Also heard is the Berkshire Music Festival Chorus. Mechanically the set is not up to par.

Excellent, in every way, are the performances of Stravinsky's "L'Histoire du Soldat" and Octet for Wind Instruments by members of the Boston Orchestra under the baton of Leonard Bernstein. Musically everything is here as it should be and the recording of each work is first rate. Heard in "L'Histoire du Soldat" are Victor Polatschek, clarinet; Raymond Allard, bassoon; Jacob Raichman Burgin, violin, and Georges Moleux, bass. The Octet is played by Georges Laurent, flute; Manuel Valerio, clarinet; Raymand Allard and Ernst Panenka, bassoons; Georges Mager and Marcel Lafosse, trumpets, and Jacob Raichman and Jo[illegible] Coffey, trombones.

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR

APR 11 1948

Famed Boston Symphony Co [illegible] His Successor

—Associated Press Wirephoto

Charles Muench, left, 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, talks with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, aged 74, during the former's last visit to Boston. It has just been announced that Muench will succeed Koussevitzky as Boston Symphony conductor at the end of the famed director's golden jubilee 1948-49 season.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE

APR 11 1948

28

VICTOR has also sought out an unusual pair of neglected items in giving record collectors an opportunity to hear Stravinsky's "L'Histoire Du Soldat" and the equally unfamiliar Octet for Strings issued this week. The first-named work is a curiously stirring and somber soldier's tale, written during the composer's World War I exile. Why it has taken 30 years in reaching the concert halls and the recording studios will long be something of a mystery, since the work now seems certain of real popularity. To this reviewer, this parable of a soldier, his violin and the devil seems a real masterpiece, and Victor, the Boston Symphony and Conductor Leonard Bernstein are to be congratulated for its resurrection.

Music-minded Salt Lakers who heard the Utah Symphony perform the Beethoven Ninth Symphony can now check their recollections of local musicianship against a Boston Symphony reading of this same work just released by Victor. Leaving the local performance aside, this reviewer will testify that the prewar Columbia album with the Vienna Philharmonic under Weingartner seems more solid in workmanship than the Victor-Boston Symphony-Koussevitzky [illegible] just issued. This same feeling holds in the case of Victor's new recording of the Mendelssohn E Minor Concerto featuring the mellow bowing of Mischa Elman. Columbia's old version with Joseph Szigeti as soloist seems more likely to stand as the definitive performance for another few years.

Of course, in time [illegible] Koussevitzky's retirement. But it is hard to believe that that charming and autocratic Russian refugee, Serge Koussevitzky, will no longer be giving Boston her music and the rest of the nation Boston's music. For on the vigor and enlightment of Koussevitzky's musical leadership, music lovers of the whole country have come in some part to depend.

Technically, he has trained the old Boston Symphony to stand as the yardstick for orchestral performance up and down the land. For a generation, too, Koussevitzky has led in the introduction of new music to American audiences—notably the great modern Russians and the gifted younger British school. And at Tanglewood he has established a new school and music center for the young musicians of the nation. A subtle and humorous programmer he has revived the more obscure old as well as introduced the new.

But above all, Koussevitzky is a brilliant conductor, and that, for good or ill, has come to include intense, dramatic personality. Greatly gifted as a pure musician, Koussevitzky has likewise the power to create the drama, maintain the intensity, which compels the most concentrated listening. It is a power always shown to best advantage on that October evening of each year—and luckily there will be one more—when Koussevitzky opens his Saturday programs.

Boston's Symphony Hall will be packed to the top till. The nervous rustling, the orchestral scraping subside as the precise hour of the concert comes. The audience waits; the orchestra waits. The door to the wings is ready, the lights are set. But Koussevitzky is not yet in. The tension mounts with every minute of his absence. Just as the audience has begun to relax to the delay and resume its rustling, it is suddenly caught together again as the white-haired figure of the conductor comes swiftly through the side door. He strides to the center under the umbrella of applause. There is brief quiet as the orchestra, brought together, awaits the signal. Then, in a burst, the first strains of the "Eroica" descend on the hall. The intellectual and emotional power of the man, now turned toward the orchestra, is somehow behind him communicated to the thousands in the hall. In the first crescendoes personality and music are one—the conductor in his drama unloosing the greater drama of the music beyond him.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

APR 12 1948

Boston Symphony

Walter Piston, noted American composer, will be at the Bushnell Memorial tomorrow night to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra ~~perform his~~ Symphony No. 3, former Mayor Mortensen, managing director of the Memorial, announced today.

Serge Koussevitzy will conduct the orchestra in this, the final event of the Bushnell symphony series. Other numbrs on the program are Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusic," the "Jupiter" Symphony and two Wagner compositions: the preludes to "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger."

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS HERALD

APR 12 1948

Genuine regret that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is to retire a year hence at the conclusion of his 25th year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. That must constitute a record for length of service with any American orchestra; but the best part of the record is that Dr. Koussevitzky has made the fame of the Boston organization such that not alone boastful Americans but international figures in music concede that it is the world's best.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

APR 12 1948

Boston Symphony Conductor Retiring

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee ~~1948-49 season~~. Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

DECATUR, IND.
DEMOCRAT

APR 13 1948

Music lovers will contemplate with sadness the decision of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to lay down the baton of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Because he brought the Boston orchestra to prominence in the period when radio and recording were developing their ability to spread the sound of a single orchestra to all the corners of the land, followers of fine music throughout America have come to name and the musical touch of Koussevitzky.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

APR 14 1948

Muench's Hub Symph Appointment a Surprise

Boston, April 13.

Appointment of Charles Muench as successor to Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 1949-50 took the Hub by surprise. French conductor is believed to have turned down the post when offered last year, on grounds that guest conducting was easier and he didn't want the responsibility of the other.

Muench is financially independent. Two names most prominently mentioned for the post in past seasons had been Leonard Bernstein, Koussevitzky's protege, and Dmitri Mitropoulos. Muench is supposed to have signed for three years at $40,000 annually. He went back to France last week and will bring his Paris Philharmonic on a 40-date tour of the U. S. next season. Koussevitzky, now 74, will complete his 25th year as Hub maestro next season, then turning reins over to Muench.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

APR 14 1948

'Goodbye Koussevitzky' In Hartford Applause

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

It was less than a week ago that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's forthcoming retirement was announced. If he conducts a limited number of concerts next season, no one knows yet whether any of these will be in this city and doubtless many people in Bushnell Hall last night thought they might be listening to his last Hartford performance.

There was an ovation when he first appeared. The man, who has always been warmly received here, was applauded with unusual heartiness after every number.

The sentiments of his admirers must have been apparent to him, for Koussevitzky, who is a sensitive artist, began his program with an urbanity customary to those pleased moments when he produces his best Mozart and he quickly ran an artistic temperature which culminated in as lush and plangent a Wagner as his sonorous Boston Symphony is capable of.

From the Little Night Music to the Lohengrin Prelude and the Meistersinger Overture, it was a typical Koussevitzky program (and who wanted anything else?) because the middle of it was given over to a contemporary American score and a Boston one at that, Walter Piston's new Third Symphony.

* * *

WITHOUT KOUSSEVITZKY what are we going to do about today's music? Not much probably, because there isn't a single one of our visiting maestros who has courage enough to get very far away from Tschaikowsky and Brahms and Debussy. They would play Raff and Delibes if that were what they thought the customers wanted.

It would be inadequate and sentimental to talk about Koussevitzky's retirement unless proper notice were taken of his evangelical bias in favor of living composers, particularly if they live in this country. He brought us Shostakovich and Hindemith when nobody asked him to, but he insisted upon Copland and Schuman and Harris.

Last night I changed my mind about Piston. Up to now he has been, for me, very professorial and efficient and uninteresting. I had the feeling that he didn't want you to know what his music was about, just as his own notes in last night's program seemed intended to be as uninformative as possible.

* * *

BUT HIS THIRD Symphony is more than mere technique. He did not seem to be preoccupied with design, although the climax in each movement was magnificently managed.

Possibly this Piston symphony has a program, but since it isn't vouchsafed to us, the meaning is anybody's guess, particularly anybody who was moved by it even if he happens to be a critic. The march-like finale is a hint; so is the dialectic scherzo.

Certainly the slow movement is subjective, and there is tone painting which is sometimes impressionistic, sometimes atmospheric. No self-respecting composer is going to supply a scenario and say that he is depicting a camp meeting or a clambake or a lynching, but Mr. Piston's symphony struck me as being about people, and for people. I cannot imagine people not asking to hear it a second time and a third because there is a mesmeric undertone which argues: This has a good deal to do with you.

It really leads one to wonder what difference there is between Mozart and Piston; between Piston and Wagner, except dates and styles? Yes, this perhaps: Composers do not work miracles; they don't try to do so. They are content to make patterns or to report what they have observed. Miracles don't happen today. And they didn't in Wagner's day, except that Wagner was the kind of genius who made them happen.

There is no other word but miracle to describe the Lohengrin Prelude. From the standpoint of architecture, it was a matchless crescendo, but that is not enough. It was not real; it was from another world altogether that Koussevitzky took it. For many, this must have been the peak of the program; perhaps for Koussevitzky. It set him aglow.

This concert had everything—the aristocratic Jupiter Symphony, the excitement of a modern work superbly done, the brilliance of the over-familiar but never-to-be-denied Meistersinger Prelude.

It had the seal, the hallmark of, Koussevitzky.

WINONA, MINN.
REPUBLICAN HERALD

APR 15 1948

Koussevitzky

Music lovers will contemplate with sadness the decision of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to lay down the baton of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Because he brought the Boston orchestra to prominence in the period when radio and recording were developing their ability to spread the sound of a single orchestra to all the corners of the land, followers of fine music throughout America have come to know the name and the musical touch of Koussevitzky.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

APR 15 1948

Boston Symphony 1947 Winner Of Radio 'Oscar' in New York

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, awarded the George Foster Peabody music award for its radio programs during 1947, will make its only appearance in this area next year when it comes to the Springfield Auditorium in January, 1949. The local concert, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard on a coast-to-coast hookup. Dr. Koussevitzky, who next year will be observing his 25th season with the Boston Symphony, will retire at the close of next season.

By JOHN M. COOPER

New York, April 15—The George Foster Peabody awards—"Oscars" of the broadcasting industry—were presented today to eight radio programs chosen as the best of 1947.

Elmer Davis, news commentator and formerly wartime head of the OWI, received the prize for outstanding reporting and interpretation of the news for the second time since the awards were established in 1940.

Two other American Broadcasting Company programs were also honored. The "Theater Guild on the Air" received the award in drama and the Boston Symphony Orchestra the award in music.

Three programs of the Colum[illegible] Broadcasting System received awa[illegible] and two more were given special cita[illegible] tions. The award in [illegible]

[illegible]

WCCO CBS [illegible] Minneapolis [illegible] Is Born [illegible] for drama [illegible]

Public Services

The [illegible] service [illegible] sented [illegible] Broadcasting [illegible] Ark., fo[illegible] during [illegible]

The [illegible] children[illegible] WQQW, Wa[illegible] Children's H[illegible]

Anoth[illegible] the program [illegible] a service [illegible] work for peace [illegible]

The awards [illegible] luncheon of [illegible] Executive [illegible] velt.

Edward W[illegible] lantic Monthly [illegible] Peabody Advis[illegible] Drewry, dean [illegible] Georgia's Henry W. Gra[illegible] Journalism, made [illegible]

William S. Hedges [illegible] Radio Executives [illegible] president of the National Br[illegible] Company, presided.

The Peabody Awards are [illegible] memory of George Fost[illegible] New York banker who [illegible] and benefactor [illegible] Georgia.

They are [illegible] versity's journalism [illegible] assistance of the National As[illegible] of Broadcasters.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
POST

APR 12 1948

On The Record—

For Varied Beauty, Hear New Album By Stravinsky

BY DUARD LE GRAND

Igor Stravinsky has had his greatest success writing music for the ballet, but he has devoted more of his time to chamber music for odd combinations of instruments.

Two outstanding examples of both types of Stravinsky are contained in a new RCA Victor album which, incidentally, contains the finest recorded sound to come along in a long time.

"The Soldier's Tale" is in the early Stravinsky ballet-folk music vein and easily a peer of "Petrouchka" and "Firebird." "Octet for Wind Instruments" is one of the cornerstones of the composer's esoteric chamber music edifice.

In these recordings, played by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under direction of Leonard Bernstein, both pieces get performances unlikely to be surpassed.

If you want to add some Stravinsky to your collection but prefer something you don't get to hear too often otherwise, then this RCA Victim Album 1197 is just what you're looking for.

* * *

Two musicians whose troubles lately have been compounded by political difficulties have new albums in the stores.

Aram Khachaturian, whose "Sabre Dance" has had the juke boxes spinning overtime and whose musical style has been condemned by orders of Kremlin headquarters, is represented by a second suite from his spectacularly successful "Gayne." Efrem Kurtz and the New York Philharmonic, whose Columbia recording of the first "Gayne" suite was last year's big seller, are the performers again. They don't have another "Sabre Dance" in this shorter work, but the music has enough of the bounce of its predecessor to please Kachaturian fans.

The work is contained in Columbia Set X292.

Compared with the Russian whose capitalistic tendencies irritate Moscow, Paul Robeson's alleged communistic tendencies have not been soothing to his fellow Americans. In addition to their political worries, the two have in common a fine feeling for folk and pseudo-folk music, and in his new album, Columbia Set 732, Robeson sings eight of the songs he does best.

You'll find "Ol' Man River," "Sylvia", "Ma Curly-Headed Baby," "It Ain't Necessarily So" and four other favorites in this collection. The Columbia Concert Orchestra provides accompaniment.

* * *

CLIFTON FORGE, VA.
REVIEW

APR 15 1948

Music Award

The third ABC award of 1947 is for music...the presentation of the Boston symphony orchestra.

Next in these "Academy Awards" of the broadcasting field is for the outstanding educational program, to CBS for documentary shows on housing, health and old age security.

The Peabody judges also mention the series called "CBS is There," an unusual method of making history alive. In this educational group comes the third special citation for 1947...to the United Nations network for peace, 115 American stations which banded together to carry actual UN debates.

And eighth in the series of top performers of 1947 in radio is WQQM of Washington. The prize is for the best children's program of what the Peabody committee calls a year of generally poor children's programs.

WORLAND, WYO.
NORTHERN WYO.
DAILY NEWS

APR 15 1948

Koussevitzky to Quit Boston Job

BOSTON — (U.P.) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced last night that he would resign next year after his 25th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, founder and director of the Paris Philharmonic orchestra.

Koussevitzky said he would continue as director of the Berkshire Center Music school at Stockbridge, but that Munch would conduct the famous Tanglewood concerts there.

ROCKFORD, ILL.
REGISTER

APR 15 1948

The award to the Theater Guild on the Air was given "for outstanding entertainment in drama." To the Boston symphony "for outstanding entertainment in music," and ta Davis "for outstanding reporting-interpretation of the news."

The Theater Guild on the Air, now being heard for its third successive year on ABC-WROK on Sunday evenings at 8:30, has one of the highest Hooper ratings among all dramatic shows on the air. The Boston symphony orchestra, first major American symphonic organization to be heard on radio, is a weekly presentation of WROK-ABC on Tuesdays at 8:30 p. m.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN

APR 15 1948

The Music Makers

Boston Symphony Offers Score by Piston

The ledger of American music had another entry when Serge Koussevitzky conducted the Boston Symphony in Walter Piston's third symphony last night in Carnegie Hall. This work, composed last year, is a four-movement symphony which has many minor virtues and a few major ones. It has honesty, some fastidious writing, skillful construction and even, a few sections that show force. The outstanding omission from this catalogue, unfortunately, is the element without which one does not return to any work of art—the element of a truly individual speech.

Piston's eclectic writing is really conservative under its modern harmonic facade. Lacking any pronounced melodic ability, Piston is forced to rely upon workmanship and instinctive taste, which he has; in his case, one can note the influences foreign to his basic style without being much disturbed by them.

The central cause for d[illegible] ance, to this mind, is the u[illegible] ing lack of conviction. P[illegible] medium is too objective to be personal, not objective enough for the neo-classicism of a Stravinsky, a bit too stylized [illegible] tional warmth, and too [illegible] conventional forms [illegible] the way of experimentation.

Koussevitzky also conducted Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" (not so "kleine," what with some fifty strings) and the Sibelius Second Symphony. The Mozart was suave and elegant up to a finale taken at a willfully fast pace, and the Sibelius was full of the shattering effects that Koussevitzky has no trouble evoking from music of this kind.

NEW YORK, [illegible]
HERALD TRI[illegible]

APR 16 [illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHE[illegible] Koussevitzky, conductor. Conce[illegible] at Carnegie Hall. The program[illegible]
"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Sere[illegible]
String Orchestra
Symphony No. 3 [illegible]
First performance [illegible]
Symphony No. 2, in D ma[illegible]

The Piston Case

WALTER PISTON'S Th[illegible] phony, a New York fi[illegible] ing, was your reporter's occ[illegible] visiting the Boston Symph[illegible] [illegible]stra Wednesday night i[illegible] Hall. Not that the orch[illegible] and it still vigorous co[illegible] [illegible]ge Koussevitzky, are n[illegible] [illegible]isit at any time. But N[illegible] [illegible]ers a wealth of musica[illegible] [illegible] week, and the rest of [illegible] night's program, consi[illegible] [illegible]miliar Mozart Serenade [illegible] too-familiar Second S[illegible] Sibelius, would scarcely [illegible] [illegible]ve provided material fo[illegible] [illegible]h were played a[illegible] [illegible]ugh, though neither r[illegible] [illegible]ed any original or u[illegible] [illegible]hentic data to the hi[illegible] [illegible]rpretation. The Bos[illegible] [illegible]stra's string pizzicati [illegible] [illegible]atched for power a[illegible] [illegible]nce.

* * *

[illegible]ston's Third Symphony [illegible] a modernization of th[illegible] [illegible]'s esthetic, long stric[illegible] [illegible]ic, in the direction [illegible] [illegible]anticism. It is, to my [illegible] his first work [illegible] [illegible]rtions based on roun[illegible] [illegible]g, material, infallib[illegible] [illegible]gn of an effort tow[illegible] [illegible]zed expressivity. T[illegible] [illegible]nent is leisurely, al[illegible] [illegible]nistic in its delibera[illegible] a mood. The se[illegible] deals also with gr[illegible] [illegible]y evocation. The t[illegible] sings and moun[illegible] a sort of rondo w[illegible] [illegible]ment, leaves the[illegible]

WILMINGTON, [illegible]
NEWS

APR 16 194[illegible]

[illegible]ive Show[illegible] Grante[illegible]

NEW YORK, April [illegible] [illegible]ndividual stations were [illegible] Foster Peabody awards, [illegible]

The Peabody prize [illegible] American Broadcasting [illegible] committee said: "In a d[illegible] points steadily toward [illegible] peace."

Other awards were [illegible] Station WBBM of C[illegible] for outstanding public [illegible] regional station for [illegible] "Report Uncensored," [illegible] with juvenile delinque[illegible] Station KXAR [illegible] (MBS), for outsta[illegible] vice by a local st[illegible] aster broadcast foll[illegible] Station WQQW [illegible] for the best child[illegible] 1947.

The Columbia B[illegible]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST

APR 15 1948

Music...

Bostonians in Season's Final Wednesday Concert

By HARRIETT JOHNSON

Serge [illegible] who in his 2[illegible] conductor of the [illegible] chestra, has [illegible] ioned con- [illegible] added another [illegible] he played [illegible] final Wed- [illegible] in [illegible] egie Hall. [illegible] Piston's [illegible] osed by [illegible] of the [illegible] ssevitzky [illegible] undation [illegible] completed [illegible] the summe[illegible] Its [illegible] re was in B[illegible] Jan- but this was [illegible] New [illegible] hearing. The [illegible] was [illegible] and took a [illegible] the [illegible]

Mr. Piston has [illegible] "to the mer[illegible] Koussevitzky," and its four movements have a prevailing sombreness which permeates even the second movement, a scherzo, marked "ellegro."

Mr. Piston's style in this work has no folk origin nor does it stem from any other "popular" source. Its character is abstruse, like many of the composer's other works, and it is not easy to pass judgment on such music after a first hearing. The idiom is complex and the ears, within a short time, have plenty to absorb.

There are moments of poignant melody as in the opening theme of the first movement, announced by the oboe. In the third movement there is considerable music in the same plaintive mood stated and developed in the entire string section.

The second movement tosses syncopations around and has a primitive vigor which surges on to the end without letup.

Both the first and fourth movements build big climaxes, the first, positive, like an affirmation of faith, and the final movement with a working out of the two main theses in vigorous, dynamic fashion.

None of it, however, sounds like music which comes from the heart and the cumulative impression is an appeal to the intellect rather than the emotions. While its contents makes sense, it seems distant, like a person whose character and personality you admire but whom you don't love.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the ensemble gave a brilliant performance. The program opened with a delightful accounting of Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," and concluded with the Symphony No. 2 by Sibelius, one of Maestro Koussevitzky's favorite contemporary composers.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 16 1948

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Concert last night at Carnegie Hall. The program:
"Eine Kleine Nacht[illegible]," Serenade for String Orchestra ....Mozart
Symphony No. [illegible] ....Piston
First performance in New York
Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. [illegible] ....Sibelius

The Piston Case

WALTER PISTON'S Third Symphony, a New York first hearing, was your reporter's occasion for visiting the Boston Symphony Orchestra Wednesday night in Carnegie Hall. Not that the orchestra itself and it sstill vigorous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, are not worth a visit at any time. But New York offers a wealth of musical fare in any week, and the rest of Wednesday night's program, consisting of a familiar Mozart Serenade and the all-too-familiar Second Symphony of Sibelius, would scarcely of itself have provided material for review. Both were played agreeably enough, though neither rendering added any original or unusually authentic data to the history of interpretation. The Boston orchestra's string pizzicati remain unmatched for power and resonance.

* * *

Piston's Third Symphony represents a modernization of this composer's esthetic, long strictly neo-Classic, in the direction of neo-Romanticism. It is, to my knowledge, his first work of major proportions based on rounded, on flowing, material, infallible clinical sign of an effort toward personalized expressivity. The first movement is leisurely, almost impressionistic in its deliberate floating of a mood. The second, a scherzo deals also with grace and probably evocation. The third, an adagio, sings and mounts. The fourth, a sort of rondo with fugal development, leaves the neo-Romantic plane of personalized expression and becomes an effective, if somewhat heavy-footed, march on a theme that fails to open up under development procedures because of its always-turning-back-on-itself conformation. The whole work thus fails of what I take to be its original expressive intention by giving up the effort at expansiveness just when this might have come to fruition.

* * *

It is, nevertheless, a step forward in Piston's creative life. Heretofore he has made perfect pieces somewhat meager in expressive content. Here he has made a rather more expressive piece, sacrificing perfection of form and stylistic consistency to that end. I doubt that the sacrifice of shapeliness was any part of his intention. Nor has he made such sacrifice in any radical way. The renouncement of stylistic consistency, in the final movement, may well have been deliberate. It is not, however, of any help to the work. The personal sentiment symphony has to open continuously; its last movement must be its climax and revelation. Like Prokofieff before him, in the latter's Fifth, Mr. Piston has walked out on the engagement. Let us hope that, now engaged in the new and, thankfully, dangerous path, he will see the matter through next time.

* * *

Piston has long been the most hermetic composer in America. The classical limpidity of his shapes and textures has proved, to this listener in any case, a barrier to the penetration of his thought. The removal of that barrier, however tentatively begun, can only be applauded by the many persons who, like myself, have long known him for a master and long wished to devine the exact nature of his musical communication. That there is in his work, however modesty on cagily concealed, a communication, is certain. Nobody writes music as assiduously as that and as well, unless somewhere in him is a real, personal and private necessity for doing so. The full revelation of that necessity is the destiny and the privilege of the assiduous and skilled composer. That it will be eventually forthcoming from Piston is your reporter's faith. That this composer's Third Symphony gives reason to hope for a not too far-off fuller revelation is his diagnosis of that work as heard Wednesday night.

WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS

Five Shows, Three Stations Granted Peabody Awards

NEW YORK, April 15 (U.P.)—Five network radio shows and three individual stations were named today as winners of the 1947 George Foster Peabo[illegible] [illegible]rds, one of radio's highest honors.

The Pea[illegible] prize for radio reporting went to Elmer Davis of the American [illegible]sting Company who won the same award in 1939. The committe[illegible] In a day of hysterical utterance his resolute reasoning point[illegible] [illegible]ward a possible pea[illegible]

Other [illegible] were to:

S[illegible] WBBM [illegible] Chicago (CBS) for [illegible] public service by a re[illegible] for its program, "Rep[illegible] Un[illegible]red," which dealt with [illegible] [illegible]linquency.

Station KXAR of Hope, Ark. (MBS) for outstanding public service by a local station for its disaster broadcast following a tornado.

Station WQQW of Washington for the [illegible] children's program of 1947

The Columbia Broadcasting System program, "CBS Views the Press," in the commentary type program.

The ABC show, "Theatre Guild of the Air," in the drama field.

The ABC presentation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the field of music.

The CBS documentary shows on housing, health and old age security in the field of outstanding educational programs.

The awards were presented at a luncheon of the New York Radio Executive Club. Presentation was by Edward Weeks, editor of the Atlantic Monthly and head of the Peabody Committee, and Dean John Drewry of the Georgia School of Journalism.

The awards were first presented in 1940. They are in memory o[illegible]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 16 1948

The News of Radio

'Theatre Guild on the Air,' Koussevitzky and Elmer Davis Among Peabody Winners

The annual George Foster Peabody Radio Awards, sponsored by the University of Georgia, were presented yesterday for the eighth time at a luncheon of the Radio Executives Club of New York in the Hotel Roosevelt. Recipients in their respective fields were:

Drama, "The Theatre Guild on the Air"; music, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; news reporting, Elmer Davis; news commentary, "CBS Views the Press"; educational program, "CBS Is There"; public service by a regional station, WBBM, Chicago, for "Report Uncensored," and community service by a local station, KXAR, Hope, Ark., for its coverage of a tornado disaster.

Citations went to "Studio One" in drama, WQQW, Washington, for a children's program, and WCCO, Minneapolis, for public service by a regional station.

A special citation was conferred on "United Nations Today," a recorded production of the radio division of the department of information of the United Nations. Henceforth, it was explained, international relations and television will be added to the categories considered for awards.

The presentations were made by Edward Weeks, chairman of the Peabody Advisory Board, and John E. Drewry, dean of the university's Henry W. Grady School of Journalism.

Mr. Weeks, in his opening talk, was sharply critical of radio for its repetition, "Sunday crime festivals" and "give-away programs."

Mr. Davis, who was named a winner immediately after the talk, dryly indicated some misgivings about accepting his award in view of Mr. Weeks' comments. Mr. Davis was a repeat winner, having received the same award in 1940.

William S. Hedges, who presided at the luncheon as president of the Radio Executives Club, announced a proposed slate of new officers, as follows: Carl Haverlin, president; Arthur Pryor Jr., vice president; Lewis Avery, treasurer, and Claude Barrere, secretary. The club will vote on new officers May 6.

Although its own New York television station has not yet been constructed, the ABC network last night started active video programming, the chain having made special arrangements with the local DuMont outlet, WABD. Its first bill was "Hollywood Screen Test," with Bert Lytell as master of ceremonies.

On Sunday at 6:30 P. M., ABC will introduce a commercially-sponsored variety program called "On the Corner," with Henry Morgan as the first principal guest. On Saturday, April 24, a bucolic revue, called "Hayloft Hoedown," is scheduled to make its bow.

Robert E. Kintner, ABC executive vice president, said that by the end of May his network planned remote television pick-ups and that it also would be present at the national political conventions in Philadelphia.

In these columns yesterday it was stated erroneously that the total number of television sets in this city was 17,592. Actually, that figure was merely the size of a sampling for a video survey conducted by The Daily News. As of March 1 the total number of video sets in the metropolitan area was put in the neighborhood of 125,000, and there has been an appreciable increase since.

Gertrude Lawrence's scheduled appearance in Shaw's "The Great Catherine" over NBC television has been postponed to May 2, when it will be presented under the auspices of the Theatre Guild. The production will take place in NBC's new television studio, 8G, which is expected to be opened next week. After her video performance Miss Lawrence will leave on a trip to England.

Samuel Chotzinoff yesterday was named general musical director of NBC. In his new capacity he is in charge of all musical activities, including television, in the company. He will report to Thomas McCray, manager of the program department.

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.
PRESS
APR 16 1948

Eleven Radio Awards Made

CBS Press Feature in List of Cited

NEW YORK, April 15 (AP)—Eight George Foster Peabody radio awards and three special awards were presented today at luncheon ceremonies.

The Peabody awards are designed to recognize disinterested and meritorious public service rendered each year by the broadcasting industry. They are in memory of George Foster Peabody, benefactor and life trustee of the University of Georgia.

Winners were:

"Report Uncensored," a program series of Station WBBM, Chicago, a CBS affiliate, for outstanding public service by a regional station.

"Disaster Broadcast From Cotton Valley," crisis services by Station KXAR, MBS affiliate, in Hope, Ark., for outstanding public service by a local station.

Good Reporting Rewarded

"CBS Views the Press," the Columbia Broadcasting System, for outstanding reporting and interpretation of the news.

Elmer Davis, American Broadcasting Company, outstanding reporting and interpretation of the news.

"Theatre Guild on the Air," American Broadcasting Company, outstanding entertainment in drama.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, American Broadcasting Company, outstanding entertainment in music.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

APR 16 1948

Dr. Koussevitzky's Retirement

If the retirement of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky from the regular leadership of the Boston Symphony were to mean the close of his active career as one of the truly great musicians of his time, the event would be an occasion for profound regret among thousands of his admirers. But relief from the "strenuous obligations" of the eighteen weeks of the annual winter season does not signify an arbitrary end to the master's work. He will preside over thirteen concerts in the 1948-1949 schedule and then appear as a guest at intervals with the organization he has brought to artistic perfection during a quarter century of tireless service. Also he has announced his intention to continue to direct the enterprises of the Berkshire Center at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, where musical history systematically is made.

After he retires Dr. Koussevitzky will have leisure for composition if he wishes to write, or he may lecture if he desires to exchange the podium for the lyceum platform. His interest in the democratization of genius already has prompted him to set up a foundation in memory of his wife "for the further development of musical culture." That philanthropy might be expanded by his own spoken interpretation of the recordings for which he is famous. It would be an experience worth having to hear him discourse on his conceptions of Tschaikowsky's Pathetique or Haydn's Surprise Symphony.

Much good could be accomplished in this respect if Dr. Koussevitzky were to do what Robert Schumann did in his journal between 1834 and 1844. Many people stand in need of instruction in the values of classic music, and if an accredited authority would undertake to teach them they surely would respond with enthusiasm.

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR

APR 16 1948

8 Radio Awards Are Handed Out

(By The Associated Press)

New York, April 16. — Eight George Foster Peabody radio awards and three special awards were presented Thursday at luncheon ceremonies.

The Peabody awards are designed to recognize disinterested and meretorious public service rendered each year by the broadcasting industry. They are in memory of George Foster Peabody, benefactor and life trustees of the University of Georgia.

Winners are:

"Report Uncensored," a program series of Station WBBM, Chicago, a CBS affiliate, for outstanding public service by a regional station.

"Disaster broadcast from Cotton Valley," crisis services by Station KXAR, MBS affiliate, in Hope, Ark., for outstanding public service by a local station.

"CBS Views the Press," the Columbia Broadasting System, for outstanding reporting and interpretation of the news.

Elmer Davis, American Broadcasting Co., outstanding reporting and interpretation of the news.

"Theater Guild on the Air," ABC, outstanding entertainment in drama.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, ABC, outstanding entertainment in music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 16 1948

C. B. S. Executives Receive Peabody Medal

Wells Church, left, director of news broadcasts of the Columbia Broadcasting System, and Frank Stanton, C. B. S. president, hold the George Foster Peabody Medal awarded to the network yesterday for its program "C. B. S. Views the Press." The award was one of five won by the network and its affiliates. Eleven medals and citations were presented at a luncheon of the Radio Executives Club in the Roosevelt

---

This Clipping From
ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS

AUG 17 1947

Koussevitsky, Secretary Wed In East

Koussevitzky

NEW YORK— (AP) —Serge Koussevitzky, 73 years old, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Miss Olga Naumoff, 46, his secretary for the past 18 years, were married Friday at the conductor's estate at Lenox, Mass., he disclosed Saturday.

Miss Naumoff is a niece of the conductor's wife, who died in 1942.

Peabody Radio Awards Go to EightPrograms

Special Citations Are Also Given for Distinguished Broadcasts During Year

Eight awards and three special citations for distinguished radio programs were presented yesterday at a luncheon of the Radio Executives Club in the Roosevelt. The session marked the eighth annual George Foster Peabody Awards, which are administered by the Henry W. Grady School of Journalism of the University of Georgia.

One of the three citations went to the United Nations Network for Peace for the "United Nations Today" program. Edward Weeks, chairman of the Peabody Advisory Board, said the awards committee was planning to present an annual prize for the program which "best promotes international relations." He also remarked that the awards next year would have to recognize the inroads of television into the radio field.

The awards were announced as follows:

1. For outstanding public service by a regional station: WBBM, Chicago, for "Report Uncensored," a program on juvenile delinquency.
2. For outstanding public service by a local station: KXAR, Hope, Ark., for "Disaster Broadcast From Cotton Valley" during a tornado in a neighboring county.
3. For outstanding reporting and interpretation of the news: the Columbia Broadcasting System for "C. B. S. Views the Press."
4. For outstanding reporting and interpretation of the news: Elmer Davis, of American Broadcasting Co.
5. For outstanding entertainment in drama: "Theater Guild on the Air," on the A. B. C. network.
6. For outstanding entertainment in music: The Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the A. B. C. network.
7. For an outstanding education program: C. B. S. for "C. B. S. Is There," a documentary program which handles historical events as if they were happening in the present.
8. For outstanding children's program: WQQW, Metropolitan Broadcasting Corp., Washington for "The Children's Hour."

The United Nations Network for Peace citation was accepted by Peter Aylen, director of the radio division of the department of information of the United Nations. Two other special citations went to WCCO, Minneapolis, for "As the Twig is Bent," which urged passage of a Minnesota youth conservation act, and to C. B. S. for "Studio One," for outstanding drama.

Among those accepting the awards were Dr. George Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Irving S. Olds, chairman of the board of United States Steel Corp., for "Theater Guild on the Air," and Mr. Davis.

Mr. Weeks, who is editor of "The Atlantic Monthly," delivered some pungent introductory remarks about radio crime shows, give-away programs, and comedians who deliver jokes about Hollywood and New York which mean little to the rest of the country.

Mr. Davis, who was announced immediately following Mr. Weeks's statement, said that he wondered at the wisdom of accepting an award in a field which, according to the magazine editor, was so immature. However, he added, he had been noting some of the products of the publishing business recently and to call that business mature, he said, would be an understatement.

Robert Swezey, executive vice-president of the Mutual Broadcasting System, announced the nomination of the following slate of officers to head the club next year: Carl Haverlin, president of Broadcast Music, Inc., for president; Arthur Pryor jr., of Batten, Barton, Durstine & Osborn, Inc., for vice-president; Lewis Avery, of Lewis Avery, Inc., station representatives, for treasurer, and Claude Barrere, for secretary. The elections will be held May 6.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

APR 16 1948

Forum Hears Koussevitzky And His Men

By Edwin H. Schloss

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra paid their annual visit to the Academy of Music last night under the auspices of the Philadelphia Forum.

A capacity audience of Forum members and other music lovers was on hand to take advantage of the season's only opportunity to hear one of this country's "Big Three" orchestras other than our own "village band."

ON HIGH LEVEL

The playing last night was, in general, on the high level that everyone has long associated with the art of the distinguished Dr. Koussevitzky and his players.

The ensemble had sonority, fine texture and precision, and if the balance was at times distorted that can probably be charged up to the fact that the conductor and his men were house guests unfamiliar with Academy acoustics.

The program was neatly chosen to cover a century and a half of the orchestral repertory. Viennese classicism was represented by the "Jupiter" Symphony of Mozart; turn-of-the century "modernism" by Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" and late Romanticism of about the same period by the Sibelius Second Symphony.

HORNS ARE NOISY

Dr. Koussevitzky was handsomely at home in all styles though perhaps less so in the Eighteenth Century with Mozart than in the early 20th, with Prokofieff and Sibelius. The horns and trumpets which should perhaps be felt rather than heard in the "Jupiter" were noisy. The slow movement was played with muted strings, which in this listener's opinion hardly comes under the head of an improvement; and the The Minuet, one of the most buoyant Mozart ever wrote, lacked a shade of "lift." But the great fugato in the Finale came off with splendid elan.

The "Scythian Suite," ballet music in the neo-pagan style of the later Russians, is clever and effective "theater" and Dr. Koussevitzky played it brilliantly as such.

This score no longer sounds as wild-eyed and savage as it did when first heard on these shores almost 30 years ago. Some of it, indeed, now sounds very much like salon barbarism.

But the blazing brasses of the final "Procession of the Sun" still are stupendously effective and the Boston brasses are second to none.

AUDIENCE ENTHUSIASTIC

The evening concluded with a beautifully poised and imaginative eading of the Sibelius Second. Here he Boston woodwinds were on reuisition and they responded beautiully, from a stage on which Philaelphians are used to what is probbly the finest orchestral woodwind laying in the world—from the cademy's home team.

The audience was warmly enthusistic and Dr. Koussevitzky was realled for repeated acknowledgents, which he shared with his en.

Before the concert William K. uff, executive director of the orum, announced from the stage at Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boson Symphony had just received the eorge Foster Peabody radio award r "outstanding entertainment in usic in 1947."

TORONTO, CANADA
STAR

APR 17 1948

Koussevitsky to Retire

Russian conductor of Boston Symphony retires this year, continuing as head of Tanglewood summer school in N.J. Munch, of French Orchestra National, takes the Boston baton; so not likely Munch will pilot his French orchestra in America—and Toronto—next season. K. was here but once, long ago. Never forget his Boston tone-ecstasy in Brahms No. 1, baton'd by the Slav who made his music-"rep" playing bull-fiddle in River Volga ship-orchestra. In 1905 Gericke baton'd that orchestra here —famous for re[illegible] all individual violins to get [illegible] uniformity of tone from [illegible] fiddles. Stokowski 25 [illegible] said here, "I'd know t[illegible] orchestra anywhere by [illegible] as when the city on [illegible] famous for baked [illegible] bluestockings"; after [illegible] of Nikisch batonier of the band founded and deficit-paid by [illegible] Higginson; last great American orchestra to be unionized; distinction then to play even a triangle in the ensemble whose concertmaster Witek used the first copper E-string in America. So, Boston went off the M.P.A.-controlled air list—playing its first resurrective radio program about the time Fiedler from B.SO.. first came here for T.S.O. "pops."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 18 1948

The Bostonians

Koussevitzky Gets Ovation as Season Here Ends

By Arthur V. Berger

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, concluded its New York season yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The main portion of the program was given over to two standard symphonies. Mozart's "Jupiter" and Beethoven's seventh, and even the modern work was a fairly familiar one. Prokofieff's second "Romeo and Juliet" Suite, which this orchestra had, as a matter of fact, presented here earlier this year. But the program offered much that was gratifying, nevertheless, for the two symphonies are towering masterpieces, and the Prokofieff, nicely contrasting with them, has three movements that are melodious and agreeable—lithe and refreshing in the dance-like portions, and peculiarly personal in the Chaplinesque pathos of the first movement.

The finale, "Romeo by Juliet's Grave," showed the less happy, the grandiose side of Prokofieff, which characteristically, of late, mixes with the more honest and truly inspired creative ideas he is eminently capable of. Doubtless, the subject matter calls for a more serious approach than in the earlier movements, but not for the obviousness of the material, and therefore the absence of such imaginative touches as, for example, the slides in the violas in the "Montagues and Capulets."

Mr. Koussevitzky, however, was altogether in his element in the last movement of the Prokofieff, eliciting the most luminous and affecting sonorities from the high violins, and stretching out each chord with loving care. And the other movements, too, were impressively played.

In the symphonies, Mr. Koussevitsky seemed at his best in the slow movements. Every curve of the line was beautifully molded in the Mozart andante, and the Beethoven allegretto came off in one piece, the violin figurations above the march-like theme moving into the fugue with the utmost smoothness. The outer movements of the Mozart, at the very fast pace Mr. Koussevitsky chose, and with the rich, full quality of the strings, did not give the figurations in eighth notes much opportunity to stand out clearly. The grand line, however, was well conveyed.

There was an ovation of several minutes at the end of the concert for the conductor.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 18 1948

BOSTONIANS CLOSE NEW YORK SEASON

Koussevitzky Leads the Group in Mozart, Prokofieff and Beethoven Compositions

By OLIN DOWNES

Perhaps the final test of the depth and authority of a conductor's art is still answered most fully by his understanding of the greatest classics of the repertory. But this is by no means the entire test. Some would say that the understanding of both classic and contemporaneous music is equally essential to his mission.

As if Dr. Koussevitzky were meeting both these tests in the most conclusive manner he closed his New York season of 1947-48 at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert of yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with memorable performances of the Mozart "Jupiter" Symphony, Prokofieff's highly modern "Romeo and Juliet" suite, and the Beethoven Seventh Symphony.

Dr. Koussevitzky also demonstrated his matured interpretive are in the authority and unfettered elasticity of face and phrase with which he conducted Mozart and Beethoven. He approached their masterpiece with equal respect for the precise proportions of their structures that made possible the conviction and eloquence of the plastic detail. Thus he sang the slow movement of the "Jupiter," with its ineffable beauty and pathos with a fluidity that released music of every conventional constraint yet remained perfectly in the frame of the classic style.

The Supreme Lyricist

Mozart, the supreme lyricist, was present in every measure; but the fugal developments and the almost carpentered fitting together of the ideas of the grand finale were precise and imperiously ordered. This only served to make the more thrilling the winged flight of the music.

Nothing, of course, would be farther from all this than the modern workmanship, style, even psychology of Prokofieff's suite, assembled from his ballet of 1935, "Romeo and Juliet." But Prokofieff is far, in these pages, from the parodist and the anti-romantic that he often has proved to be. He expresses himself not only with feeling, but striking richness of imagery and ideas. The finest of the four movements, "Juliet the Maiden," is a very moving and poetical passage. The sharp physiognomy of so many of the Prokofieff themes is not here, if we except, perhaps, the intensely dissonant chords and the prideful swing of the principal dance theme, wholly appropriate to the thought of "Montagues and Capulets. The next movement, "The Dance," is fanciful and tender, and not of today.

Handicap of Scenario

One may or may not consider the music of "Romeo at Juliet's Grave" adequate to its subject, but it is to be remembered that Prokofieff had the handicap here of a scenario which informs the audience, in accordance with one of those incredible distortions of past masterpieces which Russian artistic policies have permitted, that Juliet is not really dead—however Shakespeare represented the matter—with the inference that therefore Romeo's grief will be assuaged! We cannot blame the composer if in this place his music rings more scenic than true.

The suite was superbly played, with orchestral effect and interpretive insight that Prokofieff himself would surely have commended. But each work on the program was approached, as it seemed, with equal felicity. The Seventh Symphony capped the concert, in the power, imagination and essential simplicity which characterized it and displayed again, in this exceptionally transparent score, the qualities of the peerless orchestra.

This was Dr. Koussevitzky's edly the orchestra rose with him after the performances to acknowledge the audience's approval. There was a long demonstration at the end.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 18 1948

AS THE SEASON ENDS

Philharmonic Plans to Continue Policy Of Guest Conductors Next Year

By OLIN DOWNES

THE returns from the New York Philharmonic-Symphony season of 1947-48 are [illegible] number of composers [illegible] the number of [illegible] which was seventy-two; the number of first performances of works new to America, [illegible] to New York, to the programs of the society. Also the number of [illegible] including twelve [illegible] violinists, one violist, [illegible] twelve vocalists, [illegible] aside from [illegible] by members of the orchestra when their services as such were required in the presentation of "special works"; the list of extra "member" [illegible] the Pension Fund concert which Mr. Stokowski conducted and various minor details of the season and last, but not least, the number and the names of the conductors.

It was a season of guest conductors [illegible] one dominant [illegible] Stokowski had [illegible] any of his [illegible]

[illegible] were five: Stokowski [illegible] conducted for eight [illegible] for six; Mitropoulos, [illegible] four; Walter, six. In addition to these, Walter Hendl, the orchestra's assistant conductor, led two of the Saturday night concerts and one of the Young People's Concerts at Town Hall. The second of these was conducted by Leon Barzin.

The repertory offered a wide and interesting variety of works, old and new although no single novelty that would bid fair to have a permanent and important place in the repertory was divulged. The Krenek Fourth Symphony proved to be an over-sophisticated and unconvincing essay in the most modern and atonal style. The first symphony of Elie Siegmeister, in the American folk vein, and written with sincerity and enthusiasm, impresses us in retrospect as the work of a composer who is finding himself but has not yet arrived at the maturity of thought, technic and style, necessary for the complete projection of his ideas.

Harcourt (Paris)
Charles Munch.

New Works

Heard for the first time in America was Honegger's "Jeanne d'Arc au Bucher," scored for a grand assembly of choristers, soloists, and speaker with orchestral background, to the text of Paul Claudel. This is a spectacular piece, showy in its effects, but with weak musical under-pinning; a piece that does not begin to compare with the far more serious, intensely felt, and untheatrically projected "Symphony for Strings" by the same composer, which also figured on a Philharmonic-Symphony program of the winter.

Two other first American hearings were those of Khatchaturian's "Russian Fantasy," and Mahler's Sixth Symphony. Khatchaturian's piece is poor and banal. The symphony of Mahler, long neglected, justified in some measure its obscurity. For it has to an excessive degree Mahler's frequent excesses.

Works heard for the first time in New York were Robert Casadesus' well-composed Piano Concerto, Opus 37, performed with the composer as soloist; Hindemith's "Symphony Serena," not heard by this writer, and meeting with a generally favorable reception from authoritative pens; the Honegger "Symphony," already mentioned; Khatchaturian's "Masquerade Suite"; Milhaud's "Symphony No. 2"; Virgil Thomson's "The Seine at Night." There were also presentations by the Philharmonic-Symphony of two scores which had previously received radio or concert performances free to the public. These were Norman Dello Joio's "Concert Music for Orchestra," which did not impress this writer as the composer's best, and Douglas Moore's modestly composed Second Symphony, a work which goes its own way, which is not that of jazz, folksong or atonality and which has a simple and refreshing American sentiment.

Other Performances

There were nineteen first performances by the Society of works which had previously been presented here by other bodies. Their composers were Barber, Copland, George and Gould for the American born, and Bartók, Fernandez, Handel-Casadesus, Hindemith, Martinu, Messiaen, Mozart, Prokofieff, Shostakovich, Sibelius, Strauss, Stravinsky and Verdi. Especially classified in the Philharmonic-Symphony report are first performances of arrangements of the Bach chorale-prelude, "Kyrie, Gott Heiliger Geist," by Kay and Bauer's tone poem, "Sun Splendor" and the first concert performance of Mennin's Fantasia for Strings.

If the writer were asked to nominate the best of these scores he would list, at least, the Barber violoncello concerto, the Bartók "Dance Suite," Copland's Third Symphony; Gould's "Minstrel Show," Hindemith's "Concert Music for Strings and Brass"; the Mozart E flat piano cocerto, and, of course, Sibelius's suite from music to the play, "Belshazzar's Feast," and the Richard Strauss "Metamorphosen" for twenty-three solo string instruments. But to no one of these works would he award the palm for outstanding creative power and significance.

An Inclusive Repertory

This repertory, more inclusive, as the repertory of an American orchestra is likely to be, than any that would have been offered by any European orchestra, even before the two world wars, is at the same time strikingly indicative of the state of musical composition today. There is great activity. Especially in America, where the ferment is going on at considerable speed and temperature, are the composers learning their business, sharpening their weapons, laying the foundation for the greater things to come. From where? And tending in what direction? What will our composers evolve into? Whither, indeed, contemporaneous music?

And it is rather similar in the field of musical interpretation—at least as exemplified by our present popular system of "guest" conducting. Where are the great new talents in conducting? They are very few. The leading men, as they are now estimated, are all of the oldest or elder generation. This is not in itself curious, considering the time and the experience needed to make a truly great conductor. But how many are there, at present visible, who promise a similar degree of eminence when they reach their maturity? One or two young men are emerging and advancing under heavy odds. As it stands not only the Philharmonic-Symphony, but most of the other leading orchestras, rely upon the services of those whom we could call in a generic way the old men.

Replacements

Koussevitzky has given notice that he will retire in another season from the Boston Symphony. He will be replaced after the season of 1948-49 by Charles Munch, a conductor of signal capacities, of the generation past 50. Who will replace Stokowski when he stops? Who will follow Toscanini, at anywhere near his level? Or Monteux of San Francisco?

Younger, and from Europe, is Szell with the Cleveland Orchestra. Erich Leinsdorf is the youngest of those who have come from abroad, and is doing admirably with the Rochester Symphony. The one young American to have an established major position is Thor Johnson, with the orchestra of Cincinnati. Leonard Bernstein, by far the most brilliantly endowed of the young men, has had his orchestra disappear from under his feet at the City Center, which is unfortunate for the orchestra, the institution and its public. We need to do better by our conductors, which does not necessarily mean putting them immediately in the highest positions. Alexander Smallens, with both an operatic and symphonic repertory of uncommon extent, has become musical director of Radio City Music Hall. It is a good appointment offering broad opportunities to a musician of such experience, energy and imagination. But it can hardly call into play the extent of Mr. Smallens' knowledge and musicianship.

Walter Hendl.

In the meantime the Philharmonic-Symphony continues next season with its sure-fire series of guest leaders and soloists calculated to give additional pull to the box office.

The problems of orchestral policy are vast and complicated, and much easier to adjust from a swivel chair than from the other side of the footlights. But this is to be observed: the two orchestras of the big three of the Eastern border, those of Philadelphia and of Boston, operate under the leadership of a single conductor whose command is undivided. They have no better personnel than the Philharmonic-Symphony, but they have developed and reached higher consistent levels of performance as orchestras. The Boston Symphony sells out all its advance subscription series, in Boston, or New York, or any other place where it annually visits. And soloists are unnecessary to sell the organization to the public which goes to hear the orchestra. The same orchestra, the same conductor, who has been there for twenty-four years. Moralizing is superfluous.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 17 1948

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Final Concert of Season

By JOHN BALL Jr.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky back on the podium, appeared in a concert last night at the Academy of Music. It was the final concert of the Boston Orchestra's 1947-48 Brooklyn season which was sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

For the evening's program Dr. Koussevitzky selected Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Serge Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet Suite No. 2" and Sibelius' "Symphony No. 2."

It is hardly necessary to offer extended comment on the playing of the Boston Orchestra. A bad performance coming from this ensemble is a hard thing to imagine. Of last night's three offerings, the latter two appealed most strongly to this listener. This does not mean by any stretch of the imagination that we don't like Mozart, for nothing could be farther from the truth; we feel rather that the Prokofieff and Sibelius works were more aptly suited to this orchestra and to its conductor than the purely classic idiom.

The sound of the orchestra was rich as ever, particularly in the romantically-scored Sibelius work. This particular symphony, which has been called Sibelius "pastoral," makes good listening every six months or so, (but no oftener). In music of this sort the Boston orchestra is thoroughly at home and never fails to distinguish itself.

For reasons best known to himself Dr. Koussevitzky issued instructions before the concert that no persons were to be seated during the playing of the Mozart symphony which meant that many people were kept unnecessarily on their feet for almost half an hour.

We regard this as very bad judgment. When several hundred people assemble to hear a concert, it is reasonable to expect that some few will be prevented from arriving as promptly as they might have liked. To ask them to wait until a suitable interval in the music is correct and proper. To compell them to stand unnecessarily is not.

This symphony has clear breaks between movements which would have permitted many people to take the seats for which they had paid good money. At a time when subscriptions are being invited for the next season, Dr. Koussevitzky's action appears to have been a badly timed display of temperment.

Otherwise the concert was unquestionably a success. The program notes, we observed, made reference to the Prokofieff "Fifth Symphony" as having not yet been performed in this country. This of course is not the case. The program notes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are splendidly written by John N. Burk, who appears to have committed one of his rare errors in reprinting notes prepared for a previous performance, without having corrected them first.

Such minor matters as these occur from time to time to prove that the great names of music are also human. Despite Dr. Koussevitzky's tactics in keeping many subscribers on their feet to hear his Mozart, the series next season will undoubtedly again be a sellout—in tribute both to a great musical organization and to the calibre of the Brooklyn audience which come to hear it play.

ASHEVILLE, N. C.
CITIZEN
APR 18 1948

Four Artists Are Awarded Music Prizes

NEW YORK, April 17. (AP)—Lukas Foss, 26, of Boston, and Halsey Stevens, 40, of Los Angeles, are the 1948 winners of the publication awards of the Society for the Publication of American Music. Foss's work is a string quartet in G major, and Stevens' is a quintet for flute, strings and piano. The awards were announced by Prof. Philip James, head of the society and also of the music department of New York university. Among judges were members of the Eastman, Yale, Juilliard and Columbia faculties.

Sigi Weissenberg, 18, a pianist now studying at Juilliard, won the eighth annual contest of the Egar M. Leventritt foundation. The award will be an appearance with the New York Philharmonic.

The Esco foundation for Palestine composition scholarship for study at the Berkshire Music center this summer has been given to Herbert Brun, 29, of Tel Aviv, by American judges Leonard Bernstein, Henry Cowell, Ethel S. Cohen, Frederick Jacobi, Wallingford Riegger and Stafen Wolpe.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 18 1948

PEABODY AWARDS: The George Foster Peabody Radio Awards were announced last week at a luncheon of the New York City Radio Executives Club. Presentation of the seven awards for outstanding merit and the four special citations were made by Edward Weeks, editor of The Atlantic Monthly and chairman of the Peabody Advisory Board, and John E. Drewry, dean of the University of Georgia Henry W. Grady School of Journalism.

Here is the list of prize winners:

Outstanding public service by a regional station: "Report Uncensored," program series of Station WBBM, Chicago, Ill., CBS affiliate.

Outstanding public service by a local station: "Disaster Broadcast From Cotton Valley," crisis services by Station KXAR, Hope, Arkansas, MBS affiliate.

Outstanding news commentary: "CBS Views the Press," program series of the Columbia Broadcasting System.

Outstanding reporting and interpretation of the news: Elmer Davis, American Broadcasting Company.

Outstanding entertainment in drama: "Theatre Guild on the Air," American Broadcasting Company.

Outstanding entertainment in music: The Boston Symphony Orchestra, American Broadcasting Company.

Outstanding educational program: CBS Documentary Unit Series, Columbia Broadcasting System.

Special Citation No. 1: "As The Twig Is Bent," series by Station WCCO, Minneapolis, Minn., CBS affiliate.

Special Citation No. 2: "United Nations Today," a service of the United Nations Network for Peace.

Special Citation No. 3: "The Children's Hour," series by Station WQQW, Washington, D. C.

Special Citation No. 4: "Studio One," drama series by Columbia Broadcasting System.

BATON ROUGE, LA.
ADVOCATE
19 1948

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky lunched with Eleanor Steber during the singer's visit to Boston, and asked her how long she's been singing with the Metropolitan Opera. "I've just finished my eighth season," she told him. Koussevitzky bowed: "I salute your patience" . . . Louis Nizer's new book, "Between You and Me," out next week, has a remarkable collection of advance raves from authors critics and politicians . . . Toots Shor, whose favorite insult is "ya crum," said last night that the only man who is insult-proof to him is Bartley Crum .

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
8 1940

Boston Symphony And Theatre Guild Cited

"Theatre Guild on the Air," and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, radio programs, were among winners of the 1947 Peabody Awards.

In 1945 "Theatre Guild on the Air," now being heard for its third successive year on the ABC network, made its debut and marked the initial venture into radio of the Theatre Guild, one of America's oldest and most distinguished theatrical producing organizations. The award this year was given for "outstanding entertainment in drama."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, first major American symphonic music organization to be heard on radio, broadcast its opening program in 1926. With the formation of ABC in 1942, the Boston orchestra has been heard each season. During the orchestra's warm weather recitals, ABC carries the Boston Pops series, the Esplanade Concerts and the Berkshire Festival.

KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE
APR 18 1948

DROPS BOSTON BATON—After 25 years as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 73, announces he will resign after the 1948 season.

[106]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 18 1948

MUSIC ON THE RADIO

By B. H. HAGGIN

VEINER and the Pittsburgh Symphony—on N. B. C.'s April 10 Orchestras of the Nation—played a Sinfonietta by Lopatnikoff, concerning which I might paraphrase Shaw and say: "This is modern music. This is over my head, this is." Or repeat my own comment on another work by Lopatnikoff in the same idiom—that listening to it was like following a train of thought concealed in impenetrable code.

David Diamond's Music for "Romeo and Juliet"—originally commissioned by Thomas Scherman for his Little Orchestra, and given its first radio performance by Sylvan Levin and the WOR Orchestra last Sunday—I did not find impenetrable. But the sense it made with its raucously amorphous material—both as ordered sound and in relation to its subject—seemed to me not worth the effort of all those involved in the occasion.

Copland's "Appalachian Spring" was the contemporary work on the program of the first of the spring broadcasts of the N. B. C. Symphony on April 10 under Leinsdorf's direction. It was an interesting program, with three Sinfonias of cantatas by Bach, two of which turned out to be his own transcriptions of the first movement of the Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, and the first movement of the E major Sonata for unaccompanied violin; and with the Theme and Variations from Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 3, which Balanchine used for a ballet this year. I hear this piece now enriched by the added counterpoint of movement; but I am certain that if I had heard it for the first time April 10 I would say: the theme is insignificant, the form asks for a mere exercise of ingenious craftsmanship; and one is amazed first by what powers of craftsmanship, and then by what additional warming gifts of imagination, feeling and taste reveal themselves in the dazzling series of transformations of that insignificant theme. There was some dazzling virtuoso playing, too, by the orchestra.

Muench's treatment of the first movement of Mozart's "Prague" Symphony—in his March 30 broadcast with the Boston Symphony over A. B. C.—was straightforward; but in the Andante a couple of times there were sudden drops to pianissimo and a slower pace for dramatic effect. Thus in the one work there was the erratic unevenness I have found in Muench's performances. As for the performance of Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique that created such a sensation, when at last I heard it in a New York Philharmonic broadcast in January I agreed with the musician who remarked that it was easy to make a piece exciting by whipping it up to twice its correct tempo, but one of the results was that the March to the Scaffold became a March of Triumph.

WJZ's April 4 Coffee Concert, devoted to music by Bach, was the first of a series of four by the harpsichordist Sylvia Marlowe with Victor Just, flutist, Bronislav Gimpel, violinist, and George Ricci, cellist, as assisting artists. All four played a Trio Sonata in C, which, though by Bach, was a very dull piece. And then Miss Marlowe alone played the Italian Concerto: the first movement with much pounding of the instrument to produce sonorities that were spectacular but excessive; the second movement with constant distention of tempo and phrase which destroyed continuity of flow in the long progression of melody; the third with more natural "go." But on April 11 Miss Marlowe's playing was more relaxed in the solo pieces by Purcell which followed an excellent performance of his lovely Golden Sonata with the assisting artists.

Yella Pessl, whose concluding harpsichord recital in a WQXR series I heard on March 28, also goes in for a dynamic style, at times, that is achieved by pounding her instrument. But there were long stretches of quiet and more sensitive playing in the rather dull music—by Bach and Sweelinck, I believe.

Schnabel's playing—in the performances of sonatas with Szigeti which WNYC broadcast from the Frick Collection on April 4—came over the air with a dullness and heaviness of sound that I am inclined to ascribe to the transmission. Balance has been much improved in the Frick Collection broadcasts this year; but piano sound has lacked lustre. Even so the performance of Beethoven's Opus 96 was very fine.

Nobody I've asked was able to guess that "virtuosity—not in the prerogative sense" in last Sunday's column about the Toscanini broadcast of Beethoven's Ninth had originally—and as late as the last proof I saw—been "virtuosity—not in the pejorative sense."

Here are some programs of the week:

Today—A. M.: Works of Scarlatti and Corelli, played by Sylvia Marlowe, harpsichordist, and assisting artists, WJZ, 8:30; Biggs organ recital, C. B. S., 9:15. P. M.: Scarlatti's "Les Adieux" and Mozart's Oboe Quartet, WNYC, 1; Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," performed by Bruno Walter with the New York Philharmonic and assisting artists, C. B. S., 3; Mozart's Quartet K. 575, played by the WQXR String Quartet, WQXR, 6; Bach Aria Group, WABF (FM), 6:30; Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," WQXR, 8:30; Handel's Violin Sonata in D, Beethoven's "Eroica" Variations for piano, WQXR, 11.

Monday—P. M.: Mozart's "Seraglio" Overture, Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" (Beecham), WQXR, 8.

Tuesday—P. M.: Prokofieff's Scythian Suite, WNYC, 7; Strauss's "Don Quixote," WQXR, 8; Stravinsky's "L'Histoire d'un soldat," WQXR, 10.

Wednesday—P. M.: Organ works by Buxtehude, Walther and Bohm, played by Ernest White, WNYC, 8; Mozart's Sonata K. 304, played by Sylvan Shulman, violin, and Edward Robinson, piano, WNYC, 8:30.

Thursday—P. M.: Berlioz's "Queen Mab" Scherzo, WQXR, 9:10.

Friday—P. M.: Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex," from the Juilliard School, WNYC, 8:30.

Saturday—P. M.: Gillis's Short Overture, Rathaus's Polonaise Symphonique, Brahms's Third Symphony, played by the Southern Symphony under Carl Bamberger, N. B. C., 3; Handel-Harty "Water Music," Debussy's Rhapsody for clarinet and orchestra, Delius's "Summer Night on the River," played by the A. B. C. Symphony under Chauncey Kelly, WJZ, 3:30; Haydn's Quartet Opus 76, No. 4, WQXR, 11.

AYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
19 1948

MUSIC

Münch of Boston

Münch: Silver bangs and the Gallic touch

Would the Friends of the Boston Symphony, requested Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's trustees, please remain seated after the music; there would be an important announcement. The approximately 700 Friends (contributors to the symphony) who were present in Symphony Hall for their annual meeting on April 8 raised a collective eyebrow. After the music, they generally had tea in the Huntington Avenue foyer. However, when Serge Koussevitzky had finished conducting two Preludes by Wagner, the Friends stayed in their seats.

The announcement was that 74-year-old Koussevitzky, their adored conductor for 24 years, was going to retire at the end of the 1948-49 season. Since next year will mark his 25th anniversary with the orchestra, the Boston Symphony would celebrate 1948-49 as the Silver Jubilee Season of Serge Koussevitzky. All this was no great surprise, for rumors of his impending retirement have been going the rounds for several years.

Then came the answer to the question the music world has been asking for just as long: When Koussevitzky finally did retire, who would succeed him? Would it be Leonard Bernstein, his young protégé? Would it be Charles Münch, the silver-haired Alsatian who has taken most of the major American symphonies by storm since he began guest-conducting in this country in December 1946? Or would it be the dynamic Greek from Minneapolis, Dimitri Mitropoulos?

Münch it was. In October 1949, "le beau Charles," as the ladies in Paris used to call him, will take over as conductor of the world-famous precision instrument that is the Boston Symphony. Although Koussevitzky will continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center, Münch will conduct the popular Berkshire Festival concerts at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony's other home in Lenox, Mass.

Strings: Münch is now 56. His father was an Alsatian musician; his mother, a Parisian, and he was born in Strasbourg. His early musical interest centered on the violin, which he first studied with his father and later under Lucien Capet in Paris and Carl Flesch in Berlin. Switching to conducting, he served under Wilhelm Furtwängler in the Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipzig. In 1932 Münch began conducting in Paris and founded the Paris Philharmonic. By 1938 he had succeeded Philippe Gaubert as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. During the occupation Münch continued conducting, for there was no other way to keep the musicians together and a German conductor out. However, he turned over his salary to the Resistance.

Although Münch still maintains his connections with both the Paris Philharmonic and the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, lately he has spent most of his time guesting (coincidentally, Boston was the scene of his first American guest appearance). Next year, before he becomes Boston's conductor, his United States schedule includes appearances with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, the Chicago Symphony, and a tour with the F[illegible] Orchestre National.

Sings: All signs indicate that Münch will enjoy a great success at Beacon Hill and Back Bay tea parties. His personal charm is enormous. Although his spoken English is still very much on the tentative side, his French manner more than makes up for that. How the critics will take to him remains to be seen. He sings along with the strings as loud, if not louder, than Toscanini does. He shushes for pianissimos and exhorts for fortissimos. He may use a baton; or he may leave it idle in his left hand. He waves his arms and moves so violently that his hair falls into bangs across his forehead.

Never, however, does he appear to force tone, however louder than loudest he may have the orchestra play. And purity of tone is one of the hallmarks of the Boston Symphony. Just the week before his contract was signed, most of the Boston critics roundly roasted him for the speed and bombast which he put into the Beethoven Eighth and the Schumann Fourth. But when he does Berlioz and Honegger, few can find any fault.

However controversial Münch may prove, all the Boston critics are in agreement on one most significant point: The trustees of the orchestra at least took action and, unlike New York, Chicago, and Pittsburgh, did not follow the line of least resistance and hire a series of guest conductors. The Boston Symphony is a unique instrument, and it will be Münch, and Münch alone, who will be responsible for keeping it so.

Summer, 1915

Boston's big music news of last week was not supposed to be about a new conductor. As originally planned, it was to concern the world première on April 9 of a new work titled "Knoxville: Summer of 1915." When Münch was named on April 8, music circles felt that after a stunner like that, any première would undoubtedly fall into the category of the also-rans.

But Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted the work on Friday afternoon, and Eleanor Steber, the Metropolitan Opera soprano who sang it, were in no mood to concede an anticlimax. They believed in it. Koussevitzky had urged Sam Barber, easily one of our finest young composers, to write a work for voice and orchestra. And Miss Steber, for whom Barber had wanted to compose something, commissioned it. So Koussevitzky, Miss Steber, and the Boston Symphony (who had taken to it from first rehearsal) gave "Knoxville: Summer of 1915" a beautiful, compelling performance.

"Knoxville: Summer of 1915" is an all-American affair on an all-American theme. Barber was born in West Chester, Pa.; Miss Steber, in Wheeling, W. Va., and James Agee, whose prose poem Barber selected as his text, was born in the city he wrote about. Agee's introductory lines to the work set its theme and mood: "We are talking now of summer evenings in Knoxville, Tenn., in the time that I lived there so successfully disguised to myself as a child."

Miss Steber and Koussevitzky

Memory: The Jim Agee who, in the summer of 1915[illegible] just short of 6 years of age, remem[illegible] sounds and sensations familiar [illegible] Americans. "That time of even[illegible] wrote, "when people sit on their [illegible]es, rocking gently and talking gently and watching the street . . ." There are people walking by, "the taste hovering over them of vanilla, strawberry, pasteboard, and starched milk." There is also, of course, the streetcar, "stopping; belling and starting."* And finally, just before bedtime, there used to be the spreading of quilts on the grass in the back yard, with the whole family lying under the stars, very quietly and full of feelings of peace and security.

[illegible]The music Barber wrote is modern, but [illegible]en with melody and perceptive of the [illegible] Agee created. The part for soprano [illegible] perfectly [illegible] Miss Steber's extraordinary [illegible] and [illegible]ble musicianship. Although the critics were divided on the work [illegible] Miss Steber's performance drew the highest [illegible]

MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD

APR [illegible] 1948

Muench To Lead Boston Symphony

Charles Muench, famous European conductor who made conductorial history while guesting with the Boston Symphony during the past two seasons, has been engaged as permanent leader of that organization beginning October, 1949.

The resignation of Serge Koussevitzky, now 74 years old, has been tendered the board of trustees, to take effect at that time. Koussevitsky has guided the organization for 25 years.

The veteran conductor will continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center and will conduct the festivals of 1948 and 1949.

Dr. Muench accepted the appointment before leaving for Europe to fulfill spring engagements in France, Holland and Belgium.

He is at present conductor of both the Paris Conservatory orchestra and Paris Philharmonic orchestra, and has a long record of high successes with numerous European ensembles. This past season he conducted the Boston Symphony for three weeks in November and March.

[illegible], TN
COMMERCIAL APPEAL
4/19/48

Drops Boston Bator

AFTER 25 years as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 73, announces he will resign after the 1948 season. (International)

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 18 1948

MUSIC ON THE RADIO

By B. H. HAGGIN

VEINER and the Pittsburgh Symphony—on N. B. C.'s April 10 Orchestras of the Nation—played a Sinfonietta by Lopatnikoff, concerning which I might paraphrase Shaw and say: "This is modern music. This is over my head, this is." Or repeat my own comment on another work by Lopatnikoff in the same idiom—that listening to it was like following a train of thought concealed in impenetrable code.

David Diamond's Music for "Romeo and Juliet"—originally commissioned by Thomas Scherman for his Little Orchestra, and given its first radio performance by Sylvan Levin and the WOR Orchestra last Sunday—I did not find impenetrable. But the sense it made with its raucously amorphous material—both as ordered sound and in relation to its subject—seemed to me not worth the effort of all those involved in the occasion.

Copland's "Appalachian Spring" was the contemporary work on the program of the first of the spring broadcasts of the N. B. C. Symphony on April 10 under Leinsdorf's direction. It was an interesting program, with three Sinfonias of cantatas by Bach, two of which turned out to be his own transcriptions of the first movement of the Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, and the first movement of the E major Sonata for unaccompanied violin; and with the Theme and Variations from Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 3, which Balanchine used for a ballet this year. I hear this piece now enriched by the added counterpoint of movement; but I am certain that if I had heard it for the first time April 10 I would say: the theme is insignificant, the form asks for a mere exercise of ingenious craftsmanship; and one is amazed first by what powers of craftsmanship, and then by what additional warming gifts of imagination, feeling and taste reveal themselves in the dazzling series of transformations of that insignificant theme. There was some dazzling virtuoso playing, too, by the orchestra.

Muench's treatment of the first movement of Mozart's "Prague" Symphony—in his March 30 broadcast with the Boston Symphony over A. B. C.—was straightforward; but in the Andante a couple of times there were sudden drops to pianissimo and a slower pace for dramatic effect. Thus in the one work there was the erratic unevenness I have found in Muench's performances. As for the performance of Berlioz's Symphonie Fantastique that created such a sensation, when at last I heard it in a New York Philharmonic broadcast in January I agreed with the musician who remarked that it was easy to make a piece exciting by whipping it up to twice its correct tempo, but one of the results was that the March to the Scaffold became a March of Triumph.

WJZ's April 4 Coffee Concert, devoted to music by Bach, was the first of a series of four by the harpsichordist Sylvia Marlowe with Victor Just, flutist, Bronislav Gimpel, violinist, and George Ricci, cellist, as assisting artists. All four played a Trio Sonata in C, which, though by Bach, was a very dull piece. And then Miss Marlowe alone played the Italian Concerto; the first movement with much pounding of the instrument to produce sonorities that were spectacular but excessive; the second movement with constant distention of tempo and phrase which destroyed continuity of flow in the long progression of melody; the third with more natural "go." But on April 11 Miss Marlowe's playing was more relaxed in the solo pieces by Purcell which followed an excellent performance of his lovely Golden Sonata with the assisting artists.

Yella Pessl, whose concluding harpsichord recital in a WQXR series I heard on March 28, also goes in for a dynamic style, at times, that is achieved by pounding her instrument. But there were long stretches of quiet and more sensitive playing in the rather dull music—by Bach and Sweelinck, I believe.

Schnabel's playing—in the performances of sonatas with Szigeti which WNYC broadcast from the Frick Collection on April 4—came over the air with a dullness and heaviness of sound that I am inclined to ascribe to the transmission. Balance has been much improved in the Frick Collection broadcasts this year; but piano sound has lacked lustre. Even so the performance of Beethoven's Opus 96 was very fine.

Nobody I've asked was able to guess that "virtuosity—not in the prerogative sense" in last Sunday's column about the Toscanini broadcast of Beethoven's Ninth had originally—and as late as the last proof I saw—been "virtuosity—not in the pejorative sense."

Here are some programs of the week:

Today—A. M.: Works of Scarlatti and Corelli, played by Sylvia Marlowe, harpsichordist, and assisting artists, WJZ, 8:30; Biggs organ recital, C. B. S., 9:15. P. M.: Scarlatti's "Les Adieux" and Mozart's Oboe Quartet, WNYC, 1; Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," performed by Bruno Walter with the New York Philharmonic and assisting artists, C. B. S., 3; Mozart's Quartet K. 575, played by the WQXR String Quartet, WQXR, 6; Bach Aria Group, WABF (FM), 6:30; Loeffler's "Pagan Poem," WQXR, 8:30; Handel's Violin Sonata in D, Beethoven's "Eroica" Variations for piano, WQXR, 11.

Monday—P. M.: Mozart's "Seraglio" Overture, Falla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" (Beecham), WQXR, 8.

Tuesday—P. M.: Prokofieff's Scythian Suite, WNYC, 7; Strauss's "Don Quixote," WQXR, 8; Stravinsky's "L'Histoire d'un soldat," WQXR, 10.

Wednesday—P. M.: Organ works by Buxtehude, Walther and Bohm, played by Ernest White, WNYC, 8; Mozart's Sonata K. 304, played by Sylvan Shulman, violin, and Edward Robinson, piano, WNYC, 8:30.

Thursday—P. M.: Berlioz's "Queen Mab" Scherzo, WQXR, 9:10.

Friday—P. M.: Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex," from the Juilliard School, WNYC, 8:30.

Saturday—P. M.: Gillis's Short Overture, Rathaus's Polonaise Symphonique, Brahms's Third Symphony, played by the Southern Symphony under Carl Bamberger, N. B. C., 8; Handel-Harty "Water Music," Debussy's Rhapsody for clarinet and orchestra, Delius's "Summer Night on the River," played by the A. B. C. Symphony under Chauncey Kelly, WJZ, 3:30; Haydn's Quartet Opus 76, No. 4, WQXR, 11.

AYTON, OHIO
NEWS WEEK
1 9 1948

MUSIC

Münch of Boston

Münch: Silver bangs and the Gallic touch . . .

Would the Friends of the Boston Symphony, requested Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's trustees, please remain seated after the music; there would be an important announcement. The approximately 700 Friends (contributors to the symphony) who were present in Symphony Hall for their annual meeting on April 8 raised a collective eyebrow. After the music, they generally had tea in the Huntington Avenue foyer. However, when Serge Koussevitzky had finished conducting two Preludes by Wagner, the Friends stayed in their seats.

The announcement was that 74-year-old Koussevitzky, their adored conductor for 24 years, was going to retire at the end of the 1948-49 season. Since next year will mark his 25th anniversary with the orchestra, the Boston Symphony would celebrate 1948-49 as the Silver Jubilee Season of Serge Koussevitzky. All this was no great surprise, for rumors of his impending retirement have been going the rounds for several years.

Then came the answer to the question the music world has been asking for just as long: When Koussevitzky finally did retire, who would succeed him? Would it be Leonard Bernstein, his young protégé? Would it be Charles Münch, the silver-haired Alsatian who has taken most of the major American symphonies by storm since he began guest-conducting in this country in December 1946? Or would it be the dynamic Greek from Minneapolis, Dimitri Mitropoulos?

Münch it was. In October 1949, "le beau Charles," as the ladies in Paris used to call him, will take over as conductor of the world-famous precision instrument that is the Boston Symphony. Although Koussevitzky will continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center, Münch will conduct the popular Berkshire Festival concerts at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony's other home in Lenox, Mass.

Strings: Münch is now 56. His father was an Alsatian musician; his mother, a Parisian, and he was born in Strasbourg. His early musical interest centered on the violin, which he first studied with his father and later under Lucien Capet in Paris and Carl Flesch in Berlin. Switching to conducting, he served under Wilhelm Furtwängler in the Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipzig. In 1932 Münch began conducting in Paris and founded the Paris Philharmonic. By 1938 he had succeeded Philippe Gaubert as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. During the occupation Münch continued conducting, for there was no other way to keep the musicians together and a German conductor out. However, he turned over his salary to the Resistance.

Although Münch still maintains his connections with both the Paris Philharmonic and the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, lately he has spent most of his time guesting (coincidentally, Boston was the scene of his first American guest appearance). Next year, before he becomes Boston's conductor, his United States schedule includes appearances with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, the Chicago Symphony, and a tour with the French Orchestre National.

Sings: All signs indicate that Münch will enjoy a great success at Beacon Hill and Back Bay tea parties. His personal charm is enormous. Although his spoken English is still very much on the tentative side, his French manner more than makes up for that. How the critics will take to him remains to be seen. He sings along with the strings as loud, if not louder, than Toscanini does. He shushes for pianissimos and exhorts for fortissimos. He may use a baton; or he may leave it idle in his left hand. He waves his arms and moves so violently that his hair falls into bangs across his forehead.

Never, however, does he appear to force tone, however louder than loudest he may have the orchestra play. And purity of tone is one of the hallmarks of the Boston Symphony. Just the week before his contract was signed, most of the Boston critics roundly roasted him for the speed and bombast which he put into the Beethoven Eighth and the Schumann Fourth. But when he does Berlioz and Honegger, few can find any fault.

However controversial Münch may prove, all the Boston critics are in agreement on one most significant point: The trustees of the orchestra at least took action and, unlike New York, Chicago, and Pittsburgh, did not follow the line of least resistance and hire a series of guest conductors. The Boston Symphony is a unique instrument, and it will be Münch, and Münch alone, who will be responsible for keeping it so.

Summer, 1915

Boston's big music news of last week was not supposed to be about a new conductor. As originally planned, it was to concern the world première on April 9 of a new work titled "Knoxville: Summer of 1915." When Münch was named on April 8, music circles felt that after a stunner like that, any première would undoubtedly fall into the category of the also-rans.

But Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted the work on Friday afternoon, and Eleanor Steber, the Metropolitan Opera soprano who sang it, were in no mood to concede an anticlimax. They believed in it. Koussevitzky had urged Sam Barber, easily one of our finest young composers, to write a work for voice and orchestra. And Miss Steber, for whom Barber had wanted to compose something, commissioned it. So Koussevitzky, Miss Steber, and the Boston Symphony (who had taken to it from first rehearsal) gave "Knoxville: Summer of 1915" a beautiful, compelling performance.

Miss Steber and Koussevitzky

"Knoxville: Summer of 1915" is an all-American affair on an all-American theme. Barber was born in West Chester, Pa.; Miss Steber, in Wheeling, W. Va., and James Agee, whose prose poem Barber selected as his text, was born in the city he wrote about. Agee's introductory lines to the work set its theme and mood: "We are talking now of summer evenings in Knoxville, Tenn., in the time that I lived there so successfully disguised to myself as a child."

Memory: The [illegible] Agee who, in the summer of 1915 [illegible] just short of 6 years of age, reme[illegible] sounds and sensations famili[illegible] Americans. "That time of eve[illegible] wrote, "when people sit on thei[illegible]s, rocking gently and talking gently and watching the street . . ." There are people walking by, "the taste hovering over them of vanilla, strawberry, pasteboard, and starched milk." There is also, of course, the streetcar, "stopping; belling and starting."* And finally, just before bedtime, there used to be the spreading of quilts on the grass in the back yard, with the whole family lying under the stars, very quietly and full of feelings of peace and security.

The music Barber wrote is modern, but [illegible] with melody and perceptive of the [illegible] Agee created. The part for soprano [illegible] perfectly [illegible] Miss Steber's extraordinary [illegible]able musicianship. Al[illegible] were divided [illegible] the work [illegible] ance drew the [illegible]

MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD

APR 18 1948

Muench To Lead Boston Symphony

Charles Muench, famous European conductor who made conductorial history while guesting with the Boston Symphony during the past two seasons, has been engaged as permanent leader of that organization beginning October, 1949.

The resignation of Serge Koussevitzky, now 74 years old, has been tendered the board of trustees, to take effect at that time. Koussevitzky has guided the organization for 25 years.

The veteran conductor will continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center and will conduct the festivals of 1948 and 1949.

Dr. Muench accepted the appointment before leaving for Europe to fulfill spring engagements in France, Holland and Belgium.

He is at present conductor of both the Paris Conservatory orchestra and Paris Philharmonic orchestra, and has a long record of high successes with numerous European ensembles. This past season he conducted the Boston Symphony for three weeks in November and March.

[illegible]
COMMERCIAL APPEAL
[illegible]

Drops Boston Bator

AFTER 25 years as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 73, announces he will resign after the 1949 season. (International)

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR

Koussevitzky Gives Notice

Since [illegible] virtually retired, and especially since Toscanini's advanced age limited him to a [illegible] performances a year, few would dispute that Serge Koussevitzky is America's No. 1 [illegible] It is bad news that at 73 he feels it [illegible] to retire as leader of the Boston Symphony next year after closing a quarter-century [illegible]

[illegible] Dr. Koussevitzky has an uncanny ability to make familiar works sound newly [illegible] Olin Downes, the New York critic, [illegible] in a Boston Symphony performance the often-played Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony and Beethoven Seventh.

> There is a great difference (Downes wrote) when music produced by truly creative power passes through the crucible of the thought and feeling of a great interpreter. Then the immensity and power of the interpreter is real- [illegible] to follow the signs [illegible] now loud and now [illegible] and designate the [illegible] A performance it [illegible] interpretation it is not, and lacking living and masterful interpretation, the product [illegible] comes under the category of living [illegible]

[illegible] Koussevitzky has been producing "living [illegible] since he took over the Boston in 1924 and [illegible] great tradition from the low estate to [illegible] had fallen after Karl Muck was deposed [illegible] of sympathy with Germany in World War I. The Russian has won other distinctions: [illegible] sponsor of new music by contemporary composers, and as the founder of the famous [illegible] for conductors at Tanglewood in the [illegible]

The next leader of the Boston Symphony will be Charles Muench, organizer and conductor of the Paris Philharmonic. He first appeared in America in 1946 and recently has been guest conductor in Boston, but he is little known in this country. No doubt his selection was a result of [illegible] search, but it is regrettable that the Boston [illegible] could not find a suitable successor in the United States.

WESTCHESTER, PA
LOCAL NEWS
APR 20 1948

Drops Boston Baton

AFTER 25 years as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge ~~Koussevitzky, 73,~~ announces he will resign after the 1948 season. (International)

SARANAC LAKE, N. Y.
ADIRONDACK ENTERPRISE

APR 20 1948

KOUSSEVITSKY

Music lovers will contemplate with sadness the decision of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky to lay down the baton of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Because he brought the Boston orchestra to prominence in the period when radio and recording were developing their ability to spread the sound of a single orchestra to all the corners of the land, followers of fine music throughout America have come to know the name of the musical touch of Koussevitsky.

* * *

It would be interesting to trace the variation in a few generations of women's hats and they might mean something to a philosopher.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
APR 20 1948

Musician Gets U.S. Royalties

By RUTH CONSTAD

NEW YORK, April 19 (UP)—Soviet composer Aram Khachaturian, who has headed the classical hit parade in the United States for the last 21 weeks, is receiving his huge American royalties in Russia, his agents said today.

Louis Levy, president of the Leeds Music Corp. said Khachaturian shows "lively interest" in his sales in America which must mean that he is receiving the money Leeds sends to Russia for him.

The Khachaturian royalties are estimated as a "small fortune." Leeds declined to reveal the amount but all the recording companies have recorded his Gayne ballet suite and the Masquerade suite in their entirety and they have sold in millions of copies, especially "The Sabre Dance" from "Gayne."

Outsells All Others

The radio stations have been broadcasting Khachaturian's music regularly and juke boxes have swallowed great piles of his records. Levy said he has completely outsold any American or foreign classical composer for 21 weeks.

The two other top Soviet composers, Sergei Prokofieff and Dimitri Shostakovitch sell enough phonograph records and are played on enough radio programs to make their royalties sizeable too. Added to Khataturian's, theirs make the money going to Russia annually, a six-figure sum, it was said.

Levy ascribed the popularity of the Russian composers to the "simplicity" of their works which appeals to the "masses".

The Communist party wasn't wrong," he said, "when it called down the composers for writing music above the heads of the people. Music like that does not sell."

For example, Levy said, Prokofieff's "Holiday Poem," one of the pieces severely criticized by the central committee, was sent to Conductor Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be introduced to the American public.

Too Complicated

Koussevitzky, a friend of Prokofieff's, "regretfully" returned it saying it was too complicated for general consumption.

"That's the reason," Levy explained, "that Paul Hindemith, Aaron Copeland and a number of other American composers don't go over in their own country. People want to hear music simply enough to feel."

The Russians are retaining their musical popularity despite the present anti-Communist sentiment, Levy said.

"I guess the people love and understand Russian music enough to have the sense to divorce Sommunist art in their minds from Communist politics," he said.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
APR 19 1948

The Winners

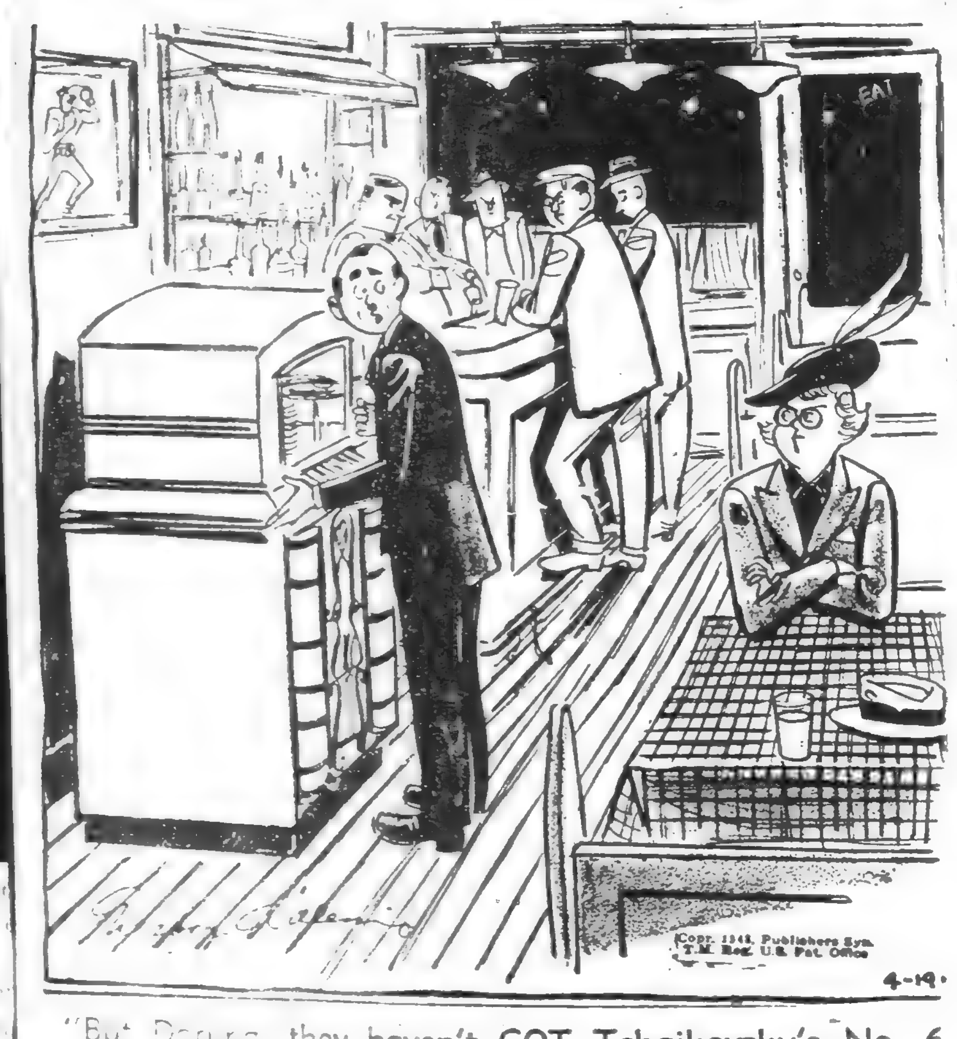
Radio's most prized ornaments (with the exception of high Hooperatings) are the annual Peabody Awards. This week in Manhattan, the 1947 Peabody "Oscars" will be handed round.

Among the networks, ABC and CBS share top honors with three prizewinning programs apiece. ABC's Elmer Davis and CBS Views the Press divided the award for reporting; ABC's Theatre Guild on the Air and CBS's Studio One split the drama prize; ABC's Boston Symphony wins the music award; CBS's Documentary Unit series gets the education award. Mutual gets only a tiny ray of reflected glory (one of its affiliated stations won a prize). NBC gets nothing.

The other prizes: to Chicago's WBBM, for its Report Uncensored (TIME, Aug. 11); to KXAR, of Hope, Ark., for outstanding public service during a flattening tornado; to Washington's WQQW (TIME, Jan. 20), for The Children's Hour, the best children's program, and to Minneapolis' WCCO, for As the Twig Is Bent, a youth rehabilitation series. The U.N. "Network for Peace" wins a special commendation for its United Nations Today.

MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE

THESE WOMEN ! by d'Alessio



EAT
Copr. 1948, Publishers Syn. T.M. Reg. U.S. Pat. Office
4-19

"But Darling, they haven't GOT Tchaikovsky's No. 6 in E Minor, 'Pathetique' conducted by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra!"

WASHINGTON, PA.
OBSERVER

Drops Boston Baton

AFTER 25 years as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge ~~Koussevitzky~~, 73, announces he will resign after the

---

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JUN 20 1948

This combination gives a very dark color to the music which repels some listeners, although I think the total effect is rather exciting. The problem, however, is to escape monotony, especially in the two outer allegro movements enclosing the beautiful Adagio, one of Bach's characteristic richly melodic and ornamented inventions here given an usually somber feeling by the darkness of the instrumentation.

This monotony can be escaped only by the most understanding and subtly valued phrasing. This is not completely found in the new three-record set (DM-1211) conducted by Sergei Koussevitsky with members of the Boston Symphony, recorded at Tanglewood. There is high polish and rich sonority of tone in abundance, but not perhaps that last understanding of Bach which alone can vitalize some of his more difficult music.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
APR 20 1948

Boston Symphony's Great Performance

Occasionally some outstanding musical performance leaves one with a memorable impression. Such was the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky, at the Academy of Music last week. It would be difficult to express in words the great artistic interpretation, the beauty and the grandeur that emanated from the stage of the Academy of Music.

I wonder, were the composers of these masterpieces present in the Academy, whether they would have gloried in their own works; for to this listener, at least, this performance may even have surpassed the conception of the creators themselves; namely, Mozart, Prokofieff and Sibelius.

The Philadelphia Forum should be congratulated for bringing to Philadelphia one of the world's greatest musical organizations.

Max N. Carol

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH
APR 21 1948

New Concert Records

By Thomas B. Sherman

A NEW Stravinsky album issued by RCA-Victor contains two of the composer's most striking compositions for small groups of instruments: "L'Histoire du Soldat" and the Octet for Wind Instruments. First desk men from the Boston Symphony Orchestra are the performing artists and Leonard Bernstein is the director. Both performances are on a virtuoso level; sound reproduction is consistently superior. "The Soldier's Story" was written for ballet, narrator and a chamber ensemble of wood, brass strings and percussion. In the recorded performance one gets only the music but while the effect is necessarily incomplete the deft manipulation of sonorities and rhythms are quite enough to interest any listener who is not anti-Stravinsky. (Five records.)

★ ★ ★

ISAAC STERN and his accompanist Alexander Zakin play the Brahms D Minor Sonata for violin and piano with deep seriousness. It is a mature performance in every respect. Mr. Stern's violin tone wavers occasionally on sustained notes but otherwise the quality of sound is equal to the differentiations of meaning that his perceptive interpretation call for. (Columbia, three records.)

IGOR STRAVINSKY.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 21 1948

Bernstein to Sail for Europe

Leonard Bernstein will leave today on the Queen Mary for a concert tour in Europe, beginning on May 9 and 10, when he will conduct at the State Opera in Munich. Concerts in Milan, Budapest, Vienna and Paris and five June concerts in Scheveningen, Holland, will follow. He will then sail on the Nieuw Amsterdam on June 22 and teach at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., in July and August. Several American works, including Roy Harris's third symphony, Samuel Barber's "Capricorn Concerto," George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" and his own "Jeremiah" symphony will be included in his European programs.

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR
5 1948

Koussevitzky Gives Notice

Since Stokowski virtually retired, and especially since Toscanini's advanced age limited him to a half-dozen performances a year, few would dispute that Serge Koussevitzky is America's No. 1 conductor. It is bad news that at 73 he feels it necessary to retire as leader of the Boston Symphony next year, after closing a quarter-century at its head.

Like Toscanini, Dr. Koussevitzky has an uncanny ability to make familiar works sound newly significant. Olin Downes, the New York critic, once noted it in a Boston Symphony performance of the often-played Tschaikowsky Fourth Symphony and Beethoven Seventh.

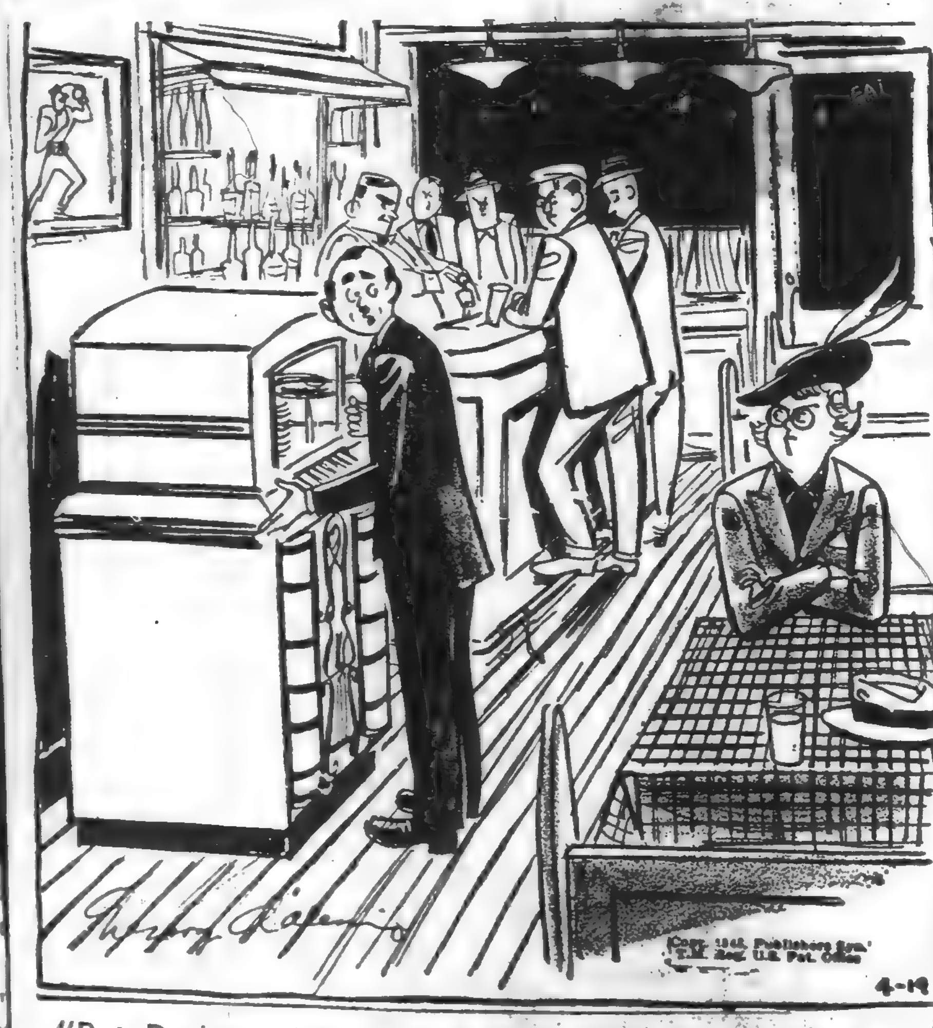
There is a great difference (Downes wrote) when music produced by truly creative power passes through the crucible of the thought and feeling of a great interpreter. Then the importance and power of the interpreter is realized. . . It is not sufficient to follow the signs on the music paper, to play now loud and now soft, now fast and now slow, and designate the result as an interpretation. A performance it is, an interpretation it is not, and lacking living and masterful interpretation, the product hardly comes under the category of living music.

Dr. Koussevitzky has been producing "living music" since he took over the Boston in 1924 and restored its great tradition from the low estate to which it had fallen after Karl Muck was deposed on a charge of sympathy with Germany in World War I. The Russian has won other distinctions: as the ardent sponsor of new music by contemporary composers, and as the founder of the famous school for conductors at Tanglewood in the Berkshires.

The next leader of the Boston Symphony will be Charles Muench, organizer and conductor of the Paris Philharmonic. He first appeared in America in 1946 and recently has been guest conductor in Boston; but he is little known in this country. No doubt his selection was a result of careful search; but it is regrettable that the Boston could not find a suitable successor in the United States.

MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
APR 19

THESE WOMEN ! by d'Alessio



Copr. 1948, Publishers Syn. T.M. Reg. U.S. Pat. Office
4-19

"But Darling, they haven't GOT Tchaikovsky's No. 6 in B Minor, 'Pathetique' conducted by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra!"

WASHINGTON, PA.
OBSERVER

Drops Boston Baton

AFTER 25 years as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 73, announces he will resign after the

---

WESTCHESTER, PA
LOCAL NEWS
APR 20 1948

Drops Boston Baton

AFTER 25 years as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, announces he will resign after the 1948 season. (International)

SARANAC LAKE, N. Y.
ADIRONDACK ENTERPRISE
APR 20 1948

KOUSSEVITSKY

Music lovers will contemplate with sadness the decision of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky to lay down the baton of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Because he brought the Boston orchestra to prominence in the period when radio and recording were developing their ability to spread the sound of a single orchestra to all the corners of the land, followers of fine music throughout America have come to know the name of the musical touch of Koussevitsky.

* * *

It would be interesting to trace the variation in a few generations of women's hats and they might mean something to a philosopher.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
APR 20 1948

Boston Symphony's Great Performance

Occasionally some outstanding musical performance leaves one with a memorable impression. Such was the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky, at the Academy of Music last week. It would be difficult to express in words the great artistic interpretation, the beauty and the grandeur that emanated from the stage of the Academy of Music.

I wonder, were the composers of these masterpieces present in the Academy, whether they would have gloried in their own works; for to this listener, at least, this performance may even have surpassed the conception of the creators themselves; namely, Mozart, Prokofieff and Sibelius.

The Philadelphia Forum should be congratulated for bringing to Philadelphia one of the world's greatest musical organizations.

Max N. Carol

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JUN 20 1948

This combination gives a very dark color to the music which repels some listeners, although I think the total effect is rather exciting. The problem, however, is to escape monotony, especially in the two outer allegro movements enclosing the beautiful Adagio, one of Bach's characteristic richly melodic and ornamented inventions here given an usually somber feeling by the darkness of the instrumentation.

This monotony can be escaped only by the most understanding and subtly valued phrasing. This is not completely found in the new three-record set (DM-1211) conducted by Sergei Koussevitsky with members of the Boston Symphony, recorded at Tanglewood. There is high polish and rich sonority of tone in abundance, but not perhaps that last understanding of Bach which alone can vitalize some of his more difficult music.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
APR 20 1948

Musician Gets U.S. Royalties

By RUTH CONSTAD

NEW YORK, April 19 (UP)—Soviet composer Aram Khachaturian, who has headed the classical hit parade in the United States for the last 21 weeks, is receiving his huge American royalties in Russia, his agents said today.

Louis Levy, president of the Leeds Music Corp. said Khachaturian shows "lively interest" in his sales in America which must mean that he is receiving the money Leeds sends to Russia for him.

The Khachaturian royalties are estimated as a "small fortune." Leeds declined to reveal the amount but all the recording companies have recorded his Gayne ballet suite and the Masquerade suite in their entirety and they have sold in millions of copies, especially "The Sabre Dance" from "Gayne."

Outsells All Others

The radio stations have been broadcasting Khachaturian's music regularly and juke boxes have swallowed great piles of his records. Levy said he has completely outsold any American or foreign classical composer for 21 weeks.

The two other top Soviet composers, Sergei Prokofieff and Dimitri Shostakovitch sell enough phonograph records and are played on enough radio programs to make their royalties sizeable too. Added to Khataturian's, theirs make the money going to Russia annually, a six-figure sum, it was said.

Levy ascribed the popularity of the Russian composers to the "simplicity" of their works which appeals to the "masses".

The Communist party wasn't wrong," he said, "when it called down the composers for writing music above the heads of the people. Music like that does not sell."

For example, Levy said, Prokofieff's "Holiday Poem," one of the pieces severely criticized by the central committee, was sent to Conductor Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be introduced to the American public.

Too Complicated

Koussevitzky, a friend of Prokofieff's, "regretfully" returned it saying it was too complicated for general consumption.

"That's the reason," Levy explained, "that Paul Hindemith, Aaron Copeland and a number of other American composers don't go over in their own country. People want to hear music simply enough to feel."

The Russians are retaining their musical popularity despite the present anti-Communist sentiment, Levy said.

"I guess the people love and understand Russian music enough to have the sense to divorce Sommunist art in their minds from Communist politics," he said.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH
APR 21 1948

New Concert Records

By Thomas B. Sherman

A NEW Stravinsky album issued by RCA-Victor contains two of the composer's most striking compositions for small groups of instruments: "L'Histoire du Soldat" and the Octet for Wind Instruments. First desk men from the Boston Symphony Orchestra are the performing artists and Leonard Bernstein is the director. Both performances are on a virtuoso level; sound reproduction is consistently superior. "The Soldier's Story" was written for ballet, narrator and a chamber ensemble of wood, brass strings and percussion. In the recorded performance one gets only the music but while the effect is necessarily incomplete the deft manipulation of sonorities and rhythms are quite enough to interest any listener who is not anti-Stravinsky. (Five records.)

★ ★ ★

ISAAC STERN and his accompanist Alexander Zakin play the Brahms D Minor Sonata for violin and piano with deep seriousness. It is a mature performance in every respect. Mr. Stern's violin tone wavers occasionally on sustained notes but otherwise the quality of sound is equal to the differentiations of meaning that his perceptive interpretation call for. (Columbia, three records.)

IGOR STRAVINSKY.

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
APR 19 1948

The Winners

Radio's most prized ornaments (with the exception of high Hooperatings) are the annual Peabody Awards. This week in Manhattan, the 1947 Peabody "Oscars" will be handed round.

Among the networks, ABC and CBS share top honors with three prizewinning programs apiece. ABC's Elmer Davis and CBS Views the Press divided the award for reporting; ABC's Theatre Guild on the Air and CBS's Studio One split the drama prize; ABC's Boston Symphony wins the music award; CBS's Documentary Unit series gets the education award. Mutual gets only a tiny ray of reflected glory (one of its affiliated stations won a prize). NBC gets nothing.

The other prizes: to Chicago's WBBM, for its Report Uncensored (TIME, Aug. 11); to KXAR, of Hope, Ark., for outstanding public service during a flattening tornado; to Washington's WQQW (TIME, Jan. 20), for The Children's Hour, the best children's program, and to Minneapolis' WCCO, for As the Twig Is Bent, a youth rehabilitation series. The U.N. "Network for Peace" wins a special commendation for its United Nations Today.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 21 1948

Bernstein to Sail for Europe

Leonard Bernstein will leave today on the Queen Mary for a concert tour in Europe, beginning on May 9 and 10, when he will conduct at the State Opera in Munich. Concerts in Milan, Budapest, Vienna and Paris and five June concerts in Scheveningen, Holland, will follow. He will then sail on the Nieuw Amsterdam on June 22 and teach at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., in July and August. Several American works, including Roy Harris's third symphony, Samuel Barber's "Capricorn Concerto," George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" and his own "Jeremiah" symphony will be included in his European programs.

WILKES BARRE, PA.
TIMES LEADER NEWS

APR 23 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY

Music lovers will contemplate with sadness the decision of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to lay down the baton of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Because he brought the Boston orchestra to prominence in the period when radio and recording were developing their ability to spread the sound of a single orchestra to all the corners of the land, followers of fine music throughout America have come to know the name and the musical touch of Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 23 1948

BERNSTEIN IS SIGNED TO LEAD IN PALESTINE

Leonard Bernstein, former conductor of the New York City Symphony Orchestra, has accepted the post of artistic director of the Palestine Philharmonic Orchestra, it was learned yesterday. He will assume his new position in October after a six-week tour of Europe, and a summer at the Berkshire Music Center, where he will be a guest conductor of the Boston Symphony.

The invitation, which will for the first time provide the Palestinian orchestra with one conoductor over a period of several months, was extended to Mr. Bernstein by Henry Haftel, one of the orchestra's concert masters, with the assistance of the American Fund for Palestinian Institutions.

Mr. Bernstein's three-year directorship of the New York Symphony ended with his "reluctant resignation" in the face of the orchestra's budget restrictions for next season.

—SATURDAY, APRIL 24, 1948

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By CYRUS DURGIN

It was time that Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote" turned up again, with Gregor Piatigorsky as cello soloist, on a program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. We last heard it three years ago February. Nor could there have been a better time to renew its acquaintance than on a weekend late in April.

This score, with all its exact and challenging detail, for some years has been one of the Serge Koussevitzky specialties and also a Boston Sypmhony specialty. It is not only a matter of this orchestra's tonal richness, but of the conductor's colorful imagination, and the sensitive response of the players to the polyphonic demands and the million-and-one attacks, accents, changes of rhythm and meter and other complexities that characterize the style of Strauss.

As for Mr. Piatigorsky, it is reasonable to say that up and down the far spaces of this country he today is most closely associated with the solo part of "Don Quixote." He plays it with a rich and "fluid" tone that never loses moisture, with a broad and virile style that "sings" all the way, and with a deft technique that makes it sound easy.

Yesterday, we heard for the first time the orchestra's new first viola in the role of Sancho Panza. Mr. Joseph De Pasquale gave a superb account of his prowess, so well that the analysis of Mr. Piatigorsky's work, in the preceding paragraph, applies equally to the playing of Mr. De Pasquale. When the performance was over, all hands received most cordial applause.

To begin this program, there is Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli's version for massed strings of two Bach Preludes: slow D minor composed for organ, and the fast E major from the Partita No. 3 for unaccompanied fiddle. Both, as we have learned from previous performances, are admirably arranged, and when played with such brilliant sonority as the Boston strings can muster, they really sound very big.

From Gericke's time, in 1905, until this week, Haydn's B-flat Symphony, No. 98 (fourth of the London series) had not been performed by the Boston Symphony. All those years it remained one of many unfamiliar Haydn symphonies deserving revival but finding it not. Mr. Koussevitzky is to be congratulated for presenting it even late. It is a most remarkable Haydn Symphony, containing an imposing first movement, one of the finest of Hayn slow movements and a tricky finale which reminds me of that other Haydn B-flat Symphony, the No. 102. The performance, apart from one conspicuous false entrance, was excellent.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

APR

RCA Victor's new Stravinsky album includes two of that modern master's chamber works which date back to the 1920's—L'Histoire du Soldat and the Octet for Wind Instruments.

They were recorded last summer at Tanglewood, Mass., scene of the famous Berkshire Festivals, by Leonard Bernstein and first-desk players of the Boston Symphony, and the result is something fascinatingly outside the usual routine.

Histoire, written originally as a ballet with both speaking and singing voices, is presented in this version with the original instrumentation calling for clarinet, bassoon, trumpet, trombone, contra bass, violin and percussion.

The accent is on the percussion, which includes practically everything in "the kitchen" (as the orchestra boys call it) except, perhaps, the sink.

The Octet is scored for four woodwinds and four brasses and is a delightfully witty and stylized piece, perhaps on the whole more intriguing than Histoire. Both works are given lively and imaginative performances and the recording is good. ($1.25.)

MUSIC

Pension Fund Concert

The second Pension Fund concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. Beethoven's Missa Solemnis was performed with the assistance of the following: The Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth [illegible]; Ellen Faull, soprano; Eunice [illegible], contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; George London, bass.

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, which constituted last night the 106th Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is one of those musical masterpieces which require a good deal of preparatory study to appreciate properly the unique features and grandiose conception that make it one of the great choral-orchestral works of all time. Curiously, our own age is closer in spirit to Bach and more readily understands and more cordially welcomes his Passions and B minor Mass and Magnificat. Perhaps that explains the fact that the hall was not entirely full last night. But certain it is that Beethoven's Missa Solemnis must not be listened to in terms of Bach.

Tovey finds affinity with Palestrina, and the last two sections are symphonic in Beethoven's mature style. Choral singers who have mastered the extreme difficulties of their role in it, love the Missa Solemis more than do audiences [illegible] so trained and oriented. [illegible] guess that the hall could have been sold out twice over for the B minor Mass, longer though it be. This hazard is not submitted in a [illegible]tentious spirit, but merely [illegible] a phenomenon of [illegible] taste.

At any rate all the huge combined forces had worked [illegible] under Dr. Koussevitzky's [illegible] produce as stirring [illegible] as possible. The [illegible]ists, Misses Faull and [illegible] Messrs. Lloyd and [illegible]quently. Theirs [illegible] semble task, and [illegible] if it were desirable [illegible] singer out above [illegible] impossible not to [illegible] under the united [illegible] Beethoven and Koussevitzky [illegible] enough to congratulate [illegible] gether on the success [illegible].

The chorus, [illegible] worth, seemed to [illegible] best singing of [illegible] even than in "Oedipus [illegible]" and in their annual concert in Cambridge. To be sure, the Radcliffe group was not in the Stravinsky [illegible] but it is still safe to assume [illegible] this performance was the climax of the [illegible] year. Harvard-Radcliffe [illegible]. Dr. Koussevitzky [illegible] the inspiring genius of the whole production.

HE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, APRIL 24, 19

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 23rd concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The soloist was Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist. The program was as follows:

Two Preludes arranged for string orchestra by R. Pick-Mangiagalli.... Bach Symphony in B flat major No. 98 .. Haydn
"Don Quixote" Op. 35 .... Strauss

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The restoration of this Haydn Symphony (No. 98) to the active repertoire of the Boston Symphony is one of the best things that could have been done. As in all Haydn's mature works there are a great many arresting features, notably in this case in the finale. The adagio could not in fact have been a requiem for Mozart, as the music was first played in March 1701 and Mozart did not die until December of that year. All the same it is easy to see what Tovey meant by the remark, for the music is grave and tender and could have been the reflection of a great artist on the loss to the world of another.

The quantity of Haydn's symphonies is probably responsible for the neglect of some of the best of them, like this one. Still, it is decidedly curious that so charming and gay and unusual a work should have been shelved for so long. It suggests that conductors should look a little sharper when they plan a Haydn symphony for the program and not be content merely with repeating the "Surprise." Dr. Koussevitzky has a great way with Haydn, and the impeccability of the performance yesterday was marred only by one too early entrance of the trumpet.

Another piece repeated from Tuesday night's concert was the Bach. Of these two preludes, one originally for organ and the other for solo violin, which Pick-Mangagalli arranged for string orchestra, the fast second one comes off better than the adagio. My suspicion is that Dr. Koussevitzky in his delight at exhibiting the silken texture of the orchestra's strings inclines to take the first prelude too slowly. Certainly no organist would attempt such deliberateness. The second one, however, sounds grand. It is tastefully transcribed and is a fine addition to Bach literature for a symphony orchestra.

Only a rabid Strauss addict, in my view, can take continuous delight in "Don Quixote." I will go further and say that it is the most boring of his tone poems, though it has some competitors for that honor. There are, of course, passages of sensuous beauty and many others of a brilliantly effective realism. But by and large "Don Quixote" dates badly and inspires tedium more than exhilaration.

Mr. Piatigorsky played with his usual beautiful tone and execution, and Mr. de Pasquale also did well. But the orchestra performance was sloppy, for once in a way, and Dr. Koussevitzky dragged the music interminably so that at times it seemed as if the works would stop of their own momentum. Let us hope they can pull the piece together for tonight's performance.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN

Stravinsky: The Soldier's Tale and Octet for Wind Instruments. Leonard Bernstein conducting members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Victor album 1197. Ten sides.

A FINE recording of two provocative, rarely heard compositions by one of the twentieth century's leading composers.

"The Soldier's Tale," written during World war I, is a setting to music of the ancient fairy tale concerning a soldier, his violin, and the devil. The music is but one of three elements in the work, the other two being the narrator and the dancers.

It is beautifully scored for seven instruments—clarinet, bassoon, trumpet, trombone, violin, double bass and elaborate percussion. There are few composers in musical history who can match Stravinsky in thematic ingenuity and orchestral coloration, particularly when he is writing for woodwinds and brasses.

Bernstein is more than equal to the difficult task of interpreting this unique music, and he gets wonderful backing from the Boston virtuosi. The Octet for Wind Instruments gives the soloists a further chance to demonstrate their mastery.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

APR 25 1948

By Fredson Bowers

TWO highly original works by Igor Stravinsky are presented in "L'Histoire du Soldat" and the Octet for Wind Instruments, played by the Boston Symphony, conducted by Leonard Bernstein on five records (DM-1197). "The Soldier's Tale" (six sides) is the music for a ballet which was to have both a narrator and dancers, but the narrative is omitted here. Written in 1918 under the influence of the first World War, the ballet tells a kind of morality story of a soldier and his encounter with the devil, their contest with fiddles, the soldier's triumph, and his eventual downfall when he breaks his pact. The music is scored for only seven instruments: clarinet, bassoon, trumpet, trombone, violin, double bass, and general percussion. With this rather odd yet balanced combination, Stravinsky plays with great ingenuity, always with the utmost attention to clarity of the instrumental voices. The work is of a very high order of imagination, although as with many ballets, some of the total effect is missing when it is played as a concert suite without the dance action to illuminate the music.

The Octet for Wind Instruments (four sides) is one of Stravinsky's first essays in absolute music in the classical spirit and away from the folk music which had hitherto influenced him. Historically it is of interest as a major forerunner of his symphonies, but the music has a quite independent appeal of its own as well. Scored for flute, clarinet, two bassoons, two trombones and two trumpets, the work does not escape some of the inherent monotony of tone inevitable in such a combination; nevertheless, the sonorities are handled with skill and variety, and the frequent contrapuntal writing does much to invite a continuous interest. Listeners must not expect another classical symphony, since this work, as well as "The Soldier's Tale" is austere and on the acrid side. Neither is likely to convert a prejudiced person to the "modern" idiom; but for those whose ears are adjusted, and who find a fascination in Stravinsky's musical intellect, the set will prove to be a real find worth much playing to familiarize oneself with an original and daring mind. The performance is impeccable and the recording (made at Tanglewood) is superb in its clarity and balance.

Ballet music of quite a different order is presented in a six-record album (DM-1205) of a wide selection from Tchaikowsky's "Sleeping Beauty" played by Leopold Stokowski and his Symphony. Some of this music has been familiar from suites of the short ballets "Aurora's Wedding" and "Princess Aurora" which have been made up from the full-evening performance of "Sleeping Beauty." Tchaikowsky wrote for the ballet some of its loveliest and freshest music, his melodic genius and his extraordinary craftsmanship finding this a natural medium for expression. This set presents a fine selection of eminently listenable pieces full of charm, gaiety, and beauty, and all imbued with motion. Stokowski is his usual self; that is, the music is made rather larger than life (I suspect some tinkering with the score), an impression aided by the slightly over-reverberant recording, and is emphasized more for the concert hall than for the ballet theater. Yet the album has many virtues and for those who want a wider selection of this lovely music than is found in the three-record Sadlers Wells album (DM-673) or the rather old Kurtz set of "Aurora's Wedding" (DM-326), it will be more than satisfactory. Outside of the echoing, the recording is rich and full-bodied.

On four 10-inch records (MO-1186), the Metropolitan baritone, Leonard Warren, with a chorus and orchestra, sings a selection of such familiar Sea Shanties as Blow the Man Down, Shenandoah, Rio Grande, Low Lands, The Drunken Sailor, and so forth. Warren's big open voice is well suited for this virile music, and for once the orchestral arrangements are ingenious rather than lush. Recording is highly realistic.

The "Brooklyn Baseball Cantata" goes back to a radio show in 1937. Now sung by Robert Merrill, baritone, with Russ Case, his orchestra and chorus, the two 10-inch records (DO-42) may amuse those to whom Brooklyn is a legend, but the stuff is pretty obvious and will scarcely bear much repetition.

Mr. Bowers will answer letters of enquiry about the choice of records.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 27 1948

Quits Philadelphia Orchestra

PHILADELPHIA, April 26 (AP).—Samuel Mayes, thirty-year-old first violoncello of the Philadelphia Orchestra, has resigned and will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. It was reported that Mr. Mayes would replace Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the Boston Orchestra, who plans to retire.

Boston Symphony's Future; Stravinsky's 'Soldier's Tale'

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

[illegible] news at the meet- [illegible] of the Boston [illegible] other day [illegible] upon [illegible] Munch, our [illegible] as of the [illegible]. He [illegible] man [illegible] would be [illegible] me who [illegible]. He is [illegible] musi- [illegible] all very [illegible] here [illegible] Min- [illegible]. He [illegible] how [illegible] Kous- [illegible] has [illegible] the Boston [illegible] the past [illegible] to build [illegible] of sound [illegible] Symphony. [illegible] that he has [illegible] at heart [illegible] to believe [illegible] Boston Sym- [illegible]

[illegible] regret at [illegible] nation a year [illegible] enemies and [illegible] in the first [illegible] the incumbency when [illegible] modern scores at [illegible] the dozen. But he [illegible] them over, and [illegible] are now ac- [illegible]. There will [illegible] the fact that he [illegible] in the Berkshires [illegible] come here for [illegible] guest," though it will [illegible] to think of him [illegible] role. For reasons of his [illegible] he is certainly wise to decide to resign. The prolonged [illegible] which clung to him this au- [illegible] alarming to his public, [illegible] not be so selfish as [illegible] him to expose himself to [illegible] simply for our pleasure in [illegible] him lead the orchestra. Finally it says much for the far- [illegible] sagacity of the trustees in [illegible] such prompt action in securing the Boston Symphony's future at a time when the direction of other orchestras in New York and Chicago is floundering around with a schedule of guest conductors.

"L'HISTOIRE DU SOLDAT"

Victor has just issued one of Stravinsky's more peculiar and controversial scores, "L'histoire du soldat," along with his Wind Octet, a delightful and more straightforward piece. The former is scored for violin, double bass, clarinet, bassoon, trumpet, trombone and percussion. Leonard Bernstein conducts seven musicians of the Boston Symphony in this recording, which was made at Tanglewood. The music is very difficult to play, with changes of time signature at almost every other bar. Nevertheless, the performance is perfectly clear.

There are those who maintain that "L'histoire du soldat" is virtually meaningless without stage action. Stravinsky wrote the music and his friend, C.-F. Ramuz, contributed the "libretto" in Switzerland after World War I when both were at a low ebb. This labor gave them something to occupy their minds and provided a little fun through rather grim days. There was a stage production in London in 1927 (not the first), and I cannot resist giving the comment made upon it by James Agate, the drama critic of the Sunday Times who died recently. His account recalls an era of artistic preciosity which is now almost quaint.

"This entertainment seemed to me to be the kind of thing which delights super-highbrows and very young children, but nobody in between. The stage presented a theater within a theater. Set back from the real footlights was a tiny proscenium lit up by smaller footlights. The tiny curtain, raised and lowered by a proclaimed stage- [illegible] revealed a primitive sea and a [illegible] monster, three whalers [illegible] a bee-line for a fishy grave, [illegible] looked on derisively. The symbolism of this work [illegible] escaped me. To the left was the orchestra whose members [illegible] for a time by wiping their [illegible] taking off their sweaters and so on. I am told that Mr. Stravinsky's instructions were that the musicians should spit freely. This was not carried out. Since, in this theater, it takes two to tell a fairy tale, there is a reader as well as the actors. As these are not ready the reader must chat with the orchestra, light a cigarette, drink beer.

"Was this amusing? Grown-ups laughed. Moby Dick being rolled up, a morbidly Tyrolese young soldier stepped into the framework and said something like: 'I'm a soldier on leave, so hey-diddle diddle; Until the pubs open I'll play on my fiddle.' 'He's a soldier on leave,' repeated the reader in case we hadn't understood. The Devil, disguised as an old gentleman, then appeared, and the rest of the play was a version of the Faust legend simplified for nursery tots of five. To me it all seemed like that party in the satirical novel, the invitations to which were written on children's notepaper with pink woolly lambs on top and concluding: 'Please tell Nurse to call for you at four A. M.'."

ODD MUSIC

I have quoted this account of a stage version at some length not only to recall a bygone age but also to prove that the music had probably better stand by itself—or else. The Suite consists of the Soldier's March, the Soldier's Violin, Royal March, Little Concert, Three Dances (Tango, Waltz, Ragtime), Devil's Dance, Chorale and Triumphal March of the Devil. Only the Waltz has a consistent time throughout, and even so, while keeping a strict ¾ in the bass, Stravinsky now and again writes a 6/8 measure on top. The music is very discordant. If you think that you hear discords sometimes in Symphony Hall, I suggest you play this album on your machine. Nevertheless, the music is frequently amusing in a wry, ironic way. Some of it, the Ragtime, for example, is very ingenious. It is not, of course, a major work, but it has a period interest if no more.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Missa Solemnis

By JOHN WM. RILEY

Serge Koussevitzky conducted Beethoven's devout and mighty Missa Solemnis in Symphony Hall last evening in the 106th concert to benefit the Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was an exalting, and properly awe-inspiring experience.

The chorus was composed of members of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The soloists were Ellen Faull, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; George London, bass; E. Power Biggs, organ.

There is a vast and spatial conception of Christian principles expressed in the Missa Solemnis. As Donald Tovey points out, there are special reasons for this. Beethoven intended the Mass to accompany the installation of his friend and patron, Archduke Rudolph, as Archbishop of Olmutz, although he did not complete it until two years after the ceremony. However, he had designed it in the greatest pomp and magnificence. Ever since, it has been used to honor great occasions, as for instance, the dedication of Symphony Hall in October, 1900.

Last evening's performance did not not quite touch the profound glories of the work until the second half (this was broadcast an hour later than usual). The opening of the Kyrie was taken at such a slow pace that it barely held together, and the chorus and orchestra were not always of the same mind in tempi and entrances.

But in the Credo, the chorus sang like angels, a hard thing to do, since Beethoven's demands on the voice are so extreme. And the whole effect was one of intense drama. For that matter, the Sanctus offered the most beautiful wedding of chorus, soloists and orchestra this listener can recall. The closing "Dona Nobis Pacem" (grant us Thy peace), disturbed in the middle by a military rattle of drums and sound of trumpets, contains significance for our times. Beethoven titled this "Prayer for inward and outward peace" and I think every listener felt it thus.

Mr. Koussevitzky was fortunate in his soloists. They seemed to be the most closely matched, in vocal timbre, skill and feeling for style, that we have heard recently in large choral works. Their work was superb.

TOLEDO, OHIO
TIMES
APR 25 1948

Sharps and Flats

Koussevitzky Said To Be Indispensable

By FREDERICK KOUNTZ

IT IS my honest opinion that almost all of us and almost all of our contributions to the world in which we live can be replaced. History has recorded grievious personal and material losses to nations and to peoples; it has marked clearly the ends of eras of enlightenment and progress. But in spite of every turn of events which seemed catastrophic at the time, the world has gone on; for better or worse generation has followed generation. And, thus far at least, in the annals of civilization we have still to discover the man or the mortal accomplishment without which the world, or indeed any particular segment of it, could not continue unhindered.

I must admit however that upon reading the letters which made official the resignation of Serge Koussevitzky from his position as Conductor and Music Director of the Boston Orchestra my own opinion wavered considerably and the incontrovertible pronouncements of history appeared to lose a little of their measure of finality.

TO the Board of Trustees of the Orchestra Mr. Koussevitzky wrote as follows: "My dear Friends: It is a profound regret to me and a painful duty to confirm by the present letter my decision to resign as Conductor and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra following the season 1948-1949, which will also mark my 25th anniversary with our great and loved Orchestra.

"I am moved to take this decision because I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season.

"It is not without deep concern and heartache that I shall come to part with an orchestra to which I have devoted 25 years of my life and am bound by a quarter of a century of uninterrupted work and artistic achievement.

"I take comfort in the thought, however, that our association will not be completely severed, and as Director of the Berkshire Music Center I shall continue to serve the great and cultural cause, radiating from Tanglewood, thus carrying on the responsibility for a unique venture which you helped me to bring to life and which has developed to become an outstanding chapter in the history of the Boston Symphony.

"Let me express to you my warm and heartfelt appreciation for your confidence and friendship throughout these long years, that helped to make my work a labor of love possible only in an atmosphere of understanding and harmony."

TO DR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S letter Mr. Henry B. Cabot, President of the Trustees replied: "Dear Dr. Koussevitzky: Last Wednesday at the Trustees' meeting you presented a letter to the Board resigning as Conductor and Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra following the season of 1948-1949, which will mark the 25th anniversary of your leadership with your—may I say, our—orchestra. The meeting was adjourned until today and the Trustees have asked me to accept your resignation and to express for all of them their regret that the time is so near at hand for the conclusion of the most brilliant leadership and the most devoted service which the orchestra has ever enjoyed from anybody.

"Your letter gives us some comfort, however, for it reaffirms the association which will continue through your position as Director of the Berkshire Music Center. For our part, and we hope you will feel the same, we should like to broaden this association by anticipating that you will return to us as a very special guest in the winter season.

"You have given so generously of your great and courageous spirit which has made possible joy and happiness to hundreds and thousands of hungry and appreciative audiences all over the world. And we know at Tanglewood, too, you have lighted a torch that will shine on through troublesome or peaceful times, and by your vision point to security and incredible accomplishment.

"Our heartfelt thanks and God bless you always.

"Your friend and admirer,
"Henry Cabot."

THESE are the letters that foretell the end of an era. And, when it has been concluded, it will have been an era in which this conductor and orchestra in the matters of thoroughly rehearsed performances, of unfettered program building, of an intelligent and well bred accomplishment of orchestral playing, will have given us something the like of which we have never before experienced.

I recall now the words that Richard Aldrich wrote some 15 years ago: "There is a lesson that has to be learned over and over again. Music remains, the great compositions of the great masters cannot be taken from us. We lose a Patti, a Lehmann, a Jean de Reszke, a Caruso, and with them we lose all hope. Everything is lost and the future of music is naught but black despair. We lose a Liszt, a Rubinstein, a Joachim, a Sarasate, and again there is no hope. But the great thing, the thing that lasts—the music they sang and played—stays."

And I know the uncommon truth of Mr. Aldrich's idea. But I wonder if ever again there will be such a long and artistically gratifying association of orchestra and conductor, an association that was able to give voice to this "music that stays" so intelligently and thoroughly and beautifully. And I wonder too if time will not prove that Mr. Koussevitzky was one without whom we could not do so well—the first indispensable perhaps among orchestral conductors.

MISSA SOLEMNIS

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" was performed at Symphony Hall last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in aid of its pension fund. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted, and the combined forces of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society assisted, together with these solo singers: Ellen Faull, soprano; Enice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and George London, bass. E. Power Biggs was the organist and Richard Burgin provided the violin solo in the Benedictus.

This Mass in D is one of Beethoven's major achievements and belongs, with the Ninth Symphony and last quartets and piano sonatas, to the third and final phase of his creative activity. Nevertheless, had he not written it, his reputation would be in no way diminished. And it is just there that it differs from the B minor Mass of Bach, by which his own work was so superbly crowned. To Bach, a deeply religious man, the composing of the Mass was an inward experience, and it drew from him his most glorious, his most profound music. Beethoven, on the other hand, approached his task more objectively. It is quite characteristic of him that he seems more truly inspired when writing for the orchestra alone than for chorus and orchestra in combination. The instruments, not voices, were his medium. We come away remembering such things as the opening, the aforementioned violin solo, the martial music so daringly introduced in the "Agnus Dei."

Perhaps the chief defect of the Mass is that it lacks variety, the sort of variety that makes Bach's B minor so overwhelmingly effective in the concert hall. Any given 15 minutes or half hour of the "Missa Solemnis" would be impressive, but the work as a whole engenders a feeling of monotony, and of conscious striving on the composer's part.

Last evening's performance was a singularly fine one. Dr. Koussevitzky was in his element. He, at least, believes in the piece. The chorus was admirable, and the four soloists acquitted themselves nobly in music that is, for the most part, vocally ungrateful. An enlarged platform, and a great space in front of it, reduced the seating capacity of the hall.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday's Symphony concert was one of those occasions when many things went well and some things not so well. A trumpet-player made a false entrance; an important chord in Strauss' "Don Quixote," was badly bungled, probably because of over-anxiety. Both could be forgiven. Accidents will happen. A more serious fault was Dr. Koussevitzky's tendency to drag and oversentimentalize portions of Strauss' tone poem, in which Gregor Piatigorsky, after a considerable absence from the role, reappeared as the solo cellist. Don Quixote had his lady love (in a manner of speaking) but he was not lovesick. And yesterday, like Charles II, he was "an unconscionable long time a-dying."

On the other hand, there were many admirable details in this performance, both on Dr. Koussevitzky's part and on that of Mr. Piatigorsky, while the orchestra's new first viola, Joseph de Pasquale, did well with what might be called the role of Sancho Panza. The work itself is both the strongest and the weakest of the major Strauss tone poems. Granted the composer's premises, he does a superb job of delineation, whether of character, mental states, or actual events. But he does it in such thoroughgoing fashion that not only phrases and single measures, but even single tones have significance. That sort of thing requires of the listener a degree of awareness that most listeners do not possess. Even the program notes, often disregarded, are of limited usefulness. You can lose your place in no time. What "Don Quixote" really needs is homework.

Of a different stripe were the other numbers on the program the two Preludes of Bach, arranged for orchestras by Pick-Mangiagalli, that Dr. Koussevitzky has given us several times, and Haydn's Symphony, No. 98, in B-flat major, which the orchestra, under Wilhelm Gericke, played at a pair of concerts in 1905.

We are always being surprised that certain Symphonies of Haydn should be neglected while others are heard times without number. This is unquestionably one of the finer ones. The first movement contains striking harmonic effects; the second, thought by some to have been inspired by the death of Mozart, is certainly one of Haydn's noblest; the finale is full of arresting rhythmic tricks. This engaging work was as engagingly played, barring the mishap mentioned above. And now, how about the Symphony with the Drumroll, the "Military" Symphony, No. 93 in D and No. 99 in E-flat? They all deserve to be brought back to our attention.

---

cert ert of the y Orchesting, was
l. Beethormed with
The Har-Choral So-conductor;
erts, con-orge Lon-

IAMS Solemnis, ght the rt of the ra, is one ces which eparatory perly the diose conne of the orks of all wn age is and more more cor-ons and B icat. Perct that the last night.
Beethoven's
ot be lis-
ch.
with Pales-sections are n's mature who have fficulties of e Missa Sodiences not
l. It is my d have been the B minor t be. This d in a con-rely to note ontemporary

ge combined
h a will un-direction to performance rtet of solo-
Alberts and don, sang elo-eally an en-not fair, even to single one other. It is n occasionally demands of evitzky. It is ate them to-
of their work.
by Mr. Wood-e to do their season, better s Rex" and in in Cambridge liffe group was y work, but it that this per climax of the horouses' year as throughout s of the whol

Koussevitzky Gets Heartfelt Tribute Here

Boston's Conductor Ends Bushnell Series Of Symphony Events

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, was presented in the final concert of the Bushnell Series Tuesday night. The program:

Eine Kleine Nachtmusik	Mozart
Jupiter Symphony	Mozart
Symphony No. 3	Piston
Prelude to Lohengrin	Wagner
Prelude to Die Meistersinger	Wagner

A pretty good idea of how Hartford concert goers feel about the pending retirement of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky from the Boston podium, was free for the asking at the Bushnell Memorial last night.

It manifested itself first in the unusually warm applause which greeted him when he took the stage at the opening of the program. But it reached the point of a demonstration at the close of the concert when the audience rose to its feet and called him back for more bows than he had ever taken here before. It was apparent that they hoped he would say something, impart some sort of patriarchal blessing. But he stood there like a fine, old Roman emperor at a triumph, silent but plainly pleased. It was a curiously touching moment, and perhaps the first sample of many more to come in the intervening time before he finally steps down from the Boston conductorship he has so long and magnificently held.

Mr. Piston's Symphony.

The program itself had brought us for the first time, Walter Piston's third and latest symphony. When Dr. Koussevitzky has got hold of something which he considers pretty special, what a sendoff he gives it! The Piston work had been played for Boston concert goers recently, but according to announcement, its radio premiere was being made from the Bushnell stage. Dr. Koussevitzky gave his all to insure its success, AM and FM. Even though you were hearing it for the first time, you could not doubt but that it was being given a reading and performance hair-curling and nonpareil.

The symphony is in the main a rewarding work musically, reasonably traditional in form, but quite modern in content. It has been richly, not to say densely written. Many parts will remind of Moussorgsky, others of Shostakovitch. It has some of the sound and much of the somberness of the former in its first movement, while the rhythms verging on syncopation and the general air of martial rat-ta-plan of the second and fourth movements suggest the contemporary Russian (if they still own him over there). Actually, Mr. Piston was probably rooting around in our own, native popular musical modes when he thought them up.

Except for certain ingratiating melodies and rhythms in the last movement, this Third is not a symphony for the concert hall loller. It is intense, complex and shrewd—and it requires concentrated listening, as well as the aural adjustment that much modern symphonic writing still demands. It is the work of an expert composer and one with things musical and emotional to say seriously and clear-eyed. Its reception last evening was not too enthusiastic, but Mr. Piston got at least a friendly if not over-interested hand from the house as he took bows on the stage with Dr. Koussevitzky.

Not Heart-to-Heart.

Mozart had been the opening fare on the program and Wagner was the closing. Dr. Koussevitzky was in a mood to make music with the most loving care, but he did not receive a similar response from the orchestra. The players must have had the Piston on their minds, for they played the "Kleine Nachtmusik" and a lot of the "Jupiter" in rather heavyhanded fashion. Dr. Koussevitzky continually had to quiet them, to shush them. The slow section of the Mozart attained a fine beauty of reading and playing, glowing under the mutes with unusual Romanticism, however. The Wagner excerpts, dramatic though they were, were roughly played in many spots.

T. H. P.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 4 - 1948

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Editor:

If the Boston Symphony Orchestra would favor us with more programs like the one rendered Mar. 30, I feel that more people, including myself, would be satisfied.

This was a truly brilliant and melodic program. It had none of the dissonant make-up and the clashing and grating combinations of tones of the modern compositions which have been played recently by this organization.

I feel that people in general like this type of music, as was evident by the fact that the hall was filled and the conductor, whose interpretations were superb, was recalled five times at the end of the program.

This was a truly enjoyable evening which I hope will be repeated in the future.

RICHARD K. WHIPPLE, M.D.

Providence.

Editor:

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been in the public eye more prominently than usual in the last several months. This has been due to the infrequent appearances of Dr. Koussevitzky in Providence during the last two seasons.

It is obvious that Dr. Koussevitzky finds it impossible to carry the full burden his job places upon him, and his eventual retirement in the not too distant future is not out of the realm of possibility.

In view of these facts, one cannot help noting the tremendous and enthusiastic applause that has been given to Charles Munch in his two guest appearances in Providence during the season just concluded.

When the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra finds it necessary to choose a successor to Dr. Koussevitzky, it would be most gratifying if they were to choose M. Munch. His dynamic and inspired leadership of the Boston Symphony is both a pleasure to behold and to hear. Providence concertgoers, I am sure, would unanimously approve his selection.

HERBERT W. WIDMANN.

North Providence.

BENTON, ILL
NEWS
4/5/48

Koussevitzky To End Career With Boston

BOSTON—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his Silver Jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES
APR 9

Retirement Planned by Koussevitsky

BOSTON, April 8 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his Silver Jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry C. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench.

OKLAHOMA CITY, O
TIMES

Koussevitzky, 74, to Quit Boston Symphony Podium

BOSTON, April 9—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor, the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic. Koussevitzky's decision was announced Thursday night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He will remain as leader of the Berkshire music festival.

RENO, N EVENING GA
APR

Orchestra Le ill Close C

BOSTON, April
ge Koussevitzky w eer as conductor o nphony orchestra a silver jubilee 1948-
The 74-year-old R
ductor will be su arles Muench, 57, A
tor. He is the pr
the Paris Conserva
and the Paris Ph
Koussevitzky's decis
unced last night b
bot, president of th e annual meeting o of Friends of the B
phony orchestra.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
APR 9 - 1948

Koussevitzky to Leave Boston Orchestra

Boston, April 9—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD-AMERICAN
APR 9 - 1948

Chicago Herald-American

CONDUCTOR TO QUIT

BOSTON, April 9-(AP)-Dr. Serge Kaussevitzky, 74, conductor of Boston Symphony, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season. His successor will be Charles Muench, 57.

Purchase U.S. Savings Bonds

GLENDALE, CA
NEWS-PRES
APR

Koussevitzky to R
As Boston Conduc

Boston AP—Dr. Serge vitzky will close his care ductor of the Boston Orchestra at the end of jubilee 1948-49 season.
The 74-year-old Ru conductor will be suc
Charles Muench, 47, Al ductor. He is the pre of the Paris Conservat tra and the Paris Phil
Koussevitzky's decis
nounced last night b Cabot, president of
at the annual meeting ciety of Friends of Symphony Orchestra.
The elderly direc
main as leader of Music Festival

HOLLAND, MICH.
SENTINEL
APR 9 1948

Boston Symphony Head Will Retire Next Year

Boston, April 9 (UP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky [illegible] last night that he [illegible] next year after [illegible] as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He [illegible] ceeded by Char[illegible] and director [illegible] monic orchestra.

Koussevitzk[illegible] would continue as d[illegible] shire Center [illegible] Stockbridge [illegible] would condu[illegible] wood conce[illegible]

"It is not [illegible] and heartac[illegible] parting wit[illegible] which I have devoted [illegible] my life," the [illegible] conductor said.

SAN FRANCISCO,
EXAMINER
APR

Koussevitzky t

BOSTON, April 8.
Serge Koussevitzky,
born conductor of t
Symphony Orchestra
at the end of his s
1948-49 season, Hen
president of the trus night.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL
APR 9 - 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY TO RETIRE

Muench To Succeed Boston Symphony Conductor

BOSTON, April 8.—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said Thursday night.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation, said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active Winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

SPOKAN
SPOKESM
APR 9

SILVER JUB
LAST FO

BOSTON, A
Koussevitzky,
ductor of the chestra, will his silver ju
Henry B. C trustees, said
His succ year-old A Charles Mu several ti symphony

MUSKOGEE, OKLA.
TIMES-DEMOCRAT

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Has Only One More Season

BOSTON, April 9—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire music festival.

JACKSONVI
TIMES-

rchestra
Will Reti

OSTON, April
ssevitzky, 74,
tor of the Bost
stra, will retir
silver jubilee
ry B. Cabot, tees, said toni is successor w
Alsatian-born
nch, who has s with the B oussevitzky's said his dec n because "I ossible for present strenuou length of 16 to tive Winter sea
Cabot said continue as shire Music
The annou annual meeti
Friends of th
Orchestra at 8

NASHVILLE, TENN.
BANNER
APR

Reviews Of Records

By JAMES PALMER WADE

Victor holds up the symphonic end of things with a recording that I suspect many of waiting for: a recording of Beethoven's Ninth "Choral" Symphony. This symphony has a terrific reputation to live up to; we expect it to be all things to all men.

I've heard a somberly powerful reading of the Ninth from Bruno Walter, and have heard of a similar rendition by Toscanini. [illegible] ern recordings of this N[illegible] though, are apt to sound trivial to reverent ears prepared for oracular thunder. This latest version, recorded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky and a chorus and soloists exquisitely handled by Robert Shaw, opens no vein of profundity until the final movement (Victor M-1190). In fact, the music chugs away like one of the less inspired works of Bach until it bursts into the overwhelming trumpet fanfares of the last movement. Life and a deep purpose enter the performance with this choral salutation to love and brotherhood among all mankind. This conclusion may be enough for you to make you want the set. At any rate, not before has Beethoven's Ninth Symphony been as brilliantly engraved on wax in pellucid sound.

HE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, APRIL 3, 194

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 21st concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Muench conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in D major, "Prague," K. 504	Mozart
Symphony No. 8 in F major Op. 93	Beethoven
Symphony No. 4 in D minor Op. 120	Schumann

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Charles Muench is now an old and welcome friend of the Boston Symphony public. He has chiefly conducted French music here, however; and it was perhaps for that reason that he chose yesterday to exhibit himself from a new angle, that of interpreter of the familiar repertoire of the classic and romantic composers. No one could say that Mozart's "Prague," Beethoven's 8th and Schumann's 4th Symphonies constituted anything but a delightful program, but you would not say either that it was off the beaten track. Consequently the reviewer's task is merely to record his opinion of the performances as they were shaped by the conductor and played by the orchestra. The music was all joyous and ebullient, exceptionally apt for the season.

I first had the good fortune to observe Mr. Muench when he came to Brussels during the war and aroused the Belgian orchestra to an amazing degree from the lethargy into which it had by and large fallen. He was clearly welcomed by that audience as a singularly inspired musician, capable of getting the best out of an orchestra and investing the most familiar music with a renewed freshness and intensity. His visits here and his work in New York have served only to strengthen that impression. I have no hesitation in pronouncing him one of the few conductors of the very first rank now operating before the public. Performances under his baton are never stale Now and again they may upset conventional notions of how a certain piece should go, but they are never insipid or dull.

Never has Beethoven's 8th Symphony sounded more joyous and exuberant. It is a symphony of sheer high spirits throughout with no slow movement to change the mood. Mr. Muench took it in this spirit and read it exultantly. With Mozart, though he used all the strings in the orchestra, he was more restrained but certainly not unduly so. The Schumann 4th Symphony was interpreted with all the ardor and fire that could be desired, with the appropriate tenderness in the contrasting lyrical themes. Schumann, because of his heavy orchestration, needs a knowing hand, and Mr. Muench guided the orchestra in a superb performance for which the audience responded with an ovation.

Familiar though the music was, nobody in yesterday's audience could have caught up on their sleep through such glowing performances. Mr. Muench is assured of a hearty welcome each time he returns to Boston; and may his visits be frequent.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Serge Koussevitzky returns to his post to lead Brahms' 3d and Sibelius' 2d Symphonies and a new piece by Samuel Barber.

FREDERICK, MD.
NEWS

CONDUCTOR RETIRES

Boston, April 8 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

JOPLIN, MO.
NEWS-HERALD
APR 9 1948

be held building.

Conductor to Retire.

Boston, April 9.—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire music festival.

HILLSDALE, MICH.
NEWS
APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky To Quit

BOSTON, April 9 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his Silver Jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor, present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Uaris Philharmonic.

RENO, NEV.
EVENING GAZETTE

Orchestra Leader Will Close Career

BOSTON, April 9. (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season. The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic. Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

GLENDALE, CAL.
NEWS - PRESS

Koussevitzky to Retire As Boston Conductor

Boston (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 47, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
EXAMINER

A[illegible]

Koussevitzky to Retire

BOSTON, April 8.—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

SPOKANE, WASH.
SPOKESMAN REVIEW

SILVER JUBILEE STINT LAST FOR KOUSSEVITZKY

BOSTON, April 8. (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston symphony.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA.
TIMES-UNION

[illegible] 1948

Orchestra Conductor Will Retire in 1949

BOSTON, April 8. (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the [illegible]

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

PEORIA, ILL.
STAR

APR 9 - 1948

Boston Symphony Conductor Quitting

Boston, April 8. (UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced tonight that he would resign next year after his 25th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, founder and director of the Paris Philharmonic orchestra.

Koussevitzky said he would continue as director of the Berkshire Center music school at Stockbridge, but that Munch would conduct the famous Tanglewood concerts there.

LUBBOCK, TEXAS
EVENING JOURNAL

APR 9 1948

Los Angeles.

Dr. Koussevitzky To Quit Symphony

BOSTON, April 9. (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris conservatory orchestra and the Paris philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire music festival.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM

APR 9 1948

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY PLANNING TO RETIRE

BOSTON, April 18—(AP) Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation, said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

BUTTE, MONT.
MONTANA STANDARD

APR 9 1948

Boston Symphony Conductor Quits

BOSTON, April 8.—(U.P.)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced Thursday night that he would resign next year after his 25th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, founder and director of the Paris Philharmonic orchestra.

Koussevitsky said he would continue as director of the Berkshire Center Music school at Stockbridge, but that Munch would conduct the famous Tanglewood concerts there.

OMAHA, NEBR.
EVENING WORLD-HERALD

APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky to Retire as Symphony Director

Boston, Mass. (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season. This was announced Thursday by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees.

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR

Dr. Koussevitzky to retire in Boston

BOSTON (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said Thursday night.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season.

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

DETROIT, MICH.
PRESS

APR 9 - 1948

Koussevitzky to Retire from Boston Symphony

BOSTON—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

BARTLESVILLE, OKLA.
EXAMINER

APR 9 1948

Boston Symphony Conductor Hands In Resignation

Boston, (AP)— Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said Thursday night.

His successor will be the 57-year old Alsatian - born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation, said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

VALLEJO, CALIF.
MORNING TIMES-HERALD

APR 9 1948

Koussevitzsky To Quit Orchestra

BOSTON — (UP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced last night that he would resign next year after his 25th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, founder and director of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra.

Koussevitzky said he would continue as director of the Berkshire Center Music School at Stockbridge, but that Munch would conduct the famous Tanglewood concerts there.

ALEXANDRIA, LA.
TOWN TALK

APR 9 1948

proached.

Dr. Koussevitzky Plans to Retire

BOSTON, April 9.—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

RICHMOND, CALIF.
RECORD-HERALD

APR 9 1948

* * *

Koussevitzky To Resign

BOSTON, April 8—(UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced tonight that he would resign next year after his 25th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, founder and director of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra.

KANSAS CITY, MO.
TIMES

APR 9 - 1948

BOSTON MAESTRO TO QUIT.

Resignation in 1949 Announced by Koussevitzky.

BOSTON, April 8.(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston symphony.

HOT SPRINGS, ARK.
SENTINEL-RECORD

APR 9 - 1948

Dr. Koussevitzky, Boston Conductor, Will Retire

Boston, April 8 (AP) Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57 year old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Sym

---

OKMULGEE, OKLA.
TIMES

APR 9 1948

Boston Symphony Conductor Retires

Boston, (AP)— Dr. Serge Kousevtzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, presidnt of the trustees, said Thursday night.

His successor will be the 57-year old Alsatian - born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation, said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

APR 9 - 1948

LOUIS A. McKEOWN

KOUSSEVITZKY TO RETIRE AS BOSTON ORCHESTRA LEADER

Charles Muench to Succeed Him at Close of the Next Season.

BOSTON, April 9 (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74 years old, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said last night.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

SPRINGFIELD, OHIO
NEWS

APR 9 1948

Resignation Planned By Koussevitzky

BOSTON, April 9.—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

BENNINGTON, VT.
BANNER

APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky Quits The Boston Symphony

BOSTON (AP).—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

NASHVILLE, TENN.
MORNING TENNESSEAN

APR 9 - 19[illegible]

Boston Symphony Conductor To Retire

BOSTON—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said last night.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation, said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me too continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire music center.

[112]

TUCSON, ARIZ.
ARIZONA STAR

APR 9 1948

comparable to 2½ engines.

Koussevitzky Retiring on Silver Jubilee

BOSTON, April 8. — (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation, said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire music center.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Symphony Hall.

ATLANTA, GA.
JOURNAL

APR 9 - 1948

BOSTON—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season. The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic. The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

MERIDEN, CONN.
RECORD

APR 9 - 1948

Dr. Koussevitzky To Retire In '49

Boston, April 8—(AP)— Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsation-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation said his decision to resign was taken because it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

NORWICH, CONN.
BULLETIN

APR 9 1948

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY TO RETIRE AS CONDUCTOR

BOSTON, Aprli 8—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston symphony.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH

Koussevitsky To Retire

International News Service

BOSTON, April 9.- Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will retire next year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and will be succeeded by Charles Muench, director of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and conductor of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra.

The announcement that Koussevitsky would retire after 25 years as leader of the orchestra he made world famous was made yesterday by Dr. Henry B. Cabot at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony.

Muench, 57, is a member of a famous French family of musicians.

LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER-JOURNAL

APR

Koussevitsky to Resign; Munch to Succeed Him

Boston, April 8 (UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced tonight he would resign next year after his 25th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, founder and director of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra.

Koussevitzky said he would continue as director of the Berkshire Center Music School at Stockbridge, but that Munch would conduct the famous Tanglewood concerts there.

"It is not without deep concern and heartache that I come to the parting with the orchestra to which I have devoted 25 years of my life," the 73-year-old conductor said.

He announced his decision to a meeting of the Society of the Friends of the Boston Symphony and said he felt it would not be possible for him to continue his present strenuous obligations.

Munch recently appeared here as guest conductor of the orchestra and in the 1946 season made his first American appearance at Symphony Hall.

Munch, 56, is a native of France. In 1932 he conducted the Paris Symphony and founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra.

Music Lovers, Symphony Players Like Muench, Alsatian-Born Conductor Long Famed in Europe

Boston Globe 3/9/

Charles Muench, 56-year-old Alsatian-born conductor who will succeed Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the opening of the 1949-1950 concert season, already has won enthusiastic approval from Boston music lovers who heard the current season's concerts at which he was guest conductor.

Completing two weeks of guest conducting with concerts last weekend, he was given an ovation by the critical Friday afternoon audience. The continued bursts of applause brought him back from the wings three times for acknowledgments before intermission, and another three times at the end of the program.

USES NO SCORE

A big man, six feet tall, handsome and with a shock of unruly gray hair, he conducts with vigorous gestures. He uses a baton, but frequently shifts it to his left hand to free his right for lively movement. Like several of today's younger conductors, he uses no score.

He spoke almost no English when he arrived in the United States in December, 1946. Although his English has improved to the point where—as a friend expressed it last night—"he can express himself until he gets involved, and then gives up," he addresses the musicians in French.

Members of the orchestra were delighted at the announcement of his appointment. They expressed themselves as having enjoyed his leadership, both in rehearsals and in concerts, during the one week last November and two this spring when he was guest conductor.

The Symphony conductor-elect is married. The couple have no children. It was not known last night when they planned to take up residence in Boston.

BORN IN ALSACE

Muench, who will take over the Symphony at the peak of its ability and while it is generally regarded as the world's finest orchestra, was born in Strasbourg, Alsace, Sept. 26, 1891, of a French mother and Alsatian father.

His father, Ernest Muench, who was director of the Choeur Saint-Guillaume in Strasbourg, was his first teacher. The musical family includes two brothers of Charles who likewise have distinguished themselves musically.

The violin was Charles Muench's chosen instrument. Besides the tutorship of his father, he studied with Lucien Capet in Paris and Carl Flesch in Berlin. In 1919 he was made professor of the Strasbourg Conservatory and conductor of its orchestra.

In 1926 he went to Leipzig as concert master in the Gewandhaus Orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwangler. Six years later he transferred his activities to Paris, where he conducted concerts of the Paris Symphony, Lamoureux and Straram orchestras.

He also founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra, of which he has since been the regular conductor. In 1938 he succeeded Philippe Gaubert as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, a position he likewise still holds.

His first appearance as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Dec. 27, 1946, shortly after his arrival in this country.

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

APR 9 - 1948

Koussevitzky To Give Baton Over To Muench

BOSTON (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire music festival.

LEWISTON, IDAHO
TRIBUNE

APR

Boston Conductor To Retire

Boston, April 8. —(AP)— Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said

---

HAGERSTOWN, MD.
MAIL

APR 9 - 1948

DIRECTOR TO RETIRE

Boston, April 8 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

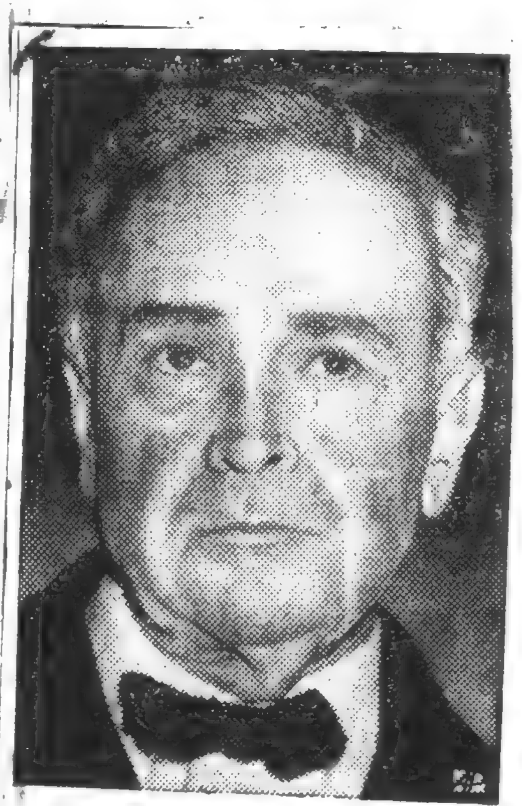
AMSTERDAM, N. Y.
RECORDER

APR 9 - 1948

Koussevitzky and Successor

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

LOUISVILLE, KY.
TIMES



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

Boston Symphony Loses Conductor At End Of Season

Boston, April 9 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The Russian-born conductor, 74, will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian, present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Koussevitzky will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

LYNCHBURG, VA.
ADVANCE

APR 9 1948

LEADER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY TO RETIRE

Boston, April 9 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris conservatory orchestra and the Paris philharmonic.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN

Leader of Boston Symphony to Resign

BOSTON, April 8—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said Thursday night.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire music center.

BATON ROUGE, LA.
ADVOCATE

Dr. Koussevitzky To Retire From Boston Symphony

Boston, April 8 [illegible] Koussevitzky [illegible] that he would resign [illegible] er his 25th season [illegible] "our great [illegible] Symphony [illegible] succeeded [illegible] er and [illegible] harmon [illegible]

Koussevitzky [illegible] tinue as dir[illegible] Center Mus[illegible] but that Mun[illegible] famous Tang[illegible]

Kousse[illegible] twice as lo[illegible] ductor of [illegible] came here [illegible] of the music[illegible] biting [illegible] perfection

---

W. VA.
EXPONENT

APR 9 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY WILL RETIRE

BOSTON, April 8, (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alastian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston symphony.

Koussevi[illegible] tion, said hi[illegible] taken becau[illegible] not be possib[illegible] my present [illegible] for the length [illegible] our active w[illegible]

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire music center.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the [illegible] Friends of th[illegible] orchestra at Sym[illegible]

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

Koussevitzky Quits Boston Symphony at End of Next Season

[illegible] April 8 (AP)—Dr. Serge [illegible]

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

Dr. Koussevitzky Of Boston Symphony Will Retire In 1948

BOSTON, April 8 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation, said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Symphony hall.

Muench, at present conductor of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic, will take over leadership of the Boston Symphony at the beginning of its 69th season in October, 1949.

He left New York today by plane for France to complete engagements in France, Holland and Belgium.

Cabot told Koussevitzky before some 700 friends of the orchestra that "you have given so generously of your great and courageous spirit which has made possible joy and happiness to hundreds and thousands of hungry and appreciative audiences all over the world.

"And we know at Tanglewood, too, you have lighted a torch that will shine on through troublesome or peaceful times, and by your vision point to security and incredible accomplishment."

The silver jubilee season will complete a period of service almost twice as long as that of any previous conductor.

Wilhelm Gericke, whose conductorship previously had been the Boston's longest, served two terms that totalled 13 years, 1884-89 and 1898-1906.

Muench comes to the position with an illustrious career to commend him. After early training on the violin with his father, Ernest Muench, and with Lucien Capet in Paris and Carl Flesch in Berlin, he was made professor of the Strasbourg Conservatory.

In 1926 he went to Leipzig where he served as concert master in the Gewandhaus orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwangler. In 1932 he went to Paris and conducted concerts of the Paris Symphony orchestra, the Lamoureux orchestra and the Straram orchestra.

Muench succeeded Philippe Gaubert as conductor of the Paris Conservatory orchestra in 1938. He founded the Paris Philharmonic orchestra in the thirties and is its regular conductor.

He first came to the United States to conduct the Bostoh Symphony as a guest on Dec. 27, 1946. Last season and this he has made guest appearances in several cities, conducting three week of the current Boston Symphony season.

LITTLE FALLS, N. Y.
TIMES

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY TO RETIRE AS CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

[illegible]—Dr. Serge [illegible] his career as conductor of the [illegible] symphony [illegible] of his silver [illegible]

[illegible] Russian born [illegible] will be succeeded by [illegible] Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of [illegible] Paris conservatory orchestra [illegible] the Paris philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees [illegible] the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

[illegible] elderly director will remain as [illegible] the Berkshire music festival.

WILMINGTON, DEL.
JOURNAL EVERY EVENING

APR 9 - 1948

Koussevitzky to Retire As Boston Conductor

BOSTON, April 9 (AP).—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society

---

OMAHA, NEBR.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD

APR [illegible]

Koussevitzky to Retire as Symphony Director

Boston, Mass. (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season. This was announced Thursday by Henry B Cabot, president of the trustees.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the symphony.

Mr. Cabot said Mr. Koussevitzky will continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

MIAMI, FLA.
HERALD

Koussevitzky, 74, Plans Retirement In 1949

[illegible] Serge Koussevitzky [illegible] conductor [illegible] symphony orchestra [illegible] end of [illegible] season. [illegible] the 57- [illegible] conductor. [illegible] appeared [illegible] Boston

---

ONEONTA, N. Y.
STAR

APR 9 - 1948

Koussevitzky Quits Post With Boston Symphony

BOSTON, April 8 (UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced tonight that he would resign next year after his 25th season as conductor of "our great and beloved" Boston symphony orchestra. He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, founder and director of the Paris Philharmonic orchestra.

Koussevitzky said he would continue as director of the Berkshire Center Music school at Stockbridge, but that Munch would conduct the famous Tanglewood concerts there.

"It is not without deep concern and heartache that I come to the parting with the orchestra to which I have devoted 25 years of my life," the 73-year-old conductor said.

Impossible to Continue

He announced his decision to a meeting of the Society of the Friends of the Boston Symphony and said he felt it would not be possible for him to continue his present strenuous obligations.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra, said that Munch would succeed Koussevitzky after next season, with his first concert taking place in October 1949.

Munch recently appeared here as guest conductor of the orchestra and in the 1946 season made his first American appearance at Symphony Hall.

Munch, 56, is a native of Strassburg, Alsace, France and studied music under his father, in Paris and Berlin. He became a professor of music at Strassburg conservatory in 1919 and conducted the orchestra there.

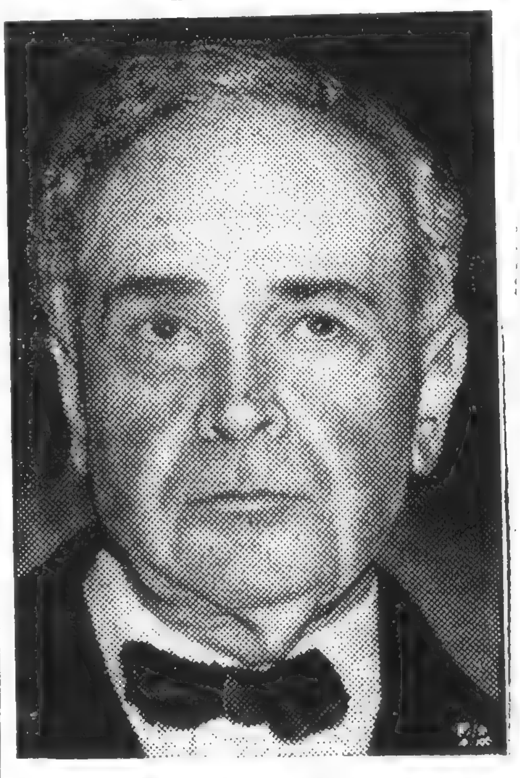
Later he went to Leipzig and was concert master of the Gewandhaus orchestra and in 1932 he moved to Paris where he conducted the Paris symphony and founded the Paris Philharmonic orchestra. He since has been regular conductor of that group.

Munch was said to have signed a contract to conduct the orchestra yesterday and that he presently is en route to Europe for a spring tour through France and Belgium.

Koussevitzky, who has served twice as long as any previous conductor of the Boston orchestra, came here in 1924 and lifted it out of the musical doldrums with his biting criticisms and demands for perfection.

His great flair f[illegible] his gift for prog[illegible] building [illegible] his attention to detail raised [illegible] Boston symphony to a point where it came to be described as the "most highly perfected and sensitized symphonic ensemble in the world."

Retiring After 25 Yrs.



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
NEWS

APR [illegible] 1948

Koussevitzky Resigns Post As Boston Symphony Director

BOSTON, April 9 — (UP) — Seventy-three-year-old Dr. Serge Koussevitzky prepared today to hand over his baton to a younger man next year after his 25th season as conductor of his "great and beloved" Boston symphony orchestra.

Succeeding him at the head of one of the world's most noted musical organizations will be Charles Munch, 56-year-old founder and director of the Paris Philharmonic orchestra.

Koussevitzky's resignation and the immediate appointment of Munch were announced last night at the annual meeting of the Society of the Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

"I am moved to take this decision because I feel that it will not be possible to continue my present strenuous obligations . . ." said Koussevitzky in a letter read by President Henry B. Cabot of the orchestra's trustees.

The Russian-born conductor promised to continue as director of the orchestra's famed [illegible] shire music center at Tanglewood, Lenox, and said he will make occasional guest appearances at the head of the symphony both there and during Winter seasons here.

Munch, meanwhile, was enroute to Europe for a Spring tour through France, Holland and Belgium. He signed a three-year contract in New York Wednesday before returning to his native Europe for the first time in two years.

During that time he has appeared as guest conductor with several orchestras including the Boston group which he took over temporarily both this season and last when he made his American debut at Symphony hall here.

His first concert as regular conductor will be in October 1949.

The Boston Globe
Published by GLOBE NEWSPAPER COMPANY
242 Washington St. Boston 7. Ma
(Established March 4, 1872. Evening edition first issu
March 7, 1878. Sunday edition first issued Oct. 14, 187

FRIDAY, APRIL 9, 1948

SUBSCRIPTION RATES

An Admirable Choice

Good news came out of the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday. Charles Munch, it was announced, will succeed Serge Koussevitzky when the present conductor terminates his brilliant regime of 25 years in 1949. Once again we have been given an example of the practical foresight which characterizes the stewardship of the trustees and management of Boston's musical glory.

In a period when certain first-rank American orchestras have been rocked by inner dissension, the Boston Symphony continues calmly and with complete accord upon its mission of bringing great music and performances to a nation-wide public. In Boston we shall have no uneasy period of testing one guest leader after another to find, belatedly, an appropriate successor. Thanks to the wisdom of the Boston trustees and management, choice and decision have been made in advance of Mr. Koussevitsky's retirement.

Mr. Munch is an admirable choice. During his guest appearances here he showed plainly his authority, technical skill and musicianship. He has the polish and the dynamic temperament that are further essentials of a first-rate conductor. We have every reason to expect that the virtuosity to which Serge Koussevitzky brought the orchestra will be maintained.

In matters business and artistic how many other orchestras can boast such good fortune?

ASHEVILLE, N. C.
TIMES

APR 9 - 1948

Dr. Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Leader, Retires

BOSTON, April 9. — (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
AGE HERALD

Serge Koussevitzky Announces Retirement

BOSTON, April 8 — (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian - born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation, said his decision to resign wa taken because "I feel that it wi not be possible for me to continu my present strenuous obligation for the length of 16 to 18 weeks o our active Winter season."

NEWARK N.J.
NEWS

APR 9 - 1948

Koussevitzky Quitting Post

BOSTON (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES

APR 9 - 1948

Conductor Of Orchestra To Resign

Munch to Succeed Dr. Serge Koussevitsky

BOSTON, April 8—(UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced tonight that he would resign next year after his twenty-fifth season as conductor of "our great and beloved" Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, founder and director of the Paris Philharmonic orchestra.

Koussevitzky said he would continue as director of the Berkshire Center Music School at Stockbridge, but that Munch would conduct the famous Tanglewood concerts there.

"It is not without deep concern and heartache that I come to the parting with the orchestra to which I have devoted 2g years of my life," the 73-year-old conductor said.

He announced his decision to a meeting of the Society of the Friends of the Boston Symphony and said he felt it would not be possible for him to continue his present strenuous obligations.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra, said that Munch would succeed Koussevitzky after next season, with his first concert taking place in October 1949.

Munch recently appeared here as guest conductor of the orchestra and in the 1946 season made his first American appearance at symphony hall.

LAUREL, MISS.
LEADER CALL

APR 9 1948

Musician Will Retire

BOSTON, April 9 —(AP)— Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his Silver Jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The eldery director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES

APR 9 - 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY RETIRES AS BOSTON CONDUCTOR

BOSTON, April 8 (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee, 1948-49, season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

APR 9 - 1948

MUNCH TO BE HUB CONDUCTOR

Parisian Will Be Successor to Dr. Koussevitzky

Boston, April 9—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced last night that he would resign next year after his 25th season as conductor of "our great and beloved" Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, founder and director of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra.

Koussevitzky said he would continue as director of the Berkshire Center Music School at Stockbridge, but that Munch would conduct the famous Tanglewood concerts there.

"It is not without deep concern and heartache that I come to the parting with the orchestra to which I have devoted 25 years of my life," the 73-year-old conductor said.

He announced his decision to a meeting of the Society of the Friends of the Boston Symphony and said he felt it would not be possible for him to continue his present strenuous obligations.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra, said that Munch would succeed Koussevitszky after next season, with his first concert taking place in October, 1949.

Munch recently appeared here as guest conductor of the orchestra and in the 1946 season made his first American appearance at Symphony Hall.

Munch, 56, is a native of Strassburg, Alsace, France, and studied music under his father in Paris and Berlin. He became a professor of music at Strassburg Conservatory in 1919 and conducted the orchestra there.

Later he went to Leipzig and was concert master of the Gewandhaus Orchestra and in 1932 he moved to Paris where he conducted the Paris Symphony and founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra. He since has been regular conductor of that group.

ALBANY, N.Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

1948

Dr. Koussevitzky to Retire As Boston Symphony Leader

Boston—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Dr. Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

Dr. Koussevitzy's letter of resignation said he felt it would be impossible for him to continue strenuous obligations "for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Mr. Cabot said the conductor's courageous spirit had made possible "joy and happiness to the hundreds and thousands of hungry and appreciative audiences all over the world."

He said he had "lighted a torch at Tanglewood (the Berkshire Center) that will shine on through troublesome or peaceful times.

The silver jubilee season wil complete for Dr. Koussevitzk period of service almost t long as that of any previ ductor, Mr. Cabot said.

Mr. Muench, who over at the beginnin ton Orchestra's 69t New York for Fr to complete er France, Holland a

---

BRISTOL, CONN.
PRESS

APR 9 1948

Conductor Of Boston Symphony To Retire

BOSTON, April 9 (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitsky will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

OSSINING, N. Y.
CITIZEN-REGISTER

A 1948

Dr. Koussevitzky To Close Career

Boston (AP).—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles, Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO
VINDICATOR

Koussevitzky to Retire

Boston, April 9 (A. P.).—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season. The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, aged 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

EAST LIVERPOOL, O.
REVIEW

APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky Will Retire

BOSTON, April 9 — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1918-49 season. The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor.

ST. PAUL, MINN.
DISPATCH

APR 9 - 1948

Koussevitzky To Quit Boston Post

BOSTON - (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced Thursday night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meetin gof the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The eldery director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music festival.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MORNING TRIBUNE

MAESTRO TO RETIRE —Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his 1948-49 silver jubilee season, it was announced in Boston. His successor will be Alsatian-born Charles Muench, 57, who has appeared several times with the Boston symphony.—(AP)

Koussevitzky

THE BOSTON HERALD, FRIDAY, APRIL 9, 1948

Muench Seen Conductor of First Rank

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The action of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in obtaining the services of Charles Muench as permanent conductor of that body to succeed Serge Koussevitzky at the end of next season should meet with the approval of all music lovers and friends of the orchestra.

This prompt decision on a momentous issue, one that has been bothering symphony patrons for some time, is the more welcome when we look about and see the mess in which the dilly-dallying of the trustees of the New York Philharmonic and the Chicago Symphony has left those orchestras.

Even the opponents of Muench on aesthetic grounds—and there has been some growling at him by critics—will recognize that it is of the utmost importance for the health and well-being of the Boston Symphony to obtain a single permanent conductor. That is common sense. The only difficulty about so acting is the scarcity of first-rank conductors.

I have no hesitation in pronouncing Muench a first-rank conductor and in fact did so in my notice of the last symphony concert. I will go further and say that he is the best choice that the trustees could have made and that Boston is extremely lucky to get him.

Serge Koussevitzky once said to me that Muench was one of the very few guest conductors who left the orchestra in the same splendid tonal estate in which he found it and that he, Koussevitzky, could come back and take up his baton where he left off. I am sure that Dr Koussevitzky will not mind my quoting this observation made in private, for it is the quality [illegible] of the Boston Symphony [illegible] the thing that sets it apart [illegible] other fine orchestras [illegible] want at all costs to [illegible]

Muench is not only [illegible] plished virtuoso on an [illegible] its peak, he can also [illegible] ocre orchestra out [illegible] and make it play [illegible] thought it knew how. I [illegible] him do just this feat with the [illegible] sels Philharmonic dur[illegible] war. We are now [illegible] country, but [illegible] tors in [illegible] ing against Muench [illegible] came to us after [illegible] excellent European [illegible]

CRITICAL ACCLAIM

As an interpreter of [illegible] sic and the modern [illegible] been everywhere acclaim[illegible] production of Honegger's [illegible] Arc at the Stadium this [illegible] New York was a major [illegible] city that teems with [illegible] "events." I think there [illegible] who will cavil at his p[illegible] of 18th century music. With [illegible] to the 19th cen[illegible] there [illegible] ready been [illegible] press. I went on [illegible] as greatly appr[illegible] tation of Beeth[illegible] mann's 4th. He [illegible] mer as in a [illegible] berance and gaiety. [illegible] was strongly rebu[illegible] of his colleagues.

Well, dispute [illegible] of artistic li[illegible] sleep under M[illegible] neither will the [illegible] wrong and Mu[illegible] should have b[illegible] always the orc[illegible] can be a gr[illegible] tors. It is my conviction that we have a leader of great musicianship, of catholic taste and of vig[illegible] ous intelligence in Muench when he comes to us perm[illegible] in the fall of 1949.

HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

APR 1948

BOSTON SYMPHONY DIRECTOR TO QUIT

BOSTON [illegible] director of the Boston S[illegible] chestra said tonight that he [illegible] sign next year. Th[illegible] Serge Koussevitzky [illegible] plete his 25th season with the B[illegible] Symphony before retir[illegible] succeeded by Charles M[illegible] director of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra.

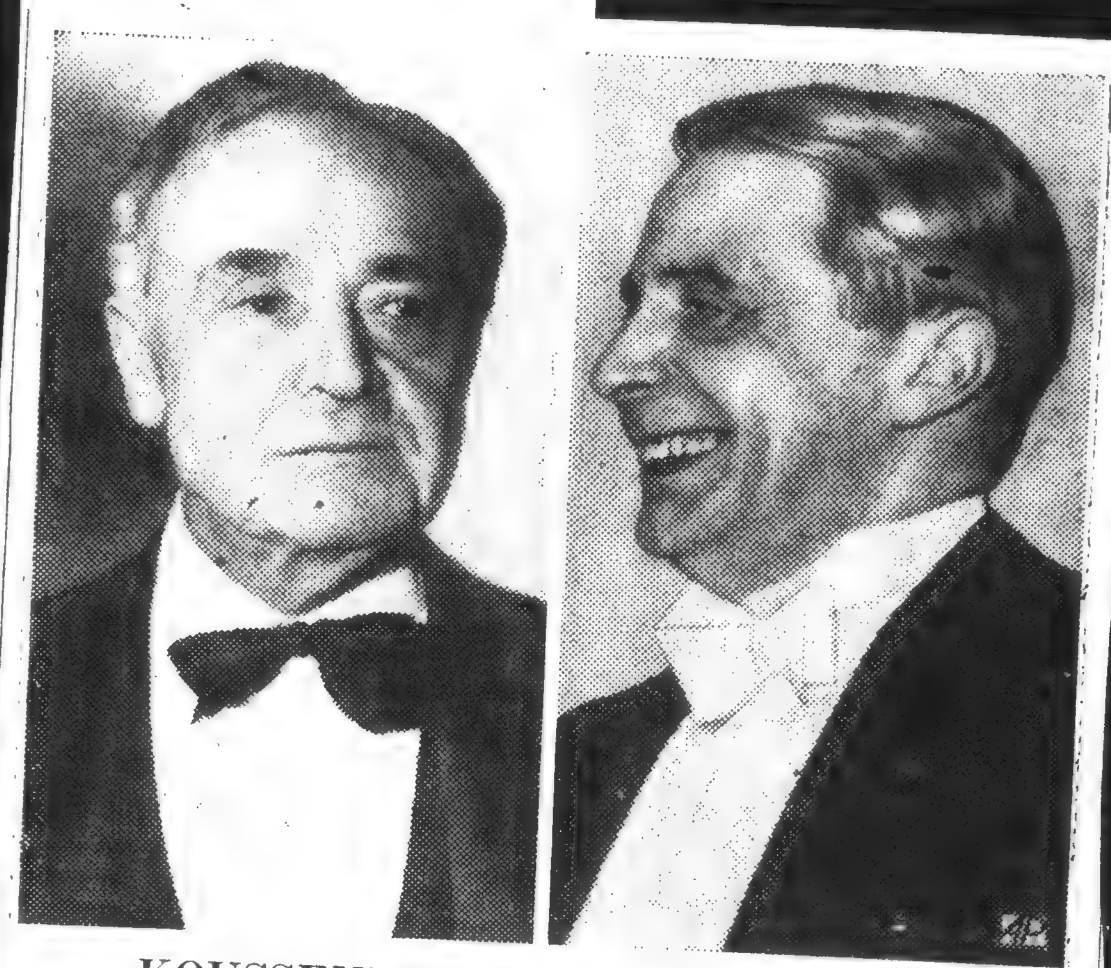
[115]

PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS
APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky, Successor

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

KNOXVILLE, TENN.
NEWS-SENTINEL
APR 9 1948



KOUSSEVITZKY AND SUCCESSOR

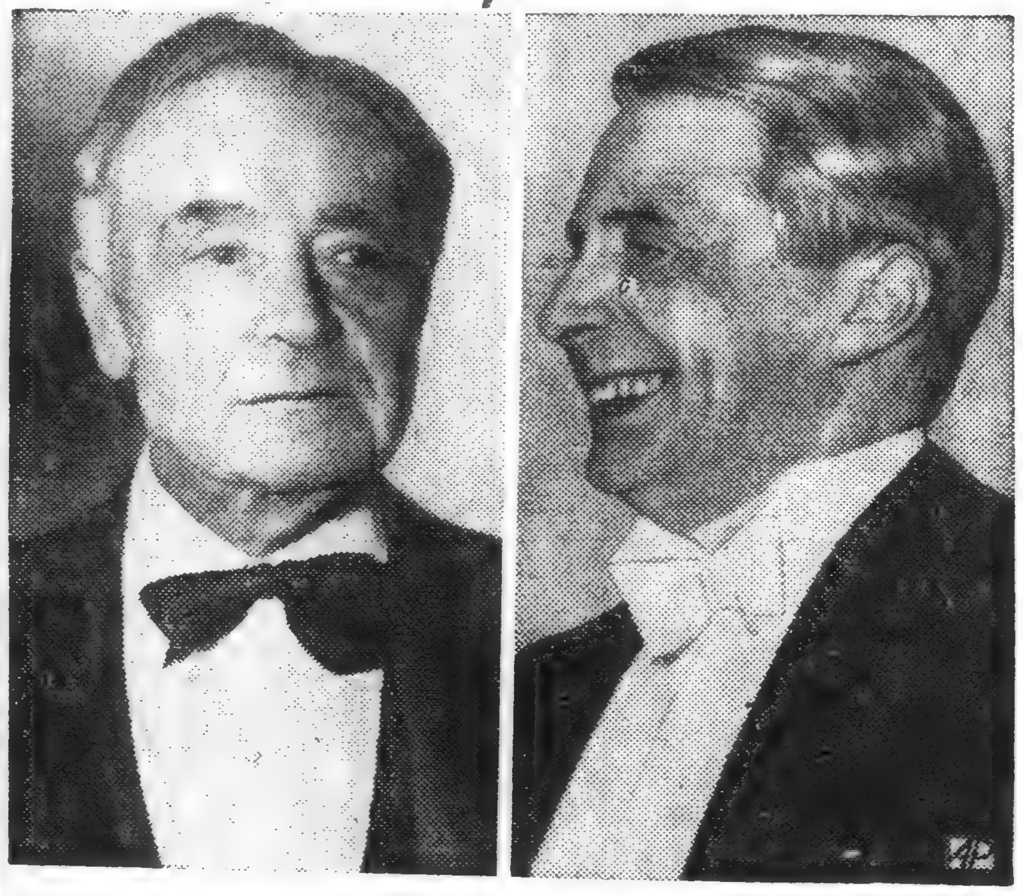
Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony. (AP Wirephoto).

ATTLEBORO, MASS.
SUN
APR [illegible] 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY AND SUCCESSOR—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (left) 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, wil retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot president of the trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

ELMIRA, N. Y.
STAR-GAZETTE
APR 10 1948

Koussevitzky, Successor



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

SARANAC LAKE, N. Y.
ADIRONDACK ENTERPRISE
APR 10 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY AND SUCCESSOR — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in Boston His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

COLUMBIA, S. C.
STATE
APR 11 1948

Koussevitzky to Retire

KOUSSEVITZKY MUENCH

Boston, April 10—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston symphony.

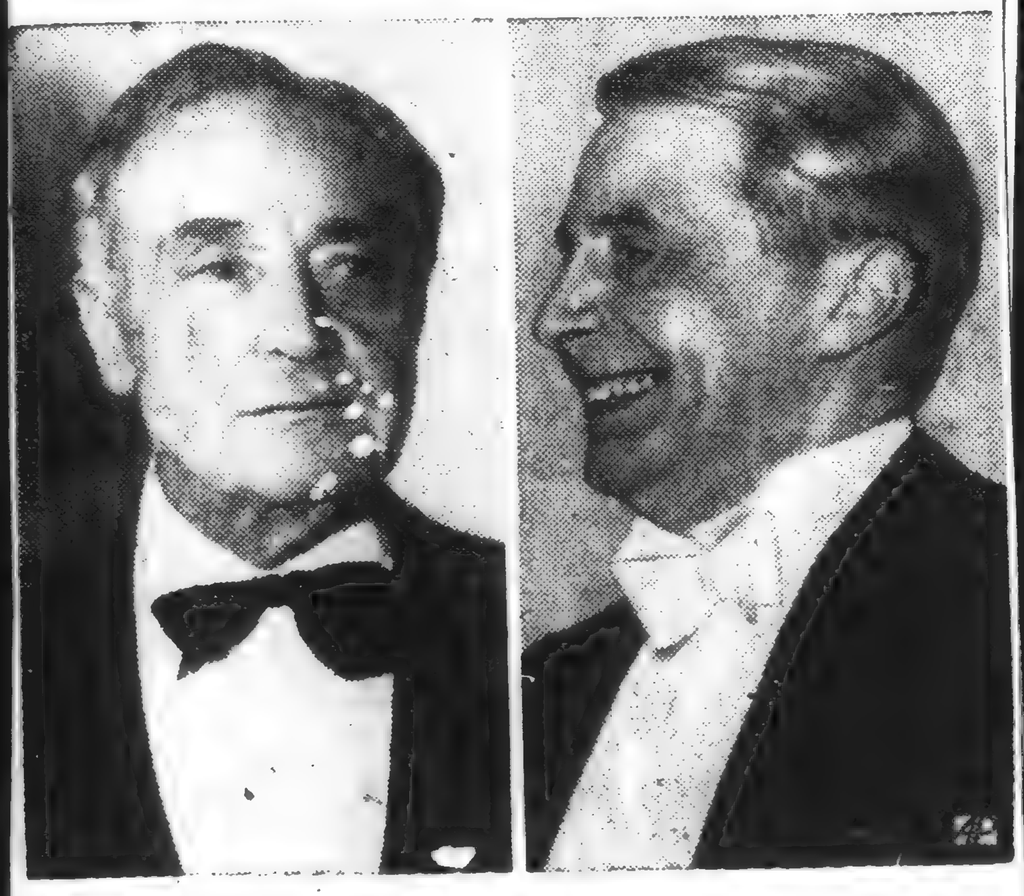
Koussevitzky's letter of resignation, said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue by present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Symphony hall.

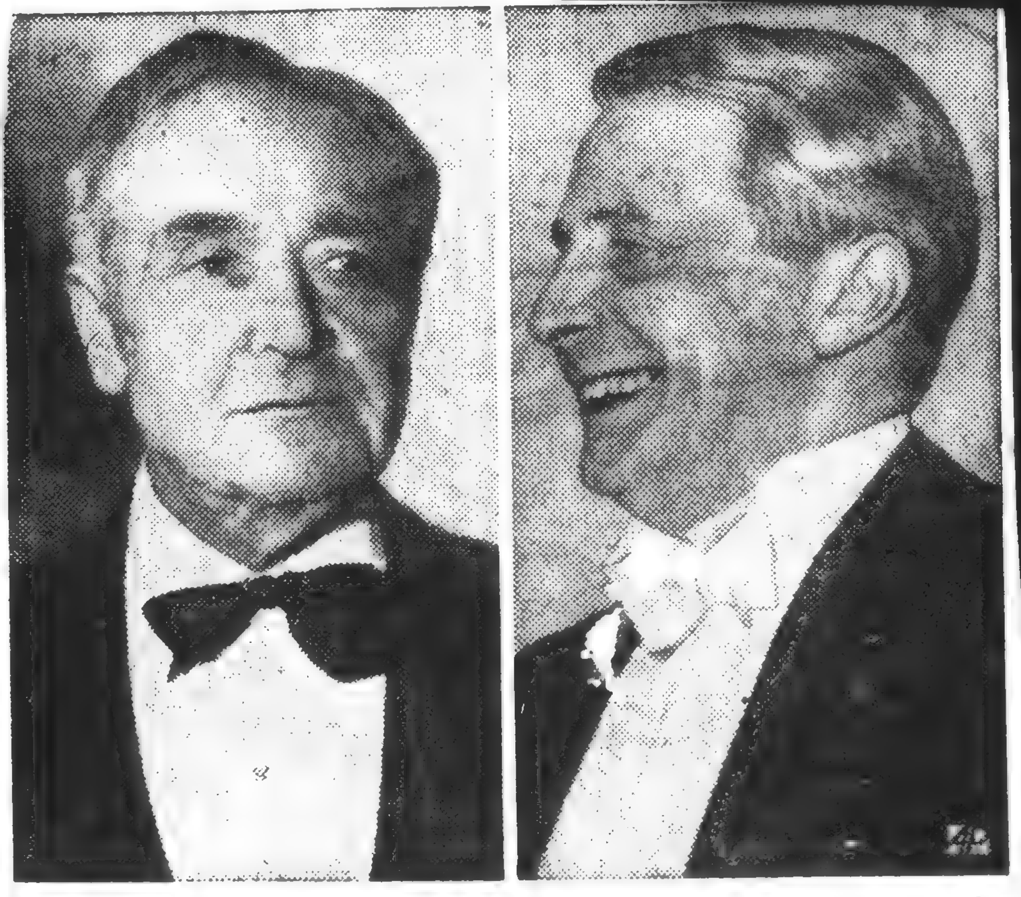
WILLIAMSPORT, PA.
GAZETTE-BULLETIN
APR 10 1948

Koussevitzky and Successor



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, left, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, right, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

SALISBURY, MD.
TIMES
APR 14 1948



KOUSSEVITZKY AND SUCCESSOR. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the Trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

VINELAND, N. J.
TIMES-JOURNAL
APR 14 1948

KOUSSEVITSKY AND SUCCESSOR—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION-STAR

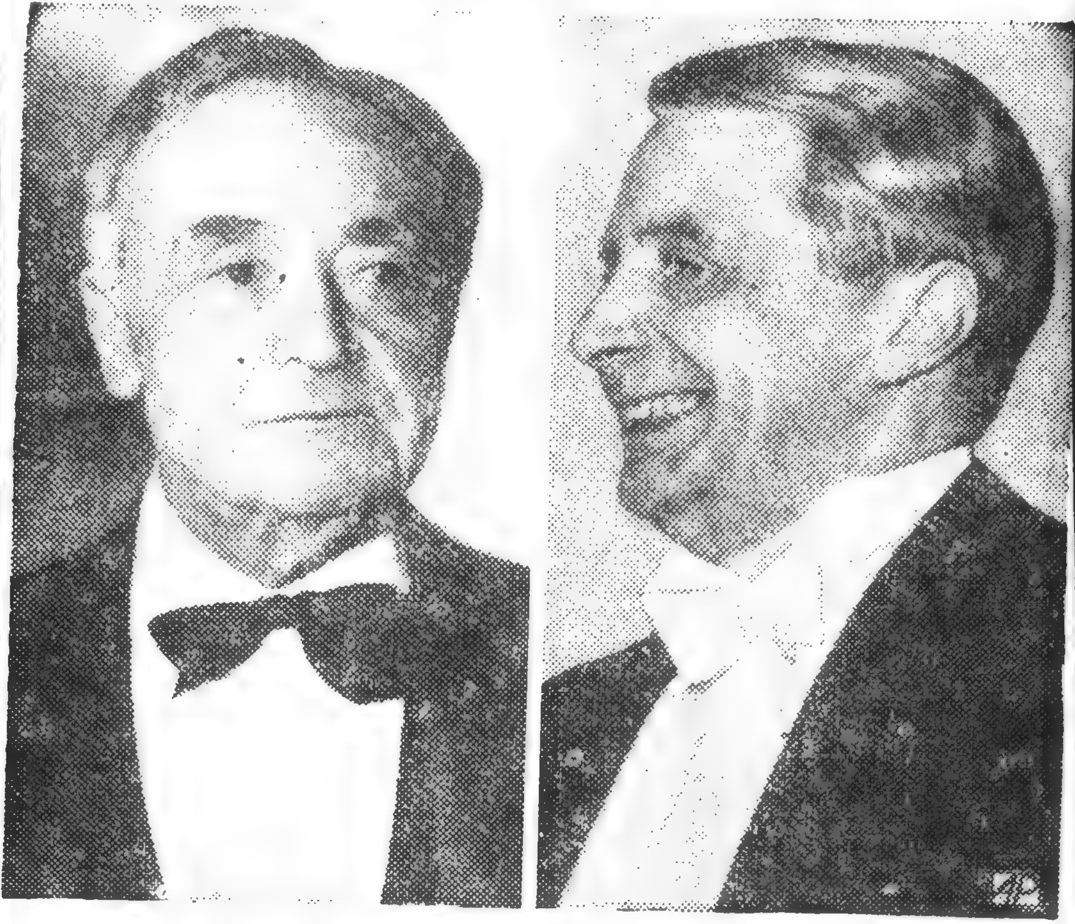
APR 13 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY AND SUCCESSOR—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

ST. JOHNSBURY, VT.
CALEDONIAN RECORD

APR 13 1948

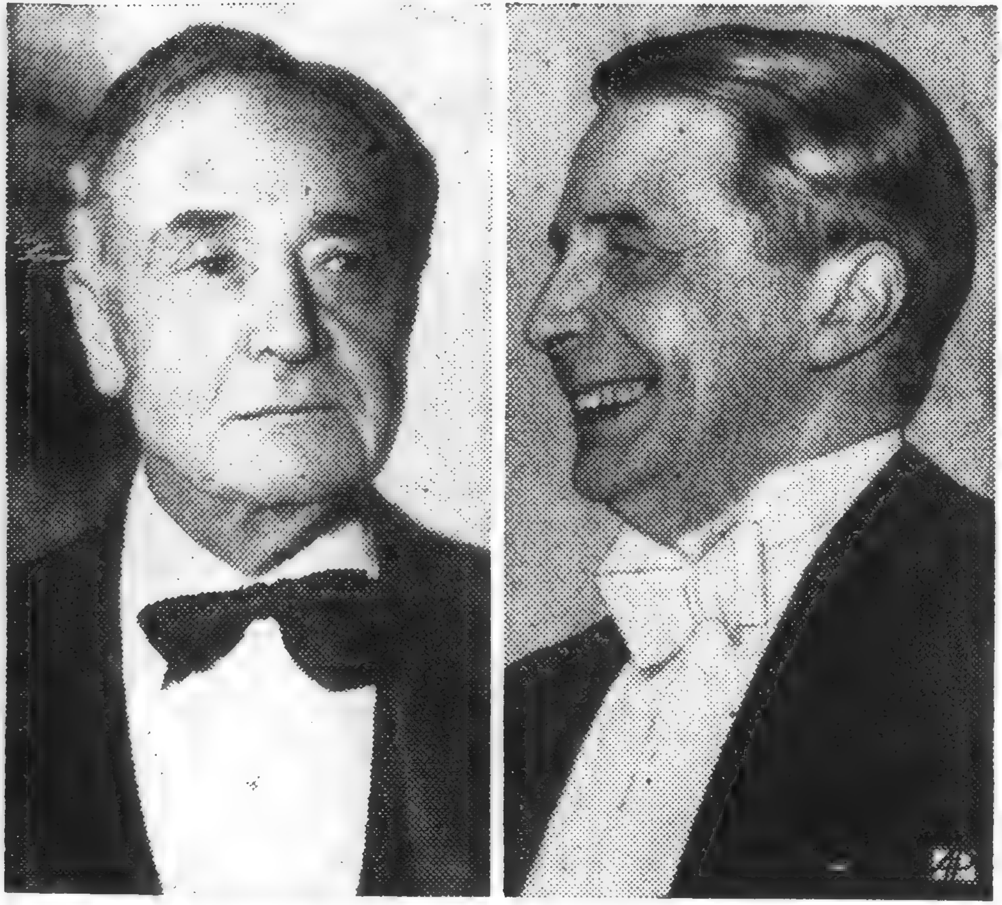
KOUSSEVITZKY AND SUCCESSOR



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

WATERTOWN, N. Y.
TIMES

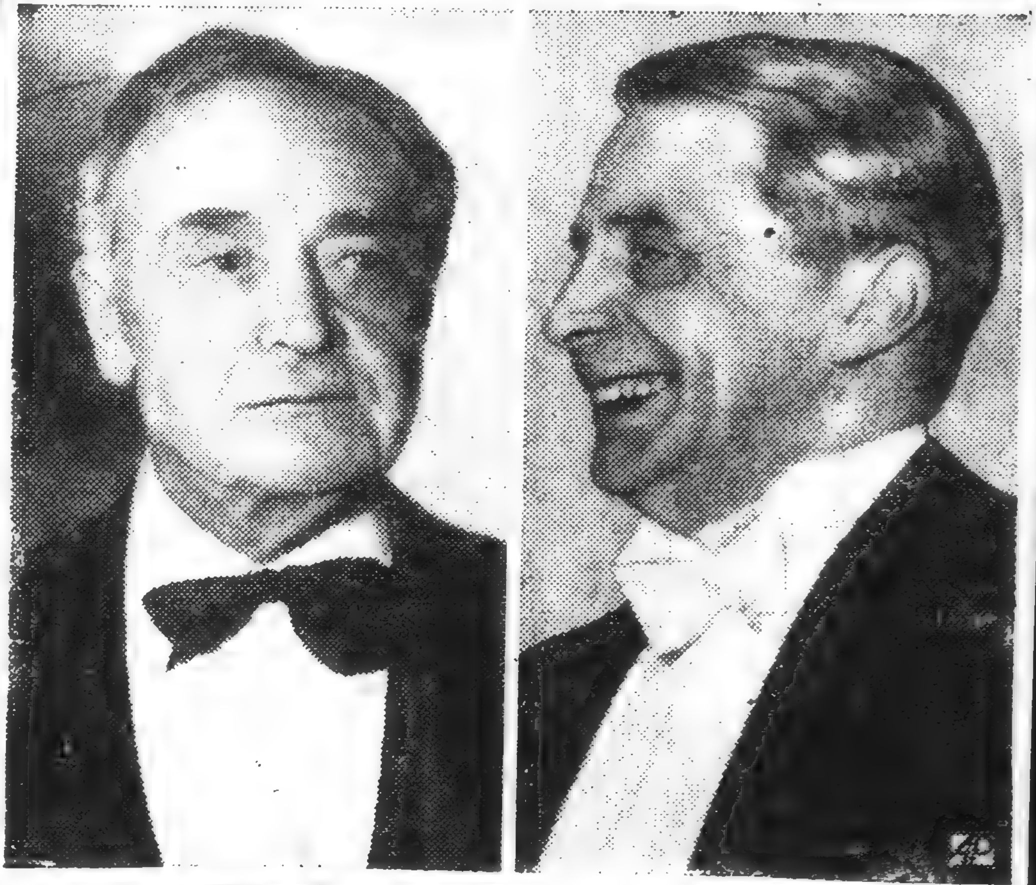
948



KOUSSEVITZKY AND SUCCESSOR — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston symphony.

GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y.
LEADER-REPUBLICAN

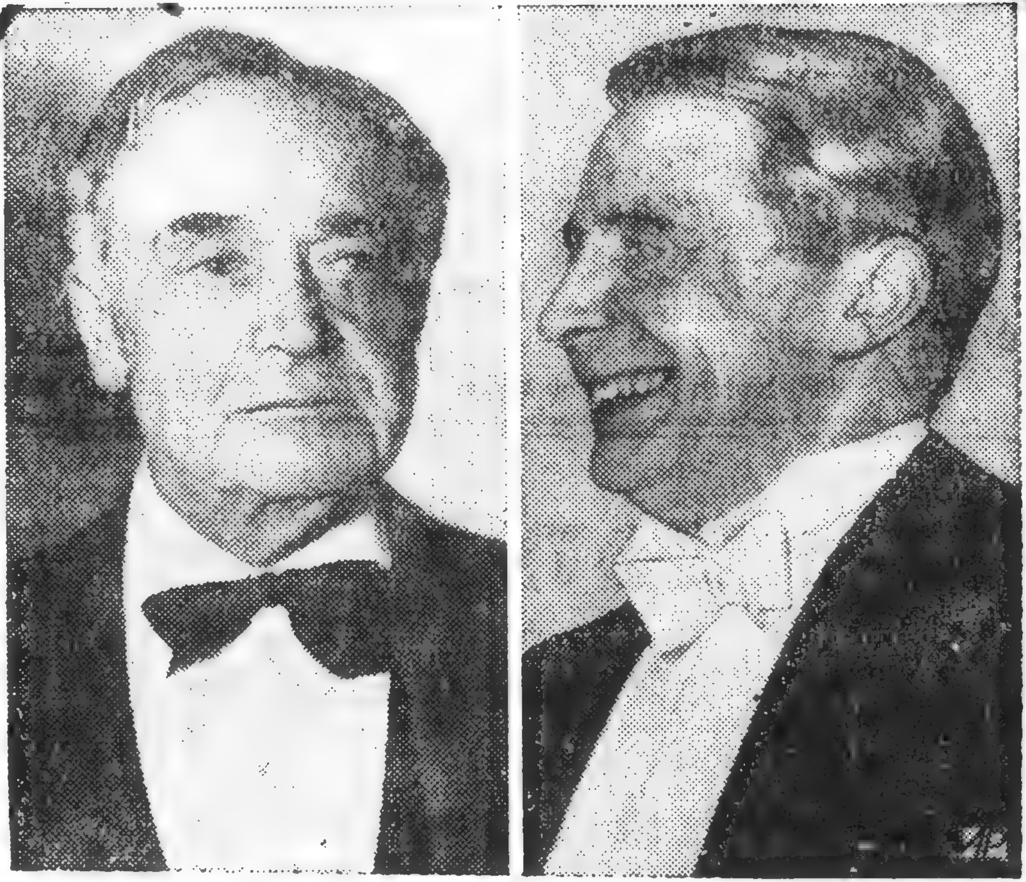
APR 9 1948



[redacted]VITZKY (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.
STANDARD STAR

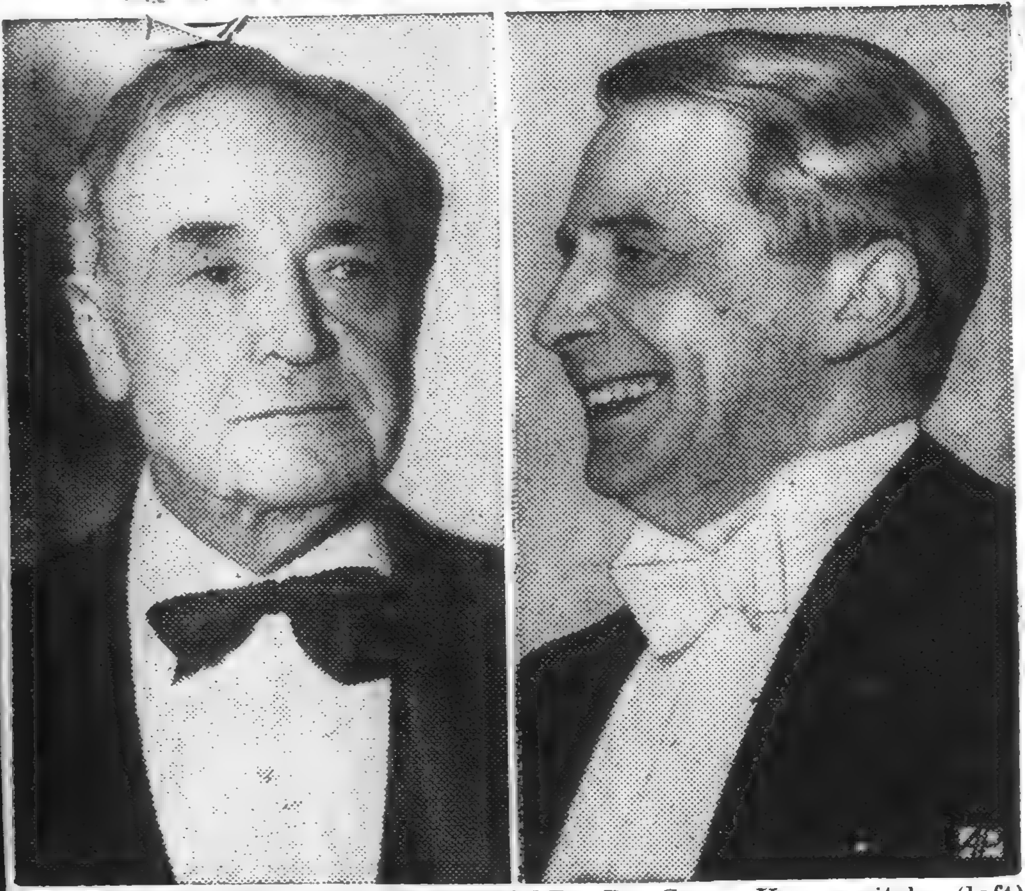
R 9 1948



KOUSSEVITZKY AND SUCCESSOR—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his Silver Jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

PHOENIXVILLE, PA.
DAILY REPUBLICAN

APR [illegible]



KOUSSEVITZKY AND SUCCESSOR—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

WESTERLY, R. I.

with the Boston Symphony.

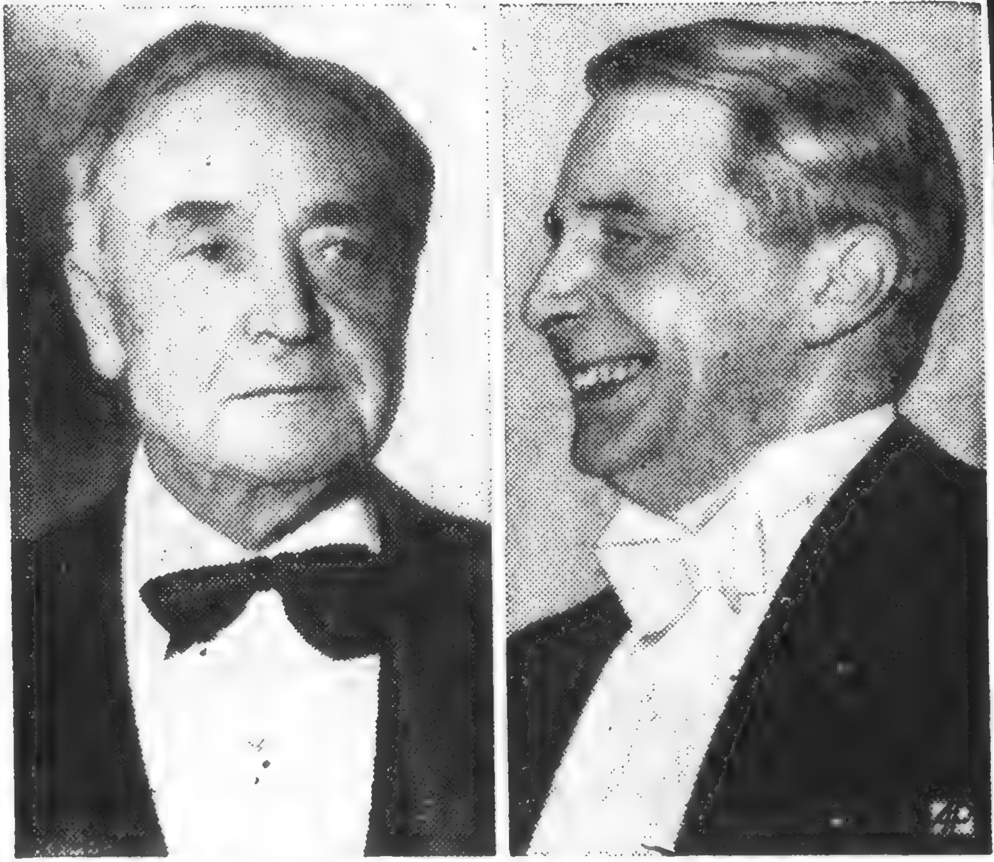
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
APR 9 1948

KOUSSEVITSKY AND SUCCESSOR

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

with the Boston Symphony.

BURLINGTON, VT.
FREE PRESS
1948



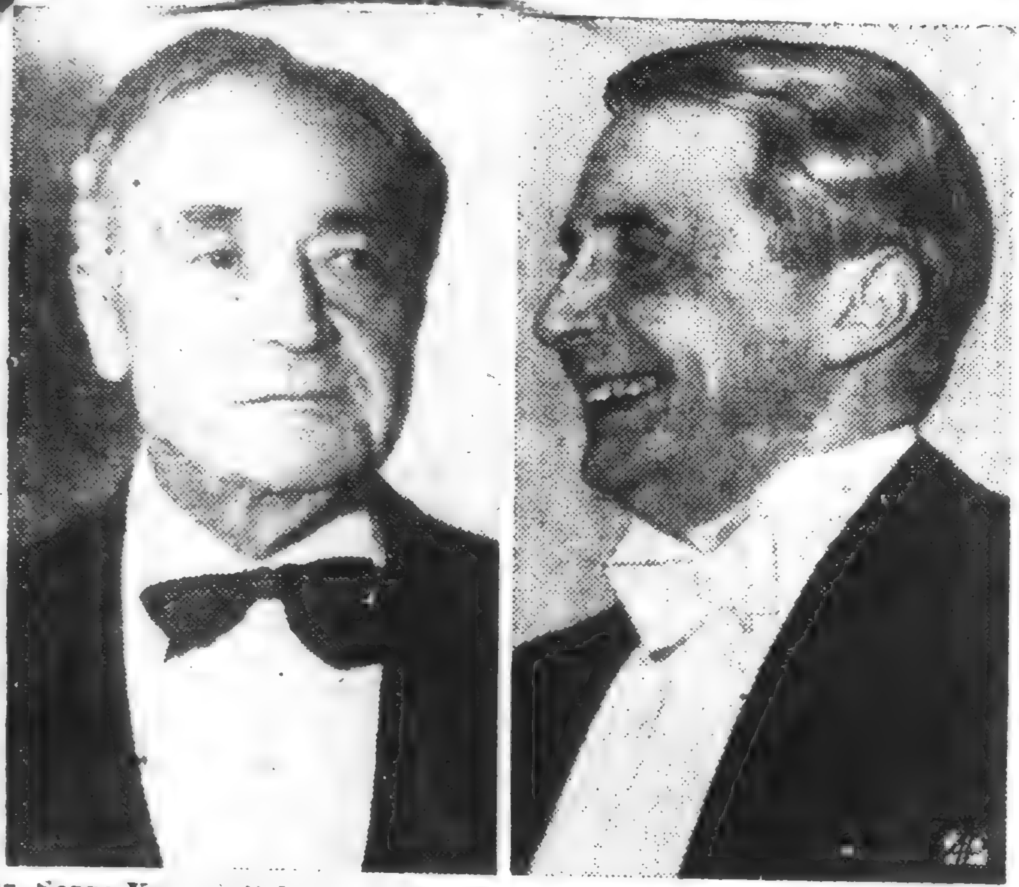
KOUSSEVITSKY AND SUCCESSOR—Dr. Serge Koussevitsky (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season. Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian born conductor, Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

WESTERLY, R. I.
SUN

1948

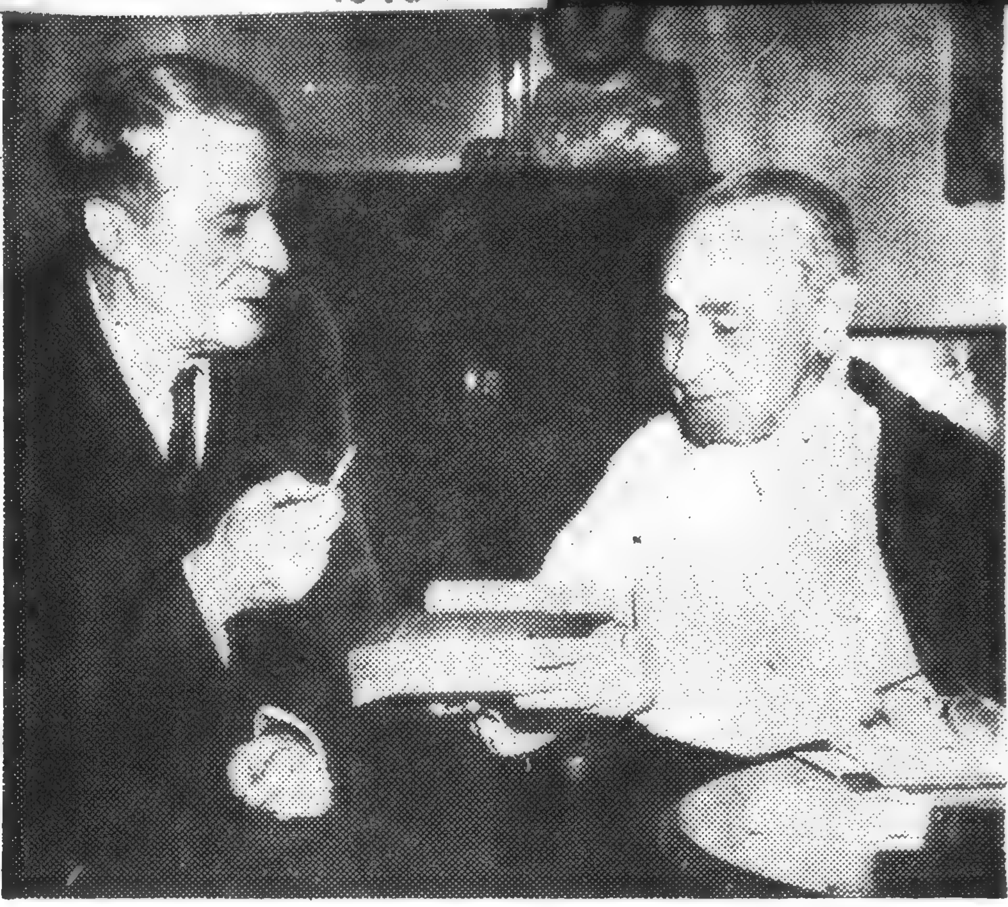
Koussevitzky and Successor



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE-STATES

APR 11 1948



—WIREPHOTO by The Associated Press.

TO SUCCEED KOUSSEVITZKY—Charles Meunch (left), 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, is shown with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, during his visit at Boston last December. It has just been announced, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that Meunch would succeed Koussevitzky at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

OMAHA, NEBR.
MORNING WORLD-HERALD

APR 10 1948

Koussevitzky and His Successor

Charles Muench (left), 57, Alsatian-born conductor, is shown with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, shortly before an announcement that Mr. Muench will succeed the latter as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the 1948-1949 season. —AP Wirephoto.

PORTSMOUTH, N. H.
HERALD-TIMES
APR 12 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY TO RESIGN—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (right) has announced that he will resign next year as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He will be succeeded by Charles Muench (left).

DAYTON, O.
HERALD

BOSTON—Dr. Serge Koussevitsky (right) announces he will retire next year ~~after his 25th~~ season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He will be replaced by Charles Munch, shown with him, who was guest conductor when this picture was made in December, 1946.

AY, APRIL 9

een tor of nk

ER WILLIAMS

he trustees of the y Orchestra in ob-vices of Charles anent conductor of ceed Serge Kous-end of next season
the approval of all friends of the or-decision on a mone that has been hony patrons for he more welcome about and see the e dilly-dallying of the New York Phil-

the Chicago Sym-
hose orchestras.
nents of Muench on ds—and there has wling at him by ognize that it is of portance for the
-being of the Bos-
to obtain a single ductor. That is com-
The only difficulty
g is the scarity of uctors.
itation in pronounc-
first-rank conductor so in my notice of ny concert. I will go that he is the best trustees could have Boston is extremely
n. evitzky once said to h was one of the very ductors who left the e same splendid ton-ich he found it and sevitzky, could come up his baton where am sure that Dr.
will not mind my bservation made in s the quality of tone
Symphony which is t sets it apart from hestras and which we sts to preserve.
not only an accom-
o on an orchestra at an also pull a medi-out of the doldrums play better than it ew how. I have seen is feat with the Bosonic during the war.
good conducntry, but it still is st Muench that he ter the war with an pean reputation.

CCLAIM

preter of French mu-oderns, Muench has ere acclaimed. His Honegger's "Joan of take" this winter in s a major event in a eems with musical ink there will be few at his performances y music. With regard entury, there has alrgument in our own
on record last week proving his interpre-hoven's 8th and Schu-
He conceived the for-mood of titanic exu-gaiety. For this he ebuked by some of my e is a healthy feature

We shall not go to Muench's reign and e orchestra. If I am Muench's Beethoven
een faulted, there is rchestra itself which educator of conducy conviction that we r of great musicianlic taste and of vigor-e in Muench when he rmanently in the fall

OSON, N. Y.
AILY STAR
1948

SYMPHONY
ECTOR TO QUIT

Mass., April 8 (U.P.)—The e Boston Symphony Oronight that he would re-
r. The 73-year-old Dr.
itzky is planning to comseason with the Boston fore retiring. He will be Charles Munch, now di-
Paris Philharmonic Or-

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
APR 9

ESIGNS—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (right) who will step down as onductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Charles Munch eft), his successor.—Acme Telephoto.

oussevitzky Yields Baton to harles Munch

Boston UP—Seventy-three-[illegible] Serge Koussevitsky [illegible] day to hand over his [illegible] a younger man next year [illegible] his 25th season as conductor [illegible] and beloved" Boston [illegible] orchestra.

[illegible] him as head of one [illegible] most noted musical [illegible] will be Charles [illegible] 56-year-old founder and [illegible] the Paris Philharmonic [illegible]

* * *

KOUSSEVITSKY'S resignation and the immediate appointment of [illegible] were announced last [illegible] the annual meeting of the [illegible] of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"I am moved to take this decision because I feel that it will not be possible to continue my present strenuous obligations," said Koussevitsky in a letter read by President Henry B. Cabot of the orchestra's trustees.

The Russian-born conductor promised to continue as director of the orchestra's famed Berkshire music center at Tanglewood. [illegible] and said he will make occasional guest appearances at the [illegible] symphony both there [illegible] seasons here.

* * *

MUNCH, MEANWHILE, was [illegible] Europe for a spring [illegible] France, Holland and [illegible] three-year [illegible] New York Wednesday [illegible] to his native [illegible] the [illegible] time in two [illegible]

[illegible] time he has appeared [illegible] conductor with [illegible] orchestras including the [illegible] which he took over [illegible] both this season and [illegible] he made his American [illegible] Symphony Hall here. [illegible] as regular conductor [illegible] in October 1949. [illegible] of Strasbourg, [illegible] studied music under [illegible] in Paris and Berlin

---

SARATOGA SPRINGS, N.
SARATOGIAN
APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky to Retire As Boston Conductor

Boston [illegible] Serge Koussevitzky [illegible] career as [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his [illegible] 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. [illegible] present leader of [illegible] Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

OSWEGO, N. Y.
PALLADIUM TIMES
APR 9 194

CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLANNING TO RETIRE

BOSTON (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation said he felt it would be impossible for him to continue strenuous obligations "for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
JOURNAL
APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky To Retire As Boston Conductor

Boston. (A.P.) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH
APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky Retires in '49

Boston, April 9 (AP)—Dr Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire music festival.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
APR 9 1948

RETIRES

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will retire at the end of the current season.

Koussevitzky Resigns From Boston Symphony

Continues as Director At Berkshire Center; Muench Is Successor

BOSTON, Friday (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said last night.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active Winter season."

Continues at Berkshire

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall.

Muench, at present conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic, will take over leadership of the Boston Symphony at the beginning of its 69th season in October, 1949.

He left New York yesterday by plane for France to complete engagements in France, Holland and Belgium.

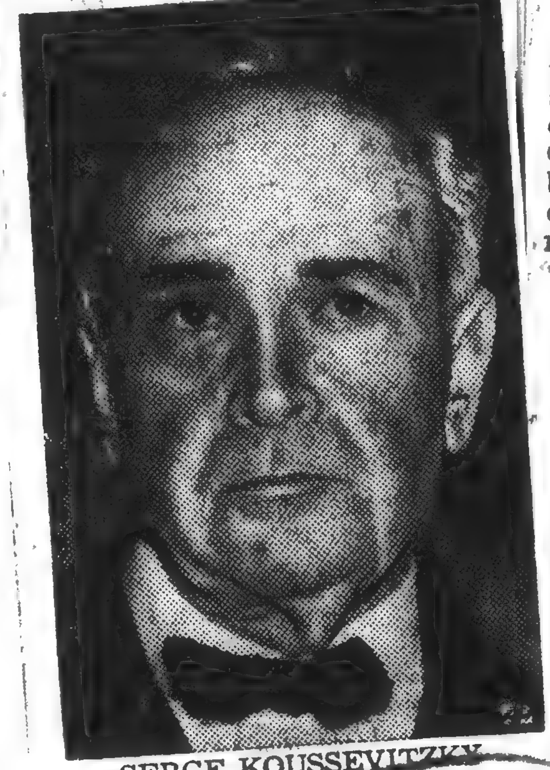
WHITE PLAINS, N. Y.
REPORTER-DISPATCH
APR 9 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY AND SUCCESSOR—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony. —AP Photo

---

SPRINGFIELD, OHIO
NEWS-SUN
APR 9 1948

To Quit Music Post



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

(By The Associated Press)

BOSTON, April 8.—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation, said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

WELLSVILLE, N. Y.
REPORTER
APR 9 1948

Serge Koussevitzky To Quit Boston Post

Boston, April 9 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

ERIE, PA.
TIMES
APR 9 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY TO RESIGN

Boston, April 9.—(U.P.)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced that he would resign next year after his 25th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, founder and director of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES
APR 9 - 1948

Boston Symphony Conductor to Resign

BOSTON, Apr. 9 (UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced that he would resign next year after his 25th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, founder and director of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky said he would continue as director of the Berkshire Center Music School at Stockbridge, but that Mr. Munch would conduct the famous Tanglewood concerts there.

HORNELL, N. Y.
TRIBUNE
APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky Resigns

Boston —(AP)— Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jibilee 1948-49 season. The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

ROME, N. Y.
SENTINEL
APR 9 - 1948

Dr. Koussevitzky To Quit Symphony

BOSTON—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his Silver Jubilee 1948-49 season.

The Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

HUNTINGTON, W. VA.
ADVERTISER

[illegible] - 1948

Koussevitzky To End Career As Conductor

BOSTON, April 9. (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

Koussevitsky to Be Guest Conductor

Although he will retire next year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky has agreed to lead the orchestra occasionally as guest conductor, it was announced today.

Dr. Koussevitsky, who has made the orchestra famous throughout the world in his 24 years of leadership, will become director of the Berkshire Music Center.

His successor is Charles Muench, former director of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, who takes over on completion of next year's season.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
PM

APR 9 - 1948

Dr. Koussevitzky Resigns Boston Conductorship

By Associated Press

BOSTON

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his Silver Jubilee 1948-'49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said last night.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian — born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared sevarl times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active Winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

THE BOSTON HERALD, FRIDAY, APRIL 9, 1948

Muench to Succeed Koussevitzky in '49

Leader Retiring After 25 Years

CHARLES MUENCH

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who in nearly a quarter century as conductor has built up the Boston Symphony Orchestra to world leadership, will retire at the end of the 1948-1949 season and be succeeded by Charles Muench, 56-year-old French conductor.

This was announced yesterday by Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's trustees, at the annual meeting in Symphony Hall of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Silver Jubilee

By continuing through the next Symphony season, Dr. Koussevitzky will have completed 25 years as the orchestra's conductor, the longest term anyone ever held the position. Special features are planned in honor of the 74-year-old Russian-born conductor's silver jubilee season next winter and spring.

(Continued on Page Three)

TERRE HAUTE, IND.
STAR
APR 9 - 1948

Koussevitzky Quits, Muench Appointed

BOSTON, April 8.—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74 years old, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

YORK HERALD TRIBUNE, FRIDAY, APRIL

Koussevitzky Retiring in 1949; Muench to Conduct Bostonians

By The Associated Press

BOSTON, April 8.—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, seventy-four, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-'49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the fifty-seven-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Koussevitzky's letter of resignation said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of sixteen to eighteen weeks of our active winter season." Mr. Cabot said Mr. Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

The announcement came at the annual [illegible] Society of Frie[illegible] Symphony Orc[illegible] Hall.

Mr. [illegible] tor [illegible] Pa[illegible] chestra [illegible] Paris [illegible]monic [illegible] of the Bo[illegible] gagement [illegible] in Oc[illegible] New York today by p[illegible] to complete engagement[illegible] France, Holland and Be[illegible]

Mr. Cabot [illegible] Mr. K[illegible]tzky before [illegible] of the orchest[illegible] so generou[illegible] and courageous spirit [illegible] made possible joy and happiness [illegible]hundreds and thousands of hungry and appreciative audiences all over the world.

"And we know at Tanglewood, too, you have lighted a torch that will shine on through troublesome or peaceful times, and by your

(Continued on page 19, column 4)

NEWPORT NEWS, VA.
PRESS
APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky To Retire Next Year

Boston, April 8.—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ,will retire at the end of his Silver Jubilee 1948-'49 season Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation, said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

Dr. Koussevitzky To Retire Next Year

BOSTON, April 8 (INS). - Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of next year's music season.

The announcement was made today by Dr. Henry B. Cabot at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony.

ARLINGTON, VA.
DAILY
APR 9 1948

Record Reviews

Concert Music

NEW YORK (U.P.)—Record buyers have been dreaming for years of a flawless recording of Beethoven's mighty Ninth Symphony. The newest effort at wish-fulfillment is by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzk and a chorus led by Robert Shaw on eight 12-inch RCA Victor records.

It is almost but not quite flawless, which can't be said of any previous recording of the Ninth. The sound is rich and spacious; all the mechanical qualities are excellent. Artistically, its greates virtue is unity. The artificiality of division by movements is overcome and the somber opening chords are solidly tied to the exultant closing coda.

But to achieve such unity, Koussevitzky thought it necessary to diminish the first and second movements to keep the work flowing on a rising plane and enhance the climactic impact of the fourth and choral movement. A sound conceptaion, of course, but the restraint seems excessive. It has a deadening effect.

As for the choral movement: Shaw's singers have produced a glorious reallzation of its so-called "impossible" score. The accents seem unduly heavy in places yet the reviewer has never heard a better over-all job in concert or on records.

SYMPHONY PICKS NEW DIRECTOR

Dr. Koussevitzky to Retire on Silver Jubilee

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

That Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who assumed the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fall of 1924, would retire at the end of his 25th season was such a reasonable assumption, there was no surprise when it was confirmed by announcement to that effect at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The occasion was the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and after a business meeting and a brief program by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, read a letter from the conductor in which he offered his resignation.

TOO STRENUOUS

"I am moved to take this decision," he said in part, "because I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season." After expressing his sorrow at parting from the orchestra with which he had been so long associated, Doctor Koussevitzky went on to say that he would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Centre.

Mr. Cabot then read his letter to Doctor Koussevitzky stating that the trustees had accepted the resignation and wished him "to express for all of them that the time is so near at hand for the conclusion of the most brilliant leadership and the most devoted service which the Orchestra has ever enjoyed from anybody." When the reading of this second letter was concluded Mr. Cabot announced that Doctor Koussevitzky's successor would be Charles Muench.

Doctor Koussevitzky will not actually retire until the end of the Berkshire Festival of 1949. After that, he will make occasional guest appearances with the Orchestra, both in Boston and in Tanglewood.

No Stranger Here

Mr. Muench is no stranger to Boston. He appeared as guest conductor last season, and for three weeks this season. He has clearly won the favor of the Boston audiences, though critical opinion was divided when he essayed, last week a concert of German music. In French music, except for his highly personal interpretation of the Symphony of Franck, he has been generally commended. When he has failed to satisfy, it has been, not through any insufficiency of temperament, musicianship, or the ability to command an orchestra, but through an excess of zeal, an over-exuberance. Such things are corrected easily.

Mr. Muench was born in Strasbourg, Alsace, Sept. 26, 1891, of a French mother and an Alsatian father. His chosen instrument was the violin, but he soon got into conducting. In 1932 he went to Paris, and has headed various orchestras in the French capitol. For the past two seasons he has been in the United States, serving as guest conductor of various orchestras. He was appointed one of the four leaders of the New York Philharmonic Symphony, after the retirement of Artur Rodzkinski, and will return to that post next season. Eleborate plans are being made for Dr. Koussevitzky's silver jubilee. And, as Mr. Cabot assured yesterday's gathering, he will not leave us for good at its conclusion.

Hard water gets its name because it contains minerals that causes relatively hard chemical compounds to form when it is used.

CORPUS CHRISTI, TEX.
CALLER

Boston Symphony Leader Announces Resignation

BOSTON, April 8. (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation said his decision to resign was taken becau[illegible] will not be possibl[illegible] tinue my presen[illegible] gations for the le[illegible] weeks of our [illegible] son."

Cabot said K[illegible] continue as director [illegible] Berkshire Music Center.

The announcement [illegible] annual meeting of [illegible] Friends of the Bost[illegible] Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

LAWTON, OKLA.
PRESS

Director To Retire

BOSTON—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said Thursday night.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL.
ILL. STATE JOURNAL
APR 9 - 1948

Orchestra Conductor Will Retire

Boston, April 8 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian born conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire music center.

[117]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 9

Koussevitzky Will Retire in 1949; Orchestra Post to Go to Munch

Conductor Will Step Down at End of 25 Years With the Boston Symphony

By JOHN H. FENTON

BOSTON, April 8—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will [illegible] at the close of [illegible] as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra after [illegible] twenty-fifth year in that post, it was announced today. He will be succeeded by Dr. Charles Munch, conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra.

The Russian-born Dr. Koussevitzky, who will be 74 years of age in July, said he found it impossible to continue my strenuous obligations for the length of the sixteen to eighteen weeks of our active winter season.

Dr. Koussevitzky will continue, however, as director of the Berkshire Music Center at Stockbridge, Mass. He also is expected to appear with the symphony occasionally as special guest conductor.

Announcement of Dr. Koussevitzky's retirement was made this afternoon at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was read by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees.

During the coming season, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in thirteen weeks. Guest conductors will be used in eleven. This is the same arrangement which has been followed in the present season.

Dr. Koussevitzky, a conductor in his native country, fled from the Bolsheviks in 1920. Before assuming the baton of the Boston Orchestra permanently, he had appeared in England, Germany, France and Spain.

To Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky brought his brilliant interpretation of the contemporary composers, Sibelius and Stravinsky. He has received honorary doctorates from Harvard and Brown Universities. In 1903, before he was 30, Dr. Koussevitzky was decorated by the Czar of Russsia. He was made a Knight of the French Legion of Honor in 1924.

Dr. Munch, the new conductor, was born in Strasbourg, Alsace, Sept. 26, 1891. His first teacher was his father, Ernest Munch, who was director of the Choeur Saint-Guillaume in Strasbourg. His chosen instrument was the violin, which he studied with his father and later with Lucien Capet in Paris and with Carl Flesch in Berlin.

In 1919 Dr. Munch was made professor of the Strasbourg Conservatory and conductor of the orchestra there. He went to Leipzig in 1926 as a concert master under Wilhelm Furtwaengler.

Dr. Munch went to Paris in 1932. After conducting concerts of the Paris Symphony Orchestra and the Lamoureux and Straram Orchestras, he founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra, of which he since has been the regular conductor. In 1938, he succeeded Philippe Gaubert as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. He still holds that post.

Dr. Munch made his first American appearance as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Dec. 27, 1946. He also conducted the Boston orchestra for three weeks of the present season.

Dr. Munch left New York today for France to fulfill spring engagements as conductor in France, Holland and Belgium.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

Dr. Charles Munch

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 9 - 1948

Koussevitzky Retiring in 1949; Muench to Conduct Bostonians

By The Associated Press

BOSTON, April 8.—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, seventy-four, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-'49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the fifty-seven-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Koussevitzky's letter of resignation said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of sixteen to eighteen weeks of our active winter season." Mr. Cabot said Mr. Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

Mr. Muench, at present conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic, will take over leadership of the Boston Symphony at the beginning of its sixty-ninth season in October, 1949. He left New York today by plane for France to complete engagements in France, Holland and Belgium.

Mr. Cabot told Mr. Koussevitzky before some 700 Friends of the orchestra, "You have given so generously of your great and courageous spirit, which has made possible joy and happiness to hundreds and thousands of hungry and appreciative audiences all over the world.

"And we know at Tanglewood, too, you have lighted a torch that will shine on through troublesome or peaceful times, and by your

Retiring Boston Orchestra Leader and Successor

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

Herald Tribune—Acme
Charles Muench

Koussevitzky

(Continued from page one)

vision point to security and incredible accomplishment."

The silver jubilee season will complete a period of service almost twice as long as that of any previous conductor. Mr. Koussevitzky's predecessors were George Henschel (1881-'84), Wilhelm Gericke (1884-'89) and 1897-1906); Artur Nikisch (1889-'93); Emil Paur (1893-'97); Karl Muck (1906-'08 and 1912-'18); Max Fiedler (1908-'12); Henri Rabaud (1918-'19), and Pierre Monteux (1919-'24. Mr. Koussevitzky's length of continuous service has been probably exceeded in this country only by the late Frederick Stock with the Chicago Symphony (1905-'43).

Mr. Muench comes to the position with an illustrious career to commend him. After early training on the violin with his father, Ernest Muench, and with Lucien Capet in Paris and Carl Flesch in Berlin, he was made professor of the Strasbourg Conservatory.

In 1926 he went to Leipzig, where he served as concert master in the Gewandhaus Orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwaengler. In 1932, he returned to Paris and conducted concerts of the Paris Symphony Orchestra, the Lamoureux Orchestra and the Straram Orchestra.

Mr. Muench succeeded Philippe Gaubert as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra in 1938. He founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra in the 1930s and is its regular conductor.

He first came to the United States to conduct the Boston Symphony as a guest on Dec. 27, 1946, and first appeared in New York with the Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 23, 1947. He was guest conductor of both orchestras also in 1947-'48, and will be with the Philharmonic for four weeks next season.

MONTREAL, CANADA
GAZETTE
APR 9 - 1948

Koussevitzky to Retire

Boston, April 8.—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee (1948-49) season. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born French conductor, Charles Muench.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS
APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky Plans To Retire Next Season

BOSTON—(AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
CHRONICLE
APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky To Resign

BOSTON, April 8 (U.P.)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced tonight he would resign next year after his 25th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, founder and director of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra.

Koussevitzky said he would continue as director of the Berkshire Center Music School at Stockbridge, but that Munch would conduct the famous Tanglewood concerts there.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
TRIBUNE
APR 9 1948

AFTER 25 YEARS

Boston Music Conductor Plans to Quit

BOSTON, April 8 (UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced Th[illegible] that he would resign next year after his 25th season as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra. He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, founder and director of the Paris philharmonic orchestra.

Koussevitzky said he would continue as director of the Berkshire Center music school at Stockbridge, but that Munch would conduct the famous Tanglewood concerts there.

"It is not without deep concern and heartache that I come to the parting with the orchestra to which I have devoted 25 years of my life," the 73-year-old conductor said.

He announced his decision to a meeting of the Society of the Friends of the Boston Symphony and said he felt it would not be possible for him to continue his present strenous obligations.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra, said that Munch would succeed Koussevitzky after next season, with his first concert taking place in October, 1949.

Munch recently appeared here as guest conductor of the orchestra and in the 1946 season made his first American appearance at Symphony hall.

SAGINAW, MICH.
NEWS
APR 9 194

Next Season Will Be Koussevitzky's Last As Boston Conductor

BOSTON (AP) Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor and present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
APR 9 - 1948

Koussevitzky Will Retire

Boston, April 8 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation, said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active Winter season."

FRAMINGHAM, MASS.
NEWS

Koussevitzky to Retire Next Year

BOSTON, April 8—The resignation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the end of next season from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which he then will have held for 25 years, was announced this afternoon by Henry B. Cabot president of the trustees.

He made the announcement at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall.

[118]

DAY, APRIL 9, 1948

SYMPHONY PICKS NEW DIRECTOR

Dr. Koussevitzky to Retire on Silver Jubilee

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

That Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who assumed the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fall of 1924, would retire at the end of his 25th season was such a reasonable assumption, there was no surprise when it was confirmed by announcement to that effect at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The occasion was the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and after a business meeting and a brief program by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, read a letter from the conductor in which he offered his resignation.

TOO STRENUOUS

"I am moved to take this decision," he said in part, "because I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season." After expressing his sorrow at parting from the orchestra with which he had been so long associated, Doctor Koussevitzky went on to say that he would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Centre.

Mr. Cabot then read his letter to Doctor Koussevitzky stating that the trustees had accepted the resignation and wished him "to express for all of them that the time is so near at hand for the conclusion of the most brilliant leadership and the most devoted service which the Orchestra has ever enjoyed from anybody." When the reading of this second letter was concluded Mr. Cabot announced that Doctor Koussevitzky's successor would be Charles Muench.

Doctor Koussevitzky will not actually retire until the end of the Berkshire Festival of 1949. After that, he will make occasional guest appearances with the Orchestra, both in Boston and in Tanglewood.

No Stranger Here

Mr. Muench is no stranger to Boston. He appeared as guest conductor last season, and for three weeks this season. He has clearly won the favor of the Boston audiences, though critical opinion was divided when he essayed, last week a concert of German music. In French music, except for his highly personal interpretation of the Symphony of Franck, he has been generally commended. When he has failed to satisfy, it has been, not through any insufficiency of temperament, musicianship, or the ability to command an orchestra, but through an excess of zeal, an over-exuberance. Such things are corrected easily.

Mr. Muench was born in Strasbourg, Alsace, Sept. 26, 1891, of a French mother and an Alsatian father. His chosen instrument was the violin, but he soon got into conducting. In 1932 he went to Paris, and has headed various orchestras in the French capitol. For the past two seasons he has been in the United States, serving as guest conductor of various orchestras. He was appointed one of the four leaders of the New York Philharmonic Symphony, after the retirement of Artur Rodzkinski, and will return to that post next season. Eleborate plans are being made for Dr. Koussevitzky's silver jubilee. And, as Mr. Cabot assured yesterday's gathering, he will not leave us for good at its conclusion.

Hard water gets its name because it contains minerals that causes relatively hard chemical compounds to form when it is used.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
APR 1948

Koussevitzky To Resign Next Year As Conductor Of Boston Symphony

Boston, April 8.—(UP.)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced tonight that he would resign next year after his twenty-fifth season as conductor of "our great and beloved" Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, founder and director of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra.

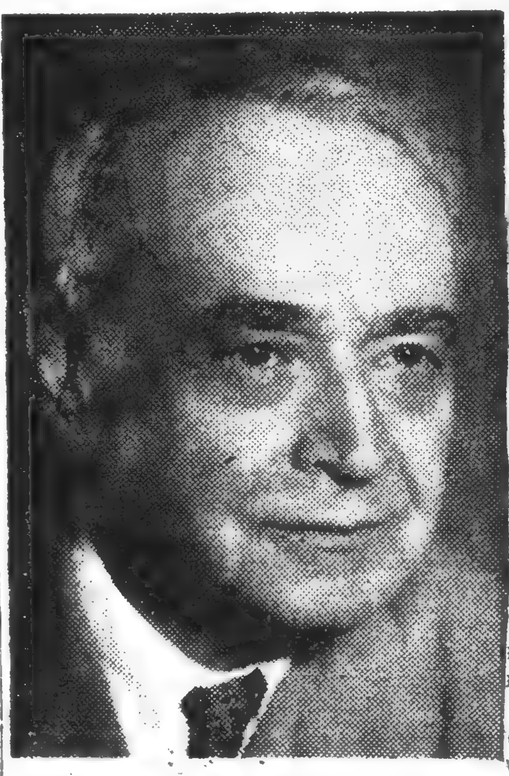
Koussevitzky said he would continue as director of the Berkshire Center Music School at Stockbridge, but that Munch would conduct the famous Tanglewood concerts there.

"It is not without deep concern and heartache that I come to the parting with the orchestra to which I have devoted 25 years of my life," the 73-years-old conductor said.

He announced his decision to a meeting of the Society of the Friends of the Boston Symphony and said he felt it would not be possible for him to continue his present strenuous obligations.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra, said that Munch would succeed Koussevitzky after next season, with his first concert taking place in October 1949.

Munch recently appeared here as guest conductor of the orchestra and in the 1946 season made his first American appearance at Symphony Hall.



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

TAMPA, FLA.
TRIBUNE
APR 1948

Koussevitzky Plans To Retire

Musical Career To End After 1948-49

BOSTON, April 8 — (AP) —Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation, said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Symphony Hall.

Muench, at present conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic, will take over leadership of the Boston Symphony at the beginning of its 69th season in October, 1949.

He left New York today by plane for France to complete engagements in France, Holland and Belgium.

Cabot told Koussevitzky before some 700 Friends of the orchestra that "you have given so generously of your great and courageous spirit which has made possible joy and happiness to hundreds and thousands of hungry and appreciative audiences all over the world.

"And we know at Tanglewood, too, you have lighted a torch that will shine on through troublesome or peaceful times, and by your vision point to security and incredible accomplishment."

RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD

Koussevitzky Will Retire

Famed Conductor of Boston Symphony to Quit at End of 1948-49 Season.

BOSTON, April 8 (AP).—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-'49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation and his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston symphony at Symphony hall.

Muench, at present conductor of the Paris conservatory orchestra and the Paris philharmonic, will take over leadership of the Boston symphony at the beginning of its 69th season in October, 1949.

He left New York today by plane for France to complete engagements in France, Holland and Belgium.

Cabot told Koussevitzky before some 700 Friends of the orchestra that "you have given so generously of your great and courageous spirit which has made possible joy and happiness to hundreds and thousands of hungry and appreciative audiences all over the world.

"And we know at Tanglewood, too, you have lighted a torch that will shine on through troublesome or peaceful times, and by your vision point to security and incredible accomplishment."

The silver jubilee season will complete a period of service almost twice as long as that of any previous conductor. Wilhelm Gericke, whose conductorship previously had been the Boston's longest, served two terms that totaled 13 years, 1884-89 and 1898-1906.

Muench comes to the position with an illustrious career to commend him. After early training on the violin with his father, Ernest Muench, and with Lucien Capet in Paris and Carl Flesch in Berlin, he was made professor of the Strasbourg conservatory.

In 1926 he went to Leipzig where he served as concert master in the Gewandhaus orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwangler. In 1932, he went to Paris and conducted concerts of the Paris symphony orchestra, the Lamoureux orchestra and the Straram orchestra.

Muench succeeded Philippe Gaubert as conductor of the Paris conservatory orchestra in 1938. He founded the Paris philharmonic orchestra in the thirties and is its regular conductor.

He first came to the United States to conduct the Boston symphony as a guest on December 27, 1946. Last season and this he has made guest appearances in several cities, conducting three weeks of the current Boston symphony season.

MARION, IND.
LEADER-TRIBUNE
APR 9 - 1948

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER REVEALS PLAN TO RETIRE

Boston, April 8. (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston symphony.

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

MORGANTOWN, W. VA.
POST
APR 9 - 1948

Serge Koussevitsky Will Retire at 74

BOSTON, Mass., April 9—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

BOSTON, MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
APR 9 1948

An Admirable Choice

Good news came out of the annual meeting of the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday. Charles Munch, it was announced, will succeed Serge Koussevitzky when the present conductor terminates his brilliant regime of 25 years in 1949. Once again we have been given an example of the practical foresight which characterizes the stewardship of the trustees and management of Boston's musical glory.

In a period when certain first-rank American orchestras have been rocked by inner dissension, the Boston Symphony continues calmly and with complete accord upon its mission of bringing great music and performances to a nation-wide public. In Boston we shall have no uneasy period of testing one guest leader after another to find, belatedly, an appropriate successor. Thanks to the wisdom of the Boston trustees and management, choice and decision have been made in advance of Mr. Koussevitsky's retirement.

Mr. Munch is an admirable choice. During his guest appearances here he showed plainly his authority, technical skill and musicianship. He has the polish and the dynamic temperament that are further essentials of a first-rate conductor. We have every reason to expect that the virtuosity to which Serge Koussevitzky brought the orchestra will be maintained.

In matters business and artistic how many other orchestras can boast such good fortune?

NEW YORK, N. Y.
MIRROR
APR 9 - 1948

Koussevitzky to Resign

BOSTON, April 8 (UP).—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced tonight he will resign next year after his 25th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SARANAC LAKE, N. Y.
ADIRONDACK ENTERPRISE
APR 9 1948

Boston Conductor To End Music Career

BOSTON, April 9 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphoney orchestra.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.
PRESS
APR - 9 1948

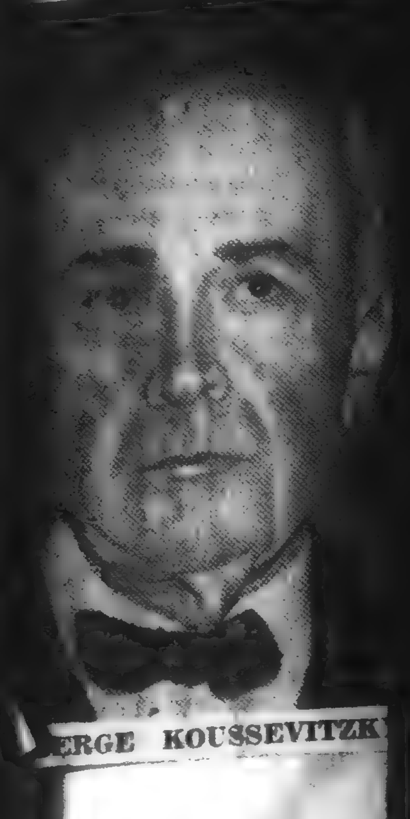
Koussevitzky Ending Career

Boston — (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-'49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees. The director will remain as leader of the Berkshire music festival.

UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH
APR 9 - 1948



ERGE KOUSSEVITZK

OUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
NEW YORKER
APR 9 - 1948

SERGE KOUSSEVITZK
Boston Symphony orches ee 1948-49 season, Henry oston. His successor will or. CHARLES MUENCH
the Boston Symphony.

WINSTON-SALEM,
JOURNAL
APR

Koussevitz
As Boston S

Boston (UP).—Dr. Se evitzky announced last he would resign next his 25th season as con
"our great and belove
Symphony Orchestra.
He will be succeeded Munch, founder and e Paris Philharmonic Koussevitzky said he nue as director of the enter Music School ridge, but that Munch uct the famous Tangl
erts there.
"It is not without d nd heartache that I arting with the hich I have devoted y life," the 73-year-
aid.
He announced his meeting of the riends of the Bos
nd said he felt it ossible for him to resent strenuous ob
Henry B. Cabot, rchestra, said that

MEMPHIS, TE
PRESS-SCIMITA
APR

Munch—

At the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, right above, will close his career as conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra to be succeeded by Russian-born Conductor Charles Muench, 57, at left. Muench, at present, is leader of Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic. Koussevitsky will remain as leader of Berkshire Music Festival. The two were munching cookies when this picture was taken in 1946.

NAC LAKE, N. Y.
NDACK ENTERPRISE
APR 9 1948

on Conductor To Music Career

ON, April 9 (AP)—Dr. Koussevitzky will close his as conductor of the Boston ny orchestra at the end silver jubilee 1948-49 sea-74-year-old Russian born or will be succeeded by Muench, 57, Alsatian con- He is the present leader aris Conservatory orches- the Paris Philharmonic. evitzky's decision was an- last night by Henry B. resident of the trustees, nnual meeting of the So- Friends of the Boston ney orchestra.

ting of the Society of the Boston Symphony t Symphony Hall.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH. PRESS
APR - 9 1948

ussevitzky ding Career

n — (AP) — Dr. Serge Kous- y will close his career as tor of the Boston Symphony ra at the end of his silver 1948-'49 season.

74-year-old Russian-born or will be succeeded by Muench, 57, Alsatian con- He is the present leader Paris Conservatory orches- the Paris Philharmonic. vitzky's decision was an- by Henry B. Cabot, presi- he trustees. The director ain as leader of the Berk- usic festival.

MEMPHIS, TEN
PRESS-SCIMITA
APR 9

Munch—

—NEA T

At the end of his silver 1948-49 season, Dr. Serge sevitzky, right above, w his career as conductor of Symphony Orchestra to ceeded by Russian-born tor, Charles Muench, 57, Munch, at present, is Paris Conservatory and the Paris Phil Koussevitzky will remain er of Berkshire Music The two were munching when this picture was in 1946.

UTICA, N. Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

Koussevitzky to Retire From Boston Symphony

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation said he felt it would be impossible for him to continue strenuous obligations "for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said the conductor's courageous spirit had made possible "joy and happiness to the hundreds and thousands of hungry and appreciative audiences all over the world."

He said he had "lighted a torch at Tanglewood (the Berkshire nter) that will shine on through ublesome or peaceful times. . . ."

The silver jubilee season will mplete for Koussevitzky a peod of service almost twice as long as that of any previous conductor, Cabot said.

Muench, who will take over at the beginning of the Boston orchestra's 69th season, left New York for France yesterday to complete engagements in France, Holland and Belgium.

OTTAWA, CANADA
EVENING JOURNAL
APR 9 - 1948

PLANS TO RETIRE.

BOSTON, April 8.—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee (1948-49) season. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsation-born French conductor, Charles Muench.

BOSTON, MASS.
RECORD
APR 9 1948

Dr. Koussevitsky To Leave Symphony

Retirement of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky as conductor of he Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of next year's season and appointment of Charles Muench, former director of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, as his successor, were announced yesterday by Dr. Henry B. Cabot at the annual meeting of he Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony.

Dr. Koussevitsky's retirement, which was accepted with regret by the society, becomes effective in his 25th year as leader of an orchestra which he made famous throughout the world.

BERKSHIRE DIRECTOR

In his letter of resignation, Dr. Koussevitsky stated he would become director of the Berkshire Music Center, which he founded. He has also agreed, Dr. Cabot said, to be a special guest conductor of the Boston Symphony after his retirement.

Immediately after the meeting, Dr. Koussevitsky and his wife were hosts to members, to Dr. Muench, and to Boston music and drama critics, at a reception at Symphony Hall.

The new conductor was born in Alsace-Lorraine in 1891. His father, a noted concert violinist, was an Alsatian, and his mother a Frenchwoman. As a boy, he studied violin under his father's instruction, and later in Paris and Berlin. Two other brothers are distinguished musicians.

In 1919, Dr. Muench was appointed conductor of the Strasbourg Conservatory Orchestra, and in 1926, in Leipzig, he conducted the Gewandhaus Orchestra, one of the most famed in Europe.

In 1932 he founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra, and has been its regular conductor since that time, alternating with the conductorship of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. He made his first American appearance Dec. 27, 1946, as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony, and last year, during a two-week absence of Dr. Koussevitzky, he again conducted the orchestra on several occasions.

CHARLESTON, W. VA.
GAZETTE
APR 9 - 1948

Koussevitsky Plans Retirement in Year

BOSTON, April 8—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his Silver Jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation, said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitsky would continue as director of the Berkshire music center.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Symphony hall.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST
APR 9 1948

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY PLANNING TO RETIRE

BOSTON, April 9—(AP) Dr.Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said last night.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation, said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
NEW YORKER

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the B[illegible] will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 [illegible] Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in B[illegible] [illegible] will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, CHARLES MUENCH (right), who has appeared several times with the B[illegible] Symphony.

Dr. Koussevitzky Closing Career

BOSTON—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music festival.

DAYTON, O.
NEWS
APR 9 - 1948

WINSTON-SALEM, N. C.
JOURNAL

Koussevitzky to Quit His Post As Boston Symphony's Director

[illegible] ge Kous- [illegible] light that [illegible] year after [illegible] conductor of [illegible] Boston [illegible] Charles [illegible] ctor of [illegible] est a. [illegible] con- [illegible] kshire [illegible] Stock- [illegible] con- [illegible]

[illegible] nced his decision at a [illegible] of the Society of the [illegible] of the Boston Symphony [illegible] he felt it would not be [illegible] for him to continue his [illegible] Henry B Cabot, president of the [illegible] Munch would succeed Koussevitzky after next season, with his first concert taking place in October 1949.

Munch recently appeared here as guest conductor of the orchestra and in the 1946 season made his first American appearance at Symphony Hall.

Munch, 56, is a native of Strassburg, Alsace, France, and studied music under his father in Paris and Berlin.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
APR 9 - 1948

BOSTON, April 8 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said Thursday night.

Dr. Koussevitzky

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Cabot said Koussevitzky will continue as director of the Berkshire music center.

DAILY NEWS

Personalities In The News

Koussevitzky To Retire As Boston Symphony Conductor

BOSTON, April 9.—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his carreer as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the society of friends of the Boston symphony orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

* * *

SHANNON AIRPORT, EIRE—(AP)—Ex-King Mihai and his mother, Queen Helen, returned to Europe today after a visit in the United States.

Mihai, who abdicated the Romanian throne last December and renounced the abdication in March, told reporters he had no plans for the future. "How can one plan nowadays?" said his mother.

MOUNT VERNON, N. Y.
ARGUS
APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky To End Career

BOSTON, (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The seventy-four-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, fifty-seven, Alsatian conductor. Muench is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire music festival.

PEORIA, ILL.
JOURNAL TRANSCRIPT
APR 9 - 1948

Dr. Koussevitzky, 74, To Retire

BOSTON. (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season. The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris conservatory orchestra and the Paris philharmonic.

RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS-LEADER

APR 9 - 1948

Dr. Koussevitzky To Quit Orchestra

BOSTON, April 9.—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzy will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzy's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH

-1948

Boston Conductor To Close Career

BOSTON, APRIL 9—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

SPOKANE, WASH.
CHRONICLE

APR 9 1948

Symphony Leader Retiring

BOSTON, April 9. (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his Silver Jubilee 1948-49 season.

TROY, N. Y.
TIMES RECORD

APR 9 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY RESIGNS FROM SYMPHONY POST

Boston (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said last night.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

NEWPORT, R. I.
NEWS

APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky To Close Conducting Career Soon

BOSTON, April 9, (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

TROY, N. Y.
TIMES RECORD

APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky Resigns From Boston Symphony

Boston (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said last night.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation, said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky Plans To Retire Next Year

Boston, April 8 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

Muench Successor

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation, said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active Winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

Muench, at present conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic, will take over leadership of the Boston Symphony at the beginning of its 69th season in October, 1949.

He left New York today by plane for France to complete engagements in France, Holland and Belgium.

700 Honor Conductor

Cabot told Koussevitzky before 700 Friends of the orchestra that "you have given so generously of your great and courageous spirit which has made possible joy and happiness to hundreds and thousands of hungry and appreciative audiences all over the world.

"And we know at Tanglewood, too, you have lighted a torch that will shine on through troublesome or peaceful times, and by your vision point to security and incredible accomplishment."

The silver jubilee season will complete a period of service almost twice as long as that of any previous conductor. Wilhelm Gericke, whose conductorship previously had been the Boston's longest, served two terms that totalled 13 years, 1884-89 and 1898-1906.

Illustrious Career

Muench comes to the position with an illustrious career to commend him. After early training on the violin with his father, Ernest Muench, and with Lucien Capet in Paris and Carl Flesch in Berlin, he was made professor of the Strasbourg Conservatory.

In 1926 he went to Leipzig where he served as concert master in the Gewandhaus Orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwangler. In 1932, he went to Paris and conducted concerts of the Paris Symphony Orchestra, the Lamoureux Orchestra and the Straram Orchestra.

Muench succeeded Philippe Gaubert as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra in 1938. He founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra in the thirties and is its regular conductor.

He first came to the United States to conduct the Boston Symphony as a guest on Dec. 27, 1946. Last season and this he has made guest appearances in several cities, conducting three weeks of the current Boston Symphony season.

DUNKIRK, N. Y.
OBSERVER

APR 9 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY WILL RETIRE AS CONDUCTOR

Boston, (UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will retire at the end of next year's music season after 25 years as conductor of the famed Boston symphony orchestra, it was learned today.

The 78-year-old maestro's decision to retire was to be formally announced late this afternoon at a meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony.

The name of Koussevitzky's successor was to be disclosed at the same time.

NEW BOSTON SYMPHONY MAESTRO BOWS IN—Charles Munch (left), new conductor, shown with Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, retiring after 25 years as director at the end of next season.

Koussevitzky to Retire; Munch Named Successor

By CYRUS DURGIN

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will retire as music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the season of 1948-49.

He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, the French conductor who last week completed a fortnight as guest leader of the orchestra.

This was announced yesterday by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting in Symphony Hall of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The news came as a starling climax, following a brief business session and a musical interlude in which Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the orchestra in two Wagner Preludes: those to "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger."

See SYMPHONY Page 10

SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
LIGHT

APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky To Resign His Post

BOSTON, April 9.—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor.

He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

APR 1948

Exit Koussevitzky

The passage of time brings change even in venerable Boston. Imagine the Symphony without Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Of course the Boston Symphony was notable before Koussevitzky took over, and there is no reason to think that it will not continue to hold its position of prominence under a distinguished new conductor. Still, for a quarter of a century the great orchestra and its famous Russian-born conductor have been inseparable in our minds.

Dr. Koussevitzky is 74 now, and he celebrates his 25th anniversary as conductor at Boston next season. After that he is going to step down and turn his baton over to Dr. Charles Muench, now conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra. What a season the 1948-49 one will be as the retiring conductor celebrates his silver jubilee. Koussevitzky is too colorful a personality to depart without a flourish.

Fortunately Tanglewood is not yet to lose the leader who has developed the Berkshire Musical Festival into one of the world's great music centers. That is good news to people in this part of the state, whose acquaintance with orchestra and conductor is based more on Lenox than on Boston concerts. Of course we also know them by way of the frequent visits they have made to Springfield and Smith College on tour, and so while continuing to see Koussevitzky in the summer we may look forward to getting to know Dr. Muench in the winter.

Looking back on the wealth of contributions Dr. Koussevitzky has made thru his Boston Symphony leadership, we find one in particular that demands our undying gratitude. It is strange, perhaps, that conservative Boston should provide the man who has done more than anyone else to introduce new compositions and contemporary composers to large audiences. Boston Symphony programs are studded with premier performances of works now world-famous. Ravel, Copland, Shostakovitch, Prokofieff, and many other modern composers have received their first boost to popularity from Koussevitzky. The Berkshire Festival has provided a wider opportunity for him to encourage the work of young musicians in various branches of the field.

It should always be remembered to Koussevitzky's credit that in holding his symphony to the high standard which makes it second to none in this country, he also accepted the responsibility of using the resulting prestige for the advancement of those still laboring outside the spotlight. This generosity springs from a devotion to music that supercedes all other considerations. Not all conductors, even great ones, are so loyal to their art.

RIVERSIDE, CALIF.
PRESS

Conductor To Resign Post

BOSTON, April 9. (UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced today that he would resign next year after his 25th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, founder and director of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra.

Koussevitsky said he would continue as director of the Berkshire Center Music School at Stockbridge, but that Munch would conduct the famous Tanglewood concerts there.

Portland, Oregon
Oregonian
4-9-48

Conductor to Retire

BOSTON, April 8 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said Thursday night.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench.

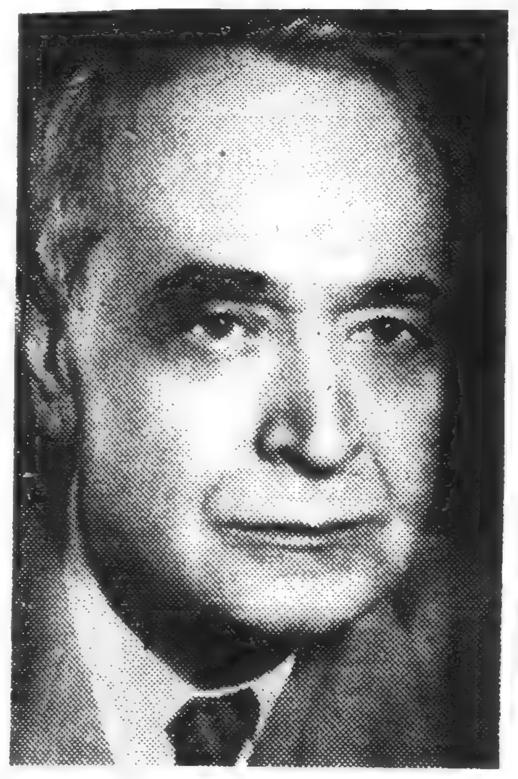
[121]

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

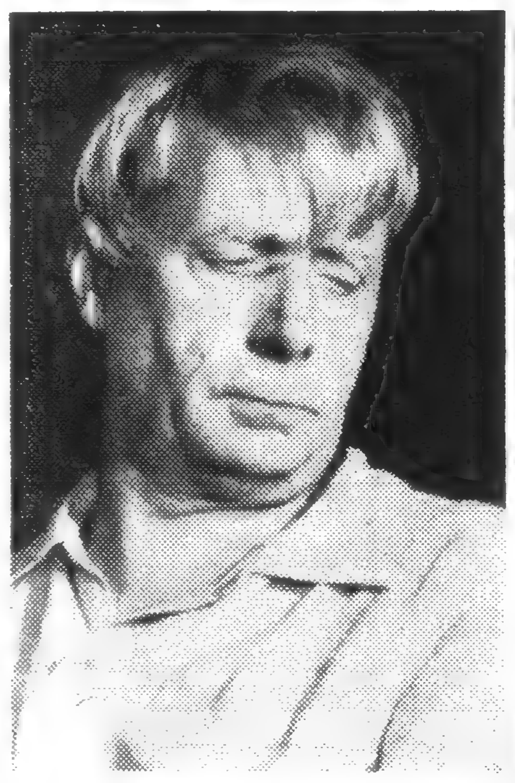
Dr. Koussevitzky to Retire From Boston Symphony

SILVER JUBILEE SEASON TO BE HIS LAST

Charles Muench to Get Post as Conductor of Orchestra



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky



Charles Muench

BOSTON, Apr. 8—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

Muench, at present conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic, will take over leadership of the Boston Symphony at the beginning of its 69th season in October, 1949.

He left New York today by plane for France to complete engagements in France, Holland and Belgium.

Cabot told Koussevitzky before some 700 Friends of the orchestra that "you have given so generously of your great and courageous spirit which has made possible joy and happiness to hundreds and thousands of hungry and appreciative audiences all over the world.

"And we know at Tanglewood, too, you have lighted a torch that will shine on through troublesome or peaceful times, and by your vision point to security and incredible accomplishment."

The silver jubilee season will complete a period of service almost twice as long as that of any previous conductor. Wilhelm Gericke, whose conductorship previously had been the Boston's longest, served two terms that totalled 13 years, 1884-89 and 1898-1906.

Muench comes to the position with an illustrious career to commend him. After early training on the violin with his father, Ernest Muench, and with Lucien Capet in Paris and Carl Flesch in Berlin, he was made professor of the Strasbourg Conservatory.

In 1926 he went to Leipzig where he served as concert master in the Gewandhaus Orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwangler. In 1932, he went to Paris and conducted concerts of the Paris Symphony Orchestra, the Lamoureux Orchestra and the Straram Orchestra.

Muench succeeded Philippe Gaubert as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra in 1938. He founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra in the thirties and is its regular conductor.

He first came to the United States to conduct the Boston Symphony as a guest on Dec. 27, 1946. Last season and this he has made guest appearances in several cities, conducting three weeks of the current Boston Symphony season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, for years a feature of the winter concert season in Providence, appeared here five times during the past season, but only on one occasion was Koussevitzky the conductor. That was at the Mar. 2 concert.

On two other occasions—Nov. 18 and Mar. 30—the orchestra was led by Muench, who will succeed Koussevitzky. Richard Burgin conducted the orchestra at its Oct. 21 appearance here, and on Feb. 3 it was led by Leonard Bernstein.

SPRINGFIELD, MO.
NEWS
APR 9 1948

Boston Conductor To Retire Next Year

BOSTON, April 8—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation, said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music center.

WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS
APR 9 - 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY TO RETIRE FROM BOSTON SYMPHONY

BOSTON, April 8 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation, said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky Due To Quit Symphony Helm In Bay State

Boston, April 9—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival in Lenox, Mass.

KNOXVILLE, TENN.
NEWS-SENTINEL
APR 9 1948

Conductor To Quit

By Associated Press

BOSTON, April 9—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

KALAMAZOO, MICH.
GAZETTE
APR 9 1948

Serge Koussevitzky Will Close Career

BOSTON -(AP)- Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Socity of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

YONKERS, N. Y.
HERALD-STATESMAN
APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky To End Career

BOSTON, (AP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The seventy-four-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, fifty-seven, Alsatian conductor. Muench is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire music festival.

HARRISBURG, PA.
TELEGRAPH
APR 9 - 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY TO RETIRE

BOSTON, April 9.—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his Silver Jubilee 1948-49 season.

ADRIAN, MICH.
TELEGRAM
APR 9 1948

KOUSSEVITSKY TO RETIRE AS BOSTON ORCHESTRA LEADER

BOSTON, April 9 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitsky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER
APR 9 1948

Noted Conductor to Retire.

BOSTON, April 8.— (AP) —Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said tonight. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL
APR 9 - 1948

Koussevitzky Resigns Post

BOSTON, April 8. — (UP) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced tonight that he would resign next year after his twenty-fifth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, founder and director of the Paris Philharmonic orchestra.

Munch, 56, is a native of Strassburg, Alsace, France and studied music under his father, in Paris and Berlin. He became a professor of music at Strassburg conservatory in 1919 and conducted the orchestra there.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS
APR 9 1948

Koussevitzky to Quit Boston Orchestra

BOSTON, April 9—(UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced today that he would resign next year after his 25th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, founder and director of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra.

Koussevitzky said he would continue as director of the Berkshire Center music school at Stockbridge, but that Munch would conduct the famous Tanglewood concerts there.

Koussevitzky, who is 73, announced his decision to a meeting of the Society of the Friends of the Boston Symphony and said he felt it would not be possible for him to continue his present strenuous obligations.

WHEELING, W. VA.
INTELLIGENCER
APR 9 1948

Boston's Symphony Director Will Resign After 25 Years

Boston, April 8—(UP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky announced tonight that he would resign next year after his 25th season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, founder and director of the Paris Philharmonic orchestra.

Koussevitzky said he would continue as director of the Berkshire Center Music school at Stockbridge, but that Munch would conduct the famous Tanglewood concerts there.

"It is not without deep concern and heartache that I come to the parting with the orchestra to which I have devoted 25 years of my life," the 73-year-old conductor said.

He announced his decision to a meeting of the Society of the Friends of the Boston Symphony and said he felt it would not be possible for him to continue his present strenuous obligations.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra, said that Munch would succeed Koussevitzky after next season, with his first concert taking place in October 1949.

Much recently appeared here as guest conductor of the orchestra and in the 1946 season made his frist American appearance at Symphony hall.

Munch, 56, is a native of Strassbur, Alsace, France and studied music under his father, in Paris and Berlin. He became a professor of music at Strassburg Conservatory in 1919 and conducted the orchestra there.

Later he went to Leipzig and was concert master of the Gewandhaus orchestra and in 1932 he moved to Paris where he conducted the Paris Symphony and founded the Paris Philharmonic orchestra. He since has been regular conductor of that group.

Koussevitzy, who has served twice as long as any previous conductor of the Boston orchestra came here in 1924 and lifted it out of the musical doldrums with his biting criticisms and demands for perfection.

[122]

THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—FRIDAY, APRIL 9, 1948

and music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra following the season of 1948-1949, which will mark the 25th anniversay of your leadership with you—may I say, our—orchestra. That meeting was adjourned until today and the trustees have asked me to accept your resignation and to express for all of them their regret that the time is so near at hand for the conclusion of the most brilliant leadership and the most devoted service which the orchestra has ever enjoyed from anybody.

"Your letter gives us some comfort, however, for it re-affirms the association which will continue through your position as director of the Berkshire Music Center. For our part, and we hope you will feel the same, we should like to broaden this association by anticipating that will return to us as a very special guest in the Winter season.

"You have given so generously of your great and courageous spirit which has made possible joy and happiness to hundreds and thousands of hungry and appreciative audiences all over the world. And we know at Tanglewood, too, you have lighted a torch that will shine on through troublesome or peaceful times, and by your vision point to security and incredible accomplishment.

"Our heartfelt thanks and God bless you always."

During the business meeting, at which Oliver Wolcott was unanicously re-elected chairman of the Society of Friends, the present financial prospects of the orchestra were discussed. For the current year, $156,000 in subscriptions has been pledged by the Friends, of whom there are 324 new members.

The weekly radio broadcasts now have 21 cooperative sponsors through the country, and although broadcasting receipts are said to be about $7000 less than the previous season, the loss is expected to be made up by royalties from increased sales of recordings. General expenses, however, have gone up.

Following the business meeting and concert, tea was served in the upper Huntington av. foyer.

Australia awaits a record wheat crop.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE
APR 9 - 1948

Koussevitsky to Close Career at End of 1949

BOSTON, April 9. (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony chestra.

The elderly director will remain as der of the Berkshire music festi-

---

HOLLYWOOD, CAL.
CITIZEN NEWS
APR

Koussevitzky Will Retire as Conductor; Muench to Get Job

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

LONG BEACH, CALIF.
PRESS-TELEGRAM
APR 1 0 1948

Music Patrons Moist-eyed at Koussevitzky Finale

BOSTON, April 10. (AP) Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74-year-old conductor who brought Boston Symphony Orchestra to the front rank, left his audience moist-eyed at his regular Friday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall.

The Russian-born music master, now a citizen of the United States, announced Thursday he will retire after next season from the position he has held since 1924.

His listeners, many of them among his first Boston audience, applauded vigorously when he went on the platform.

"I am touched by this wonderful reception given me today," he told the group of 2700. He was brilliant as he displayed his tremendous energy and talent in three selections, Brahms' Second and Sibelius' third symphonies, and the first performance of the American Samuel Barber's "Knoxville: Summer of 1915" for soprano and orchestra.

The maestro emphasized the reason for his decision to turn over the leadership of the world-honored musical organization to the 57-year-old French conductor of Paris Philharmonic, Charles Muench.

"I have been thinking about retiring for two or three years," he said. "Some forget that besides the very strenuous Boston Symphony season, I have done all the conducting at the Berkshire music festivals at Tanglewood, except for last summer, when I was aided by guest conductors."

PORTSMOUTH, OHIO
TIMES
1948

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY TO QUIT AS CONDUCTOR

BOSTON, A [illegible] Koussevitzk [illegible] reer as con [illegible] symphony [illegible] of his silver [illegible] son.

The 74-ye[illegible] conductor will be succe[illegible] Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris conservatory orchestra and the Paris philharmonic.

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
APR 10 1948

100

Give Koussevitzky Ovation at Boston

Moist-Eyed Symphony Hall Audience Vigorously Applauds Boston Symphony Maestro.

Boston, April 10 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74-year-old conductor who brought Boston Symphony orchestra to the front rank, left his audience moist-eyed at his regular Friday afternoon concert in Symphony hall.

The brilliant Russian-born music master, now a citizen of the United States, announced Thursday he will retire after next season from the position he has held since 1924.

His listeners, many of them among his first Boston audience, applauded vigorously when the balding musical genius took his place on the podium. It was an occasion of reminiscence and deep emotion for Koussevitzky and his hearers alike.

"I am touched by this wonderful reception given me today," he told the group of 2,700 who filled the hall. He was brilliant as he displayed his tremendous energy and talent in three selections, Brahms second and Sibelius' third symphonies and the first performance of the American Samuel Barber's "Knoxville: Summer of 1915" for soprano and orchestra.

The maestro emphasized the reason for his decision to turn over the leadership of the world-honored organization to the 57-year-old French conductor of the Paris Philharmonic, Charles Muench.

"I have been thinking about retiring for two or three years," he said. "Some forget that besides the very strenuous Boston symphony season, I have done all the conducting at the Berkshire music festivals at Tanglewood, except for last summer, when I was aided by guest conductors."

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
APR 1 0 1948

Boston Music Leader to Quit

BOSTON, April 10.—(AP.)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, conductor who brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the front rank, left his audience moist eyed at his regular Friday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall.

The brilliant Russian-born music master, now a citizen of the United States, announced Thursday he will retire after next season from the position he has held since 1924.

His listeners, may of them among his first Boston audience, applauded vigorously when the balding musical genius took his place on the podium. It was an occasion of reminiscence and deep emotion for Koussevitzky and his hearers alike. He said:

"I am touched by this wonderful reception given me to-

LYNN, MASS.
ITEM
APR 10 1948

Help YOUR Red Cross Today — Greater Lynn Quota $110,395

Dr. Koussevitzky to Retire

Announcement that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for nearly a quarter century, will retire a year hence, will create a stir in musical circles not only in New England but in many other parts of the country where the work of the distinguished leader is known and acclaimed.

The trustees of the orchestra did not indulge in intemperate language when, in accepting Dr. Koussevitzky's resignation, they referred to his work in Boston "as the most brilliant leadership and the most devoted service which the orchestra has ever enjoyed from anybody." No other leader of the Boston Symphony has served the orchestra anywhere nearly so long. In the past 25 years it has developed into one of the most highly respected musical organizations in the world.

Charles Muench, Dr. Koussevitzky's Alsatian-born successor, is, in the opinion of qualified critics, an admirable choice to carry on the great traditions of the Boston orchestra. Tall, vigorous, in the prime of life and tempered in the exacting atmosphere of Europe's musical centers, he has already won the admiration of Boston audiences during guest appearances this past season.

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
1948

Recorded Music

News and Reviews

By CLIF BRADT

It rarely happens, but even a record column can [illegible] a day later than usual—and this reviewer has not [illegible] way to write copy and attend dinners in the public service at one and the same time.

Nevertheless, if any of the 3,700 Albany people who attended the Mischa Elman violin concert at the Palace Theater some time ago would like an encore of the same concerto number, Mendelssohn's E Minor, Op. 64, it is now available in a new recording from Victor, played in the same characteristically mellow tone with the same expressive feeling, but with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra instead of the Rochester Philharmonic.

In the same category, Columbia has one, the Brahms Sonata No. 3 in D Minor for violin and piano, with the young artist, Isaac Stern, who will be remembered as the off-scene violinist who saved the day for the film, "Humoresque." Alexander Zadkin is at the piano. The album is conclusive evidence that Stern is among the luminaries, and the recording is good.

The much publicized recording at Tanglewood of Beethoven's "Choral" Symphony No. 9, by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, turns out to be a rather disappointing affair. With no resonant backing and with reverberations and echoes that turn the texture into a salad of sound, the excellent reading, orchestral and vocal work are lost. The album from Victor is thus principally interesting as musical history.

Victor has issued the first Tagliavini album, four tenor arias, and the magnificent voice is well displayed in Verdi's "Parmi veder le lagrime," Donizetti's "Una furtiva lagrima," Meyerbeer's "O, Paradiso!" and Cilea's "Lamento di Federico." However, the differential in volume between the soft and strong phrases is too marked.

The corking performance of "The Prince of Pilsen" last night at Philip Livingston Junior High School (to be repeated tonight by the Knickerbocker Guild) probably will bring a local demand for recordings from this musical show. It is pretty hopeless, for the revival specialists of the recording companies, the name orchestras and the Broadway stage have missed this melodic bonanza almost completely, a version of the "Stein Song" (U. of Maine) being the exception.

DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS
APR 10

Koussevitzky To Retire Next Season

BOSTON, Mass., April 9 [illegible] Serge Koussevitzky, 74, [illegible] born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, [illegible] end of his Silver [illegible] season, Henry B. [illegible] of the trustees, said.

His successor will be [illegible] old Alsatian-born [illegible] Charles Munch, [illegible] several times with [illegible] phony.

Koussevitzky's [illegible] tion said his dec[illegible] taken because [illegible] not be possible [illegible] my present [illegible] for the length of [illegible] weeks of our ac[illegible]

Cabot said Kou[illegible] continue as director of [illegible] shire Music Center.

The announcement [illegible] annual meeting of the S[illegible] Friends of the Boston Sym[illegible] Orchestra at Symphony Hall

---

MONROE, MICH.
NEWS
APR 10 1948

Boston Symphony Losing Conductor

BOSTON, April 10 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced Thursday by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
APR 1

Koussevitzky To Retire

BOSTON (AP) Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74-year-old conductor who brought Boston symphony orchestra to the front rank, announced he will retire after next season from the position he has held since 1924.

ELMIRA, N. Y.
ADVERTISER
APR 10 1948

Koussevitzky To Quit in '49

Boston (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation said he felt it would be impossible for him to continue strenuous obligations "for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—FRIDAY, APRIL 9, 1948

and music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra following the season of 1948-1949, which will mark the 25th anniversay of your leadership with you—may I say, our—orchestra. That meeting was adjourned until today and the trustees have asked me to accept your resignation and to express for all of them their regret that the time is so near at hand for the conclusion of the most brilliant leadership and the most devoted service which the orchestra has ever enjoyed from anybody.

"Your letter gives us some comfort, however, for it re-affirms the association which will continue through your position as director of the Berkshire Music Center. For our part, and we hope you will feel the same, we should like to broaden this association by anticipating that will return to us as a very special guest in the Winter season.

"You have given so generously of your great and courageous spirit which has made possible joy and happiness to hundreds and thousands of hungry and appreciative audiences all over the world. And we know at Tanglewood, too, you have lighted a torch that will shine on through troublesome or peaceful times, and by your vision point to security and incredible accomplishment.

"Our heartfelt thanks and God bless you always."

During the business meeting, at which Oliver Wolcott was unanimously re-elected chairman of the Society of Friends, the present financial prospects of the orchestra were discussed. For the current year, $156,000 in subscriptions has been pledged by the Friends, of whom there are 324 new members.

The weekly radio broadcasts now have 21 cooperative sponsors through the country, and although broadcasting receipts are said to be about $7000 less than the previous season, the loss is expected to be made up by royalties from increased sales of recordings. General expenses, however, have gone up

Following the business meeting and concert, tea was served in the upper Huntington av. foyer.

Australia awaits a record wheat crop.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE

APR 9 - 1948

Koussevitsky to Close Career at End of 1949

BOSTON, April 9. (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced last night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society Friends of the Boston Symphony chestra.

The elderly director will remain as der of the Berkshire music festi-

---

HOLLYWOOD, CAL.
CITIZEN NEWS

Koussevitzky Will Retire as Conductor; Muench to Get Job

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

LONG BEACH, CALIF.
PRESS-TELEGRAM

APR 10 1948

Music Patrons Moist-eyed at Koussevitzky Finale

BOSTON, April 10. (AP) Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74-year-old conductor who brought Boston Symphony Orchestra to the front rank, left his audience moist-eyed at his regular Friday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall.

The Russian-born music master, now a citizen of the United States, announced Thursday he will retire after next season from the position he has held since 1924.

His listeners, many of them among his first Boston audience, applauded vigorously when he went on the platform.

"I am touched by this wonderful reception given me today," he told the group of 2700. He was brilliant as he displayed his tremendous energy and talent in three selections, Brahms' Second and Sibelius' third symphonies, and the first performance of the American Samuel Barber's "Knoxville: Summer of 1915" for soprano and orchestra.

The maestro emphasized the reason for his decision to turn over the leadership of the world-honored musical organization to the 57-year-old French conductor of Paris Philharmonic, Charles Muench.

"I have been thinking about retiring for two or three years," he said. "Some forget that besides the very strenuous Boston Symphony season, I have done all the conducting at the Berkshire music festivals at Tanglewood, except for last summer, when I was aided by guest conductors."

PORTSMOUTH, OHIO
TIMES

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY TO QUIT AS CONDUCTOR

BOSTON, [illegible] Koussevitzk[illegible] reer as co[illegible] symphon[illegible] of his silve[illegible] son.

The 74-[illegible] conductor [illegible] Charles M[illegible] 57, A[illegible] conductor. He [illegible] present [illegible] er of the Pa[illegible] chestra and [illegible] monic.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH

APR 10 1948

Boston Music Leader to Quit

BOSTON, April 10.—(AP.)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, conductor who brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the front rank, left his audience moist eyed at his regular Friday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall.

The brilliant Russian-born music master, now a citizen of the United States, announced Thursday he will retire after next season from the position he has held since 1924.

His listeners, may of them among his first Boston audience, applauded vigorously when the balding musical genius took his place on the podium. It was an occasion of reminiscence and deep emotion for Koussevitzky and his hearers alike. He said:

"I am touched by this wonderful reception given me today."

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

APR 10 1948 100

Give Koussevitzky Ovation at Boston

Moist-Eyed Symphony Hall Audience Vigorously Applauds Boston Symphony Maestro.

Boston, April 10 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74-year-old conductor who brought Boston Symphony orchestra to the front rank, left his audience moist-eyed at his regular Friday afternoon concert in Symphony hall.

The brilliant Russian-born music master, now a citizen of the United States, announced Thursday he will retire after next season from the position he has held since 1924.

His listeners, many of them among his first Boston audience, applauded vigorously when the balding musical genius took his place on the podium. It was an occasion of reminiscence and deep emotion for Koussevitzky and his hearers alike.

"I am touched by this wonderful reception given me today," he told the group of 2,700 who filled the hall. He was brilliant as he displayed his tremendous energy and talent in three selections, Brahms second and Sibelius' third symphonies and the first performance of the American Samuel Barber's "Knoxville: Summer of 1915" for soprano and orchestra.

The maestro emphasized the reason for his decision to turn over the leadership of the world-honored organization to the 57-year-old French conductor of the Paris Philharmonic, Charles Muench.

"I have been thinking about retiring for two or three years," he said. "Some forget that besides the very strenuous Boston symphony season, I have done all the conducting at the Berkshire music festivals at Tanglewood, except for last summer, when I was aided by guest conductors."

LYNN, MASS.
ITEM

APR 10 1948

Help YOUR Red Cross

Dr. Koussevitzky to Retire

Announcement that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for nearly a quarter century, will retire a year hence, will create a stir in musical circles not only in New England but in many other parts of the country where the work of the distinguished leader is known and acclaimed.

The trustees of the orchestra did not indulge in intemperate language when, in accepting Dr. Koussevitzky's resignation, they referred to his work in Boston "as the most brilliant leadership and the most devoted service which the orchestra has ever enjoyed from anybody." No other leader of the Boston Symphony has served the orchestra anywhere nearly so long. In the past 25 years it has developed into one of the most highly respected musical organizations in the world.

Charles Muench, Dr. Koussevitzky's Alsatian-born successor, is, in the opinion of qualified critics, an admirable choice to carry on the great traditions of the Boston orchestra. Tall, vigorous, in the prime of life and tempered in the exacting atmosphere of Europe's musical centers, he has already won the admiration of Boston audiences during guest appearances this past season.

ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

Recorded Music

News and Reviews

By CLIF BRADT

It rarely happens, but even a record column [illegible] day later than usual—and this reviewer has not [illegible] way to write copy and attend dinners in the pub[illegible] and the same time.

Nevertheless, if any of the 3,700 Albany people who attended the Mischa Elman violin concert at the Palace Theater some time ago would like an encore of the same concerto number, Mendelssohn's E Minor, Op. 64, it is now available in a new recording from Victor, played in the same characteristically mellow tone with the same expressive feeling, but with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra instead of the Rochester Philharmonic.

In the same category, Columbia has one, the Brahms Sonata No. 3 in D Minor for violin and piano, with the young artist, Isaac Stern, who will be remembered as the off-scene violinist who saved the day for the film, "Humoresque." Alexander Zadkin is at the piano. The album is conclusive evidence that Stern is among the luminaries, and the recording is good.

The much publicized recording at Tanglewood of Beethoven's "Choral" Symphony No. 9, by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, turns out to be a rather disappointing affair. With no resonant backing and with reverberations and echoes that turn the texture into a salad of sound, the excellent reading, orchestral and vocal work are lost. The album from Victor is thus principally interesting as musical history.

Victor has issued the first Tagliavini album, four tenor arias, and the magnificent voice is well displayed in Verdi's "Parmi veder le lagrime," Donizetti's "Una furtiva lagrima," Meyerbeer's "O, Paradiso!" and Cilea's "Lamento di Federico." However, the differential in volume between the soft and strong phrases is too marked.

The corking performance of "The Prince of Pilsen" last night at Philip Livingston Junior High School (to be repeated tonight by the Knickerbocker Guild) probably will bring a local demand for recordings from this musical show. It is pretty hopeless, for the revival specialists of the recording companies, the name orchestras and the Broadway stage have missed this melodic bonanza almost completely, a version of the "Stein Song" (U. of Maine) being the exception.

DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS

APR 10

Koussevitzky To Retire Next Season

BOSTON, Ma[illegible] Serge Koussevit[illegible] born conductor [illegible] phony Orchestra [illegible] end of his Silve[illegible] season, Henry [illegible] of the trustees, [illegible]

His successor [illegible] old Alsatian-[illegible] Charles Munch [illegible] several times [illegible] phony.

Koussevitzky [illegible] tion said his d[illegible] taken because [illegible] not be possible [illegible] my present [illegible] for the length [illegible] weeks of our a[illegible]

Cabot said [illegible] continue as dir[illegible] shire Music Cen[illegible]

The announcem[illegible] annual meeting [illegible] Friends of the B[illegible] Orchestra at S[illegible]

MONROE, MICH.
NEWS

APR 10 1948

Boston Symphony Losing Conductor

BOSTON, April 10 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced Thursday by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL

Koussevitzky To Retire

BOSTON (AP) Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74-year-old conductor who brought Boston symphony orchestra to the front rank, announced he will retire after next season from the position he has held since 1924.

ELMIRA, N. Y.
ADVERTISER

APR 10 1948

Koussevitzky To Quit in '49

Boston (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation said he felt it would be impossible for him to continue strenuous obligations "for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

id to be previous d to be ncreased ral ex-
up.

Following the and concert, tea upper Huntington

Australia await crop.

UTH, OHIO
IES

10 1948

SSEVITZKY
CONDUCTOR

10—Dr. Serge close his ca-of the Boston ra at the end
ce 1948-49 sea-

Russian-born succeeded by 57, Alsatian
e present lead-onservatory or-
Paris philhar-

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

Notes and Sketches

By Milton Widder

The announced retirement of Serge Koussevitzky after next season as musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should be no surprise to those following the musical news—for his retirement has been in the rumor stage for more than three years.

Those rumors were stirred up not so much by those close to the Boston orchestra situation but by the ambitious orchestral conductors around this country anxious to pluck that ripe and satisfying plum for themselves. At various times the names of Rodzinski, Stokowski, Leonard Bernstein, Mitropoulos and Monteux were mentioned as the inheritors of the post. No doubt countless others were in the race too—courting the favor of the Brahmins as well as Koussevitzky himself.

In the past quarter century the ex-bass fiddle player has built an aura of tradition around himself and his orchestra — the perfection of his musical instrument and his interpretative powers. I've known musicians who made a living with their art who would rather play for Koussy at $10 a week less than they could get elsewhere, just to be under his musical influence.

Cleveland was particularly taken by Koussevitzky. His concerts here were sold out constantly and the adulation he received here from the fringes was just short of worship.

The selection of Charles Muench, the French conductor, is a happy one for the post. This conductor, who guested here this season and will be back next, is considered one of the "great" and he will fit in well with Boston's musical, cultural and social life; and that last category in Boston (as well as elsewhere in the musical communities that dot the nation) is an important factor.

New Leader of Boston Symphony

Kind, Amiable, Sheds Shyness Making Music

By CYRUS DURGIN

NEW YORK, April 10—What sort of a man is Charles Munch, the French musician who will take over as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when Serge Koussevitzky retires in 1949?

A shy, but kind, generous and amiable man, who sheds all his shyness like a cloak the moment he starts to make music.

That is the sum of conversations I have had here in New York the past two days with people who have known and worked with Mr. Munch.

"He is one of the finest gentlemen I ever have known," boomed Bruno Zirato, assistant manager of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra.

"Mr. Munch loves to buy lavish presents for his friends, and I mean lavish," continued Zirato, who once was secretary to Enrico Caruso. "What is more, the men in the Philharmonic paid Munch a hitherto unheard of tribute when he finished his appearances with us in 1947. They gave him a cocktail party, and a gold cigarette case. That shows you how well they thought of him! This season Mr. Munch returned the honor and gave a huge cocktail party for them.

"He is a very nervous man when he is working," Zirato went on, "but it is the nervousness of a man who knows precisely what he wants to accomplish and who concentrates on that to the exclusion of everything else.

"Everywhere he has conducted in the United States he has had really sensational success.

See MUNCH Page 27

The reviews and the public have been unanimously favorable. You know, it was the New York Philharmonic who first brought Munch to this country.

"It was only because of a jam in booking dates that he made his actual American debut in Boston in December of 1946. The next week he came to us. For next season he hasn't a date open!

A Splendid Technician

"Charles Munch is a splendid technician, with a good ear and a remarkable facility for getting the men to work with him," stated young, spectacled Walter Hendl, assistant conductor of the Philharmonic.

"There is no waste of time or energy at a Munch rehearsal," continued Hendl, "even though he expends a terrific amount of his own energy. He stretches every nerve, but that is the natural way for him to work. He concentrates upon the big lines of a piece, rather than the details. He has a fine ear for clearness and the right balance of instruments.

Boston Daily Globe
SATURDAY, APRIL 10, 1948

MUSIC
SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

By JOHN WM. RILEY

The dramatic announcement on Thursday of Serge Koussevitsky's retirement as music director of the Boston Symphony at the end of the 1948-49 season had its effect on both yesterday's audience and the music performed.

As Mr. Koussevitzky came to his stand, the members of the orchestra rose in deference to their director. Slowly, the audience began to rise and to applaud in a brief demonstration of their regard for the man who has served them musically for nearly 25 years. This was neither a prolonged nor an excited demonstration, for it seemed as though the audience was stunned by the announcement of the inevitable. Mr. Koussevitzky made a sudden gesture, indicating that the audience be seated, and the concert began.

The program offered two Koussevitzky favorites—the Brahms Third and the Sibelius Second symphonies—which are familiar to us as mediums of his personal expression. Between the two symphonies came the first performance anywhere of Samuel Barber's "Knoxville: Summer of 1915", Op. 24. This is a setting for soprano and large orchestra of a prose poem by James Agee, in which Eleanor Steber was the soloist.

The performances of the two symphonies were not on their customary emotional level. In place of the forward drive, the swift, marching stride which often characterizes a Koussevitzky performance, we had reflective, personalized, lyrical, even tender interpretations which showed Brahms and Sibelius in a fresh light. Only briefly, in the final movement of the Brahms, and in the climax of the Sibelius, did Mr. Koussevitzky strive for transcendental sound. Perhaps we gained a new view of the music and its interpreter.

Mr. James Agee reveals, through John N. Burk's program notes, that his "Knoxville: Summer of 1915" was an experiment in autobiographical "improvisatory writing." This is a recollection in tranquility of happy childhood evenings. It is nostalgic, reminiscent and suffused with the rosy glow of fond memories.

That set Mr. Barber a problem when it came to writing music for Mr. Agee's words. They do not lend themselves to dramatic interpretation and they do not suggest the tension of an emotional climax. They are a blend of honest sentiment and feeling and Mr. Barber, as an artist, had to write fitting music for them.

I should say that he succeeded admirably, although the popular success of his music is something else again. In his workmanlike fashion he has deliberately designed music to mirror the mood of the text. Its texture is soft and pretty, sunny like a Monet landscape. It's what Virgil Thompson has aptly described as "elegant neo-Romanticism."

Messrs. Agee and Barber together successfully evoke the wonderful atmosphere and memories of childhood impressions. Although Mr. Barber's music seems to lack character on first hearing, I rather feel that it would grow on one in repeated hearings. The vocal part is cast in a sort of melodic recitative, pleasant but without a sharply defined character. Miss Steber sang it with feeling, as though she remembered those Summer evenings as a child.

ELMIRA, N. Y.
ADVERTISER
APR 10 1948

Koussevitzky To Quit in '49

Boston (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation said he felt it would be impossible for him to continue strenuous obligations "for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
APR 10 1948

MUENCH OKAYED BY BOSTONIANS

New Symphony Orchestra Leader Is Dynamic

Charles Muench, 56-years-old Alsatian born conductor, who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning with the 1949-1950 concert season, has already won the enthusiastic approval of Boston's music lovers who heard the current season's concerts at which he was guest conductor. He completed two weeks of guest conducting last week end, and was given a tremendous ovation by the critical Friday afternoon audience.

A handsome six feet tall man with a shock of unruly hair, he conducts with vigorous gestures, and often shifts the baton to his left hand, thereby freeing his right for more lively movements.

Born in Alsace, the son of Ernest Muench, who directed the Choeur Saint-Guillaume in Strasbourg, in 1926 he went to Leipzig as concert master in the Gewandhaus orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwangler. Six years later he transferred his activities to Paris, where he founded the Paris Philharmonic orchestra. Since founding the orchestra, he was the regular conductor, and in 1938 he succeeded Philippe Gaubert of the Paris Conservatory orchestra, a position he still holds.

He spoke almost no English when he arrived in the United States late in 1946, but since that time his use of the English language has become much improved. His first appearance as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra was Dec. 27, 1946.

NEWARK N.J.
NEWS
APR 10 1948

Koussevitzky

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY'S resignation from his post as conductor of the Boston Symphony effective at the end of next season puts a period to one of the most fascinating eras of American music.

When Dr. Koussevitzky went to Boston in 1923, the orchestra in that Athens of the East was in a fairly sorry state and its musical public was steeped in the darkness of nothing but classical music of the German-Austrian school.

Through his efforts, the music of Sibelius and Stravinsky were brought to acceptance there, and consequently throughout the remainder of America. Eventually, the redoubtable Serge turned to American music and by commissioning, stubborn conviction and hard labor won an audience for striking new works by Copland, Hindemith, Diamond, Piston, Harris, Barber and others who have since proved their worth elsewhere as well.

Dr. Koussevitzky has pioneered in other fields. Happy chance interested him at an early date in recording, which resulted in a flow of music into many homes, where the Boston version became the standard. He has never been loathe to take the band on tour, to spread far and wide the wonders of its miraculous string section, its French-trained winds. Perhaps these tours transported him back to his youth, when he shipped a full symphony up and down the Volga in Czarist times, to the amazement of peasant and gentry alike.

No easy task lies ahead of Dr. Koussevitzky's successor, Charles Muench, a French conductor who has already made for himself a name in this country. On the other hand, Mr. Muench will come into some undeniable assets—an orchestra that is in top fettle, a repertory equaled by few in the world, an audience ready for anything first rate and a glorious tradition of music making. All of these are the personal creations of Serge Koussevitzky.

TAUNTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
APR 10 1948

Koussevitzky Leaves Moist Eyed-Audience

BOSTON, April 10 (AP)— Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74-year-old conductor who brought Boston Symphony orchestra to the front rank, left his audience moist-eyed at his regular Friday afternoon concert in Symphony hall.

The brilliant Russian-born music master, now a citizen of the United States, announced Thursday he will retire after next season from the position he has held since 1924.

His listeners, many of them among his first Boston audience, applauded vigorously when the balding musical genius took his place on the podium. It was an occasion of reminiscence and deep emotion for Koussevitzky and his hearers alike.

"I am touched by this wonderful reception given me today," he told the group of 2,700 who filled the hall. He was brilliant as he displayed his tremendous energy and talent in three selections, Braum's Second and Sibelius' Third symphonies and the first performance of the American Samuel Barber's "Knoxville: Summer of 1915" for soprano and orchestra.

The maestro emphasized the reason for his decision to turn over the leadership of the world-honored musical organization to the 57-year-old French conductor of the Paris Philharmonic, Charles Muench.

COHOES, N. Y.
AMERICAN
APR 10 1948

Koussevitsky Retiring As Boston Conductor

BOSTON —(AP)— Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his Silver Jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced Thursday night by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation said he felt it would be impossible for him to continue strenuous obligations "for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season."

Cabot said the conductor's courageous spirit had made possible "joy and happiness to the hundreds of thousands of hungry and appreciative audiences all over the world."

He said he had "lighted a torch at Tanglewood (The Berkshire Center) that will shine on through troublesome or peaceful times x x x."

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS
APR 10 1948

Koussevitzky Leaves Audience Moist-Eyed

Boston, April 10. (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74-year-old conductor who brought Boston Symphony Orchestra to the front rank, left his audience moist-eyed at his regular Friday afternoon concert in Symphony Hall. The brilliant Russian-born music master, now a citizen of the United States, announced Thursday he will retire after next season from the position he has held since 1924.

ALBANY, N.Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS

APR 10 1948

Reception Leaves Koussevitzky, 2,700 in Audience Moist-Eyed

Boston—(AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky 74, the conductor who brought Boston Symphony Orchestra to the front rank, left his audience moist-eyed at his regular Friday concert in Symphony Hall.

The brilliant Russian-born music master, now a citizen of the United States, announced Thursday he would retire after next season from the position he has held since 1924.

His listeners, many of them among his first Boston audience, applauded vigorously when he took his place on the podium. It was an occasion of reminiscence and deep emotion for Koussevitzky and his hearers alike.

"I am touched by this wonderful reception given me today," he told the group of 2,700 who filled the hall. He was brilliant as he displayed his tremendous energy and talent in three selections, Brahms' Second and Sibelius' Third Symphonies and the first performance of the American Samuel Barber's "Knoxville: Summer of 1915" for soprano and orchestra.

LANCASTER, PA.
INTELLIGENCER-JOURNAL

APR 10 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY TO RETIRE AS SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

Boston — (P) — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, seventy-four, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said.

His successor will be the fifty-seven-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation, said his decision to resign was taken because "I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active Winter season."

Cabot said Koussevitzky would continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center.

The announcement came at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall

CHICAGO, ILL.
SUN & TIMES

APR 10 1948

Dr. Koussevitzky to quit at Boston

Boston (AP)--Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

FITCHBURG, MASS.
SENTINEL

APR 10 1948

Tribute To Koussevitzky

BOSTON, April 10 (AP)—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74-year-old conductor who brought Boston Symphony orchestra to the front rank, left his audience moist-eyed at his regular Friday afternoon concert in Symphony hall.

The brilliant Russian-born music master, now a citizen of the United States, announced Thursday he will retire after next season from the position he has held since 1924.

His listeners, many of them among his first Boston audience, applauded vigorously when the balding musical genius took his place on the podium. It was an occasion of reminiscence and deep emotion for Koussevitzky and his hearers alike.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE

APR 10 1948

Koussevitsky Will Retire

After Next Season he Will Quit Post He Has Held Since 1924 in Directing Boston Symphony

Boston, April 10 — AP — Dr. ~~Serge Koussevitzky~~, 74-year-old conductor who brought Boston Symphony orchestra to the front rank, left his audience moist-eyed at his regular Friday afternoon concert in Symphony hall.

The brilliant Russian-born music master, now a citizen of the United States, announced Thursday he will retire after next season from the position he has held since 1924.

His listeners, many of them among his first Boston audience, applauded vigorously when the balding musical genius took his place on the podium. It was an occasion of reminiscence and deep emotion for Koussevitzky and his hearers alike.

"I am touched by this wonderful reception given me today," he told the group of 2,700 who filled the hall. He was brilliant as he displayed his tremendous energy and talent in three selections. Brahms' Second and Sibelius' Third Symphonies and the first performance of the American Samuel Barber's "Knoxville: Summer of 1915" for soprano and orchestra.

The maestro emphasized the reason for his decision to turn over the leadership of the world-honored musical organization to the 57-year-old French conductor of the Paris Philharmonic, Charles Muench.

"I have been thinking about retiring for two or three years," he said. "Some forget that besides the very strenuous Boston Symphony season, I have done all the conducting at the Berkshire Music Festivals at Tanglewood, except for last summer when I was aided by guest conductors."

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

APR 10 1948

BOSTON MAESTRO AND SUCCESSOR—Charles Muench (left), 57, Alsatian-born conductor, is shown with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, during a visit to Symphony Hall in Boston. It has been announced that Muench will succeed Koussevitzky as conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season.

Tonal Integrity

4/10/4

Boston is to be congratulated on [illegible] organization that functions quickly, harmoniously and well, not only in its normal operations but when changes are in order. The Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra can take bows, along with its present conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, and its future conductor, Charles Muench, for an impending transfer of batons without friction, with musician and subscriber satisfaction, and without delay.

Boston, politically, is something less than a model for other municipalities. In the proficiency and consistency of its orchestra, it sets a standard for the world. Perhaps the versatility of these artists in moving effortlessly from the technical perfection of the symphony to the common but authentic touch of the Pops of the summer evenings of the Hatch Shell is an unheralded mark of their greatness. So soundly, so smoothly do they function that discord in a change of leaders is somehow unthinkable. Yet it could have happened here, as it has in the bickering and trial-and-error in symphony groups in other cities.

When Dr. Koussevitzky retires at the end of next season, his silver jubilee as conductor will mark uninterrupted musical building and integrity. It is music's and New England's good fortune that he will continue in the less arduous task as director of the Berkshire Music Center. His subsequent guest reappearances in Symphony Hall will be occasions of gratitude and rejoicing.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
HERALD

APR 11 1948

~~BOSTON SYMPHONY~~ GETS NEW LEADER

Proper Bostonians heard big news this week. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, would lay down his baton with the Boston Symphony at the end of 1948.

Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra trustees, and the conductor of 25 years, exchanged warm letters. Charles Munch, Alsatian, will be the new conductor.

MAMARONECK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 12 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY TO RETIRE

By The Associated Press

BOSTON — Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of his Silver Jubilee 1948-49 season. The 74-year-old Russian-born conductor will be succeeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatian conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

SWEETWATER, TEXAS
REPORTER

APR 11 1948

Symphony Conductor To Lay Down Baton; Koussevitsky Quits

BOSTON, Apr. 10, (UP)—One of the nation's greatest symphony orchestras will lose its leader before very long.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky went to Boston 24 years ago to conduct that city's symphony orchestra. The brilliant conductor lifted the orchestra out of its musical doldrums with his demands for perfection and his great flair for showmanship. He raised the Boston symphony to a point where many musical experts describe it as without equal in the world of music.

Tonight, the 73-year-old conductor announced that he will retire next year after completing his 25th season as conductor. He will be succeeded by Charles Munch, the director of the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra.

DALLAS, TEXAS
NEWS

APR 11 1948

RECORDS IN REVIEW

Two More Favorites By the Piano Quartet

That blooming flower of musical showmanship, the First Piano Quartet, hastens more disks to an avid market. Several months ago it delivered its own version of that Polonaise—you know the one—by Chopin, plus an album of Lecuona music.

Latest additions are a resounding "La Campanella," Paganini out of Liszt, and Busonism raised to a fourth degree for two Bach choral preludes, "Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring" and "Rejoice, Beloved Christians." (Victor Disk 12-0206, 12-inch.)

Another contains the FPQ treatment of two favorites, Padrewski's Minuet in G Major and Rachmaninov's C Sharp Minor Prelude. (Victor Disk 12-0207, 12-inch.)

Let it be said quickly this is stunt music full of excitements that appear to thrill hundreds of thousands. Musical sophisticates will ask why these particular lilies need gilding but we doubt that anybody will give them an answer if he could.

◆

STRAVINSKY, Igor (1882): L'Histoire du Soldat and Octet for Wind Instruments. Ensembles from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Leonard Bernstein. (Victor Album 1197, five 12-inch disks.)

"L'Histoire du Soldat" was composed in 1918 and the Octet for Winds in 1923 and Mark Stravinsky's pursuit of chamber music textures rather than the overwhelming effects of his ballet scores. "L'Histoire du Soldat," born out of the bitterness of the 1914-18 war (or any other), combines pantomime, music by a 7-piece ensemble and a narrator's comment. The music in both this and in Stravinsky's own recorded version, is an abstracted suite. Each of the seven instruments functions as a character of the story. It is useless to describe the magic of this music, at once inspired and masterful. It can be enjoyed qua music or, if you go to a little trouble, with the liberetto, as a discourse on the sardonic folk tale of a soldier, his violin and the devil.

The Octet for Wind Instruments is absolute music and an essay at a classical form with an experimental combination of instruments for color and motility. It is lively, fascinating, and, to most ears, winning.

The small ensembles of the Boston Symphony, which recorded the work at Tanglewood last summer, are directed by young Leonard Bernstein with as much perception as you could ask, not as much detail and repose as you might want.

◆

KHACHATURIAN, Aram (1903): Gayne Ballet Suite No. 2. The New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, Efrem Kurtz conducting. Columbia Album MX 292, two 12-inch disks.

Aram Khachaturian, the Armenian-Soviet conductor, is emphatically in the bad room in Moscow, and that isn't good for health or pocketbook. It's a pity he can't cash in on the popularity of his "Gayne" ballet music in this country where the Sabre Dance is being jazzified, arranged for voice, two to four pianos and Oscar Levant. As a matter of fact if Russia doesn't want Khachaturian, New York could use him for what he is, a gifted composer of light music.

The Sabre Dance turned up in the first suite from the music for the ballet "Gayne." It made a best seller out of several albums, one of the most popular being that by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under Efrem Kurtz of the Kansas City Philharmonic. The same combination delivers Suite No. 2 which should find favor but nothing like that of No. 1. It's Fire Dance is no match for the Sabre Dance. The best part of it is the first item, a Russian Dance. The two slow sections are "tempo di Sinatra."

◆

LISZT, Franz (1811-1886): Hungarian Rhapsodies Nos. 5, 6, 11, 15. Shura Cherkassky, pianist. Vox Album 175, three 10-inch disks).

It is necessary to bring great conviction as well as great technique to Liszt's piano music these days. Shura Cherkassky, a prodigy of twenty years ago, and now matured into one of our better pianists, delivers these four Hungarian Rhapsodies brilliantly and persuasively. He favors detail rather than mere thunder or dazzle for its own sake and the music profits from his taste and restraint. Our records are not flawless in either range or smoothness of surfaces.

HUDSON, N. Y.
DAILY STAR

APR 12 1948

DR. KOUSSEVITSKY CLOSING CAREER

BOSTON, Mass—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

The 74-year-old Russian born conductor will be succeded by Charles Muench, 57, Alsatain conductor. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky's decision was announced by Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, at the annual meeting of the Society of Friends of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The elderly director will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music festival

SAN DIEGO
TRIBUNE

APR

Boston Conductor Plans to Retire After Next Season

BOSTON, Ap. 13 (AP)—Dr. Serge Kousse[illegible] 74, conductor, who brought [illegible] Symphony Orchestra to [illegible] left his audience m[illegible] at his regular concert in Sy[illegible] Hall.

The Russ[illegible] music master, now a Unit[illegible] citizen, announ[illegible] re after next sea[illegible] on he has held since 1924.

His listeners [illegible] among his first Boston [illegible] ce, applauded vigorously [illegible] he mounted the podium.

He displa[illegible] tremendous energy and talent [illegible] Brahms' Second and Sibelius' Third Symphonies and the first perf[illegible] of the American Samuel B[illegible] Knoxville: Summer of 1915 [illegible] soprano and orchestra.

The Maestro emphasized the reason [illegible] to turn over leadership [illegible] French conductor of the Paris Philharmonic, Charles Muench, 57.

"I have been thinking about retiring 2 or 3 years," he said "Some forget that besides the very strenuous Boston Symphony season, I have done all the conducting at the Berkshire Music Festivals, at Tanglewood, except for last summer, when I was aided by guest conductors."

LAWRENCE,
EAGLE

APR 13

NEWPORT NEWS, VA.
PRESS
APR 12 1948

A Maestro Retiring

Serge Koussevitzky's announced resignation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's baton at the end of the next season will remove from the American interpretive music field (not entirely, for Mr. Koussevitzky is to continue at the helm of the annual Berkshire festivals) one of the oldest men in point of service. His retirement raises the question whether the Boston ensemble, for many years held by some judges to be the best symphonic group in the United States, will be subjected to the uncertainty that has afflicted the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra through the last decade or so. Future events will have to reveal that. But even more it emphasizes anew the fact that the United States has done little toward the development of American symphonic and operatic conductors.

For stepping into Mr. Koussevitzky's place before the Boston orchestra will be the Alsatian, Charles Muench. There is not, so far as we know, a single American orchestra or operatic organization of first-class rank which employs a native American as regular conductor or on its staff of conductors. By stretched interpretation the Baltimore orchestra may be said to come into the category, since Reginald Stewart, its conductor, is a Canadian; but Mr. Stewart succeeded the United States-born Howard Barlow several years ago.

It is to be hoped that Boston will be so blessed as to escape the tribulations that have beset the New York orchestra since the resignation of the man who probably is the greatest of living conductors—Arturo Toscanini. Even before Signor Toscanini resigned, conditions were not as good as they might have been because the noble Italian maestro conducted in person only a few weeks and entrusted the ensemble to guests for the rest of the season. While an occasional guest is welcome, a preponderance of them is disrupting. Since then John Barbirolli was pleasing enough to be re-engaged when a three-year contract expired but during his second three years aroused antagonism and, for reasons not apparent here, lost the support of the orchestra itself. After "he was not invited to return" Arturo Rodzinski was engaged; gave fine promise; and then charging interference, resigned effective at the end of a season only to be discharged immediately. Now the magnificent but aging Bruno Walter is director but feels it necessary to allow guests—M. Muench among them—to do most of the conducting. Mr. Koussevitzky's long tenure—24 years up to the present—has operated against that; M. Muench has made an excellent record, but his age (57) is a virtual guarantee that he will not wield the baton so long; and he is stepping, as did Mr. Rodzinski, into the shoes of a giant.

Besides all this, the Boston move once more reveals the United States as still in a position of dependence on Europeans for classical music interpretation. This is not said in any disparagement of the Europeans nor, for that matter, of M. Muench's choice to succeed Mr. Koussevitzky. The Boston orchestra's list of conductors—among them some of the greatest of all time, such as Arturo Nikisch and Karl Muck—have all been Europeans. But far from voicing this in any spirit of nationalism or exclusion, we voice it as a reminder that music in the highest sense respects no national boundaries and that Europe may not always be in a position to furnish the world the highest type of interpreters. In view of the terrible devastation wreaked by two world wars in less than a generation and the disorganization following the last one, the supply is not at all unlikely to run short. Not merely for national pride, but for the sake of fine music itself, the United States needs to develop some first-class orchestral and operatic conductors. Europe may need them within the foreseeable future.

SAN DIEGO,
TRIBUNE S
APR

Boston Cond Plans to Re After Next S

BOSTON, April 13
Serge Koussevitzky, 74,
who brought Boston Sy chestra to the front audience moist-eyed at concert in Symphony Ha
The Russian-born mus now a United States c nounced he will retire season from the position since 1924.
His listeners, many first Boston audience, vigorously when he podium.
He displayed tremend and talent in Brahms' Sibelius' Third Sympho
first performance of the Samuel Barber's "Knox
mer of 1915," for sopra
chestra.
The Maestro empha son for his decision to leadership to the Frenc of the Paris Philharmo
Muench, 57.
"I have been thinki tiring 2 or 3 years," he forget that, besides the ous Boston Symphony have done all the cond
Berkshire Music Fest
glewood, except for when I was aided by doctors."

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
APR

KOUSSEVITZKY

Music lovers will contemplate with sadness the decision of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to lay down the baton of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Because he brought the Boston orchestra to prominence in the period when radio and recording were developing their ability to spread the sound of a single orchestra to all the corners of the land, followers of fine music throughout America have come to know the name and the musical touch of Koussevitzky.

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
APR

Koussevitzky To Retire

BOSTON--(AP)--Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season.

His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor, Charles Muench, who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky's letter of resignation said his decision to resign was taken because 'I feel that it will not be possible for me to continue my present strenuous obligations for the length of 16 to 18 weeks of our active winter season.'

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD-TIMES
APR 13 1948

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Regret over the resignation of Serge Koussevitzky as musical director and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is tempered by the fact that he still will be associated with that organization. He will continue in his present position until the end of the 1948-49 season, and after that, will appear on several occasions as guest conductor. He also will continue as head of the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, which is founded for the purpose of encouraging talented young musicians.

Under Dr. Koussevitzky's leadership, which will have lasted 25 years at the close of the next season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has come to be recognized as the outstanding group of its kind in this country.

Other orchestras have had conductor trouble, but the one in Boston has been notably free from it, and relations with Dr. Koussevitzky have been happy and harmonious.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 13 1948

'Dissonant Harsh Noises'

Editor:

After reading one of the letters on the Boston Symphony in the issue of Apr. 4 I understand why it is that our best symphony orchestra does not give our contemporary composers the chance to be heard, and also why Providence is such a stagnant city musically. The writer of this letter complimented the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Charles Muench, for choosing a program which did not contain what the writer called "dissonant harsh noises." To my mind characterizing 20th century music as noise seems to be a fairly prevalent attitude, all the more startling when you consider how seldom contemporary music is played.

How can one judge this music objectively when nine times out of 10, a musical program will contain selections by Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, etc., and it is a novelty to hear Hindemith, Barber, Piston, etc. And this is not the conductor's fault entirely. It is the fault of a lazy-minded public. People prefer to go to a concert and be lulled by the same music they have been hearing for the past 50 to 100 years than to hear mentally stimulating music. We all know Beethoven and Mozart were masters; I do not condemn or condone contemporary music, but it must at least be heard before it can be liked or disliked.

I personally think it is an insult to an audience's musical intelligence to offer such a program as Munch selected last week. Mr. Koussevitsky, on the other hand, more often than most conductors, gives modern composers a chance to have their works performed by a major orchestra.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL
APR 13 1948

Koussevitzky Retires

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has decided to retire at the end of his silver jubilee season, that of 1948-1949. He is now 74 years old and feels that he can no longer do full justice to the demands of the orchestra through a strenuous season of from 16 to 18 weeks. As Dr. Koussevitzky prepares to leave the stage, he may be assured he takes with him the respect and affection of an amazing number of people. He has helped make the American people conscious and fond of symphonic music as few men have.

Incidentally, Dr. Koussevitzky's experience in Boston has largely refuted the ancient idea that there Lowells talked only to Cabots and Cabots talked only to God. The announcement that Dr. Koussevitzky would retire was made by Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's Board of Trustees. He spoke to the conductor in terms of warm gratitude and reported with great satisfaction that the doctor would remain in charge of the Berkshire Music Center.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 13 1948

'Dissonant Harsh Noises'

Editor:

After reading one of the letters on the Boston Symphony in the issue of Apr. 4 I understand why it is that our best symphony orchestra does not give our contemporary composers the chance to be heard, and also why Providence is such a stagnant city musically. The writer of this letter complimented the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, Charles Muench, for choosing a program which did not contain what the writer called "dissonant harsh noises." To my mind characterizing 20th century music as noise seems to be a fairly prevalent attitude, all the more startling when you consider how seldom contemporary music is played.

How can one judge this music objectively when nine times out of 10, a musical program will contain selections by Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, etc., and it is a novelty to hear Hindemith, Barber, Piston, etc. And this is not the conductor's fault entirely. It is the fault of a lazy-minded public. People prefer to go to a concert and be lulled by the same music they have been hearing for the past 50 to 100 years than to hear mentally stimulating music. We all know Beethoven and Mozart were masters; I do not condemn or condone contemporary music, but it must at least be heard before it can be liked or disliked.

I personally think it is an insult to an audience's musical intelligence to offer such a program as Munch selected last week. Mr. Koussevitsky, on the other hand, more often than most conductors, gives modern composers a chance to have their works performed by a major orchestra.

MRS. SELMA KROLL.
Edgewood.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE
APR 13 1948

Of Music and Musicians

CHARLES MUENCH

Charles Muench has been named as permanent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to succeed Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who will retire following the 1948-49 season.

Muench was born in Strasbourg, Alsace, on Sept. 26, 1891, of a French mother and an Alsatian father. His first teacher was his father, Ernest Muench, who was the director of the Choeur Saint-Guillaume in Strasbourg. His instrument was the violin, which he studied with his father, then with Lucien Capet in Paris and Carl Flesch in Berlin.

In 1919 he was made professor of the Strasbourg Conservatory and conductor of the orchestra there. Going to Leipzig in 1926, he served as concertmaster in the Gewandhaus Orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwangler. In 1932 he went to Paris and after conducting concerts of the Paris Symphony Orchestra, the Lamoureus Orchestra and the Straram Orchestra, he founded the Paris Philharmonic Orchestra, of which he has since been the regular conductor.

CIRCLEVILLE, OHIO
HERALD

APR 14 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY

MUSIC lovers will contemplate with sadness the decision of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to lay down the baton of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Because he brought the Boston orchestra to prominence in the period when radio and recording were developing their ability to spread the sound of a single orchestra to all the corners of the land, followers of fine music throughout America have come to know the name and the musical touch of Koussevitzky.

BRADFORD, PA.
ERA

APR 15 1948

Koussevitzky

Music lovers will contemplate with sadness the decision of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to lay down the baton of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Because he brought the Boston orchestra to prominence in the period when radio and recording were developing their ability to spread the sound of a single orchestra to all corners of the land, followers of fine music throughout America have come to know the name and the musical touch of Koussevitzky.

HICKORY, N.C
RECORD
4/15/48

PEABODY AWARDS TO ABC

Hickory's Radio Stations WHKY-AM and WHKY-FM are to be congratulated upon the fact that they are carrying regularly for the entertainment of Hickory area listeners, the three American Broadcasting Company programs which have been chosen for three of the most coveted honors of the industry, Peabody Awards for 1947.

These programs are: "Theatre Guild of the Air," the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Elmer Davis, news commentator.

Announcement of the awards was made at a luncheon meeting of the Radio Executives Club, in New York, this afternoon, by Edward (Ted) Weeks, editor of the Atlantic Monthly.

The three programs picked were cited "for outstanding entertainment in drama"; "for outstanding entertainment in music"; and "for outstanding reporting-interpretation of the news."

The Catawba Valley Broadcasting Company, which operates the WHKY Hickory stations, under the general management of Ed Long, is entitled to a public salute for making such "outstanding" programs available to the people of this area, over the local facilities.

JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
JOURNAL

APR 13 1948

A Maestro Retires

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the 1948-49 season, which celebrates his silver jubilee, has richly earned a rest, but it will be only a modified rest, for the 74-year-old maestro will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival. Announcing the retirement, Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, declared that Dr. Koussevitsky had made possible "joy and happiness to the hundreds of thousands of hungry and appreciative audiences all over the world" — an apt and true phrase.

Charles Muench, who succeeds him, is a 57-year-old Alsatian. He is now the leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic. Mr. Muench has been heard at the head of the Boston Symphony and displayed qualities that indicate that he is a worthy successor to the veteran who has so long given the American people the benefit of his masterly musicianship.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

APR 15 1948

Koussevitzky Gets Heartfelt Tribute Here

Boston's Conductor Ends Bushnell Series Of Symphony Events

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, was presented in the final concert of the Bushnell Series Tuesday night. The program:

Eine Kleine Nachtmusik	Mozart
Jupiter Symphony	Mozart
Symphony No. 3	Piston
Prelude to Lohengrin	Wagner
Prelude to Die Meistersinger	Wagner

A pretty good idea of how Hartford concert goers feel about the pending retirement of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky from the Boston podium, was free for the asking at the Bushnell Memorial Tuesday night.

It manifested itself first in the unusally warm applause which greeted him when he took the stage at the opening of the program. But it reached the point of a demonstration at the close of the concert when the audience rose to its feet and called him back for more bows than he had ever taken here before. It was apparent that they hoped he would say something to impart some sort of patriarchal blessing. But he stood there like a fine, old Roman emperor at a triumph, silent but plainly pleased. It was a curiously touching moment, and perhaps the first sample of many more to come in the intervening time before he finally steps down from the Boston conductorship he has so long and magnificently held.

Mr. Piston's Symphony.

The program itself had brought us for the first time, Walter Piston's third and latest symphony. When Dr. Koussevitzky has got hold of something which he considers pretty special, what a sendoff he gives it! The Piston work had been played for Boston concert goers recently, but according to announcement, its radio premiere was being made from the Bushnell stage. Dr. Koussevitzky gave his all to insure its success, AM and FM. Even though you were hearing it for the first time, you could not doubt but that it was being given a reading and performance hair-curling and nonpareil.

The symphony is in the main a rewarding work musically, reasonably traditional in form, but quite modern in content. It has been richly, not to say densely written. Many parts will remind of Moussorgsky, others of Shostakovitch. It has some of the sound and much of the somberness of the former in its first movement, while the rhythms verging on syncopation and the general air of martial rat-ta-plan of the second and fourth movements suggest the contemporary Russian (if they still own him over there). Actually, Mr. Piston was probably rooting around in our own, native popular musical modes when he thought them up.

Except for certain ingratiating melodies and rythms in the late movement, this Third is not a symphony for the concert hall loller. It is intense, complex and shrewd—and it requires concentrated listening, as well as the aural adjustment that much modern symphonic writing still demands. It is the work of an expert composer and one with things musical and emotional to say seriously and clear-eyed. Its reception Tuesday evening was not too enthusiastic, but Mr. Piston got at least a friendly if not over-interested hand from the house as he took bows on the stage with Dr. Koussevitzky.

Not Heart-to-Heart.

Mozart had been the opening fare on the program and Wagner was the closing. Dr. Koussevitzky was in a mood to make music with the most loving care, but he did not receive a similar response from the orchestra. The players must have had the Piston on their minds, for they played the "Kleine Nachtmusik" and a lot of the "Jupiter" in rather heavyhanded fashion.. Dr. Koussevitzky continually had to quiet them, to shush them. The slow section of the Mozart attained a fine beauty of reading and playing, glowing under the mutes with unusual Romanticism, however. The Wagner excerpts, dramatic though they were, were roughly played in many spots.

T. H. P.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

[illegible]

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Orchestra in Concert Here

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE

UNDER AUSPICES of the Philadelphia Forum, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its dynamic conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, made its annual appearance at the Academy of Music last night. The result was an ovation for both conductor and orchestra.

The program was a typical one, as far as this famous organization was concerned—Mozart, Prokofieff and Sibelius.

It is curious how our major symphony orchestras have personalities all their own, differing entirely one from another. The Boston Symphony is no exception; it radiates an atmosphere and excitement like no other.

Dr. Koussevitzky is a generous musician — expansive, seizing the moment with enthusiasm, giving to the hilt in moments of climax. Last evening these qualities were again in evidence. The characteristic, slow and majestic walk to the conductor's stand, the deep bow to the audience, the occasional Mephistophelean lunges at the different sections of the orchestra — all were once more present.

The Boston conductor's performance of the "Jupiter" Symphony is a personal one. Rather uneven, and lacking the unity that some others achieve, this "Jupiter" is nevertheless arresting and attention-compelling. Some of it, notably the second movement, was very beautifully played.

Prokofieff's "Scythian" suite, with its barbaric langours and stunning final Procession of the Sun, is ideal fare for this orchestra. The clarity of the woodwinds was especially noticeable.

In conclusion, Dr. Koussevitzky played one of his old war-horses, the Sibelius' Second Symphony. The breadth and energy, the healthy forward thrust of this, the longest of Sibelius' symphonies is well suited to Dr. Koussevitzky's temperament.

The conductor worked tremendously in the building up of the final climax, which piles repeatedly upon itself until the final fortissimo measures are reached. His efforts were rewarded by a veritable storm of applause, which brought him out slowly, wiping his brow, for several recalls.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

APR 16 1948

ABOUT PEOPLE

By JEAN and ROBERT BOARDMAN

GOVERNOR DEWEY'S big handicap with the farm vote—one of which he's well aware—is that he looks like a city slicker. Once, on the recent Nebraska tour, the Governor climbed off the bus into the teeth of a high prairie wind and got reasonably rumpled en route to the speaker's platform. Pro-Deweyites in his entourage were exulting up to the moment when the Governor stepped onto the platform, his hair once again neatly combed. Afterwards, they called him on it.

"Well, if I hadn't combed it," the Governor grumbled, "they'd think I was putting on an act."

* * *

When Charles Muench was guest - conducting the Philharmonic last February, he accepted an invitation to dinner at the home of Walter Hendl, the orchestra's assistant conductor. Mr. Muench arrived with a huge bouquet of red roses for Mrs. Hendl (the former Newby Williams, actress and poet) and during the evening he extravagantly admired the dinner, the Hendl's six-months-old baby and Mrs. Hendl's amateur paintings.

Charles Muench

Just before Mr. Muench's appointment to succeeed Serge Koussevitzky as director of the Boston Symphony was announced, he received Mrs. Hendl's "thank-you" for the roses—an oil portrait of the bouquet.

* * *

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

APR 16 1948

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY RETIRES

When Dr. Serge Koussevitzky steps down at the end of next season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it will be at the age of 75 and after twenty-five years as its conductor and after five decades of music making. Those acquainted with the concerts of the Boston Symphony in its annual visits to New York and over the radio will feel more than a twinge of regret at his departure. For under his aegis the Boston has become a virtuoso ensemble of first rank and the "Boston tone" a criterion for all but two or three other orchestras in the country.

His sympathy and understanding of contemporary music has been one of the most beguiling features of his tenure. He has not only played modern compositions but by commissioning new works through the Koussevitzky Foundation has made it possible for them to come into being. His summer concerts at Tanglewood have provided excellent music in beautiful surroundings and a valuable training school for instrumentalists, conductors and composers.

It is pleasant to remember that Dr. Koussevitzky will appear as an occasional guest conductor and will still be active during the summer months at Tanglewood. And we know that his experience and counsel will be available to composers and students in the long years ahead which all those indebted to him for his music making in the past will wish him.

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL

AP [illegible]

The "Oscars" of radio—the Peabody Awards—were presented to eight radio programs chosen as the best of 1947. Network shows cited included Elmer Davis, for interpretation of the news; "Theater Guild," for dramatic excellence; Boston Symphony, for outstanding musical programs; "CBS Is There," the award in education, and "CBS Views the Press," the award for commentary. Other citations were to individual stations throughout the country.

CIRCLEVILLE, OHIO
HERALD
APR 14 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY

MUSIC lovers will contemplate with sadness the decision of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to lay down the baton of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Because he brought the Boston orchestra to prominence in the period when radio and recording were developing their ability to spread the sound of a single orchestra to all the corners of the land, followers of fine music throughout America have come to know the name and the musical touch of Koussevitzky.

BRADFORD, PA.
ERA
APR 15 1948

Koussevitzky

Music lovers will contemplate with sadness the decision of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to lay down the baton of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Because he brought the Boston orchestra to prominence in the period when radio and recording were developing their ability to spread the sound of a single orchestra to all corners of the land, followers of fine music throughout America have come to know the name and the musical touch of Koussevitzky.

HICKORY, N.C
RECORD
4/15/48

PEABODY AWARDS TO ABC

Hickory's Radio Stations WHKY-AM and WHKY-FM are to be congratulated upon the fact that they are carrying regularly for the entertainment of Hickory area listeners, the three American Broadcasting Company programs which have been chosen for three of the most coveted honors of the industry, Peabody Awards for 1947.

These programs are: "Theatre Guild of the Air," the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Elmer Davis, news commentator.

Announcement of the awards was made at a luncheon meeting of the Radio Executives Club, in New York, this afternoon, by Edward (Ted) Weeks, editor of the Atlantic Monthly.

The three programs picked were cited "for outstanding entertainment in drama"; "for outstanding entertainment in music"; and "for outstanding reporting-interpretation of the news."

The Catawba Valley Broadcasting Company, which operates the WHKY Hickory stations, under the general management of Ed Long, is entitled to a public salute for making such "outstanding" programs available to the people of this area, over the local facilities.

JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
JOURNAL
APR 13 1948

A Maestro Retires

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who will close his career as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the 1948-49 season, which celebrates his silver jubilee, has richly earned a rest, but it will be only a modified rest, for the 74-year-old maestro will remain as leader of the Berkshire Music Festival. Announcing the retirement, Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's board of trustees, declared that Dr. Koussevitsky had made possible "joy and happiness to the hundreds of thousands of hungry and appreciative audiences all over the world" — an apt and true phrase.

Charles Muench, who succeeds him, is a 57-year-old Alsatian. He is now the leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic. Mr. Muench has been heard at the head of the Boston Symphony and displayed qualities that indicate that he is a worthy successor to the veteran who has so long given the American people the benefit of his masterly musicianship.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
APR 15 1948

Koussevitzky Gets Heartfelt Tribute Here

Boston's Conductor Ends Bushnell Series Of Symphony Events

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, was presented in the final concert of the Bushnell Series Tuesday night. The program:

Eine Kleine Nachtmusik	Mozart
Jupiter Symphony	Mozart
Symphony No. 3	Piston
Prelude to Lohengrin	Wagner
Prelude to Die Meistersinger	Wagner

A pretty good idea of how Hartford concert goers feel about the pending retirement of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky from the Boston podium, was free for the asking at the Bushnell Memorial Tuesday night.

It manifested itself first in the unusally warm applause which greeted him when he took the stage at the opening of the program. But it reached the point of a demonstration at the close of the concert when the audience rose to its feet and called him back for more bows than he had ever taken here before. It was apparent that they hoped he would say something to impart some sort of patriarchal blessing. But he stood there like a fine, old Roman emperor at a triumph, silent but plainly pleased. It was a curiously touching moment, and perhaps the first sample of many more to come in the intervening time before he finally steps down from the Boston conductorship he has so long and magnificently held.

Mr. Piston's Symphony.

The program itself had brought us for the first time, Walter Piston's third and latest symphony. When Dr. Koussevitzky has got hold of something which he considers pretty special, what a sendoff he gives it! The Piston work had been played for Boston concert goers recently, but according to announcement, its radio premiere was being made from the Bushnell stage. Dr. Koussevitzky gave his all to insure its success, AM and FM. Even though you were hearing it for the first time, you could not doubt but that it was being given a reading and performance hair-curling and nonpareil.

The symphony is in the main a rewarding work musically, reasonably traditional in form, but quite modern in content. It has been richly, not to say densely written. Many parts will remind of Moussorgsky, others of Shostakovitch. It has some of the sound and much of the somberness of the former in its first movement, while the rhythms verging on syncopation and the general air of martial rat-ta-plan of the second and fourth movements suggest the contemporary Russian (if they still own him over there). Actually, Mr. Piston was probably rooting around in our own, native popular musical modes when he thought them up.

Except for certain ingratiating melodies and rythms in the late movement, this Third is not a symphony for the concert hall loller. It is intense, complex and shrewd—and it requires concentrated listening, as well as the aural adjustment that much modern symphonic writing still demands. It is the work of an expert composer and one with things musical and emotional to say seriously and clear-eyed. Its reception Tuesday evening was not too enthusiastic, but Mr. Piston got at least a friendly if not over-interested hand from the house as he took bows on the stage with Dr. Koussevitzky.

Not Heart-to-Heart.

Mozart had been the opening fare on the program and Wagner was the closing. Dr. Koussevitzky was in a mood to make music with the most loving care, but he did not receive a similar response from the orchestra. The players must have had the Piston on their minds, for they played the "Kleine Nachtmusik" and a lot of the "Jupiter" in rather heavyhanded fashion.. Dr. Koussevitzky continually had to quiet them, to shush them. The slow section of the Mozart attained a fine beauty of reading and playing, glowing under the mutes with unusual Romanticism, however. The Wagner excerpts, dramatic though they were, were roughly played in many spots.

T. H. P.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
APR 16 1948

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Orchestra in Concert Here

By MAX de SCHAUENSEE

UNDER AUSPICES of the Philadelphia Forum, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its dynamic conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, made its annual appearance at the Academy of Music last night. The result was an ovation for both conductor and orchestra.

The program was a typical one, as far as this famous organization was concerned—Mozart, Prokofieff and Sibelius.

It is curious how our major symphony orchestras have personalities all their own, differing entirely one from another. The Boston Symphony is no exception; it radiates an atmosphere and excitement like no other.

Dr. Koussevitzky is a generous musician — expansive, seizing the moment with enthusiasm, giving to the hilt in moments of climax. Last evening these qualities were again in evidence. The characteristic, slow and majestic walk to the conductor's stand, the deep bow to the audience, the occasional Mephistophelean lunges at the different sections of the orchestra — all were once more present.

The Boston conductor's performance of the "Jupiter" Symphony is a personal one. Rather uneven, and lacking the unity that some others achieve, this "Jupiter" is nevertheless arresting and attention-compelling. Some of it, notably the second movement, was very beautifully played.

Prokofieff's "Scythian" suite, with its barbaric langours and stunning final Procession of the Sun, is ideal fare for this orchestra. The clarity of the woodwinds was especially noticeable.

In conclusion, Dr. Koussevitzky played one of his old war-horses, the Sibelius' Second Symphony. The breadth and energy, the healthy forward thrust of this, the longest of Sibelius' symphonies is well suited to Dr. Koussevitzky's temperament.

The conductor worked tremendously in the building up of the final climax, which piles repeatedly upon itself until the final fortissimo measures are reached. His efforts were rewarded by a veritable storm of applause, which brought him out slowly, wiping his brow, for several recalls.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
APR 16 1948

ABOUT PEOPLE

By JEAN and ROBERT BOARDMA

GOVERNOR DEWEY'S big handicap with the farm vote—one of which he's well aware—is that he looks like a city slicker. Once, on the recent Nebraska tour, the Governor climbed off the bus into the teeth of a high prairie wind, and got reasonably rumpled en route to the speaker's platform. Pro-Deweyites in his entourage were exulting up to the moment when the Governor stepped onto the platform, his hair once again neatly combed. Afterwards, they called him on it.

"Well, if I hadn't combed it," the Governor grumbled, "they'd think I was putting on an act."

* * *

Charles Muench

When Charles Muench was guest - conducting the Philharmonic last February, he accepted an invitation to dinner at the home of Walter Hendl, the orchestra's assistant conductor. Mr. Muench arrived with a huge bouquet of red roses for Mrs. Hendl (the former Newby Williams, actress and poet) and during the evening he extravagantly admired the dinner, the Hendl's six-months-old baby and Mrs. Hendl's amateur paintings.

Just before Mr. Muench's appointment to succeeed Serge Koussevitzky as director of the Boston Symphony was announced, he received Mrs. Hendl's "thank-you" for the roses—an oil portrait of the bouquet.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 16 1948

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY RETIRES

When Dr. Serge Koussevitzky steps down at the end of next season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it will be at the age of 75 and after twenty-five years as its conductor and after five decades of music making. Those acquainted with the concerts of the Boston Symphony in its annual visits to New York and over the radio will feel more than a twinge of regret at his departure. For under his aegis the Boston has become a virtuoso ensemble of first rank and the "Boston tone" a criterion for all but two or three other orchestras in the country.

His sympathy and understanding of contemporary music has been one of the most beguiling features of his tenure. He has not only played modern compositions but by commissioning new works through the Koussevitzky Foundation has made it possible for them to come into being. His summer concerts at Tanglewood have provided excellent music in beautiful surroundings and a valuable training school for instrumentalists, conductors and composers.

It is pleasant to remember that Dr. Koussevitzky will appear as an occasional guest conductor and will still be active during the summer months at Tanglewood. And we know that his experience and counsel will be available to composers and students in the long years ahead which all those indebted to him for his music making in the past will wish him.

AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
APR 18 1948

The "Oscars" of radio—the Peabody Awards—were presented to eight radio programs chosen as the best of 1947. Network shows cited included Elmer Davis, for interpretation of the news; "Theater Guild," for dramatic excellence; Boston Symphony, for outstanding musical programs; "CBS Is There," the award in education, and "CBS Views the Press," the award for commentary. Other citations were to individual stations throughout the country.

16. 1948

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge [illegible] Mozart [illegible]

The Piston Case

W[illegible] PISTON'S Third Sym-[illegible] New York first hear-[illegible] occasion for [illegible] Symphony Or-[illegible] Hall in Carne-[illegible] the orchestra it-[illegible] conductor. [illegible] are not worth [illegible] But New York [illegible] musical fare in [illegible] the rest of Wednes-[illegible] consisting of a [illegible] Mozart Serenade and the [illegible] Second Symphony [illegible] itself [illegible] review. [illegible] agreeably [illegible] rendering [illegible] unusually [illegible] the history of [illegible] The Boston or-[illegible] remain [illegible] and res-[illegible]

* * *

[illegible] Third Symphony repre-[illegible] of this com-[illegible] strictly neo-[illegible] direction of neo-Romanticism. It is, to my knowl-[illegible] work of major [illegible] based on rounded, on [illegible] infallible [illegible] an effort toward per-[illegible] expressivity. The first movement is leisurely, almost im-[illegible] in its deliberate float-[illegible] of a mood. The second, a scherzo deals also with grace and [illegible] evocation. The third, an adagio, sings and mounts. The fourth, a sort of rondo with fugal development, leaves the neo-Romantic plane of personalized expression and becomes an effective, if somewhat heavy-footed, march on a theme that fails to open up under development procedures because of its always-turning-back-on-itself conformation. The whole work thus fails of what I take to be its original expressive intention by giving up the effort at expansiveness just when this might have come to fruition.

* * *

It is, nevertheless, a step forward in Piston's creative life. Heretofore he has made perfect pieces somewhat meager in expressive content. Here he has made a rather more expressive piece, sacrificing perfection of form and stylistic consistency to that end. I doubt that the sacrifice of shapeliness was any part of his intention. Nor has he made such sacrifice in any radical way. The renouncement of stylistic consistency, in the final movement, may well have been deliberate. It is not, however, of any help to the work. The personal sentiment symphony has to open continuously; its last movement must be its climax and revelation. Like Prokofieff before him, in the latter's Fifth, Mr. Piston has walked out on the engagement. Let us hope that, now engaged in the new and, thankfully, dangerous path, he will see the matter through next time.

* * *

Piston has long been the most hermetic composer in America. The classical limpidity of his shapes and textures has proved, to this listener in any case, a barrier to the penetration of his thought. The removal of that barrier, however tentatively begun, can only be applauded by the many persons who, like myself, have long known him for a master and long wished to devine the exact nature of his musical communication. That there is in his work, however modesty on cagily concealed, a communication, is certain. Nobody writes music as assiduously as that and as well, unless somewhere in him is a real, personal and private necessity for doing so. The full revelation of that necessity is the destiny and the privilege of the assiduous and skilled composer. That it will be eventually forthcoming from Piston is your reporter's faith. That this composer's Third Symphony gives reason to hope for a not too far-off fuller revelation is his diagnosis of that work as heard Wednesday night.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

Peabody Awards Are Conferred

N[illegible] April 15 (UP)—[illegible] and [illegible] stations were [illegible] winners of the [illegible] George Foster Peabody [illegible] of 1947's highest [illegible]

[illegible] Peabody prize for radio re-[illegible] Elmer Davis of ABC. The committee said: "In a [illegible] utterance, [illegible] points [illegible] peace."

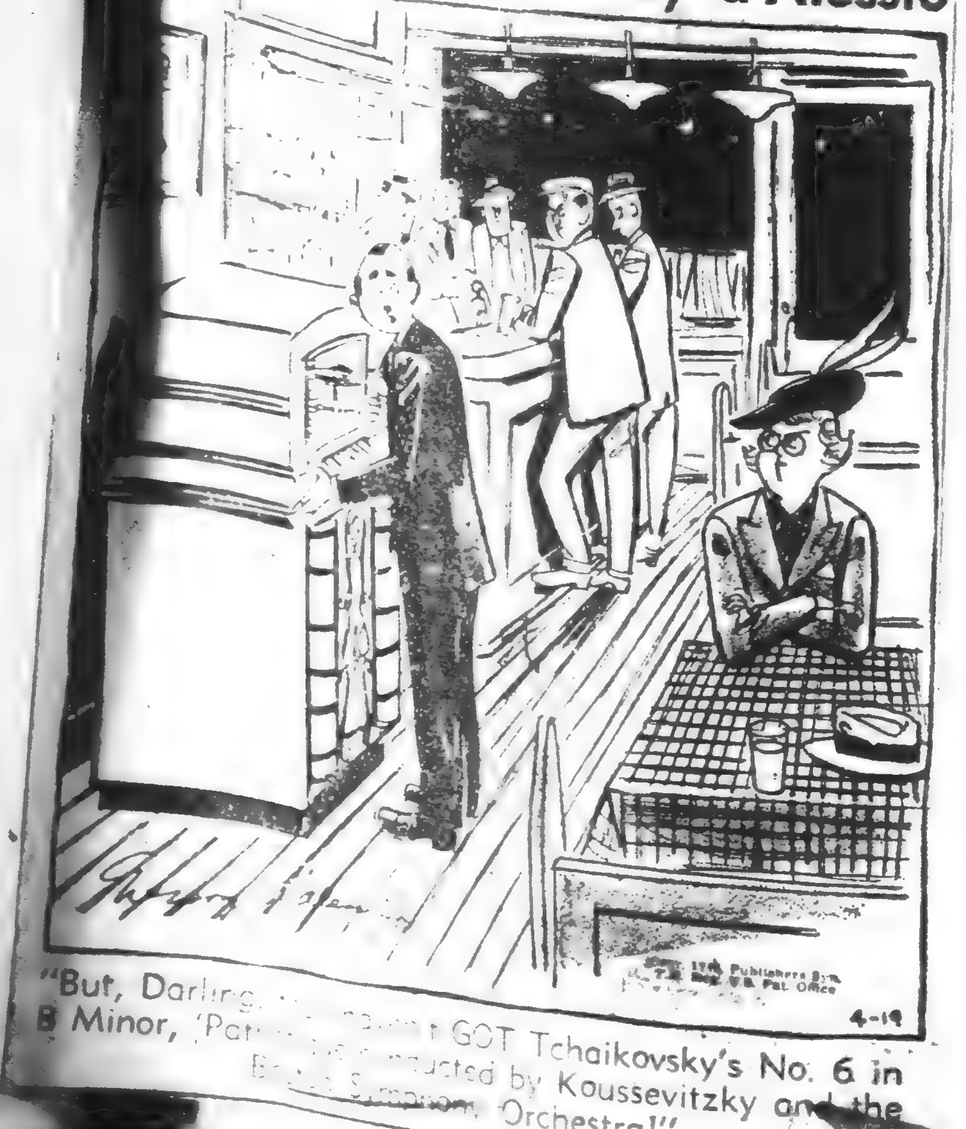
OTHER PRIZES [illegible] network [illegible] ABC for [illegible] the Air, ABC [illegible] Boston [illegible] CBS for [illegible] CBS Views the [illegible] CBS for outstanding [illegible] current prob-[illegible]

[illegible] for public service were [illegible] by station WBBM of Chicago and KXAR of Hope, Ark. WQQW of Washington, D.C., was cited for airing the best children's program of 1947.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

ESE WOMEN

By d'Alessio



"But, Darling, [illegible] GOT Tchaikovsky's No. 6 in B Minor, 'Pat[illegible] conducted by Koussevitzky and the B[illegible] Symphony Orchestra!"

, FRIDAY, APRIL 16, 1948

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.]

PISTON SYMPHONY HEARD AT CONCERT

Composer's Third Is Presented by Koussevitzky—Mozart and Sibelius Offered

By OLIN DOWNES

Serge Koussevitzky presented Walter Piston's Third Symphony for the first time in New York at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. The new symphony, for us a labored and uninviting work, was sandwiched between two other works of unquestionable popularity—the "Nachtmusik" of Mozart and the Second Symphony of Sibelius. And, one asks, which served which purpose? Did the works of Mozart and Sibelius protect the symphony of Piston, or did the Piston symphony serve to point up the more prominently the values of Mozart and Sibelius?

No doubt it depends upon the point of view. The symphony commissioned of Mr. Piston under the terms of the Natalie Koussevitzky Musical Foundation, was given, so far as one unacquainted with its detail could tell, a presentation most advantageous to the composer. Our impression of it is that of a labored and fussy score, overelaborated, of little impulsion or thematic interest. That it is worked out with the utmost care, skill and artistic scruple is self-evident. But the ideas are not significant in their own right, and their treatment is precious if not pedantic. One movement is immediately effective: This is due to its rhythmic drive and triumphant inflection. It contrasts brightly in color as well as mood with what has gone before. But this brilliancy is one of technique rather than intrinsic thought.

The symphony, however, was well received by a large part of the audience, and Mr. Piston, with the conductor, bowed from the stage.

Mozart delicious music was delicately and beautifully played and surely there is little music which is more delightful. It is easy casually to remark upon these things, but it is not easy to find a conductor and orchestra who can accomplish them so masterfully and this in spite of a degree of humidity disadvantageous for strings inside or outside a hall.

The Sibelius Symphony triumphed as it always does, because of its inborn originality of ideas and of style, and a spaciousness and power which inhabits every page of the score. It is early Sibelius, and magnificent in its stride and masculinity, and panoramic splendor. The later Sibelius has left this style far behind. But it stirs the listener to the marrow by its Nordic color, and the sheer power, heroic spirit and simplicity of address.

There are more bleak and savage landscapes in the score than Dr. Koussevitzky chose to reveal in certain pages. His coloring was now and again more [illegible] than the composer's [illegible] then to the over-refined. But the eloquence with which the essence of other pages was revealed and the unforgettable grandeur of the peroration brought a demonstration as the last note sounded.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
APR 16 1948

3 CBS Programs Win Peabody Radio 'Oscars'

NEW YORK, Friday (INS) — Eight radio programs were honored yesterday with George Foster Peabody awards — the "Oscars" of the American broadcasting industry.

The awards were made at a New York Luncheon at which special citations for broadcasting excellence were announced.

CBS Programs Cited

Three Columbia broadcasting system programs received awards and two more were given special citations. The award in education went to the CBS documentary series and to the weekly program "CBS Is There." The award for commentary was given to "CBS Views the Press."

Station WBBM, CBS affiliate in Chicago, received the award for outstanding public service by a regional station for the program "Report Uncensored."

Special citations went to station WCCO, CBS affiliate in Minneapolis, Minn., for the program "As the Twig is Bent", and to "Studio One" of CBS for dramatic programs.

Awards to ABC

Elmer Davis, ABC news commentator, received the prize for outstanding reporting and interpretation of the news. It was the second such award to Davis since they were established in 1940.

Two other ABC programs were honored, the "Theater Guild on the Air" receiving the award in drama and the Boston Symphony Orchestra the award in music.

The award for outstanding public service by a local station was presented to station KXAR, Mutual Broadcasting System affiliate in Hope, Ark. for its service to the community during a tornado.

Background of Awards

An award for outstanding children's program, went to station WQQW, Washington, D. C., for "The Children's Hour."

Another special citation was given the program "United Nations Today", a service of the United Nations network for peace.

The Peabody Awards "are designed to recognize the most disinterested and meritorious public service rendered each year by the broadcasting industry."

They are given in memory of George Foster Peabody, New York banker who was a trustee and benefactor of the University of Georgia, and are administered by the university's journalism school, with the assistance of the National Association of Broadcasters.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAIL

Brief for Modern Music

Editor:

Dr. Whipple is doubtless correct in stating in the issue of Apr. 4 that most concertgoers prefer the type of music heard on the Boston Symphony's last program to modern works. [illegible] have frequently been baffled, bored and/or disgusted on hearing a new composition for the first time. However, I think all of us music lovers would do well to change our attitude, bearing the following points in mind:

1. Variety is the spice of music. The last program was thoroughly enjoyable, but a little variety would have made it more interesting. Even the greatest works can pall if they are heard too often, with nothing in between. Two contrasting works complement each other as do different colors in an outfit or different food in a meal. It isn't fair to any of the composers, great, lesser, modern, or to audiences, to play the great works to death and ignore everything else.

2. This "I've-never-heard-it-so-I-don't-like-it" attitude is as senseless as that of a child who doesn't like a food he's never tasted. And if you've heard a work once, having already made up your mind you don't like it, you have not heard it at all. Music lovers, think back to the time you were just beginning to appreciate music. You didn't like everything the first time you heard it, did you? I fell asleep during my first Tristan, and there was a time when all Haydn and Mozart symphonies sounded exactly alike to me and quite superficial! Don't you remember how it sometimes took five or 10 or 20 hearings before things began to click? If this is true of works which have been around for 100 years or so, how much truer of works seldom heard and written in an unfamiliar idiom? A piece which can be understood at the first hearing is almost certain to be trivial.

3. Every original composer, beginning with Bach, deliberately broke established rules and wrote music which sounded strange to most contemporary ears. Beethoven, Wagner, Moussorgsky, Franck, Debussy come to my mind. If they'd written like their predecessors, music couldn't have progressed, obviously. The Eroica was written almost 150 years ago, but imagine you've never heard anything written after 1800! You go to a concert, totally unprepared, and it explodes on you, that gigantic work, enormous in conception, departing radically from established rules, with its length, originality, dissonances, tremendous emotional force. If today there is a composer of Beethoven's stature, do you think his new work is going to sound soothing and familiar?

4. Do give composers the credit of assuming that they aren't deliberately making ugly sounds just to annoy people. They have something to say and are saying it the best they can. Perhaps it is not worth saying. How can you tell, unless you listen? I read somewhere a suggestion that amateurs withhold judgment on a work until they can hum it. It's a splendid idea. Don't decide it can't be done until you've tried it. You'll be surprised.

5. This is the most important point of all. What is a composer to do? Imitate? Obviously not. A man can imitate Beethoven, and in so doing cease to create. He cannot be Beethoven. Every great creative artist is unique. Furthermore, he is not only an individual but a product of his time. Suppose Hemingway had written novels like Jane Austen's, or put the material of "A Farewell to Arms" in the style of "Pride and Prejudice." Preposterous, isn't it? No more can a composer writing in 1948 sound as if he were writing in 1848. Then what should the composer do? Decide it's all been said already and give up? We hope not. So what's left? He must say what he has to say as the laws of his own being dictate, and the greater he is, the more original his music will be. In other words, the creative artist, by his very nature, must create.

So I say, let's give the new music a fair hearing. If you honestly approach a new work with the idea of getting as much out of it as you can, you'll soon find the modern idiom losing some of its strangeness. You may find, also, better listening habits are enabling you to hear more in your old favorites. Best of all, sooner or later you'll have the fun of adding another piece to those you enjoy.

ELIZABETH McCOLLISTER.

North Scituate.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

APR 19 1948

The Peabody Award prize-winning program, "The Children's Hour" on WQQW, has acquired a sponsor starting on Saturday, May 1, at the new time of 10:30 a.m. Incidentally, the contract of sponsorship was signed before the awards were announced.

The 1947 Peabody Awards were made last Thursday at a luncheon in New York. Because of the high caliber of the judges, the breadth of the survey, and the painstaking method of selection, these awards are probably the most coveted in radio.

For the first time in the history of the awards a Washington station and program received one of the so-called "Oscars." The program so recognized was WQQW's "The Children's Hour," conducted by Carl Green and broadcast every Saturday morning.

Mr. Green is a 37-year-old bachelor who was an executive employe of the station when, with no previous radio or entertainment experience, he suddenly took to the air with "The Children's Hour."

The success of the program lies in Mr. Green's own personality and in his carefully chosen stories and musical selections. Many of the stories are written by Green himself.

In citing "The Children's Hour" program, the Peabody Award Committee said in part: "The fact that the program appeals to a group of children so often neglected in radio programs, the apparent sincerity which the personality of Carl Green reflects, and the original material so successfully used make this program outstanding. The unique spirit of the program has elicited the enthusiastic appreciation of young children, their parents and the press."

Other Peabody awards were made to ABC's "Theater Guild on the Air" and to CBS's "Studio One" for "outstanding entertainment in drama"; to ABC's Elmer Davis and the program "CBS Views the Press," "for outstanding reporting-interpretation of the news"; to the CBS documentary unit for "outstanding educational broadcasting"; to ABC's broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for "outstanding entertainment in music," and to three local stations in other cities for service to their communities.

* * * *

Walter Compton, WTTG-Dumont television station manager, announced this week that the Washington Senators baseball games will be seen and heard on his channel 5 ngton Senators' baseball games will be televised, 77 in all, including 6 double-headers and 38 night games.

The voice in the background with the color and play-by-play account will be that of Bob Wolff.

* * * *

TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

APR 19 1948

MUSIC

David Nilsson

CONDUCTORS MÜNCH & KOUSSEVITZKY
Beethoven's Eighth or Waterloo?

Very Koussevitzky

With the final chord of the Prelude to Die Meistersinger, the courtly figure on the podium put down his baton, bowed elegantly to his audience, and strode from the stage. The orchestra and audience remained in their seats, but Serge Koussevitzky did not return. In his place, amid a sudden hush, gold-spectacled Henry Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, slowly mounted the stage. The word had already gotten out that Harry Cabot had a very special announcement to make, and most of the audience had a good idea of what it was.

In 24 years, Bostonians had come to boast of their Russian-born conductor as their grandparents once boasted of Emerson or Dr. Holmes. He was a welcome autocrat at any Brahmin table, and when his concerts were over, Boston dowagers liked to flock backstage to kiss and be kissed on both cheeks.

Members of the orchestra were not so affectionate. They knew him in rehearsal as a sweatered tyrant ("Don't spik! If you spik, I go!") who would exhaust them by demanding repetitions until his long-awaited "Vonnderful! Ah, vonnderful!" finally came. But they shared with him a fierce pride in their orchestra, which Bostonians—critics, musicians and public—regard as America's best. (Less partisan critics believe that the Boston and the Philadelphia are hard to choose between, with the New York Philharmonic a strong third.)

No Ovation. Now Cabot, in his dry Yankee voice, read a letter from Koussevitzky, announcing his retirement. When Cabot had finished, he looked expectantly up at the balcony, but Koussevitzky was not sitting where Cabot had hoped he would be. His bride of a year, who was there, quietly slipped out. Koussevitzky had gone to his room to change his shirt; he wanted no demonstration.

The old conductor had carefully planned his retirement. "When I was young," he explained afterwards, "I told myself I would retire at the highest point in my career. I feel that it is the time." His 75th birthday comes in July 1949. Koussevitzky will go on conducting until he has celebrated his 25th anniversary in Boston next year—marking a longer period as conductor of the Boston Symphony than any man before him. He was pleased with his timing: "It is very Koussevitzky. It is my style."

No Shock. The choice of Koussevitzky's successor was something of a surprise, but not a shock. Koussevitzky's 29-year-old protégé Leonard Bernstein had long had the inside track with his sponsor, but not with the symphony's trustees. The post went instead to 56-year-old Alsatian Charles Münch, who first came to the U.S. in December 1946, has since guest-conducted in Boston, New York, Chicago and Los Angeles.

Bostonians will find some things about Charles Münch very Koussevitzky. As the elegant conductor of the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra ("the oldest and best orchestra in France," says Münch), "le beau Charles" was the idol of lady concertgoers. Like Koussevitzky himself (whose second wife was rich), Charles Münch is independently wealthy. His wife, the daughter of a Swiss condensed-milk millionaire, inherited a fortune said to be close to $1,000,000.

He is apt to be flashy in his conducting ("Was that the Beethoven Eighth," demanded one Proper Bostonian when Münch guest-conducted in Boston last year, "or the Battle of Waterloo?"). But when he is at his best, Bostonians will find the same electric brilliance and showy skill to which Koussevitzky has accustomed them.

LACONIA, N. H.
CITIZEN

APR 20 1948

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY RETIRES
(From the N. Y. Times)

When Dr. Serge Koussevitzky steps down at the end of next season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it will be at the age of 75 and after twenty-[illegible] years as its conductor and a[illegible] five decades of music making. Those acquainted with the [illegible]certs of the Boston Symphony [illegible] its annual visits to New York and over the radio will feel more than a twinge of regret at his departure. For under his aegis the Boston has become a virtuoso ensemble of first rank and the "Boston tone" a criterion for all but two [illegible] three other orchestras in the country.

His sympathy and [illegible] ing of contemporary music [illegible] been one of the most be[illegible] features of his tenure. He has not only played modern com[illegible] but by commissioning new [illegible] through the Koussevitzky F[illegible]tion has made it possible for [illegible] to come into being. His sum[illegible] concerts at Tanglewood hav[illegible] vided excellent music in be[illegible] surroundings and a valuable [illegible] ing school for instrument[illegible] conductors and composers.

It is pleasant to remember [illegible] Dr. Koussevitzky will ap[illegible] occasional guest conductor [illegible] will still be active during the summer months at Tanglewood. A[illegible] we know that his experie[illegible] counsel will be available [illegible] posers and students in the [illegible] years ahead which all those [illegible] lebted to him for his music mak[illegible] ng in the past will wish him

---

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 20 1948

Ho, Hum!

[illegible] controversy of [illegible] unimpressi[illegible]e proportions [illegible] question of whether [illegible] comers should be seate[illegible] has started. The [illegible] Academy Dr. Serge K[illegible] dered that no one be [illegible] had started Mozart's [illegible] symphony. The only rules [illegible] this are that when we [illegible] performance has starte[illegible] anyone to come climbin[illegible] we are late, we wou[illegible] between us and [illegible] seems to be some me[illegible] that, since the Mozart [illegible] breaks, needless inconve[illegible] fered by those compelled [illegible] it was over simply bec[illegible] conductor wanted it th[illegible]

NORWALK, CONN.
HOUR

APR 19 1948

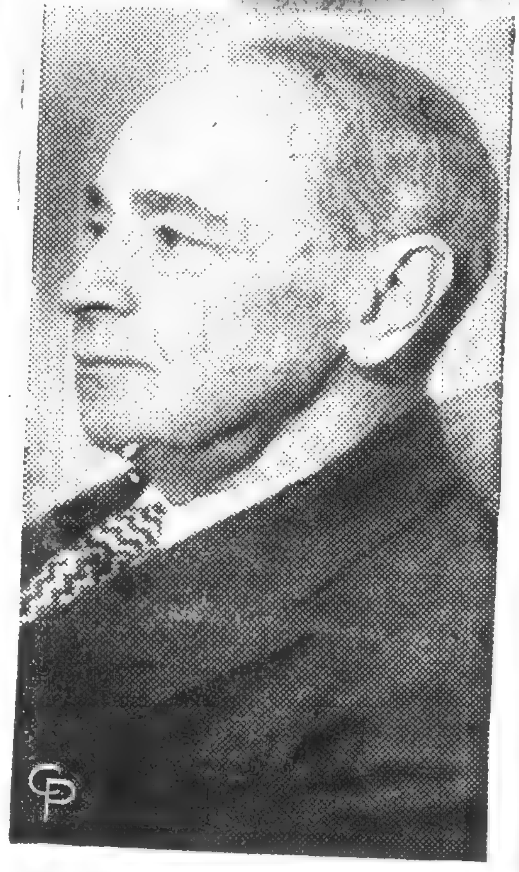
KOUSSEVITZKY AND

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky will remain as leader of the Berkshire Festival..

WINONA, MINN.
REPUBLICAN HERALD

APR 19 1948



AFTER 25 years as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 73, announces he will resign after the 1948 season.

MONMOUTH, ILL.
REVIEW ATLAS

APR 20 1948

MUSIC AND ART

By Prof. Thos. H. Hamilton

Koussevitzy has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to take effect at the close of next season, at which time he will have conducted it longer than any other man, having started in 1924. He will be succeeded by Charles Muench, now aged 56, an Alsatian-born conductor who has had a brilliant record in Paris. Both men married wealthy wives, and have had the means to get the necessary conducting experience with orchestras of their own.

ALLIANCE, O.
REVIEW

Drops Baton

After 25 years as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 73, announces he will resign after the 1948 season. (International)

[129]

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

APR 19 1948

The Peabody Award prize-winning program, "The Children's Hour" on WQQW, has acquired a sponsor starting on Saturday, May 1, at the new time of 10:30 a.m. Incidentally, the contract of sponsorship was signed before the awards were announced.

The 1947 Peabody Awards were made last Thursday at a luncheon in New York. Because of the high caliber of the judges, the breadth of the survey, and the painstaking method of selection, these awards are probably the most coveted in radio.

For the first time in the history of the awards a Washington station and program received one of the so-called "Oscars." The program so recognized was WQQW's "The Children's Hour," conducted by Carl Green and broadcast every Saturday morning.

Mr. Green is a 37-year-old bachelor who was an executive employe of the station when, with no previous radio or entertainment experience, he suddenly took to the air with "The Children's Hour."

The success of the program lies in Mr. Green's own personality and in his carefully chosen stories and musical selections. Many of the stories are written by Green himself.

In citing "The Children's Hour" program, the Peabody Award Committee said in part: "The fact that the program appeals to a group of children so often neglected in radio programs, the apparent sincerity which the personality of Carl Green reflects, and the original material so successfully used make this program outstanding. The unique spirit of the program has elicited the enthusiastic appreciation of young children, their parents and the press."

Other Peabody awards were made to ABC's "Theater Guild on the Air" and to CBS's "Studio One" for "outstanding entertainment in drama"; to ABC's Elmer Davis and the program "CBS Views the Press," "for outstanding reporting-interpretation of the news"; to the CBS documentary unit for "outstanding educational broadcasting"; to ABC's broadcasts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for "outstanding entertainment in music," and to three local stations in other cities for service to their communities.

* * * *

Walter Compton, WTTG-Dumont television station manager, announced this week that the Washington Senators baseball games will be seen and heard on his channel 5 ngton Senators' baseball games will be televised, 77 in all, including 6 double-headers and 38 night games. The voice in the background with the color and play-by-play account will be that of Bob Wolff.

CHICAGO, ILL.

APR 1

MUSIC

David Nilsson

CONDUCTORS MÜNCH & KOUSSEVITZKY
Beethoven's Eighth or Waterloo?

Very Koussevitzky

With the final chord of the Prelude to Die Meistersinger, the courtly figure on the podium put down his baton, bowed elegantly to his audience, and strode from the stage. The orchestra and audience remained in their seats, but Serge Koussevitzky did not return. In his place, amid a sudden hush, gold-spectacled Henry Cabot, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, slowly mounted the stage. The word had already gotten out that Harry Cabot had a very special announcement to make, and most of the audience had a good idea of what it was.

In 24 years, Bostonians had come to boast of their Russian-born conductor as their grandparents once boasted of Emerson or Dr. Holmes. He was a welcome autocrat at any Brahmin table, and when his concerts were over, Boston dowagers liked to flock backstage to kiss and be kissed on both cheeks.

Members of the orchestra were not so affectionate. They knew him in rehearsal as a sweatered tyrant ("Don't spik! If you spik, I go!") who would exhaust them by demanding repetitions until his long-awaited "Vonnderful! Ah, vonnderful!" finally came. But they shared with him a fierce pride in their orchestra, which Bostonians—critics, musicians and public—regard as America's best. (Less partisan critics believe that the Boston and the Philadelphia are hard to choose between, with the New York Philharmonic a strong third.)

No Ovation. [illegible] Cabot, in his dry Yankee voice, [illegible] Koussevitzky, announc[illegible] When Cabot had finished, [illegible] expectantly up at the balcony, but [illegible] was not sitting where Cabot had hoped he would be. His bride of a year, who was there, quietly slipped out. Koussevitzky had gone to his room to change his shirt; he wanted no demonstration.

The old conductor had carefully planned his retirement. "When I was young," he explained afterwards, "I told myself I would retire at the highest point in my career. I feel that it is the time." His 75th birthday comes in July 1949. Koussevitzky will go on conducting until he has celebrated his 25th anniversary in Boston next year—marking a longer period as conductor of the Boston Symphony than any man before him. He was pleased with his timing: "It is very Koussevitzky. It is my style."

No Shock. The choice of Koussevitzky's successor was something of a surprise, but not a shock. Koussevitzky's 29-year-old protégé Leonard Bernstein had long had the inside track with his sponsor, but not with the symphony's trustees. The post went instead to 56-year-old Alsatian Charles Münch, who first came to the U.S. in December 1946, has since guest-conducted in Boston, New York, Chicago and Los Angeles.

Bostonians will find some things about Charles Münch very Koussevitzky. As the elegant conductor of the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra ("the oldest and best orchestra in France," says Münch), "le beau Charles" was the idol of lady concert-goers. Like Koussevitzky himself (whose second wife was rich), Charles Münch is independently wealthy. His wife, the daughter of a Swiss condensed-milk millionaire, inherited a fortune said to be close to $1,000,000.

He is apt to be flashy in his conducting ("Was that the Beethoven Eighth," demanded one Proper Bostonian when Münch guest-conducted in Boston last year, "or the Battle of Waterloo?"). But when he is at his best, Bostonians will find the same electric brilliance and showy skill to which Koussevitzky has accustomed them.

LACONIA, N. H.
CITIZEN
APR 20 1948

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY RETIRES
(From the N. Y. Times)

When Dr. Serge Koussevitzky steps down at the end of next season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra it will be at the age of 75 and after twenty-five years as its conductor and after five decades of music making. Those acquainted with the concerts of the Boston Symphony in its annual visits to New York and over the radio will feel more than a twinge of regret at his departure. For under his aegis the Boston has become a virtuoso ensemble of first rank and the "Boston tone" a criterion for all but two or three other orchestras in the country.

His sympathy and understanding of contemporary music has been one of the most beguiling features of his tenure. He has not only played modern compositions but by commissioning new works through the Koussevitzky Foundation has made it possible for them to come into being. His summer concerts at Tanglewood have provided excellent music in beautiful surroundings and a valuable training school for instrumentalists, conductors and composers.

It is pleasant to remember that Dr. Koussevitzky will appear as an occasional guest conductor and will still be active during the summer months at Tanglewood. And we know that his experience and counsel will be available to composers and students in the long years ahead which all those indebted to him for his music making in the past will wish him.

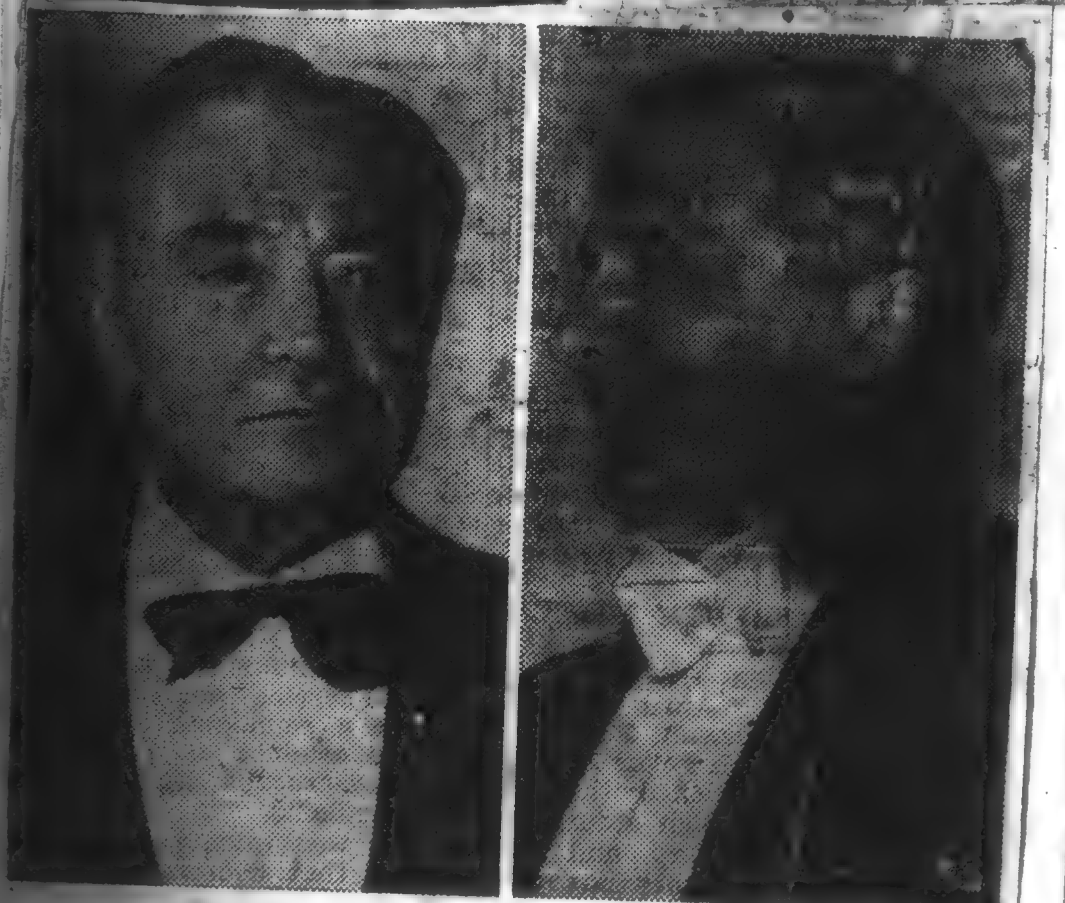
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 20 1948

Ho, Hum!

A controversy of terrifically unimpressive proportions is arising over the question of whether at a concert latecomers should be seated after the music has started. The other night at the Academy Dr. Serge Koussevitzky ordered that no one be seated after he had started Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony. The only rules we know about this are that when we are seated and a performance has started we do not want anyone to come climbing over us. When we are late, we would have everything between us and our seat removed. There seems to be some merit in a contention that, since the Mozart piece has definite breaks, needless inconvenience was suffered by those compelled to wait until it was over simply because the Boston conductor wanted it that way.

NORWALK, CONN.
HOUR
APR 19 1948

KOUSSEVITZKY AND



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (left), 74, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will retire at the end of his silver jubilee 1948-49 season, Henry B. Cabot, president of the trustees, said in Boston. His successor will be the 57-year-old Alsatian-born conductor Charles Muench (right), who has appeared several times with the Boston Symphony. He is the present leader of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra and the Paris Philharmonic.

Koussevitzky will remain as leader of the Berkshire Festival.

WINONA, MINN.
REPUBLICAN HERALD
APR 1

AFTER 25 years as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 73, announces he will resign after the 1948 season.

MONMOUTH, ILL.
REVIEW ATLAS
APR 20 1948

MUSIC AND ART

By Prof. Thos. H. Hamilton

Koussevitzy has resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, to take effect at the close of next season, at which time he will have conducted it longer than any other man, having started in 1924. He will be succeeded by Charles Muench, now aged 56, an Alsatian-born conductor who has had a brilliant record in Paris. Both men married wealthy wives, and have had the means to get the necessary conducting experience with orchestras of their

---

ALLIANCE, O.
REVIEW
APR 1948

Drops Baton

After 25 years as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 73, announces he will resign after the 1948 season. (International)

MUSIC

Münch of Boston

[illegible]

Münch it was. In October 1949, "le beau Charles," as the ladies in Paris used to call him, will take over as conductor of the world-famous precision instrument that is the Boston Symphony. Although Koussevitzky will continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center, Münch will conduct the popular Berkshire Festival concerts at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony's other home in Lenox, Mass.

Sings: All signs indicate that Münch will enjoy a great success at Beacon Hill and Back Bay tea parties. His personal charm is enormous. Although his spoken English is still very much on the tentative side, his French manner more than makes up for that. How the critics will take to him remains to be seen. He sings along with the strings as loud, if not louder, than Toscanini does. He shushes for pianissimos and exhorts for fortissimos. He may use a baton; or he may leave it idle in his left hand. He waves his arms and moves so violently that his hair falls into bangs across his forehead.

Never, however, does he appear to force tone, however louder than loudest he may have the orchestra play. And purity of tone is one of the hallmarks of the Boston Symphony. Just the week before his contract was signed, most of the Boston critics roundly roasted him for the speed and bombast which he put into the Beethoven Eighth and the Schumann Fourth. But when he does Berlioz and Honegger, few can find any fault.

However controversial Münch may prove, all the Boston critics are in agreement on one most significant point: The trustees of the orchestra at least took action and, unlike New York, Chicago, and Pittsburgh, did not follow the line of least resistance and hire a series of guest conductors. The Boston Symphony is a unique instrument, and it will be Münch, and Münch alone, who will be responsible for keeping it so.

---

he is fundamentally a [illegible] man, who sheds all his shyness the moment he starts conducting. Then he is absolutely inside the music, and wrapped up in it.

"The combination of personal shyness and public poise is not so unusual in artists. They may be retiring away from their work, but when it comes to the natural sublimation, the natural outlet of an artist, whether writing, acting, or conducting, then the personal shyness vanishes and the communicating artist emerges."

We of Boston shall not know exactly what manner of man is Charles Munch for 18 months. But we may be certain of one thing: His administration at Symphony Hall will be lively and full of interest.

No Dots for 'U,' So Munch Settles for 'Munch'

Already there is speculation on the proper spelling and pronunciation of the name of Charles Munch, Alsace-born conductor who will succeed Serge Koussevitzky as music director of the Boston Symphony at the close of the 1948-49 season.

Since American newspapers do not have typesetting machines which will set certain letters with the Germanic umlaut (two little dots over a letter) the problem is a testy one. Munch's name should have the two little dots over the "u". Some newspapers have spelled his name Muench, which is a fair approximation and a key to the proper pronunciation.

That has been the accepted spelling until Munch made his preference known. When informed by John N. Burk, program annotator for the Boston Symphony, that American newspapers cannot print the umlaut "u" Munch said he preferred it to be spelled "Munch" and to be pronounced in the French manner.

WINONA, MINN.
REPUBLICAN HERALD

APR 24 1948

Boston Symphony Season Will Be Concluded Tuesday

The Boston Symphony orchestra will conclude another season of broadcasts over ABC and KWNO Tuesday, at 8:30 p. m.

Serge Koussevitzky, who will be on the podium completing 24 years of service as conductor of the ensemble, has announced his retirement at the close of next season, ending one of the longest tenures in this country by a major orchestral conductor.

The season's climax program will be devoted to Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" with the chorus combining the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth. Soloists will include Ellen Faull, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, David Lloyd, tenor, and George London, bass.

On Tuesday, May 4, ABC will broadcast the first of several programs by the Boston "Pops" orchestra with Arthur Fieldler again conducting. These will continue through June 29. On July 6 and 13, the broadcasts will come from the Esplanade on the Charles river and on July 20, the first of four broadcasts of the Berkshire Music Festival will be heard.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA.
TIMES-UNION

APR 23 1948

"Spike Jones yearns to conduct a symphony orchestra"—which seems to take care of a vacancy left in Boston by Koussevitzky. Any further questions on matters of personnel placement?

SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES

APR [illegible]

CLASSICAL HIT PARADE IN U. S. IS LED BY RED

Huge American Royalties Going to Composer Khachaturian

New York, April 24 (P).—Soviet Composer Aram Khachaturian, who has headed the classical hit parade in the United States for the last 21 weeks, is receiving his huge American royalties in Rusisa, his agents said today.

Louis Levy, president of the Leeds Music corporation said Khachaturian shows "lively interest" in his sales in America which must mean that he is receiving the money Leeds sends to Russia for him.

The Khachaturian royalties are estimated as a "small fortune." Leeds declined to reveal the amount but all the recording companies have recorded his Gayne Ballet Suite and the Masquerade Suite in their entirety and they have sold in millions of copies, especially "The Sabre Dance" from "Gayne."

The radio stations have been broadcasting Khachaturian's music regularly and juke boxes have swallowed great piles of his records. Levy said he has completely outsold any American or foreign classical composer for 21 weeks.

The two other top Soviet composers, Sergei Prokofieff and Dimitri Shostakovitch sell enough phonograph records and are played on enough radio programs to make their royalties sizable too. Added to Khachaturian's, theirs make the money going to Russia annually, a six-figure sum, it was said.

Levy ascribed the popularity of the Russian composers to the "simplicity" of their works which appeals to the "masses."

"The Communist party wasn't wrong," he said, "when it called down the composers for writing music above the heads of the people. Music like that does not sell."

For example, Levy said, Prokofieff's "Holiday Poem," one of the pieces severely criticized by the central committee, was sent to Conductor Serge Koussevitsky of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be introduced to the American public.

Koussevitsky, a friend of Prokofieff's, "regretfully" returned it saying it was too complicated for general consumption.

"That's the reason," Levy explained, land and a number of other Ameriland an da number of other American composers don't go over in their own country. People want to hear music simply enough to feel."

The Russians are retaining their musical popularity despite the present anti-Communist sentiment, Levy said.

"I guess the people love and understand Russian music enough to have the sense to divorce communist art in their minds from communist politics," he said.

As for the Soviet composers' attack on Hollywood for using their music in an anti-Soviet movie, Levy thought that was "justified."

"After all," he said, "Irving Berlin wouldn't like his stuff played in a movie running down America. Why shouldn't the Rusisans have the same kind of patriotism?"

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE

Music For You

Loss Of Serge Koussevitsky Bemoaned

The names of Koussevitsky and Boston Symphony orchestra have [illegible] that the idea of separation seems as impossible as that of removing the O from H2O. However, with the forthcoming resignation of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky that is precisely [illegible] leadership of [illegible] representa[illegible] capital [illegible] We [illegible] who [illegible] pay tribute to the artistic expert which characterizes this man of music.

Cheaper Organ

Organ enthusiasts will be interested to know that Wurlitzer (producer of those mighty theater and concert hall organs) is preparing to put on the market, an organ smaller in size, with two manuals at a price decidedly low (for organs, that is).

HARRISBURG, PA.
PATRIOT

APR 22 1948

DROPS BOSTON BATON

After 25 years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 73, announces he will resign after the 1948 season.

LYNN, MASS.
TELEGRAM-NEWS

APR 23 1948

Drops Boston Baton

AFTER 25 years as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 73, announces he will resign after the 1948 season. (International)

[130]

sweek, April 19, 1948

MUSIC

Münch of Boston

Would the Friends of the Boston Symphony, requested Henry B. Cabot, president of the orchestra's trustees, please remain seated after the music; there would be an important announcement. The approximately 700 Friends (contributors to the symphony) who were present in Symphony Hall for their annual meeting on April 8 raised a collective eyebrow. After the music, they generally had tea in the Huntington Avenue foyer. However, when Serge Koussevitzky had finished conducting two Preludes by Wagner, the Friends stayed in their seats.

The announcement was that 74-year-old Koussevitzky, their adored conductor for 24 years, was going to retire at the end of the 1948-49 season. Since next year will mark his 25th anniversary with the orchestra, the Boston Symphony would celebrate 1948-49 as the Silver Jubilee Season of Serge Koussevitzky. All this was no great surprise, for rumors of his impending retirement have been going the rounds for several years.

Then came the answer to the question the music world has been asking for just as long: When Koussevitzky finally did retire, who would succeed him? Would it be Leonard Bernstein, his young protégé? Would it be Charles Münch, the silver-haired Alsatian who has taken most of the major American symphonies by storm since he began guest-conducting in this country in December 1946? Or would it be the dynamic Greek from Minneapolis, Dimitri Mitropoulos?

Münch it was. In October 1949, "le beau Charles," as the ladies in Paris used to call him, will take over as conductor of the world-famous precision instrument that is the Boston Symphony. Although Koussevitzky will continue as director of the Berkshire Music Center, Münch will conduct the popular Berkshire Festival concerts at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony's other home in Lenox, Mass.

Sings: All signs indicate that Münch will enjoy a great success at Beacon Hill and Back Bay tea parties. His personal charm is enormous. Although his spoken English is still very much on the tentative side, his French manner more than makes up for that. How the critics will take to him remains to be seen. He sings along with the strings as loud, if not louder, than Toscanini does. He shushes for pianissimos and exhorts for fortissimos. He may use a baton; or he may leave it idle in his left hand. He waves his arms and moves so violently that his hair falls into bangs across his forehead.

Never, however, does he appear to force tone, however louder than loudest he may have the orchestra play. And purity of tone is one of the hallmarks of the Boston Symphony. Just the week before his contract was signed, most of the Boston critics roundly roasted him for the speed and bombast which he put into the Beethoven Eighth and the Schumann Fourth. But when he does Berlioz and Honegger, few can find any fault.

However controversial Münch may prove, all the Boston critics are in agreement on one most significant point: The trustees of the orchestra at least took action and, unlike New York, Chicago, and Pittsburgh, did not follow the line of least resistance and hire a series of guest conductors. The Boston Symphony is a unique instrument, and it will be Münch, and Münch alone, who will be responsible for keeping it so.

---

he is fundamentally a [illegible] man, who sheds all his shyness the moment he starts conducting. Then he is absolutely inside the music and wrapped up in it.

"The combination of personal shyness and public poise is not so unusual in artists. They may be retiring away from their work, but when it comes to the natural sublimation, the natural outlet of an artist, whether writing, acting, or conducting, then the personal shyness vanishes and the communicating artist emerges."

We of Boston shall not know exactly what manner of man is Charles Munch for 18 months. But we may be certain of one thing: His administration at Symphony Hall will be lively and full of interest.

No Dots for 'U,' So Munch Settles for 'Munch'

Already there is speculation on the proper spelling and pronunciation of the name of Charles Munch, Alsace-born conductor who will succeed Serge Koussevitzky as music director of the Boston Symphony at the close of the 1948-49 season.

Since American newspapers do not have typesetting machines which will set certain letters with the Germanic umlaut (two little dots over a letter) the problem is a testy one. Munch's name should have the two little dots over the "u". Some newspapers have spelled his name Muench, which is a fair approximation and a key to the proper pronunciation.

That has been the accepted spelling until Munch made his preference known. When informed by John N. Burk, program annotator for the Boston Symphony, that American newspapers cannot print the umlaut "u" Munch said he preferred it to be spelled "Munch" and to be pronounced in the French manner.

WINONA, MINN.
REPUBLICAN HERALD
APR 24

Boston Symphony Season Will Be Concluded Tuesday

The Boston Symphony orchestra will conclude another season of broadcasts over ABC and KWNO Tuesday, at 8:30 p. m.

Serge Koussevitzky, who will be on the podium completing 24 years of service as conductor of the ensemble, has announced his retirement at the close of next season, ending one of the longest tenures in this country by a major orchestral conductor.

The season's climax program will be devoted to Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" with the chorus combining the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, prepared by G. Wallace Woodworth. Soloists will include Ellen Faull, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, David Lloyd, tenor, and George London, bass.

On Tuesday, May 4, ABC will broadcast the first of several programs by the Boston "Pops" orchestra with Arthur Fiedler again conducting. These will continue through June 29. On July 6 and 13, the broadcasts will come from the Esplanade on the Charles river and on July 20, the first of four broadcasts of the Berkshire Music Festival will be heard.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA.
TIMES-UNION
APR 23 1948

"Spike Jones yearns to conduct a symphony orchestra"—which seems to take care of a vacancy left in Boston by Kousevitzky. Any further questions on matters of personnel placement?

SHREVEPORT, LA.
TIMES
APR 25 1948

CLASSICAL HIT PARADE IN U. S. IS LED BY RED

Huge American Royalties Going to Composer Khachaturian

New York, April 24 (UP).—Soviet Composer Aram Khachaturian, who has headed the classical hit parade in the United States for the last 21 weeks, is receiving his huge American royalties in Rusisa, his agents said today.

Louis Levy, president of the Leeds Music corporation said Khachaturian shows "lively interest" in his sales in America which must mean that he is receiving the money Leeds sends to Russia for him.

The Khachaturian royalties are estimated as a "small fortune." Leeds declined to reveal the amount but all the recording companies have recorded his Gayne Ballet Suite and the Masquerade Suite in their entirety and they have sold in millions of copies, especially "The Sabre Dance" from "Gayne."

The radio stations have been broadcasting Khachaturian's music regularly and juke boxes have swallowed great piles of his records. Levy said he has completely outsold any American or foreign classical composer for 21 weeks.

The two other top [illegible] composers, Sergei Prokofieff and Dimitri Shostakovitch sell enough phonograph records and are played on enough radio programs to make their royalties sizable too. Added to Khachaturian's, theirs make the money going to Russia annually, a six-figure sum, it was said.

Levy ascribed the popularity of the Russian composers to the "simplicity" of their works which appeals to the "masses."

"The Communist party wasn't wrong," he said, "when it called down the composers for writing music above the heads of the people. Music like that does not sell."

For example, Levy said, Prokofieff's "Holiday Poem," one of the pieces severely criticized by the central committee, was sent to Conductor Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be introduced to the American public.

Koussevitzky, a friend of Prokofieff's, "regretfully" returned it saying it was too complicated for general consumption.

"That's the reason," Levy explained, land and a number of other Ameriland an da number of other American composers don't go over in their own country. People want to hear music simply enough to feel."

The Russians are retaining their musical popularity despite the present anti-Communist sentiment, Levy said.

"I guess the people love and understand Russian music enough to have the sense to divorce communist art in their minds from communist politics," he said.

As for the Soviet composers' attack on Hollywood for using their music in an anti-Soviet movie, Levy thought that was "justified."

"After all," he said, "Irving Berlin wouldn't like his stuff played in a movie running down America. Why shouldn't the Rusisans have the same kind of patriotism?"

HAVERHILL, MASS.
GAZETTE
APR 22 1948

Music For You

Loss Of Serge Koussevitsky Bemoaned

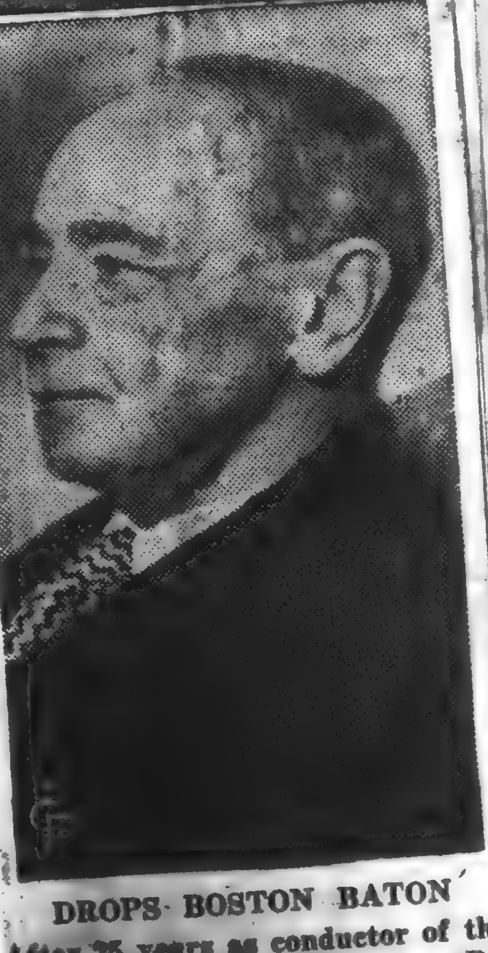
The names of Koussevitsky and Boston Symphony orchestra have been so closely allied that the idea of separation seems as impossible as that of removing the O from H2O. However, with the forthcoming resignation of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, that is precisely what is happening.

Under the skillful leadership of Dr. Koussevitsky, the representative orchestra of our state capital has risen to great heights. We, who are musicians and we, who are lovers of music, pay tribute to the artistic expert which characterizes this man of music.

Cheaper Organ

Organ enthusiasts will be interested to know that Wurlitzer (producer of those mighty theater and concert hall organs) is preparing to put on the market, an organ smaller in size, with two manuals at a price decidedly low (for organs, that is).

HARRISBURG, PA.
PATRIOT
22 1948



DROPS BOSTON BATON

After 25 years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 73, announces he will resign after the 1948 season.

LYNN, MASS.
TELEGRAM-NEWS
APR 23 1948

Drops Boston Baton

AFTER 25 years as conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 73, announces he will resign after the 1948 season. (International)

[130]

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

Records In Review

By NORMAN NAIRN

STRAVINSKY: L'Histoire du Soldat and Octet for Wind Instruments. Leonard Bernstein conducting members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Provocative music, both of these compositions, and both recorded at Tanglewood, Mass., during the 1947 Berkshire Music Festival.

Composed during World War 1 and performed first at Lausanne in 1918, "L' Histoire du Soldat" fulfilled the composer's ambition to set to music the ancient Russian fairy tale concerning a soldier, his violin and the devil. It has been presented in ballet form three times in this country, the last in New York in 1946.

Stravinsky's title page designates the work as intended to be "read, played and danced." The synopsis should be read in entirety before the listener turns on the music, otherwise its full conception might not be realized. In its unusual scoring the piece is set for only seven instruments, clarient, bassoon, trumpet, trombone, violin, double bass and percussion.

The Octet, scored for flute, clarinet, two bassoons, two trombones and two trumpets, is graceful and vivacious. Bernstein, who has an aptitude for contemporary music, receives from the excellent Boston performers sterling collaboration. Recording fine. (RCA Victor, five 12-inch records.)

SCHUMANN: Symphony No. 3 in E flat, Opus 97 (Rhenish). Dimitri Mitropoulos conducting the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. Despite the numbering, this is Schumann's last symphony, and while he indicated no programmatic intentions, it is known he sought to evoke his enthusiastic reaction to the Rhineland.

Mitropolous brings out the exuberance and joy of the work in a markedly balanced interpretation. Fine value all around, recording good. (RCA Victor, four 12-inch records.)

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 26 1948

LETTERS TO THE EAGLE

Defends Dr. Koussevitzky's Instructions for Late Comers

To the Editor of the Eagle:

As a subscriber to the concerts of the Boston Symphony for many years, in Boston, and of late years in New York; as well as a subscriber to many other series of top-notch musical programs, I must take exception to Mr. Ball's support of audience-rudeness.

If there is anything more annoying to those who really appreciate fine music, finely produced, than late comers interrupting the continuity of the program and climbing over them in the dark, I don't know what it is. And why top-notch performers and conductors should be asked to stand that peculiar type of rudeness is something else that is difficult to understand.

If every conductor would issue instructions such as Dr. Koussevitzky issued to late comers to last Friday's concert it is my guess that subscribers would make whatever added effort was necessary to be in their seats at a scheduled time.

BARBARA BICKFORD.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 27 1948

MAYES QUITS ORCHESTRA

First 'Cellist for Philadelphia Troupe Decides to Resign

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PHILADELPHIA, April 26—Samuel Mayes, 30-year-old first 'cellist of the Philadelphia Orchestra, has resigned and reportedly will assume a similar post with the Boston Symphony, it was announced today.

The resignation was accepted with regret by Eugene Ormandy, musical director, and the executive committee of the orchestra. "The selection of the new first 'cellist probably will not be attempted until the orchestra has completed its six-week tour," said Harl McDonald, manager.

Mr. Mayes' resignation does not become effective until after the 12,000-mile cross-country tour, with forty-one concerts scheduled between now and June.

ROCKFORD, ILL.
REGISTER
APR 27 1948

Symphony Ends Season Tonight

Koussevitsky Completes 24 Years on Podium

The ~~Boston Symphony~~ orchestra, which last week climaxed a long list of awards and commendations by receiving a coveted Peabody award for the "best in music on the air," will conclude another season of broadcasts over WROK-ABC tonight at 8:30. Serge Koussevitsky, who will be on the podium completing 24 years of service as conductor of the orchestra, has announced his retirement at the close of next season, ending one of the longest tenures in this country by a major orchestral conductor, Tonight's program will be devoted to Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" with the chorus combing the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society. Soloists will include Ellen Faull, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and George London, bass.

Comedian Jimmy Durante will be Bop Hope's guest on his broadcast tonight at 9 over WMAQ-NBC.

"Beware the Woman" is the title of the Big Town dramatization on WBBM-CBS tonight at 7.

America's Town Meeting of the Air, on WROK-ABC tonight at 7:30, will discuss "Will the Third Party Bring Us Peace and Prosperity?" Participating will be Senator Glen H. Taylor (Dem., Idaho), vice presidential candidate on Henry A. Wallace's third party ticket; James Stewart Martin, chairman of the Progressive party in Maryland; Dwight MacDonald, editor and publisher of "Politica," and Columnist Dorothy Thompson. George V. Denny, Jr., will moderate.

Henry Weber will conduct the Chicago Philharmonic orchestra tonight at 8:30 over WGN. The program will include the "Water Music" suite by Handel and "Don Juan" by Strauss.

Studio One, hour-long dramatization on WBBM-CBS tonight at 9 o'clock, will star Charles Laughton in a radio version of the novel "South Riding."

The Winnebago County Cancer society will present the Rockford Radio Council broadcast over WROK this evening at 7. The program, which is titled "People Are Talking," will feature an all-star cast of the American Cancer society including John Burlend, commentator; Miss Kate Leonard, nine-year-old child; Mrs. Mildred Bettner, housewife; Reede Serle, high school student; Mrs. Edward Guagliatta, Mrs. Axel Eklund, Raymond D. Nihan, Joseph Ramsey and Dr. William [illegible] Ford.

"Do We Need a Federated World Government?" will be discussed on Your Right to Say It tonight at 9:30 over WGN.

HOUSTON, TEX.
POST
28

Munch's Houston Date Unaffected By Boston Deal

The recent appointment of Charles Munch, noted Parisian conductor, to succeed Serge Koussevitsky as director ~~of the~~ Boston Symphony orchestra will not interfere with his appearance in Houston next fall at the head of the French Orchestre National.

Mrs. Edna W. Saunders, who has booked Munch and the Orchestre National to open her season next Nov. 8, issued a statement Tuesday concerning the status of the Paris conductor, to settle confusion among her patrons.

The resignation of Koussevitzky as head of the Boston orchestra does not become effective till the close of the 1948-49 season. Munch's connection in Boston will begin in the autumn of 1949. The French conductor is thus available for an American tour next fall.

Jack Adams, Munch's New York agent, notified Mrs. Saunders by letter Tuesday that Munch will conduct in Houston and all other cities to be visited by the Orchestre National.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

BY CYRUS DURGIN

Three symphonies form the farewell program of Charles Muench as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are the "Prague" (K.504) of Mozart, the Eighth of Beethoven, and the Fourth of Robert Schumann. On each of the other programs Mr. Muench conducted here there was at least one piece of French music. Such a list—in this case exclusively German—was just what some had been waiting for: to see what the excellent French conductor would do with other than French works.

The Mozart went beautifully, with every voice sounding clear, the whole full-bodied and taken at the right pace. Mr. Muench neither overrefined Mozart nor did he coarsen him. Everything sang and everybody was happy.

With Beethoven of the graceful little Eighth Symphony, however, it was a different and a startling, perhaps dismaying, story. Dynamically speaking, this was the most inappropriate performance of this score I have heard from first-rank forces. Mr. Muench observed every expression mark, but the whole Symphony was far too loud and far too tense. As a result the texture was thick; you missed most of the detail of the inner voices, and whenever there was a little solo passage for any wind instrument it sounded strained. It seemed, too, as if Mr. Muench had rehearsed the Eighth at a slower tempo and then speeded up in performance, for many times the orchestra was scrambling to keep together.

During the Schumann D minor Symphony, orchestra and Mr. Muench were back at their usual excellence, and here you had a wondrously vital performance of a wondrously romantic score. Again, every marking of the work was meticulously observed, save for a diminuendo that began two measures late in the first movement, and a ritard where none was indicated in the finale. Some of the sudden accents for strings were too heavy, but otherwise this was admirable Schumann.

These observations are made purely as a matter of reporting, for we all know that, by and large, Mr. Muench is a conductor of skill, taste, authority, experience and polish. Perhaps, like many another, he may be carried away on occasion by his own intensity. All the same it has been rewarding to hear him and [illegible] the Boston audiences would like to hear him again. Their applause yesterday proved that beyond a doubt.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

I have always thought that Dr. Koussevitzky (when his evil genius possessed him) could get more unnecessary noise and excitement out of an orchestra than anyone around. Well, compared with Charles Muench, who is concluding a two-weeks engagement at Symphony Hall this week, Dr. Koussevitzky, in his wildest moments is mild and gentle as a lamb, a model of reticence and restraint.

This idea suggested itself last fall when Mr. Muench jazzed up the Symphony of Cesar Franck in a fashion truly extraordinary. He went to town yesterday afternoon on two pieces in which such goings-on were, if anything, less appropriate, the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven and the Fourth of Schumann. During the intermission one member of the audience queried: "Was that the Beethoven Eighth or the Battle of Waterloo?" That, however, was not the general reaction. There was long and continued applause at the end of the Beethoven and cheering and stamping when the Schumann was done.

It would seem as though Mr. Muench is sadly deficient in what is known as a sense of style, and that he has little feeling for the personality of composers. For him Franck, Beethoven and Schumann are all to be treated as a combination of Tchaikovsky and Liszt. Now, Beethoven's Eighth is a little symphony; the composer himself so referred to it. It is also playful, though not quite in the manner of Haydn. This is the playfulness of a Titan. There are strong dynamic contrasts; there are such things as that amazingly irrelevant C-sharp in the finale. There points should be made; but they should not be made with a sledgehammer.

TEL. HA 6-0830

As for the romantic Symphony of Schumann, we heard a finer and far more just performance earlier in the season from the orchestra of the Conservatory under Malcolm Holmes. That was Schumann. The composer set forth yesterday was one whom I could not identify. Even the Romanza, where a little poetry might have been expected, became a sort of wail. There was, to be sure, felicitous and arresting moments both here and in the Beethoven, but they were swallowed up in the tastelessness, the tactlessness of the whole.

To end on a pleasanter note, the concert began with an altogether admirable rendition of Mozart's "Prague" Symphony. Mr. Muench made you realize that not only does this Symphony stand next to the last three in point of time, it also comes close to them in its beauty, its dramatic fire. That one performance made the afternoon worthwhile. But why, oh why, can't Mr. Muench take things more easily?

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

The 22d concert by the Boston Sy hony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky co ucting, was given yesterday afternoon ymphony Hall. Eleanor Steber, sopra was the soloist. The program was as fo ows:

Symphony No. 3 in F major, Op. 90 .... B
"Knoxville: Summer of 1915." Op. 24 .... Bar
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43 .... Sib

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The only novelty on yesterday's program, sandwiched between thos massive old friends, Brahms No. 3 and Sibelius No. 2, was the firs performance anywhere of Samu Barber's setting of part of a pro poem by James Agee, "Knoxvill Summer of 1915." I remember Age very well. We were both studen in Bernard De Voto's composition class in Harvard in 1930-31, and was by far the most promising an talented member therein. I cann say with any conviction, thoug that that promise has been he fullfilled. "Improvisatory" writin or not, such phrases as "switchin their weight of aestival body" a "squared with clowns in hue amber" convey little of either meaning or imagery to me. Rather do this writing seem a vague oath allegiance to the Gertrude St banner.

Nevertheless Mr. Barber wen boldly ahead and attempted to fetter it to music. He was closest t the text when he was writing a not unconventional summer nocturne, but most of the time he merel abandoned the text in the task of composing fairly pleasant vocalise The loud shrieks on the word "mother," may have appeared to some in the audience to have threatened our favorite American institution, but in the main Mr. Barber has composed nothing in the least startling. Candidly, "Knoxville:

ymphonic Reflections of Old Customer

Bristol Devotee Has Open Mind About New Conductor

By G. Y. LOVERIDGE

NOW [illegible] the Boston Symphony Orchestra is about to [illegible] conductors again, for the [illegible] in 24 years, it may be [illegible] hear a word from a man who has seen and heard all [illegible] orchestra's nine conductors [illegible].

[illegible] George Frederic Phillips [illegible] Road, Bristol, [illegible] one year of Boston [illegible] concerts in Providence. The first conductor, George [illegible] the position from [illegible]. Mr. Phillips didn't see [illegible] Henri Rabaud, who was [illegible]. But he did [illegible] Wilhelm Gericke 1884-1889, [illegible] Arthur Nikisch, 1889-[illegible] Emil Paur, 1893-1898; Karl [illegible] 1912-1918; Max [illegible] Pierre Monteux, [illegible] and Serge Koussevitzky, [illegible] present. Mr. Phillips [illegible] a view of Charles [illegible] to follow Dr. Koussevitzky [illegible] 1949.

